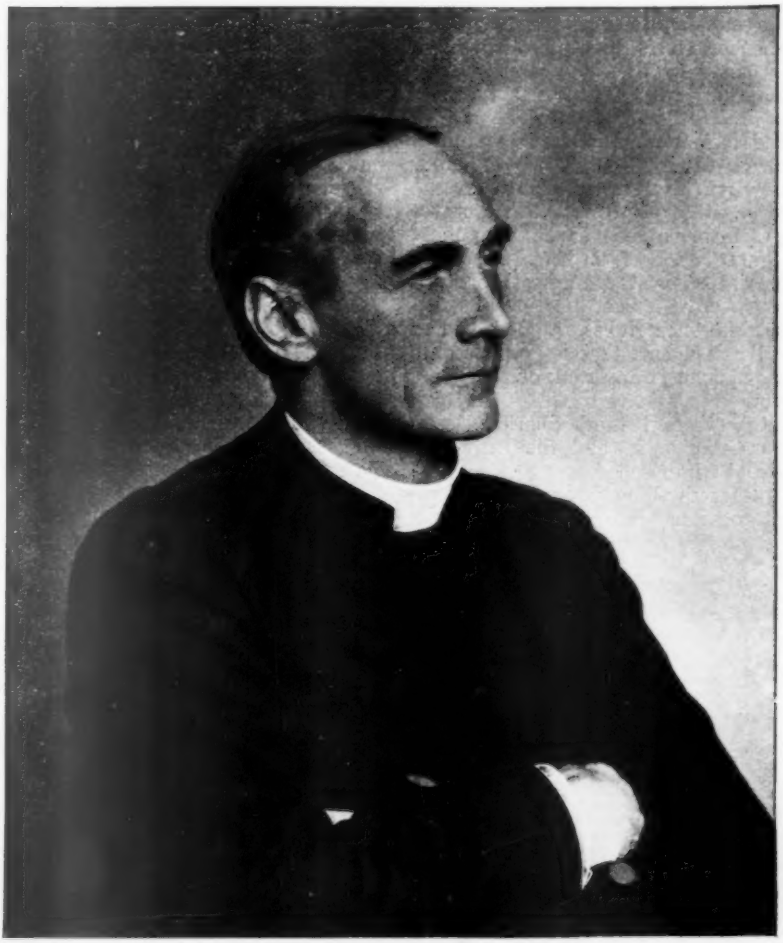
THE QUIVER

ANNUAL VOLUME, 1904

Principal Contributors

The Venerable the Archdeacon of Westminster
The Rev. Frederick Hastings
F. M. Holmes
The Rev. H. B. Freeman, M.A.
The Rev. Alexander McLaren, D.D.
D. L. Woolmer
The Rev F. S. Webster, M.A.
The Rev. A. B. Boyd-Carpenter, M.A.
May Crommelin
The Rev. R. F. Horton, D.D.
The late Rev. Hugh Macmillan, D.D., LL.D., F.R.S.E.
Howard Angus Kennedy
The Rev. J. S. Banks, D.D.
The Rev. R. J. Campbell, M.A.
Morice Gerard
The Rev. Canon W. Hay M. H. Aitken, M.A.
Ethel F. Heddle
Elizabeth L. Banks
The Rev. Thomas Spurgeon
Raymond Blathwayt
The Very Rev. the Dean of Gloucester
The Rev. W. W. Tulloch, D.D.
L. G. Moberly
Scott Graham
Myra Hamilton
Professor Sir Frederick Bridge M.V.O., Mus.D.
Katharine Tynan
The Rev. Mark Guy Pearse
The Very Rev. the Dean of St. Patrick's
Harry Davies
The Ven. Archdeacon Wynne, D.D.
Sir A. C. Mackenzie, Mus.D., LL.D.
The Rev. J. Monro Gibson, D.D.
Richard Mudie-Smith
The Ven. the Archdeacon of London
Agnes Giberne
Sarah A. Tooley
Christopher Hare
The Rev. Canon Sutton, M.A.
The Rev. J. G. McPherson, LL.D., F.R.S.E.
etc. etc.



CASSELL and COMPANY, LIMITED
London, Paris, New York & Melbourne
ALL RIGHTS RESERVED

THE QUIVER.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON: AN APPRECIATION.

By Raymond Blathwayt.

(Illustrated from Photographs, specially taken for THE QUIVER, by Cassell & Co., Ltd.)

THE BISHOP OF LONDON.

IN the best sense of the term, the Bishop of London is a man of the world—a man of the world, however, in whom there is not the faintest suspicion of the worldly man. Nor is the distinction so subtle as it might appear to be at first sight. Dr. Ingram is a man of the world in the lofty sense in which St. Paul meant it when he became "all things to all men," that by so doing he might win souls to Christ.

A real man of the world, in his highest avatar, I take it, is a man in full sympathy with his fellow-men, a man of culture, a man of affairs, and a man who, knowing his world, knows all and can pardon all, and is in absolute touch with all sorts and conditions of men and women around him.

Such a man is the present Bishop of London. He appeals to every section of society with equal force and entire sympathy, from the dainty and delicate lady who sits highest in the land, and whom we all so love and revere, to the crowds of rough, sceptical artisans and mechanics who throng a hall whenever it is announced that Dr. Ingram is going to give an address. It is a curious and, in some ways perhaps, a dangerous gift—that of universal popularity—and it is one of the few qualities which can be neither bought nor acquired, though now and again it is inherited.

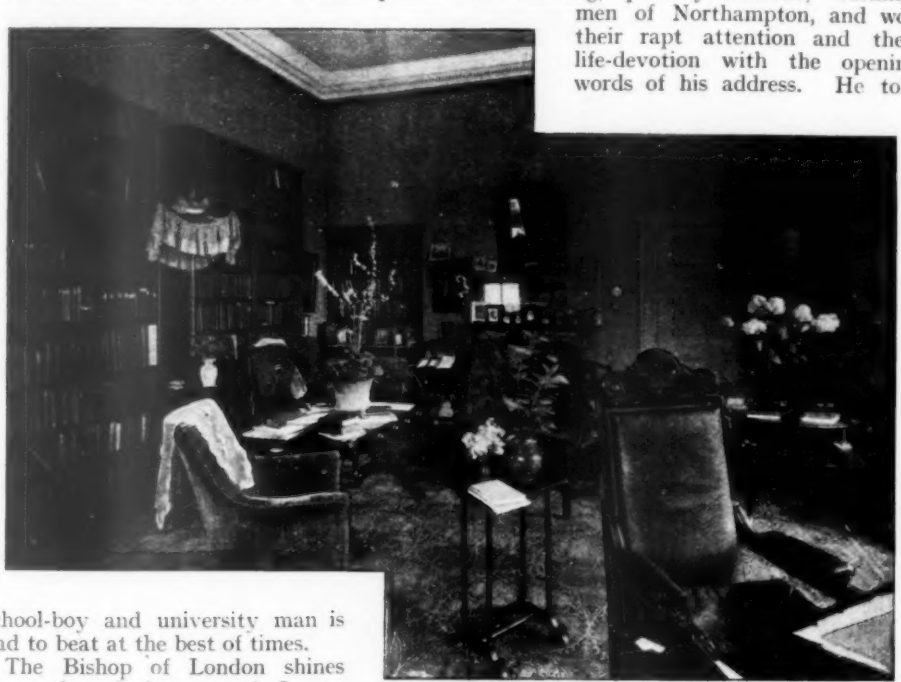
To be the centre of attraction in a crowd of pretty, fashionable women, the most popular guest at a West-End Bohemian club dinner, the most enthusiastically applauded speaker at a vast meeting of hard-headed working-men, takes a good deal of doing, and it is a task that is possible only to a very few men of any rank or profession whatsoever.

Lord Roberts and Lord Charles Beresford are capable of it, and the Bishop of London—and who else?

I am rather dwelling upon this perhaps somewhat obvious side of the Bishop's nature because to a certain extent it helps to explain the man and his marvellous versatility. He is not, so far as I understand, a great scholar; he is not, as a very near relation of his once put it to me, particularly clever; but he is essentially sympathetic.

And he is a man right through. Most emphatically he is not, as one of his leading clergy described him to me, a man of feminine nature. Such a man could be a leader neither of men nor of women. Dr. Ingram is essentially a man, and in no way more specially so than in his outspoken horror and contempt of hypocrisy. And this outspokenness is frequently of the greatest service to him and to the cause he has so much at heart. He is a power amongst working-men, for the reason that, while he is absolutely sympathetic with them in all their troubles, whether of body or of soul, physical or mental, he is able to see straight through them and thus to dominate them.

A certain type of secularist working-men—and I know them well—likes nothing so much as to get hold of a soft-hearted and half-baked curate or Dissenting minister, or, even better, some pretty delicate woman, and attempt to shock them with his crude blasphemies. And in nine cases out of ten he succeeds. But not with the Bishop of London.



"Don't talk rot!" he once smartly cried to a blatant fool of this description; and the man shrunk away, abashed and cowed alike by the Bishop's timely sternness and the hearty and enthusiastic applause of his secularist companions.

THE COURTYARD, FULHAM PALACE.

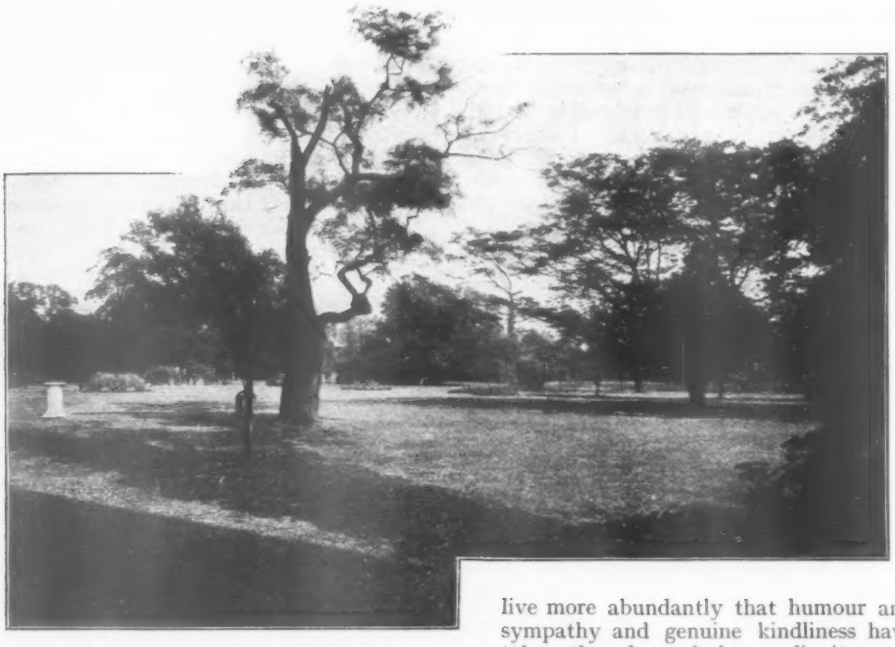
It is at such a moment as this that the Bishop shows himself a man of the world. And, indeed, a well-bred, well-read public school-boy and university man is bad to beat at the best of times.

THE BISHOP'S STUDY.

The Bishop of London shines upon the platform — and I use the expression advisedly, for from every point of view he presents a striking and a remarkable figure. He is a man of singularly winning personality. Tall, slight, with an atmosphere about him of eternal youth; a keen, clear-cut, clean-shaven face, humorous eyes, a clever, mobile, but well-disciplined mouth — and no feature denotes character so truly or gives away a man so fatally as the mouth, and a delightfully sympathetic, somewhat pleasantly hoarse voice—and its hoarseness is mainly responsible for its singular charm —Dr. Ingram wins his auditory in his opening sentence.

I heard him a few months ago at the great working-men's meeting at the Church Congress at Northampton, where he was, even in that hotbed of secularism and anti-clericalism, immeasurably the most popular figure among the many distinguished and world-famed men upon the platform.



His reception was tremendous, and when the enthusiasm of applause at his mere appearance had died down, it woke up into renewed life and energy as his pleasing voice broke the sudden stillness.

He stood before the keen, hard-headed, free-thinking, possibly atheistic, working-men of Northampton, and won their rapt attention and their life-devotion with the opening words of his address. He told them, I remember, of his earliest experience of clerical work in the East of London.

"On my first Sunday," said he, "I addressed a crowd of working-men, and when I had finished, I said to them, 'What shall we talk about next Sunday?' and at once five hundred voices called out, 'Eternal punishment.'"

"'Eternal punishment'! That was a nice little subject to hurl at a young fellow 'out on his own' for the first time in his life."

The working-men screamed with delight, and with some interest I turned to see how the assembled bishops and dignitaries grouped around the speaker were taking the daring utterance, for daring it was when one recalled such men as Sydney Smith's Bishop of London, of whom he once spoke as "The Church of England and Mrs. Blomfield," or the stately figure of the Prince Bishop of Durham of the early part of the last century, or the chilly hauteur and awe-inspiring personality of a not very long dead prelate of Winchester.

A VIEW IN THE GROUNDS, FULHAM PALACE.

But they seemed to be, as a whole, happy and undisturbed, though one or two were obviously a little startled. And the Bishop went on :

" And then, of course, we discussed ' Who was Cain's wife ? ' Well, we settled that question quite satisfactorily, and very soon we buried Cain's wife in Bethnal Green ; and there she lies to-day, poor dear, at rest at last ! "

I remember thinking at the moment how clever it all was, even if it wasn't very dignified. It was the very essence, so I thought at the moment, of clever, high-class clap-trap—and I use the word in its very best sense, for remember there is a kind of clap-trap, of which this was an admirable specimen, which is infinitely more to the purpose than all the tomes of the Fathers or the platitudes of the wise. The old order changes, giving place to the new, and Dr. Ingram, realising that under that old order the Church of England were like to die of dignity, has resolved that so far as himself and his beloved working-men are concerned it shall live, and live more abundantly that humour and sympathy and genuine kindliness have taken the place of dreary dignity, and dull, doleful donnishness.

But pray understand I do not imply for a single moment that he does not possess dignity and plenty of it, and dignity of the highest possible quality—for there is the dignity of pomposity and there is the dignity of high office nobly borne, and of great responsibility manfully undertaken ; and no one in the world can be more dignified, or more rightly and properly conscious of his great position, than the present Bishop of London.

As I have endeavoured to show you, Dr. Ingram is nothing if he is not the working-men's cleric. He has been so all his life ; he will be so to the end of the chapter. His heart is in the East End. He told me himself one day, as we sat talking amid the historic splendour and beauty of Fulham Palace, that work among the working-classes was the most fascinating, and nothing rouses him so much as to assert that working-men have no sense of religion. He will vigorously assure you that the very reverse is the case, whilst at the same time he excuses their undeniable tendency to secularism and free-thought by the assertion that working-men see so much of the misery of the world that they (more than the prosperous merchant or well-to-do tradesman) are tempted to believe that, either God cannot cure the misery of humanity or else that He does not care to do so.

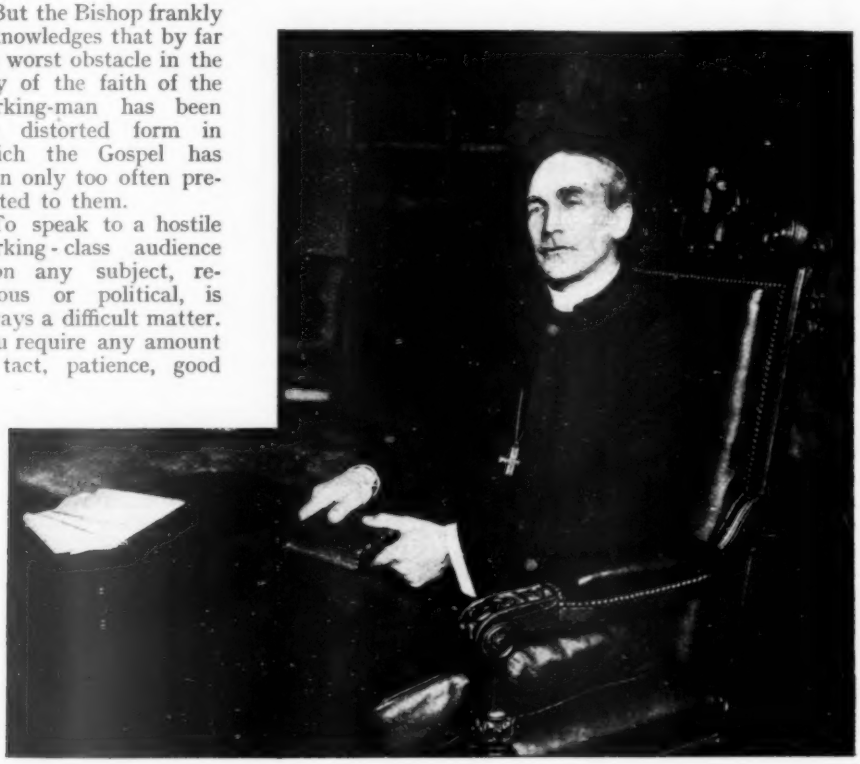
And then, again, he blames the clergy for this condition of working-class unbelief, in that they have not spoken out sufficiently strongly on the questions which are of vital interest to the poor—the housing question, sanitation, sweating, and the like.

And, again, he finds excuse for their infidelity in their extraordinary and amusingly innocent ignorance. He gives an apt instance of this.

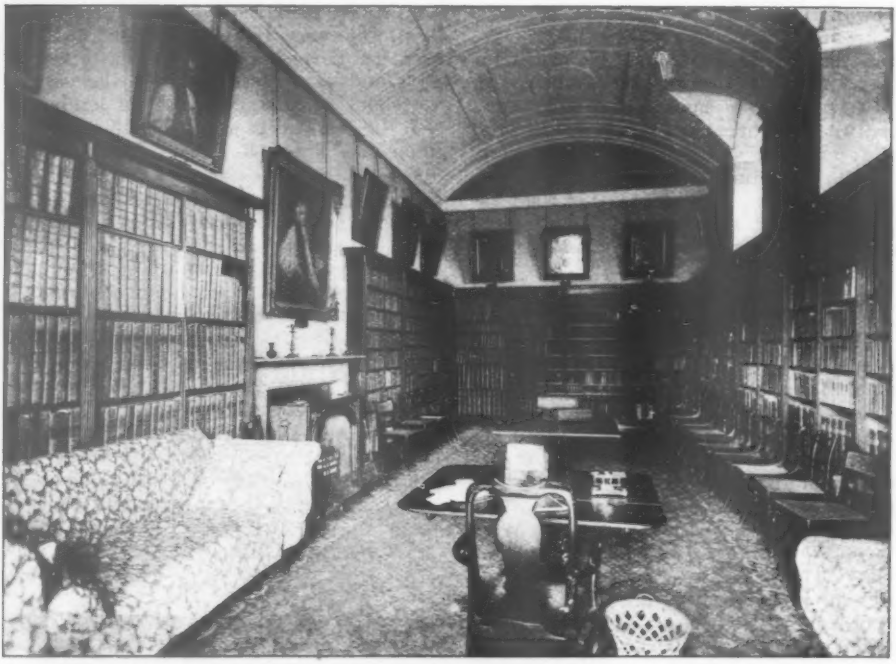
"One day," he tells his friends, "when I had explained at some length that most New Testament difficulties arose from mistranslations or misunderstanding of the original Greek text, such as in the case of 'Woman, what have I to do with thee?' 'Take no thought for the morrow.' etc. The only reply was this: 'Do you really suppose that if the Christian religion had been meant for the world, its documents would have been written in Greek at all?' What can you do in the face of such ignorance as that?"

But the Bishop frankly acknowledges that by far the worst obstacle in the way of the faith of the working-man has been the distorted form in which the Gospel has been only too often presented to them.



To speak to a hostile working-class audience upon any subject, religious or political, is always a difficult matter. You require any amount of tact, patience, good temper, ready repartee. The Bishop, I believe, from what those tell me who know him best, has never once been known to fail, and his secret of success has been the very obvious one of honesty and good temper.

If he has been asked a difficult or an impossible question—and a fool can ask a question that all the wise men on earth cannot answer—he would frankly say he did not know the answer. For a moment a gasp of wonder would greet his daring frankness, and then a murmur of applause would testify to the admiration of his audience for his moral courage.



"If you don't know, say you don't!" the Bishop once advised a friend; "and if you can't keep your temper, don't go in for these open-air meetings at all."

It is interesting to note some of the difficulties of working-class men with which the Bishop used to deal in his old East-End days, and the manner in which he dealt with them.

"Who was Cain's wife?" cried out a working-man on more than one occasion at these secularist meetings in Victoria Park. "Who was Cain's wife? There was no one for him to have married except his own mother, Eve."

THE BISHOP IN HIS STUDY.

THE LIBRARY, FULHAM PALACE.

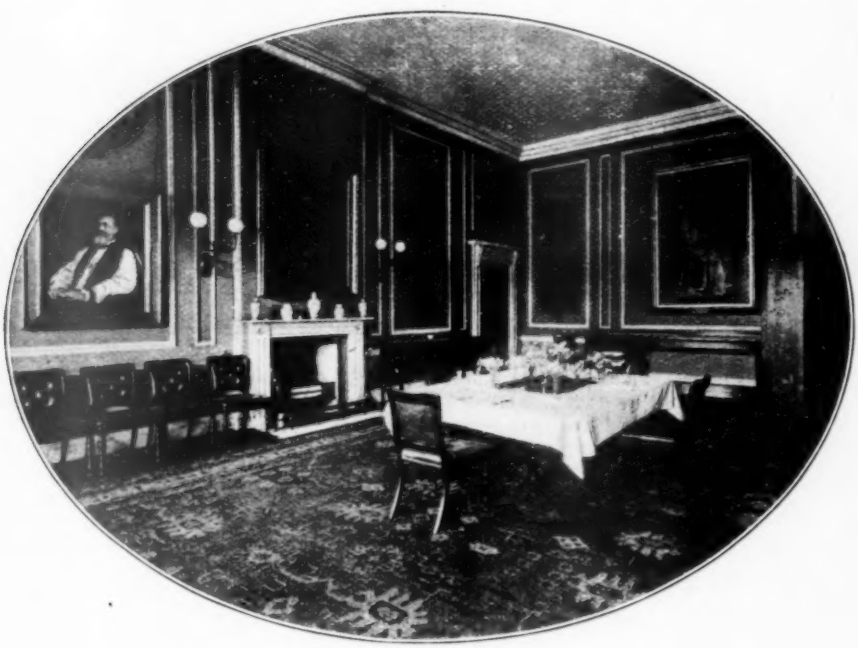
And the Bishop would recognise the honesty of the speaker and the real difficulty of the question. So instead of withering the poor man with a glance of indignation and of wonder that by such a question he should presume to throw doubt for a single moment upon the inspired Word, he would throw around him upon his hushed and wondering auditory a glance of infinite humour as he replied:

"Ah, my friend, but how do you know there was no one else but Eve? Is not that one of those gratuitous assumptions which are so freely made by those who make use of the argument from 'silence'? According to this school of interpreters, whatever is not mentioned in the Bible is therefore asserted not to have happened. In the New Testament this argument is pressed in the face of the assertion of St. John that if everything had been written the world itself could not have contained the books that should have been written. In the case of these dim events in the far-off ages, of which a short and hasty summary is given in the Bible, it is still more absurd to press such an argument. One hundred and thirty years had elapsed before the birth of Seth, who apparently was born very soon after the murder of Abel. This would have allowed ample time for even one or two generations to have grown up, of whom no mention at all is made, except incidentally. Incidentally, however, others are mentioned. Cain was afraid that 'whosoever found him would slay him'; he is able to 'begin building' a city which, though probably at first only a collection of rude huts, must have involved some sort of a community, so that it is evident that there was no difficulty in Cain finding a wife."



On another occasion a man asked him how anyone could possibly believe in the resurrection of the dead. "That is a very ancient difficulty," replied the Bishop. "In the very earliest days of Christianity St. Paul asked his hearers, 'Why is it thought a thing incredible with you that God should raise the dead?' But, my dear friend, does not the difficulty in believing it arise from narrowness of an imagination which is often unable to take in even the wonders of this world? A telegram flashed to America changes in a second the atoms in 3,000 miles of wire. This is a scientific fact; but yet the imagination left to itself looks blankly and incredulously at it. Is it not natural that it should at first look incredulously at the statement that 'We shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye'? 'If I have told you earthly, and ye believe not, how shall ye believe if I tell you of heavenly things'?"

Let the above stand as fair specimens of the admirable common-sense manner in which the Bishop used to, and, indeed, still encounters the somewhat crude, albeit in certain respects shrewd objections to the facts of Christianity as revealed in the pages of the Bible.

I have hinted that the Bishop makes no pretence to wide scholarship, but that he is a well-read man, and one thoroughly versed in the controversies of the day, no one who knows him would deny for a single moment. And his reading has resulted in a broad outlook upon life and a certain modernity of mind which are singularly favourable to his acceptance at the hands of very widely differing elements in the community. Most men, for instance, whether of the working classes or of the educated, will mark with interest his declaration that the theory of evolution is in no way inconsistent with the main doctrines of Christianity, and the majority of people will agree with the Bishop that the theory of evolution properly understood only adds to their previous conceptions of the majesty and omnipotence of the Creator. "Rightly understood," says the Bishop, "Darwin's theory only brings out more clearly the purpose which is slowly working in the world."

The Bishop cannot subscribe to the innocent belief that is held to-day by some of his own most worthy clergy—that we are precipitated into the world, practically as we are, with neither descent nor design to account for our presence. As he once aptly described it, speaking on this very subject of evolution—"Whether the theory of evolution with regard to our bodies is true or not, it is not inconsistent either with the Christian doctrines of a Creator, or of a Providence, or of man's creation from the dust, or of a fall and its subsequent recovery; and whatever other kind of evolution may be true or not, this, at least, is true—and it is enough to satisfy the most ambitious—'Now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that, when He shall appear, we shall be like Him; for we shall see Him as He is.'" Thus spoke the Bishop to his devoted East-End working-men.

THE DINING ROOM.

FULHAM PALACE, FROM THE LAWN.

As a theologian, of course, his views are entirely those of the Church of England, and in himself he is distinctly a high Anglican; but, as I have endeavoured throughout to show, a Churchman of broad and generous sympathies. He hates controversy, for he realises that but little good can ever come of it; but being in it, he holds his own right manfully, and with a skill and acumen which are frequently capable of withstanding the arguments of his most doughty opponents.

As a leader of laymen, if I may so term him, the Bishop stands high in the estimation of his fellows; as a father of his clergy, most of them testify gladly to his sympathy and encouraging help; it remains yet to be seen how he will conduct himself as the ruler of one of the largest, most varied, and most important spheres of religious work in the whole world.

His attitude of steady opposition towards the Romanising section of the Church is firmness itself. And it could not be otherwise, for the Bishop is pre-eminently an Englishman, and he could not understand or sympathise in the least with anything which would do away with man's individual freedom of conscience and action. At the same time, he realises that it is his plain duty to administer the Church's law with absolute impartiality; and his determination never to recognise any church wherein that law was broken, whilst it came as a shock to the extremists, greatly pleased those to whom the best interests of the Church were most dear.

But to see the Bishop at his best is to see him at home. Fulham Palace is a delightful old house, and the Bishop is a kindly and a charming host. Here in his superb dining-room, surrounded by the portraits of dead and gone prelates of the See of London—Bishop Juxon, who attended Charles I. on the scaffold; Bishop King, of James I.'s time; Bishops Tait, Temple, Creighton, and many others—he dispenses graceful hospitality, and is foremost in witty and interesting conversation. Naturally his is a very busy and a very fully occupied life. He told me on one occasion, I remember, that he never received fewer than eighty letters a day, every one of which was answered before night. Around the palace is spread a beautiful, extensive, and delightfully old-fashioned garden, but it is on the tennis lawn that the Bishop takes most of his recreation. There are two things of interest to which he always draws his guests' attention: one is the beautiful photographic reproduction—an enormous book—of the "Log" of the Mayflower, the original of which was discovered a year or two ago and presented by Bishop Creighton to the American Ambassador, and the other is the portrait of Bishop Tunstall, the only portrait of a pre-Reformation Bishop of London preserved at Fulham Palace.

THE CHAPEL, FULHAM PALACE.

THE DRAWING ROOM, FULHAM PALACE.

IN THE STRAITS OF TIME

A ROMANCE OF OLD FRANCE.

By Christopher Hare, Author of "Dreams to Sell," Etc.

"Only a romance. It is only human life . . . with the ceaseless throbbing of its quivering heart, and contempt of wrong and pain and death, and the passionate yearning for the face of God, and woman's self-sacrifice and devotion, and woman's love. Yes, it is only a romance. It is only the ivory gates falling back at the fairy touch."—"JOHN INGLESANT."

CHAPTER I.

"MADEMOISELLE DE BEAUMANOIR, visitors await you below in the parloir; and Madame l'Abbesse bid me say she would have a word with you."

There was a hush of breathless excitement in the low-panelled classroom, while the sister who brought the message, stood motionless, with folded hands, within the doorway. Then a stir and a flutter thrilled the young girls, as an evening breeze might sweep across the half-fledged daffodils of an upland meadow.

All the flower-like faces of the children were uplifted from their embroidery task and set towards Gabrielle Antoinette de Beaumanoir, who at the summons had started to her feet.

A slight girl, with a small, proud head, crowned by heavy coils of dusky hair, she stood expectant for a moment, a flush of rich colouring on her cheek and a vivid gleam in the dark eyes, frank and wide. Like her black-robed companions, she was clad in the severe simplicity of the convent uniform, whose sombreness was only relieved by the glow of a broad red ribbon across one shoulder—the badge of the "red class," that of the elder girls.

The book which she had been reading aloud to the class engaged in needlework—"Devout Lives of the Holy Saints"—had fallen, unnoticed in her agitation, to the ground. One stooped to pick it up—a tall, fair girl, who quickly rose erect, straight as a willow wand, by the side of her friend, and pressed her hand with a silent grasp of sympathy.

The rays of the afternoon sun, which struck the narrow western windows, fell aslant on her braided hair, the colour of raw silk, till it shone like red gold against the dark oak-panelled wall.

"Yvonne, come with me, dear. I dare not face him alone!" whispered Gabrielle, looking up with a quiver of emotion.

But even as the words were spoken she knew how futile was her appeal; before ever the sharp, querulous voice of Madame Sainte Scholastique jarred on the still air.

"Mademoiselle de Beaumanoir, where is your obedience? How long is Sœur Petronille to wait attendance on your pleasure?"

In a sudden change of mood the young girl drew herself up with an air of defiance, and slowly moved across the room, a stately little figure, tense with energy and determination. A reassuring smile hovered on her lips as she gave one quick backward glance towards Yvonne, who watched her with wistful yearning, until the heavy door closed behind her and she was gone.

"Mademoiselle le Tellier will continue the interrupted reading. I will request you, Mesdemoiselles, to return to your work with increased attention, or I shall be under the sad necessity of reporting you to Madame, and you will spend to-morrow's fête writing out "Le Privileye du Roi."

The cold, stern reprimand met with reluctant attention, for all feared the peevish ill-humour of this particular class mistress, the least beloved of all the teaching nuns. Young heads were bowed once more over their stitches, and the pupils dissembled their restlessness; but they no longer took the faintest interest in the doleful story of Sainte Bernardine, which went droning on in a level, monotonous voice. All their thoughts and fancies had strayed away, like swallows on the wing, and followed the girl who at that moment was the centre of dramatic interest to all her companions.

There was an atmosphere of suppressed excitement in the cloistered chamber; the very air was laden with mystery, and vague scraps of knowledge or surmise floated about, for rumour had already been busy with the future of Gabrielle de Beaumanoir.

The delicate needlework made but small progress that sultry summer afternoon, and the fretful complaints of Madame Sainte Scholastique were more than justified; but she was wont to demand the uttermost letter of the law, and her narrow soul was steeled against pity. Not until the enamelled clock on the mantel deigned at length to strike the hour with slow, unperturbed dignity did the wearisome lesson come to an end, and the order rang out:

"Ten minutes for recreation and preparation. The red class will then repair to the upper salon for the dancing lesson."

Even then there might be no unseemly haste. Each girl had to fold up her strip of embroidery, and put it neatly by in its appointed place, before she made her deep, sweeping curtsey and passed out demurely in her turn. But once safely outside the door, those sedate, high-bred maidens became a bevy of wild, frolicsome children, chattering like magpies and brimful of eager excitement. Yvonne was surrounded by an impetuous group.

"Tell us, Mademoiselle de la Féronniere—you are her dearest friend. It is a marriage they arrange; but who is the gentleman? Can they find one worthy of her? Is it true that——"

"Nay, ask me not; Mademoiselle will tell you herself," was the breathless answer, as she escaped from the clinging fingers and ran lightly down the long, dim corridor.

She had caught sight of her friend, and with a cry of joy welcomed her in a clasp of outstretched arms.

"Come, come quick, Yvonne! I came to fetch you. They make their adieux to Madame now—my sister and Monsieur le Duc. There is not a moment to lose. From the gallery windows you will see him pass out into the courtyard," cried th girl, and drew her on with impatient haste.

Meantime, others of the red class had caught the scent and followed up the chase. With a murmured "Hush!" they pressed their faces against the low latticed casements.

Oh, joy and triumph! they were in time. The great coach, with its four stout Flemish horses and postilions, and gorgeous footmen in green and gold liveries, was drawn up at the foot of the massive stone staircase. The door of the chariot was held open by a bare-headed major-domo. There was a low murmur of voices below; then a radiant vision, a Court lady in the height of the fashion, from the tip of her dainty high-heeled shoes to the jewel on her topknot, tripped delicately down the broad steps.

"Ah! 'tis the Marquise de Chamans, the sister of Mademoiselle!"

"Just like her, the same dark eyes; but what a style, what a toilette!"

"Look at the long train of her cinnamon-watered tabby, and her silver-wrought scarf and hood. 'Tis ravishing!"

"See! I told you a 'Sévigné' was the last mode. How it becomes her!"

These were some of the whispered comments which rustled through the air; but the next moment Madame la Marquise and all her charms were quite blotted out and eclipsed by overwhelming interest in the gentleman who followed her. A small, somewhat elderly figure, which would have been almost insignificant but for his rich attire and a certain air of dignity and distinction in his carriage. He wore a black velvet suit, set off by a gold-embroidered vest, heavy lace ruffles, and diamond knee-buckles; while his face was half hidden beneath the shade of a broad beaver hat, with a double row of plumes and a jewelled clasp.

The suppressed excitement had now reached its climax, for all knew that this must be the suitor.

"Yes, dear; 'tis the Duc de Maillebois!" sighed Gabrielle under her breath, as she clung to her friend with a desperate craving for sympathy and protection.

Her schoolmates were hushed in dismay and looked at each other with raised eyebrows and signals of distress, when just then, either by chance or some vague Heaven-sent instinct, the Duke turned his head and caught sight of the young faces crowded at the window above. He raised his plumed hat, and did homage with a low, courtly bow and a kindly smile, as he passed on with an easy air to his coach. Little did he guess how that slight action had won golden appreciation and made a revolution in his favour.

"Ah, 'twas well done! A man of breeding!" cried one.

"A gallant bearing, and a right courteous salute, even to us little pensionnaires!" echoed another.

"Pity he's so old; he might be her father!"

"But what would you? One can't have all one desires in this world, and a girl with no fortune is lucky to get a husband at all!"

The last speaker was a sallow girl of about thirteen, with a freckled face and sandy hair. One of her class-mates turned sharply on her with a mocking curtsey.

"Ah, Madame la Comtesse de Gaspil! 'Tis well for you to sneer, when we all know that only your great dowry could buy you a young husband. Yes, indeed; all the world has heard the story. But for Mademoiselle de Beaumanoir, our peerless Gabrielle, she is not to be spoken of in the same day!"

Other voices quickly chimed in, eager and indignant, to echo the praise of their idol, their leader, the chosen queen of their allegiance; but suddenly the tinkle of a distant bell was heard, and all the young creatures fled in guilty haste, though one of the bolder spirits cried aloud:

"Monsieur Robert can wait; he will never scold us. And as for dear Madame Sainte Véronique, why, she will only puzzle her brains to make excuses for us."

Still, the fact remained that they had sadly wasted their ten minutes of recreation, during which they should have made ready for the dancing lesson, which the ballet master at the Opéra himself gave, three times a week, to these favoured damsels.

The poor little Comtesse de Gaspil lingered behind, in disgrace with her companions, repenting all too late of her spiteful remark. Child as she was, she could not fail to know that any such reflection on Mademoiselle de Beaumanoir came with an ill grace from her. Two months ago she had been still in the "white" class, which spent most of its time learning the Catechism; but directly after her first Communion she was taken from the convent by her guardian and married to the gay, spendthrift young Count. Immediately after the ceremony she was sent back and promoted to the red class, in which she would continue her studies, and so pass the time until she was considered old enough to take her place in society.

At the period of this story—A.D. 1684, in the reign of Louis XIV.—such a marriage was no unusual event. It was often a matter of policy to secure an heiress of tender years, or to make sure of some fickle suitor, or indeed irrevocably settle some family arrangement, in those days when parents and guardians had their own way. As in this case, the little bride could be sent back to her studies, and give no further anxiety or trouble.

Here in this famous convent, the Abbaye aux Bois, the daughters of the most aristocratic families in France received their education, and were early trained to play their part as the great ladies of the coming time. The Cistercian nuns had established themselves, some thirty years before, in the Rue de Sève, Faubourg St. Germain, in the fine old abbey, with its great gardens and wooded grounds, which the Annonciades of Bougres had just left. In the midst of Paris itself, they had all the advantages of town and country, and the pupils had a curious mixture of secular and cloistered life.

Dancers from the Opéra taught them dancing and deportment; the first actors of the day gave lessons in elocution, and prepared them to read the tragedies of Racine; and the nuns themselves were all of noble families; while the salon of Madame was a matchless school of manners and conversation.

Where there was such constant passing to and fro, so much intercourse with varied life, we cannot wonder that rumours from the world beyond did not always die away at the convent gate.

"Did homage with a low, courtly bow and a kindly smile."

CHAPTER II.

GABRIELLE DE BEAUMANOIR kept silence against her will all that long evening, for her one absorbing desire was to tell her friend all that had happened. The meeting in the parloir had been the crisis of her fate; but it so chanced that after the five o'clock snack that day, when there would have been a short time for recreation, a new pupil arrived—a little spoilt darling, who was so broken-hearted at the parting from her mother that good Madame Sainte Véronique, in despair, brought her to the elder girls to make a diversion.

"Mademoiselle de la Féronniere, you are so kind, you have such a happy touch with the little ones!" said the smiling, round-faced nun. "This is Mademoiselle Alix de Courcelles; her mother is gone, and she cries without ceasing. Will you try to comfort her?"

She pointed to the pathetic little figure, already clothed in the convent uniform—the long, black frock, with a blue ribbon, the badge of the youngest class. Alix was still loudly sobbing; but as Yvonne took her gently by the hand and enticed the small, desolate creature on to her lap, the tears soon came to an end, and presently she was placidly eating bonbons, pressed on her from all sides, and listening entranced to a fairy legend.

"You will be her little mother, Mademoiselle de la Féronniere?" said the nun, with a grateful smile. "I knew your magic would not fail, and for to-night she will sleep next to you, in your dormitory."

At this Gabrielle could not restrain an impatient gesture. Alas! when would there be an opportunity for talk, if they were always to be hampered with this tiresome child? However, there was no help for it, and she could only hope for some fortunate chance.

But in the end her time came. Late that night, when the stir and turmoil of young life was hushed in slumber, save for low, whispering voices here and there; when in the dim light of the flaring lamps the long row of white beds in the dormitory melted away, cloudlike and shadowy, then Mademoiselle de Beaumanoir told her story.

"Yvonne, dear, come quite close," she began. "Ah! what a day it has been. I saw him for the first time; but, as you know, Héloise has told me all about him, and prepared me for the meeting. Since my mother died she manages everything."

"Madame de Chamans is a good sister, and loves you well; but 'tis a bold venture!" was the whispered reply.

"What would you have?" sighed Gabrielle. "I have no dowry, for we are fallen on evil times with our estates; and my father, the Comte de Beaumanoir, has ever been given to lavish hospitality. Héloise is six years older than I am, and much of my mother's fortune went to her when she married. Then there is Réné, our only brother, who must have something to keep up the title one day. Dear lad, he is so generous; he would never suffer me take the veil for his sake; so what can I do? I must marry. And the Duc de Maillebois is a great friend of Héloise; he comes to her salon, and she talks to him about her little sister at the convent. One day she showed him a miniature of me, by Nanteuil, with folded hands, looking like an angel in an altar-piece! What say you to that, Yvonne?"

"That the artist was a man of humour; but tell me more about the Duke."

"He is a philosopher, living in his library like a bookworm, and, they say, has a mortal dread of the ladies of fashion who pay court to him. But with his great fortune and position he must marry; so he has this day graciously declared himself willing to take me, a simple schoolgirl, without a dowry!" She ended with a low, mirthless laugh, and for a moment there was silence.

"Dear Gabrielle! I scarce know what to say. One can see that Monsieur le Duc has a kind heart and is a true gentleman. For the rest, Madame de Chamans doubtless knows that he is above reproach. Such a life, with all its possibilities, would suit you better than the shadowed stillness of the convent."

"Oh, speak not of that!" shuddered the girl. "Think of the dreary, never-ending round of Matins and Vespers, of Confession and Mass! Fancy me a peevish shrew like Madame Sainte Scholastique; or growing at last into a fumbling, quarrelsome old hag like Madame Sainte Elbœuf, ever struggling for her rags of comfort and precedence!

"Ah, my dear! Tears fill my eyes when I think of those three charming little Demoiselles de la Roche Aymon, who are all to be sacrificed for the heir of the family. Now, it would suit you, Yvonne, if you were not a heretic; for you are the stuff that saints are made of and, to look at, you're just like the Madonna of a shrine. What was Fate thinking of to make you a great heiress, too ?" And she stooped to sweeten with a kiss the tender mockery of her words.

"But, as you so plainly state, Gabrielle, I am a Huguenot, too; so that were it not for that same fortune and the hope of my conversion the nuns would not have me here !"

"Well, I don't know that there is much to choose; for my father says that we are all Jansenists at the Abbaye aux Bois, and I know that Monseigneur de Paris does not approve of us. I have no head for theology; but, save that you don't go to confession or Communion, it seems to me that you are as religious as any of us. This I know, that you are my dear, dear friend, and that you shall come with me to my wedding, if wedding there be. It must be this summer, Héloise says; perhaps she fears that Monsieur le Duc may change his mind. Oh, I forgot to tell you, she envies me above all things to have no mother-in-law; you have heard what she suffered from hers ?"

"Yes; but you told me that she rebelled after her baby was born, and that now she really is mistress in her own house," rejoined Yvonne.

"Ah, trust Héloise, with her brave spirit, to hold her own. She even keeps Jean-Charles in order; but then, she loves him, with all his faults."

"And little baby Jean, what a treasure he must be to them both, and a link between them !" was the murmured reply. "Tell me, Gabrielle, will you come back to the convent after the wedding ?"

"Yes, until I am seventeen, next May. Fancy me posing as Madame la Duchesse, demure and stately. Ah, dear ! no more mischief and fun. Never more shall I put ink in the stoup, or tie up the bell for early matins, till poor Madame Sainte Elbœuf thinks the place bewitched ! And Madame Sainte Scholastique will try to forget that she once decked me out with donkey's ears and hung a black tongue round my neck for calumny. Do you remember how Madame l'Abbesse came in and was so angry, and said we might be punished as became young ladies, but not made ridiculous like Egyptian idols or carnival clowns ?"

At that moment the conversation was interrupted by a piercing cry from a bed at the other end of the dormitory and a sound of hasty scuffling.

"Oh, help ! What horrible beast is this which comes to devour me ?" screamed a terrified voice.

Yvonne started up, quickly caught hold of the nearest lamp (an earthenware bowl of oil with a floating wick), and hurried to the rescue of Mademoiselle le Tellier. There was a merry outburst of laughter from those around, as a great tabby cat sprang to the ground. The noise awoke little Alix, who sat up in bed, with a piteous wailing.

"Where is my Mimi ?" She would not be soothed until Mademoiselle de la Féronniere had caught and brought back her own pussy which, in defiance of all discipline, kind-hearted Madame Sainte Antoine had suffered her nurse to take up to her bed.

"Oh, Mademoiselle," cried the girl in the excitement of her sudden awakening, "I never said my new prayer, the 'Heart to God,' which Aunt Philippine told me always to say in the convent."

She knelt on her bed, with the cat folded in a close embrace, and began, "My God, I give you my heart; take it, I pray you, that no other creature may take it or possess it but you alone." Here she paused, and then added in a very different tone of real earnestness: "And please, dear God, take care of my own pet Mimi, and don't let anybody hurt her or tease her."

"You naughty child," interrupted Mademoiselle le Tellier. "You must never talk to the good God about Mimi. Fie ! what wickedness to pray for a cat !"

"No, no; you are not wicked, dear Alix," said Yvonne softly. "God made all the creatures, and He loves them all."

"Ah, of course a heretic like Mademoiselle de la Féronniere would find an excuse for such blasphemy !" sneered the other girl.

"Mademoiselle le Tellier ! How dare you thus insult my friend ?" cried Gabrielle, in fiery indignation. "Why, 'twas your greediness made all the bother, for see, your bed is strewn with scraps of chocolate and cake. Doubtless you were having a feast by yourself, and the poor cat wanted to join in."

Upon this there arose such jeers of ridicule, such an outcry of "Shame !" and "Beg pardon of Mademoiselle !" that the nun in charge was roused from the adjoining chamber, and came blinking in, to restore peace and to mete out punishment.

But Mimi was avenged.

"Listening entranced to a fairy legend"—p. 11.

CHAPTER III.

THE morrow dawned divinely bright and beautiful, the Feast of St. Barnabas. Of all the many holidays which the calendar of saints bestowed, this was the choicest of the year and the most prized by the convent pupils, for it came in the very glow and glory of early summer.

On a festival, the Mass was at nine o'clock in the morning, in the ancient chapel, whose quaint stained glass gave to many a child her first conceptions of Heaven and Hell. In the side aisle stood the splendid copper tomb of Jean de Nesle and his wife Anne d'Entragues who had founded the convent in the reign of Louis VI.

Mademoiselle de la Féronniere and two other Huguenot girls had their places assigned them somewhat apart, close behind this monument, and there was always a strange fascination for her in those moulded images, especially the face of the wife, so delicately marked with tender patience and quiet strength. Yvonne was never weary of trying to build up in her mind the story of the Countess Anne, with wistful wondering whether her own future would bear any likeness to that heroic past, so clearly written for her in characters of stone.

Day-dreams ever held that hour; for the more simple worship to which, as a Calvinist, she had been used in former days, gave to the elaborate ceremonial of the Mass a vague sense of aloofness and unreality. As the soft, clear voices of the choir rose and fell, the girl almost fancied that she could hear, echoing back from those old walls, the sighs of bye-gone penitents and the long-stilled voices of forgotten nuns, who had been borne forth to their last rest through yonder low-arched doorway, so touchingly named "The Gate of Heaven."

After the service there was a brief instruction from one of the Directors, and then the girls were free to plan out their day's sport. The favourite game at the Abbaye aux Bois was to have a mimic stag-hunt in the spacious gardens and wooded grounds, which were enclosed with high walls, and where the children had absolute freedom.

The first and most important thing was to make choice of the two best runners as "stags," and the votes were soon given for Mademoiselle de Beaumanoir and her friend, Mademoiselle de la Féronniere. All the elder girls in the red class who cared to play were appointed "huntsmen," and then a deputation was sent to the blue class of younger girls, politely inviting them to contribute the "dogs." It was a mission which required some tact; for the dogs had all the hard work and but little of the glory in the chase, and if the children were offended, or felt themselves aggrieved by the elders, they would refuse their help, and then the game was impossible.

The middle class of the school, distinguished by a white ribbon, was so much engaged with catechism, and preparation for the first Communion, that it was not taken into account. On this occasion there was no feud between the classes; the "stags" were very popular, and plenty of "dogs" were forthcoming.

Directly after the mid-day meal the game began. Gabrielle and Yvonne had ten minutes' start, and then all the other players fluttered down the great stone steps into the garden, while the air rang with the joyous cries of their fresh young voices. Lightly they ran on, under the broad avenue of plane trees, into the wooded wilderness beyond—the children's enchanted kingdom. They passed beneath a belt of limes, with their delicate, green, shimmering leaves; by dusky hollies on the fringe of a grove; and a big gnarled elm, whose mossy branches were laden with the myriad white stars of clematis.

In the open spaces, light fell in sheets of radiance on lilac bushes pluming to the wind, the home of unnumbered bees; while beneath the quivering birches, trailing sprays of wild rose carpeted the brown earth. As the girls ran hither and thither, in the chequered shade, they crushed under their feet the wild thyme, whose fragrance filled the air.

Never before had the "stags" so long escaped their pursuit, and the whistle of a blackbird seemed to mock them from the cypress shade In truth, the two friends had made use of their opportunity to find a favourite sequestered spot, where they might continue their interrupted conversation. Hidden amidst the thick branches of the ancient yew tree, over which a clinging honeysuckle had flung its red trumpets, they crouched side by side, and defied huntsmen and hounds.

"Yvonne dear, Madame l'Abbesse sent for me to her chamber this morning. She was most gracious. I prayed her that she would suffer you to come to my wedding, and she promised. Think of that, for she always keeps her word. Then she asked if I had chosen the class-mate who would go round the school with me to announce my coming marriage."

"Ah! what did you reply? Gabrielle, you have so many other friends; I would not have you give cause for jealousy."

"So Madame said. She suggested Léonore de Brissac, whose father is in such high favour with the King. It would make a good impression; but, Yvonne, there is no one dear to me as you are."

"All the same, you need not wear your heart on your sleeve. Madame is quite right, and it will make Léonore so happy."

"That is all you think of, dear; never of yourself. Ah! when I am my own mistress, my home shall be yours always, if you will; and if you marry, we will have our town houses near by and meet every day. I could not live without you!"

"You think so now, but the future is hidden," was the quiet reply. "When you are a great lady I may be a poor fugitive, and you will be wise to forget me."

"There was no answer."

"What do you mean, Yvonne? You, with your great inheritance, will have the world at your feet. What wild fancy is this?"

"It is no fancy, dear, but sober truth. You know that the Huguenots are looked on with disfavour by the King, who is guided by Monsieur de Louvois. Cruel laws have been made against them, and already they are persecuted in the provinces. And as for my fortune, alas! it is my misfortune!"

"Surely not! Think what a difference a dowry would have made to me!" sighed the future Duchesse de Maillebois.

"Gabrielle, it would have been far happier for me if I had been a poor peasant girl in my native Poitou. You know how I was left an orphan—my dear father and mother taken from me by the fever, within a few days of each other. They had no time to take legal steps for my protection; and the Marquis de Vaudreuil, my father's half brother, became my guardian, for I was only a child of twelve, alone in the world."

"You poor dear; while I have so many loved ones—father, brother, sister!"

"It chanced that my English godmother, the Lady Elisabeth Morton, was with us in that sad hour. She was the dearest friend of my poor mother, who, on her deathbed, left me in her care. In a fond, despairing effort to protect my future, she also placed in the keeping of the Lady Elisabeth all her valuable diamonds and jewels, together with sundry title-deeds, to be given to me when I marry, if it be with her approval.

"My godmother would have taken me back to England with her; but M. de Vaudreuil obtained an order from the Courts, and I was given over to his charge. Ours was an old Huguenot family; but he was a pervert, and vowed that I, too, should become a Catholic. That was why I was to be brought up in a convent."

"A cruel shame! Still, but for that we should never have met. How well I remember that first day when your uncle came here with you. You were so pale, so still; and yet how proudly you hid your grief from our pitiless curiosity. Then at night your bed was next to mine in the dormitory; I heard you softly sobbing in the darkness, and—so we were friends from the first, dear Yvonne."

"It was hard to lose all I loved, to be torn from my dear home. But these four years at the Abbaye aux Bois have been quiet and peaceful; you are all very good to me. Doubtless Madame hopes that time and kindness will win me over to your faith, but in my heart I know that I shall never change. My uncle will leave no stone unturned to convert me, and to marry me to his son Adolphe. Ah, but he is hateful! so cruel to his dogs, to his servants, to his little lame sister Louise! So false, so mean is my cousin I would sooner die than be his wife."

In her excitement, the girl had forgotten the game, and took a step forward beyond the sheltering boughs; when suddenly a loud shout of triumph announced that one of her pursuers was close at hand and had caught sight of her.

"Oh, what shall we do?" whispered Gabrielle. "They must not find us here and discover our secret hiding place."

She slipped softly out under the low branches and stole behind a thick clump of laurels which skirted the boundary wall. From one shelter to another they crept along in their dark dresses, without being seen, until they reached a point where a big elm tree had been blown over by some recent storm, and falling against the old wall had partly broken it down.

The pursuing party was at hand, and Gabrielle, wild with excitement, saw her opportunity. "Come, come quick!" she cried. "The dogs are close behind. We will hide outside while they pass by!"

Without pausing to think, the girl clambered over the loose stones in the gap, and with a great leap reached the ground below.

Yvonne was too late to stop her, although she was full of misgivings at the bold venture. In sheer loyalty to her friend, she followed in her steps. But as she too sprang down, she was startled and alarmed to find how much lower was the level of the lane underneath.

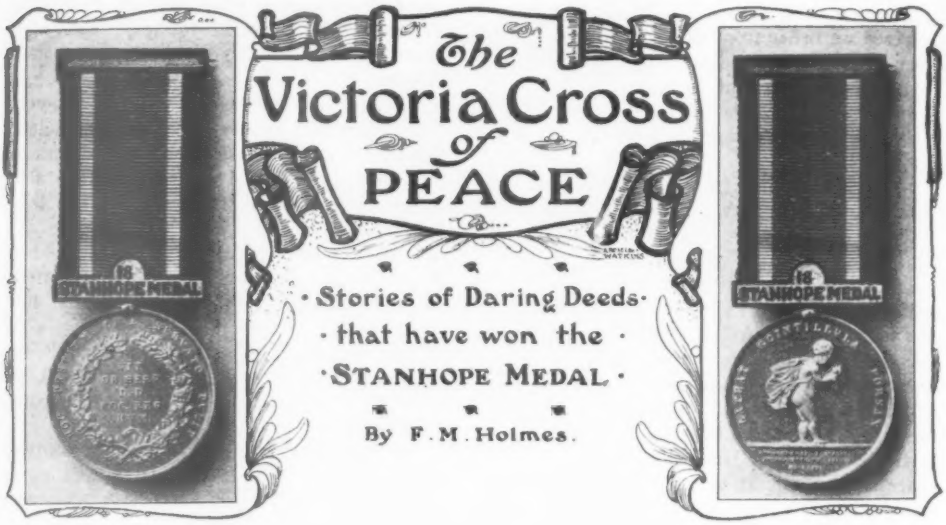
For a moment the girls stood and looked at each other in breathless dismay, for Gabrielle had already begun to realise what she had done.

"It was all very well to jump down," she exclaimed; "but 'tis so steep and high we can never climb up again. What is to become of us? What will Madame say?"

"We must call to the girls and tell them where we are; then some of the nuns will come round outside to fetch us!" was Yvonne's first impulse.

It was a desperate remedy, and she may have been somewhat half-hearted in her first cry, for there was no answer.

"Mademoiselle de Brissac! Mademoiselle de Seignelai!" again she called in louder and more urgent appeal; and this time there came a mocking echo of her words, in a man's voice, near at hand.



"Look, Yvonne! there are rough, common people coming up the lane, close behind us!" whispered Gabrielle, now half distracted with terror. "Oh, what shall we do? We can never let them find us here!"

"Let us take off these red badges, pull the hoods over our faces, and walk quickly on till we reach the gate of the Abbaye. Maybe they will take no notice of us!" was the trembling reply.

It is difficult to conceive what a terrible experience it was to these young girls, thus to find themselves suddenly cast adrift from the cloistered seclusion of their convent home. In their guarded lives, so carefully sheltered from every outside influence, it was the first time that they had ever found themselves alone and unprotected, and the vague unknown dangers of the world loomed vast and fearful before them.

[END OF CHAPTER THREE.]

THE deeds that have won the Stanhope Gold Medal will rank among the bravest records of the time. They rival the most valiant actions in war, and exhibit in a high degree the daring and the heroism which we place among the noblest attributes of mankind.

So highly prized is the Stanhope, that it forms a brilliant complement to even the Victoria Cross itself. But while the Victoria Cross is only granted for gallantry in war, and to those alone who are actually engaged in hostilities, the Stanhope Medal recognises the valour of brave deeds performed at any time, and by any person, for the saving of human life.

The Medal perpetuates the memory of Captain Chandos Scudamore Stanhope, a naval officer who was most highly respected, and who died on July 7th, 1871. Several of his friends collected a sum of money which they handed over to the Royal Humane Society, on the understanding that the committee should annually award a gold medal, to be known by the Captain's name.

The Society undertook the trust, and has admirably discharged the duty pertaining to it. The Medal is awarded at the General Court of the Society to the best silver medal instance of the year—that is, to the person who encountered the greatest risk in saving life, and to whom the Society's silver medal was presented.

Silver and bronze medals, as well as the Stanhope, are awarded by the Society, the design being the same in each case. On the front is engraved the figure of a little boy breathing on an extinguished torch in the hope that he may revive the flame—by which symbol life is represented. Beneath the figure appears the inscription in Latin—"The [Royal Humane] Society, established in London for the recovery of persons in a state of suspended animation, 1774."

The other side shows a civic wreath—the Roman reward for the saving of life—and the words in Latin—"He has obtained this reward for having saved the life of a citizen," while within the wreath is exhibited another inscription, also in Latin, "The Royal Humane Society presented this gift for saving life," a variation of the wording being made for a very brave attempt, which nevertheless may have been unsuccessful in its ultimate object.

The gallant actions for which the Medal has been awarded have often occurred in the most unlikely places, and under the most unpromising circumstances. What could appear more unheroic than a distillery of tar? Could any act of valour be found therein? Let us see.

One morning in the month of March, 1900, a certain man named Francis McLeod, employed by the Wear Fuel Company, of Sunderland, went into a large cavernous structure about eight and a half feet deep, used for the distillation of tar. His object was to repair the still, but he had been instructed not to enter the huge contrivance just then, because it was hot from previous use, and dangerous fumes were arising from the interior.

The warning was very necessary, for no sooner had he entered the still than he was at once overcome and fell prostrate in a state of unconsciousness. But another man, named Richard Lawson, immediately followed, in order to rescue his comrade, when he too succumbed. Undeterred by the fate which had befallen these two men, a third, named John Weddle, determined to face the subtle foe, and he also entered the structure, but like the others was overpowered by the noxious vapour.

Three men were now lying insensible in the large still, the victims of the poisonous fumes; would another step forth to fight with death? Yes, another now entered the field.

This fourth man was named William Allen, and he took a rope with him. Grasping McLeod, he was able to bring him out, and entering the still a second time he was successful in rescuing Weddle. Once more he ventured in the poison-trap and was able to reeve the rope around Lawson, but was so overpowered by the fumes that he could only just struggle out himself into the open air.

Even now the rescue was not complete, for Lawson's feet had been caught in the apparatus within the still, and he could not be hauled out. So for the fourth time the intrepid William Allen entered the noxious structure and disengaged the unconscious man so that he could be saved.

Great as is the gallantry which will bear a wounded comrade from the battlefield in face of the foe, the determined valour exhibited in rescuing these three men is surely equally great, and equally deserving of recognition. Allen encountered very serious risk indeed in entering the poisonous still four times, being fully aware as he was of the great danger to which he was exposed. It is satisfactory to know that the bravery of both Lawson and Weddle was rewarded by the Society's bronze medal, while Allen received the Society's silver medal and also the highly prized Stanhope.

The act for which Constable John Jenkins

HOW WILLIAM ALLEN WON THE STANHOPE MEDAL.

was awarded the same medal was also a deed of determined courage. The policeman was on duty at Waterloo Bridge, when about a quarter to three o'clock on a July morning he beheld a man scale the parapet and cast himself into the Thames beneath.

The bridge rises forty-three feet above water, and the tide was swirling through the arches like a mill-race, while a baffling mist shrouded the river in gloom. Yet in a moment the brave constable whipped off his belt and took the deep dive.

He came up with the suicide, and spite of the man's resistance gripped him firmly, and supported him effectively, while the two men were swept along by the tide; the rescuer kept his hold bravely until at length he and the man he had saved were picked up some way down the flood by a boat sent from the Thames Police Station.

Few persons, even expert swimmers, would care to run such a risk even in broad daylight, and in the darkness of early morning the difficulty and danger must have been doubled. Yet Jenkins never shrank for a moment, but without a second's hesitation took his great plunge from the bridge.

Boys, too, are nobly represented on the Stanhope list. A few winters ago a lad named Albert Battison, aged seventeen, and belonging to H.M.S. Impregnable, did a deed of bravery which will rank with the best.

He was at Leicester at the time, and the river Soar being frozen over, a girl, whose name was Annie Freer, broke through the ice in an attempt to cross the stream. The river at that point was deep, measuring some fourteen feet to the bottom; and a man ventured forth to rescue the drowning girl. He failed, however, in his attempt, and returned unsuccessful. Then Battison dived under the ice, an act involving the greatest possible risk, grasped the girl, and reaching the surface, broke the ice with his head, and brought her to the shore.

Now to dive under ice for a drowning person is, in the words of Battison's commanding officer, "perhaps the greatest act of bravery that anyone can perform, the risk being so great," and in this case, he said, he could not imagine a greater risk than that encountered by the lad. If Battison "had not been able to break the ice he would in all probability have been drowned."

The suddenness with which these accidents frequently occur, and the immediate promptitude necessary to save life, form one of the most striking features of these cases of rescue. In a moment a terrible crisis arises, and the assistance must be rendered at once, or prove valueless. So promptly acted a soldier on furlough one afternoon shortly after Christmas Day, 1898, in a Clerkenwell street, that he was able to save four persons. He heard a cry and at once he rushed to render aid at the most imminent peril to his own life.

It appeared that a man named Franklin was busy in an electro-plating factory upstairs, when his wife and three little children came to visit him. In the apartment stood several vessels bearing materials employed in the work, and suddenly the room became filled with the fumes of hydrocyanic acid, more popularly known as prussic acid. So powerful was the vapour that Franklin himself and the children likewise succumbed, and sank into a state of insensibility.

His wife happily was able to escape, and cried for help. The soldier, whose name was Hall, was passing at the time, and, hearing of the catastrophe, pushed his handkerchief into his mouth, and dashing into the building, brought out the eldest boy, whom he found near the foot of the stairs; returning, he hurried up the steps three times in succession, rescuing the two other children, and lastly their father.

In bringing out Franklin, he fell at the end of the stairs, for he was greatly enfeebled by breathing the fumes, and he was helped out by his brother, who had now appeared; but the effect of the poison was so great that, although outside the house, he became for a time insensible.

As to the cause of the accident the children are believed to have upset in their play two vessels which contained, respectively, vitriol and cyanide of potassium—substances from which chemists distil hydrocyanic acid—and these two materials mingling together immediately generated the poisonous fumes. But for the great promptitude of Mr. Hall, and his courage in braving the terrible risks which he encountered, the father and three children must have perished.

Turn we now to an altogether different scene. As H.M.S. Empress of India was entering a channel near the island of Andros in the Grecian Archipelago, late one evening, she saw signals of distress fired by a steamer not far distant from the shore. Approaching nearer to the vessel, the Empress found her to be the Charkich from Piræus to Constantinople, with passengers and crew numbering nearly eighty souls on board.

Lieutenant Lowry visited the ship in a boat, and learned that her shaft was broken.

How could the Empress assist her?

The captain of the Charkich asked to be taken in tow. Away went the boat to fulfil his request, but by the time the little craft had returned, the doomed vessel had drifted too near to the shore for this method of rescue to be practicable, and indeed she almost immediately disappeared. The hour was now about midnight, and the officers of the Empress judged that, as the lights of the Charkich were extinguished, she must have gone aground. Attempts were made to find the vessel by searchlights, but to no purpose, and the sea and wind were too high to permit the use of boats. The Empress therefore waited until daybreak.

Alas, the sad sight that met the eyes in the morning! The masts of the wretched vessel rose forlornly out of the water, three men were clinging to the foremast and three more were on the rocks near by, while a quantity of wreckage was tossed hither and thither on the heavy sea.

Lieutenant Lowry again manned the cutter and rowed to windward of the foremast. His object was to float a lifebuoy and line to the men, but the cross current which was running swept the apparatus away from the mast. One man, however, plunged into the sea and reached the buoy, and was drawn to the boat.

Again and again the lieutenant endeavoured to manœuvre the buoy to the mast, but without success, and at length, about seven o'clock in the morning, he sprang overboard, taking the lifebuoy and line with him, and swam to the mast himself. But as he gained it he lost the line, which became caught in the wreckage, and he found himself drenched with sea water and on the rigging of the wrecked ship, cut off from his boat and friends.

Here was a terrible disaster: effort after effort was made to reach the men in the mast, but without success. The cutter was almost swamped by the heavy sea, and boats were sent to pour oil literally on the troubled waters, but to no purpose. Grass-lines and rockets were also failures.

How were these men to be reached?

Another method was now attempted. The Empress steamed to Pargo Bay, and a party of her crew was landed with the object of saving the men from the coast. Returning to her previous position, the Empress found that the vessel had broken in two, and that one of the men had reached the shore by means of wreckage, but that Lieutenant Lowry and the other man were still in the rigging. The situation was most critical, for the mast might give way now at any minute. Lieutenant Lowry might be saved through his life-belt, but he would not leave the man he had come to help.

"BROKE THE ICE WITH HIS HEAD AND BROUGHT HER TO THE SHORE" (ALBERT BATTISON).

IN THE ANNAGHER PIT

At length, about three o'clock in the afternoon, Lieutenant Vereker made another effort in the cutter, Lieutenant Lowry himself directing proceedings from the mast, and a line was at last fastened between the two. By means of this line the rescue was finally accomplished, Lieutenant Lowry seeing his man safely on board before he himself entered the boat. Meantime one of the men on the rocks had gained the shore, but the other two were drowned.

For this act of persevering and determined bravery Lieutenant Lowry received the Stanhope Medal for 1901, an award to which none will deny he was fully entitled. We suppose that at almost any moment he might have saved himself with his own belt, but he remained hour after hour in his perilous position to rescue the man he had come to save.

Miners have also their share in the Stanhope Medal. One day in September, 1898, an explosion burst in the Annagher pit, county Tyrone, when four men were below. Two of these gained the bank alive, though one died shortly afterwards. But the other two remained in the mine, insensible from the choking after-damp. Who would brave the deadly vapour to save them?

The underground manager, named Francis O'Neill, promptly determined to do so. He went down the shaft, but was driven back on three consecutive occasions. The attempt seemed hopeless, but the brave man had heard the voice of Hughes, one of the men in the mine, and believing he was still alive, resolved to descend for the fourth time.

The shaft was nearly two hundred feet deep, and when O'Neill had descended but thirty feet, his lamp was extinguished, showing how deadly the mine still remained. But he persevered, and he reached the foot of the shaft. Groping in the darkness, he found Hughes, placed him in the cage to be hauled to the surface, but then became unconscious himself. Happily he was with Hughes, and the two were raised to the bank.

Recovering from his insensibility, O'Neill determined to search for the remaining miner still left below, and accompanied by an assistant, named Thomas McKenna, he once more descended into the deadly after-damp. The body was recovered, but life was extinct, all attempts at restoration proving failures. O'Neill was awarded the Stanhope Medal, which he richly deserved, for his indomitable bravery, and McKenna received the Society's bronze medal.

Numerous other instances might be given, showing the resolute bravery and the promptitude of resource with which gallant men belonging to all classes of society have hurried to the rescue of their fellow-creatures from death. Not long after the Medal was established, a landowner in Tasmania, Mr. George W. Bennett Story, of Henbury, plunged into a flooded river some fifteen feet deep, and swimming seventy yards, saved the lives of three persons who had attempted to cross a bridge in the flood, and brought each one separately to land. He was so fatigued and benumbed with his efforts in the ice-cold water that he experienced great difficulty in gaining a friend's house about two miles distant. The river was so high that it was running over the bridge, and was actually rising higher at the time.

The spirit of true gallantry shines through case after case. Whether it be plunging into a shark-infested sea to save a man overboard, as did Mr. A. J. Cooper, of the steamship Massilia; or leaping from the bridge of a battle-ship, as did Captain the Hon. Edmund Fremantle in his uniform and sea-boots, to rescue a leadsman; or wrestling with a whirlpool in the Hoogly, twenty-five feet deep, as did a Baboo of Calcutta, to save a drowning woman; or struggling in a flooded sewer, as did William Mugford of Torquay, to preserve two of his comrades—the highest courage is exhibited by all. Moreover, they are specimens of others, the records of the Stanhope Medal forming a noble roll of gallant deeds.

It is well that such deeds should be honoured. True bravery is worthy of such honour and of such incentive; and among the heroic actions that stir the heart and quicken the pulse, none can take higher place than determined efforts in face of the greatest danger to save a fellow-creature from death.

"BUT AS HE GAINED IT HE LOST THE LINE" (LIEUTENANT LOWRY).

A Pinch of Experience

A Complete Story by Sydney C. Grier.

"QUITE ready, Lu? Got the money?"

"Yes, here it is. Do take it, John. I feel so dreadfully unsafe with four five-pound notes loose in my hand. Just think if I had lost them!"

"More likely to have them stolen if you grip them in that agitated way," said John, taking the little wad of closely folded notes and bestowing them in his waistcoat pocket. "I say, Lu, what a jolly hat!"

"Now, don't say it must be a new one," said Lucy warningly, "for you've seen me in it hundreds of times. Why does a man never know an old hat when he sees it?"

"Because the face underneath is always new," said John gallantly, and Lucy smiled and blushed in spite of herself, and said with great sternness that she thought this was to be a strictly business expedition. John replied that if he had known that he would have insisted on ten minutes' pleasure before starting, but that he would see they made up for it when they got home; and, this settled, they went down the street to the tram-cars, talking learnedly about dressers and washable paints and oilcloth and tiles. They were furnishing their house—or rather, the house which was to be theirs, and which was also to be a model for all married curates' houses ever after. It was most conveniently placed, close to the mission church of which John was now in charge, and at the opposite side of the great northern city to that on which Lucy's parents lived. It was so near that she could easily run home for the day if John was out and she felt lonely, and yet John would not find his dwelling perpetually overrun by young brothers and sisters-in-law, or his household superintended by Aunt Lucilla, who was wont to favour her brother's family with a large supply of unwelcome advice. The house had taught both John and Lucy a good deal already, for whereas John had imagined a room would be amply furnished when it contained a bookshelf, a table, and two chairs, Lucy had set her heart upon showing Aunt Lucilla how well a drawing-room could be made to look, no matter how cheap the furniture, if it were merely arranged with taste, and now she was finding that a certain amount of money was desirable in any case. She interrupted John at this moment in a laborious calculation of the cubic contents of the kitchen boiler, which had shown signs of leaking.

"It's the carpet!" she cried suddenly. "I don't mind anything else, for we could add a chair at a time. But a carpet stamps a room at once. Surely even you must have noticed that, John. And you can't buy it in bits. Of course, an art square is very nice——"

"And much more satisfactory than felt when you have only one servant," said John, repeating parrot-like a sentiment he had heard several times lately from Lucy's mother.

"Oh, yes, of course; but that lovely velvet pile, John! It feels so luxurious when your foot sinks into it, and it would last for ever. No room could look poorly furnished if it had that carpet."

"It might be rather difficult to live up to," suggested John, "especially if we had to bring the kitchen chairs into the drawing-room because we had spent all the money on the carpet, and couldn't afford any others."

"I didn't mean that, of course. You are as bad as Aunt Lucilla. Oh, John, you don't know how near we were to not having any drawing-room furniture at all! When I went to see Aunt Lucilla she made me a regular speech—said that it had always been a pleasure to her to see that I could appreciate good china, and that she prided herself on having formed my taste. I knew what was coming then, and I could have wept. 'And so,' she said, 'I made up my mind to give you one of my vases,' and she looked towards those horrid Corean Cherry things which I hate, and I trembled, but she went on, 'However, it has been suggested to me that with young and untrained servants you would not be able to give it the care it needs, and I have determined to give you this instead,' and she brought out the twenty pounds. But just think of it, John! I suppose we might have managed to afford some Chinese matting for the floor, and that would have been all. The vase would have stood in the middle of the room, and we and our visitors would have had to sit round on our heels admiring it, like the people on a Japanese fan; but that wasn't the side of the case which appealed to Aunt Lucilla, you see. I wonder what she would have said if we had sold the vase, and furnished the drawing-room properly with the money?"

"Don't suggest such a thing!" said John, shuddering, half-seriously. "But we could have done a good deal more than that, Lu. Do you know that those Corean Cherry vases are tremendously valuable now? There was a man at the hotel last night who was telling me about them. He was agent for some dealer in curiosities, I think, and knew all about that sort of thing. He said that everything of that pattern—and especially if it was in that peculiar blue which you dislike—had increased in value extraordinarily of late years, and that many people had hundreds of pounds' worth stored away without knowing in the least how rich they were. So, you see, if we had had the vase——"

"We might have made the house a perfect gem, we might—Oh, there's no end to the things we could have done! Why, oh why, didn't Aunt Lucilla give us the vase?"

"Well, if she had, we could scarcely have sold it immediately for what it would fetch," said John.

"I suppose not; but why don't things happen as they do in books? Why don't we light upon one of those vases in one of the shops we go to, and buy it for a few shillings, and then sell it for several hundred pounds? Now that would be the right sort of thing to happen to one. Oh, what lovely carpets we would have!"

"Isn't the house good enough for you as it is, Lu?" asked John, in a grieved voice, and Lucy was obliged to call him a dear old stupid, and squeeze his arm as tightly as she could without attracting public attention, before she could make him believe that she was really quite content. This took some time, and before John was wholly satisfied they had left the tram, and were well on their way to a certain curiosity shop, where someone had told them a particularly covetable old oak folding table was to be seen. Lucy looked at the shop rather doubtfully when they reached it. It had no special pretensions, and the things in the window were dusty and ill-arranged.

"I wonder if it's worth while going in?" she said. "It doesn't look as if the man took any care of his stock. Why, that's Worcester!"

There was no more hesitation, and she entered the shop and asked the price of the vase which had caught her eye. John, who thought she intended to lead the conversation round gradually to the subject of the oak table, was lost in admiration of her diplomacy.

"It's absurd!" she whispered hurriedly, as the shopman went to fetch another piece of china, leaving her with the vase in her hand. "It's worth double that. He can't know the value of his things."

"Perhaps it's not genuine," suggested John, and received a scathing glance in reply.

"If you think I don't know real Worcester from imitation after all these years of Aunt Lucilla's teaching——John!" She gripped him by the arm, and her face was actually pale. Setting down the piece of Worcester, she pointed to two far smaller vases upon an unobtrusive shelf.

"Why, what is it? Not the Corean Cherry? Yes, it is really." John's voice rose as his excitement grew.

"Hush! Be quiet. Leave this to me. I rather like this pair of vases," she said, in tones that trembled a little, as the shopman returned. "What do you want for them?"

"Let you have the three for a ten-pound note," said the man indifferently.

"I'll give you five." Lucy's voice was even less steady than before. The man shook his head.

"No, miss; please yourself whether you'll take 'em or leave 'em, but they don't go under ten pounds. I've a sort of feeling for the blue vases; they're company to me, like. I've had 'em up there so long, and I did hear as they might be very valuable one day. But then they might get broken, so if you care to take the risk and the chance both, why, you can."

"Lucy, it's not fair!" John whispered hastily, as the man turned to reach the vases down. "We know that they are valuable."

"It's quite fair. We take the risk and the chance, as he says," Lucy whispered back. "Yes, I'll take them," to the shopman. "But they are not the real blue—the very best."

"Ah, there now!" said the man. "As soon as you come inside that door I see you were a young lady that knew her way about. Now what would you say if I could put you on the track of a larger pair of vases, of the real best blue, such as it's a pleasure to handle?"

"I should be very glad to hear of them," said Lucy recklessly, regardless of John's warning pressure on her arm.

"Well, miss, it's an old lady has them, and often and often I've made her a small offer for them, through liking the articles, as you may say, and not because I expected to make anything by it. But she won't have nothing to do with dealers, she won't, and showed me the door as haughty as you please. But if she see a real lady and gentleman that had took a fancy to the vases, why, it might be different, for she's known better days, and twenty pounds or so would come in handy for her and her cat."

"I haven't as much as that," said Lucy meditatively. Then she turned to John. "John, you must let me have that five pounds you had put aside for doing up the garden. We can manage that ourselves."

"No, no!" protested John. "We can't go flinging money away like this."

"I'm going to make money, not fling it away," in an excited whisper. "Give it me at once, John. I'll never forgive you if you don't."

Unwilling to embark upon a quarrel before the shopman, John complied with sore reluctance. Something very like the gambler's fever had seized upon Lucy, he saw, and he made a vain attempt to stem it. "I believe they'll turn out to be frauds," he said.

"Really, John, you must think I am very easily imposed upon. I shall examine them most carefully, I assure you."

"And if they're genuine we shall be cheating the old lady."

"Oh, we'll put that right afterwards, of course. Now where does this old lady live?" she asked of the shopman.

"Out St. Bernard's way, miss. But if you're going up there at once, I have a bit of business to see to in that direction myself, and if you'll excuse me while I ask my wife to have an eye on the shop, I could show you the house. Not for the old lady to see me, of course, lest she should think it was a plant made up between you and me, but just to wait outside and see whether you can get round her."

Since Lucy agreed to this, John found it vain to object. The three vases were paid for, and carefully packed in a basket, which the shopman carried, and they set out. The weight of the basket seemed to be oppressive, for when they passed a cab-stand, the man suggested that they would do the journey much quicker on wheels. John demurred, but Lucy, who had refused from motives of economy to take a penny 'bus when they left the tram, was by this time far above thinking of such trivial matters as cab-hire, and they took a cab accordingly. It was a long drive, but at last they reached a terrace of neat small houses, and stopped before the neatest of them.

"She must be a nice old lady," said Lucy, as they walked up the little tiled pathway, the shopman remaining out of sight in the cab. "Look how tidy the windows are, and yet the curtains are all darned."

A very small servant, as neat as the house, opened the door, and Lucy gasped as she stepped over the threshold, for hanging in the little hall, or rather passage, was a magnificent blue plate, finer than any of those on which Aunt Lucilla prided herself. There were other plates in the little parlour, and several vases, among them the pair the shopman had mentioned. Lucy's mouth positively watered as she gazed at them. Perfect specimens, the right blue, without a crack in them—they must be almost priceless. In her excitement she did not notice the entrance of the owner, and it was left to John to explain the object of their visit, which he did with extreme diffidence, for every shadow of suspicion fled from his mind in the presence of the little old lady before him. Such a dear old lady—with white hair lying smoothly under a lace cap, with netted mittens on her wrinkled hands, and a soft white shawl thrown loosely round her shoulders. Her black dress was old, but of excellent material, and the wedding-ring, worn very thin, was guarded by an old-fashioned mourning-ring set with pearls. It seemed almost an insult to suggest to this old lady that she should part with any of her treasures, and John was quite shame-faced as he mumbled out that they had heard she had some china she might be willing to dispose of, and they were furnishing their house, and thought——

"Quite so," said the old lady. "All this china was collected by my dear husband many years ago. He was very fond of it, and though I have had many offers for different pieces, I have always refused them all until just lately. But now my little income is much reduced, and I have been obliged——" Her eyes wandered to several empty places on the shelves of the china-cabinet.

"The plate in the hall?" gasped Lucy, but the old lady shook her head.

"That plate," she said, "I will never part with while I live. It was my dear husband's favourite piece, and I have it hung there so that I can see it from either room by leaving the door open. The other plates or the vases I should not mind so much."

"It was left to John to explain the object of their visit."

"These two?" asked Lucy breathlessly.

"Ah, you like them? Curiously enough, they have always been my favourites. It is not a fashionable taste, I know, though my dear husband used to say that fashion would come round to them, and they would be very valuable one day. But it won't happen in my lifetime, evidently," she sighed gently. "So, my dear, if you like them——"

"They are just what we wanted," broke in Lucy hurriedly, too honest to say that she liked the vases, but anxious to anticipate John, who was about, she felt convinced, to blurt out the truth; "but I don't know—we haven't much money——"

"Twenty-five pounds was what my dear husband paid for the vases," said the old lady.

"Oh, I'm afraid we can't make up more than fifteen, anyhow," said Lucy, with a beseeching glance at John. Surely he might give up his new study table? But he looked impenetrable, and Lucy gathered that he would feel relieved if the negotiation fell through on this ground.

"Fifteen pounds?" said the old lady slowly. "It would be very useful, there is no doubt. My long illness last winter—I could pay our good doctor part of his bill. Yes, my dear, you shall have them. It will be a pleasure to me to think that you appreciate my dear husband's taste."

Not daring to look at John, whose stony silence betrayed the most intense dislike to the transaction, Lucy handed over the money, received the receipt, and herself helped to empty the vases of the lavender with which they were filled. Then she took one and John the other, and, leaving the old lady bowing with stately grace on the doorstep, they went out to the cab, where the shopman received them with envious congratulations.

"Let you have 'em for fifteen pound, did she?" he remarked. "If I'd known that, I believe I'd have got a friend to go and buy them in for myself. And she kept lavender in them, by the smell. Lavender in those vases!"

"I don't think it's much better to stand them on a dusty shelf, as he would have done," whispered Lucy, as the man left them. "The old lady kept them clean, at any rate. I'm glad they're just the pattern I hate. I could never sell a piece of china I really liked."

"I feel that we are the most consummate frauds and cheats alive!" cried John vehemently. "To deceive that poor old lady——"

"Oh, but of course we'll make it up to her," cried Lucy; "and the shopman shall have something too. Just think of it, John! Of course, they must be sold in London—Christie's is the place, isn't it? You and I will go up for the day and listen to the bidding, and we shall hear it go up and up, perhaps to hundreds of pounds. Oh, won't it be splendid! Don't you feel the thrill? And we will give the old lady—how much? It shall be just as much as you think we ought, John—half, if you like. Won't she be surprised when we take her all that money? And the man—he must have a percentage, I suppose? And with the rest—oh, won't we make the house lovely? And then—why, John, we might do up the church!"

"I think the old lady ought to have it all—except just the fifteen pounds we paid her," said John rigidly.

"Oh no, John—not really! Why, think, she would have kept the vases in her cabinet as long as she lived—until they had gone out of fashion again, perhaps, and never got a penny for them. I'm sure we deserve a share for getting her such a windfall in her lifetime. But it's really dreadful to think that we have the responsibility of getting hold of it for her. If the vases got broken! John, I feel certain they will get broken. This cab will turn over, or we shall be like Alnaschar, and throw them down as we get out. I feel so horribly nervous. Can't we put them somewhere to be safe?"

"We are not far from Lewin's," said John, referring to the principal china-dealer of the place, "and we might get him to value them and house them for us. Perhaps he might even make an offer for them, and it might be as well to accept it—a bird in the hand, you know—unless you think that as trustees for the old lady we ought to stick out for the highest possible price?"

"Oh, no; it would be so nice to have the money at once. Do tell the man to drive to Lewin's, John. We will go in together, and you shall bring out one of the vases, and say, 'I have rather a nice vase here that I should like you to look at, Mr. Lewin. What would you feel inclined to offer for it?' Then perhaps he will say fifty guineas, just to try us, you know, and you will say, 'What would you say if I had a pair of them?'"

"Tableau!" said John, entering into the spirit of the occasion, as they stopped before the shop. At his request they were ushered into the proprietor's private office, where they prepared to astonish him. But the scene they had rehearsed fell rather flat, for instead of gazing with ecstasy at the first vase, Mr. Lewin merely pinched up his chin with his fingers, and asked:

"Have you any more things of this sort?"

Resenting something—she hardly knew what—in his tone, Lucy set to work to unpack the basket, and presently there were ranged on Mr. Lewin's table the two vases bought of the old lady, the smaller pair from the curiosity shop, and the Worcester vase which had first attracted Lucy's attention. Mr. Lewin surveyed them indulgently with his head on one side, then smiled sadly as he turned to John.

"Why will young ladies do this kind of thing?" he asked pityingly. "Why didn't Miss Grant come to me first?"

"Then they are not genuine?" gasped John.

"All made at the same place in Paris less than a year ago."

"And—and—what might be their value?"

"Say ten shillings for the lot. I wouldn't give you ten shillings for them, of course, because I don't want them, but anyone that took a fancy to them might. But don't go on my word alone," as he caught sight of Lucy's stunned face. "Go to X."—he mentioned a famous London expert—"and consult him. It can't do much harm in any case, and if he says they are genuine you'll be glad you went."

"Oh, don't let us waste any more money, John!" cried Lucy, finding her tongue at last; but John's resolution was taken.

"No, Lu; I shall certainly go. You seem to forget that if these things are shams, we must prosecute the shopman and—and the old lady for fraud, and we shall need the expert's opinion."

"The old lady! Oh, John, she couldn't have known."

"What about her dear husband having paid five-and-twenty pounds for them many years ago?" asked John sternly, and Lucy was silent. It was a very crestfallen couple that smuggled the unfortunate vases back to John's hotel, and Lucy's brothers and sisters could not imagine why she was so guarded on the subject of her day's purchases that evening, or why she seemed to have nothing to say about the way in which the afternoon had been spent. The next morning John left early for London, and all day Lucy was in such a frantic state of anxiety for his return that her family thought he must have promised to bring her back something very splendid indeed. She heard his step at last before anyone else did, and rushed to the door.

"Well?" she gasped. "What did he say?"

"Said it made him sick to look at them. Asked me as a favour to take them out of his sight," responded John gloomily.

"Oh, John! But we are going to prosecute the people, aren't we?"

"I'm afraid not. The fact is, Lu, I went to my lawyer in town, and laid the matter before him, and he said that though we had most excellent ground for an action, he was afraid you—we, I mean—would break down under cross-examination."

"Why? It was all perfectly straightforward."

"Ah, but why were we buying the vases? Not to keep. It was because we meant to sell them again for much more than we gave. In fact, Lu, we meant to cheat the man, though the man succeeded in cheating us. That's where we should come out badly."

"Oh!" said Lucy blankly, then added with vigour, "If ever I trust a curiosity shop man or a nice old lady with china to sell again! But what a splendid actress she must be! Oh, John, can you realise that you and I, who wouldn't take a penny 'bus because it was too expensive, have thrown away twenty-five pounds, and got nothing to show for it but those horrible, dreadful vases? I shall never be able to look at them without feeling perfectly degraded."

"Let's get rid of them," suggested John. "The boys and I can make cock-shies of them to-night. I'm sure Fred and Tom never had free leave to destroy five-and-twenty pounds' worth of china before."

"No," said Lucy firmly; "we will keep them as a warning—against speculating and all that sort of thing, I mean—and," as she remembered John's fruitless efforts to prevent the purchase, "as a special private warning to me, too."

Hence it was that when, some two months later, Lucy was showing her drawing-room to Aunt Lucilla, the vases occupied a prominent position on a shelf of John's manufacture.

"It all looks very nice, dear—very suitable." Aunt Lucilla, who was rich herself, had naturally strict views on the subject of what was suitable for poorer people. "I am glad to see you have not over-crowded your room with furniture, and the matting on the floor looks so pleasantly cool and—and unassuming."

"Yes, it is very unassuming," and Lucy, glancing round the bare little room, heaved a sigh in memory of the once despised art square.

"But, my dear, what is that?" Aunt Lucilla's eye-glass was up. "The Corean Cherry—is it possible?"

"'They are not genuine.'"

"They are not genuine, Aunt Lucilla."

"I am sorry you should put up shams in your drawing-room, Lucy. Have as little decoration as you like, but let that little be good, has always been my motto, and I thought I had impressed it upon you. But they were one of your presents, perhaps?"

"Ye—es," stammered Lucy guiltily. If Aunt Lucilla only knew that they were her present!

"Who sent them? No, don't tell me, child," Aunt Lucilla interrupted herself hastily. "I am sure I could never speak peaceably to anyone who was capable of sending forged china as a wedding present. Really, I don't think you need consider their feelings so much as to exhibit the vases like that. At any rate, you might arrange a slight accident."

"No," said Lucy with conviction; "no housemaid and no cat that ever lived could break those vases. If they were genuine it would be different."

"My dear, don't I know it? What I have gone through with servants has been heart-rending. But these imitations you will probably hand down to your grandchildren."

"Yes, they will live to vex me," said Lucy lightly, but in her heart she knew that the vases stood for something more than vexation. They would be a constant reminder of several valuable lessons, such as no one wishes to receive, but everyone is the better for having learnt.

WANTED-A REVIVAL

By the Rev. F. S. Webster, M.A., Rector of All Souls, Langham Place.

UT is it so? Without doubt a revival is needed. Is it desired? For when the hearts of God's people begin to desire it with keen spiritual longing, the time of spiritual uplifting and overflowing blessing is certainly at hand.

Slowly and sadly, the most cautious watchers upon the towers have been compelled to acknowledge something of an ebb in the spiritual life of God's people. Things are not as they were some twenty years ago. There are fewer conversions. Parochial missions no longer reach the hundreds of non-church-goers. The Salvation Army, then at its prime, and gathering thousands into the largest halls in London and the great cities, has now often the thinnest congregations. There is less faith in the power of the Gospel to save all sorts and conditions of men. Work for men's souls has been driven into the background, and the efforts of Christian people are directed towards clubs and entertainments instead of Bible classes and Gospel preaching. In fact, the antithesis between soul and body which was so prominent in the teaching of Jesus Christ—"Fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul; but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell"—is largely suppressed. Our weapons have lost their teeth. There is so little aggressiveness in our enterprise. We spend infinite pains in seeking to minister to men's bodies, but we are afraid to tell them that their souls are in danger. And while the solemn warnings of the Gospel are seldom uttered, it is equally rarely that we come across that unfeigned and exulting joy in the glory of the Gospel message which helps to win the most stubborn and unbelieving; in fact, we are more prone to apologise for our faith than to use it to save souls. There is so little of the testimony that the Queen of Sheba bore to Solomon: "I believed not the words, until I came, and mine eyes had seen; and behold, the half was not told me." Our vision is dim and our testimony is lacking in power. This is chiefly due to the worldliness which has been infecting the Christian Church. Nothing paralyses the arm like impurity in the heart. An unholy alliance, based upon surrender and compromise, has sprung up between the Church and the world.

Twenty years ago, in all evangelical circles, the command, "Come out from among them and be ye separate, and touch not the unclean thing," was literally obeyed. Now "Puritanism" is laughed at, and many who sincerely desire to follow Christ see no necessity for separation from the questionable amusements of the world. The theatre, for example, has steadily deteriorated, the number of indecent plays has rapidly increased, and yet Christians think that as long as they select modest plays there is no harm in going. This may seem a small thing, but it is a symptom of a very serious disease. It shows a lack of thoroughness, a lack of that loyal whole-heartedness which is determined to give God the benefit of the doubt. It is a falling back upon the temporising plea, "When God shows me that it's wrong I'll give it up," instead of honestly deciding "I won't touch it until I am sure it's right." The same spirit of compromise with evil shows itself in a general increase of luxury and self-indulgence, in reading unwholesome novels, in associating voluntarily with fast women and loose men, in Sabbath breaking, and "seeking their own pleasure on the Lord's Day," in card-playing with small stakes, pretending that there is no harm in gambling as long as one can afford to lose, and in a hundred other ways. And the result is twofold: a lack of relish for spiritual things—the giving up evening church and staying away from the weekday prayer meeting or Bible class—and a loss of power in testimony. "People who live in glass houses should not throw stones," and those whose hearts tell them that they are not living the Christian life in all its purity and strength cannot testify against the ungodly.

As long as by a lively faith we prove the Gospel of Christ to be the "power of God unto salvation" in our daily lives, we are "not ashamed of" it, we can proclaim it with certainty and convincing power; but when, owing to some harboured sin, our salvation breaks down, like a motor-car with a burst tyre, then we are ashamed, and our testimony is silenced. Unless the Gospel of Christ prevails to cast out the love of the world, the love of ease and pleasure and self-indulgence, from the hearts of God's people, it will be powerless to win the ungodly. Strong, effective testimony can only come out of consecrated and victorious lives.

Side by side with the worldliness of the Church there is a loosening of her faith. Those who "thrust from them" "a good conscience" cannot fail to make "shipwreck" of the faith Thousands who have never studied the writings of the critics and have no idea how flimsy and unreliable are the foundations on which they rest their theories, eagerly take advantage of their conclusions and make them an excuse for abandoning all faith in "the unique inspiration and divine authority" of the Bible. In like manner, tens of thousands, disregarding the solid foundations laid by Jesus Christ for the doctrine of a real Devil and "everlasting punishment," have been led to embrace easier and more comfortable theories, chiefly in order to escape from the intense reality and infinite importance which the old orthodox faith adds to this present life in the body. So the temper of the day is more careless. "Nothing is certain, therefore nothing matters," and, the pressure of things spiritual and eternal being relaxed, society gives itself up to mere animal enjoyment. Religion, so far as it helps to give people a good time in this present world—i.e. religion on its philanthropic side—is patronised. True religion, in its revelation of the eternal life of the world to come and the supreme importance of keeping unspotted from this present evil world, is rejected and despised.

And yet, thank God, faith is not perishing, nor is society entirely without thought of God. There is a bright side to the picture. Three or four years ago two of the most popular London dailies published Sunday editions. The opposition was so strong, the boycotting of these papers by those who demanded that respectable journalism should honour the Sabbath, was so general, that the Sunday editions had to be withdrawn. Our English Sunday, the envy of all earnest Christians throughout the world, is not yet lost. Nor is society wholly given up to selfish apathy or infidelity. No novels are more popular than those which deal with Christianity and social problems. While the society novel, like Hall Caine's "The Christian," magnificent, of course, as a drama, is full of gross misconceptions of what true Christianity is, a much simpler book, with no special artistic merit, but far nearer to a true description of the Christian life—Mr. Sheldon's "In His Steps"—gained a far wider circulation of millions of copies. A genuine desire to humble ourselves under the mighty hand of God was widely shown both during the South African War and when God preached that solemn sermon without words in the tragic illness of our King.

And there are signs of an awakening in the midst of God's people. Year by year the great gatherings of the Keswick Convention are held, when thousands of Christians of all Evangelical Churches unite as "all one in Christ." Last year the Convention was full of an ardent yearning for revival, and as the result "prayer circles" sprang up spontaneously all over the world to pray for an outpouring of God's Holy Spirit. Even the sad strife following upon the Education Bills of the Government was not able to mar the harmony of this year's Convention, or lessen the spiritual power of those truly pentecostal gatherings.

It is wrong, therefore, to give place to discouragement. The outlook, however dark, is always to the believer bright as the promises of God. Granted that a revival is sorely needed, it is equally certain that God is more ready to pour out His Holy Spirit than we are to pray. Do we honestly desire a great spiritual awakening?

There is strong prejudice in the average Christian Englishman against anything approaching religious excitement. It is partly due to the climate and our natural lethargy; it is partly the result of our jealous demand for reality, and a wholesome abhorrence of all that is shallow and evanescent. Consequently we like a quiet, steady-going religion, and deprecate all excitement or strong emotion.

This dread of revivals is not confined to the careless professors of religion. Many true Christians, though they know the terrible condition of the ungodly—blindfolded and enchained by the Devil and drifting to eternal destruction—and firmly believe that if not saved in this life by Jesus Christ they will be lost for ever, yet wish all the work of awakening them from their slumber and bringing them to Christ to be accomplished without excitement, without attracting any attention or making any stir. The great change of conversion—that mighty wrench whereby men are uprooted from their old foundations, torn asunder from the hopes and habits of a lifetime and led to yield to new influences, opening their hearts to the love of God and fixing their affections upon things above—a change which goes to the very foundations of a man's being, and affects every detail of his life—they desire that all this should take place without any stir or strong excitement. There is a widespread dread of everything sudden and decisive in personal religion, and a desire that God's kingdom should always go forward as quietly and gradually as the breaking of the day. So far as this dread of excitement is only fear of unreality and shallowness it is a good thing. We cannot be too careful in the midst of excitement to see that we are not carried away into saying or doing more than we mean. Any neglect of counting the cost is as foolish in the service of God as in business matters. But we must not condemn all revivals because in some of those who seem to be awakened the work is not lasting. However the seed is sown, the different kinds of soil will always be found. Shallow natures are met with, even in the course of the most sober preaching of the Gospel. The emotional hearer, who receives the seed into the outer surface of his feelings but is not in earnest through and through, will always make a great profession for a time and then fall away, through lack of depth, in the day of persecution.

We must not, then, let our dread of false religious excitement make us smother all enthusiasm in God's service. Enthusiasm needs to be guided and controlled, but without it there will be very little snatching of men from the grasp of the great enemy of souls, or lifting of God's people out of their worldliness and apathy into the spirit of joyful sacrifice and whole-hearted devotion. A certain amount of excitement will generally accompany great spiritual awakenings. The strong wind, the earthquake, and the fire are often needed to prepare the way for the still small voice. There may be strong excitement without the working of the Spirit—false fire of human energy and carnal enthusiasm, which brings no power of the Spirit with it. We must beware of this. There may be the powerful working of the Spirit without any excitement at all; as in the case of Lydia, God will sometimes awaken the ungodly as gently as when a mother rouses her slumbering child with a kiss. But frequently, as on the day of Pentecost, when strong prejudices are being overcome and proud wills yielding to God, and the fire of heaven is alighting on the sacrifice of willing hearts, there will be excitement so strong and manifest that the onlookers scoff and cry, "These men are full of new wine!"

And we need to see that the progress of God's kingdom amongst men is generally marked by a series of revivals and declensions. The forces of evil are so strong and active that it is only by a series of pitched battles, in which the spiritual energies of the Church of God are taxed to the utmost, that the enemy is driven back. We are engaged in a war, a great spiritual campaign, in which the opposing forces are so evenly balanced that the moment the Church relaxes her efforts she is driven back. For the forces of evil never slumber. We do not find in history or in Scripture that quiet uneventful progress in which souls are won without stir or excitement. Evil may spread silently and without effort, for man's fallen nature takes to it as readily as meal to leaven; but spiritual progress is all at the point of the sword. The blood of martyrs is the seed of the Church; the agonising prayers and sustained faith of God's people—sustained only by patient study of the Holy Scriptures—these win the day. The history of the Children of Israel is simply a record of a succession of declensions and revivals: first declensions marked by the falling into idolatry, that is, conforming to the sensuous delights, sanctioned by religion, of the surrounding heathen nations, and then, with the advent of some great champion of Jehovah, the overthrow of idolatry and the revival of spiritual religion. It is the same with the history of the Christian Church—first trial and persecution, during which faith is strong and the hope of Christ's return bright and clear, and the Church is absolutely separate from the world; then toleration and peace, with a relaxing of the Church's watchfulness, a marked increase of her wealth and political influence, a corresponding decrease in her spiritual joy, in her unspottedness from the world, and in the convincing power of her testimony—a period of stagnation and decay.

That great revivalist, John Wesley, saw only too clearly in his own day the signs of the stagnation and deadness that followed that marvellous awakening of the eighteenth century. In a memorable sermon on the text, "Is there no balm in Gilead? Is there no physician there? Why then is the hurt of the daughter of my people not recovered?" he examines why it is that even in a Protestant land, even in a church which knew the truth and had the advantage of a strict discipline as the Methodists had in those days, the healing efficacy of the Gospel, its power to overcome all that is evil and false in man, should be manifested to so small a degree. His answer was that luxury and love of ease, developed by increase of riches, were grieving God's Holy Spirit and frustrating the power of the Gospel. The Methodists, he declared, had decreased in fervour and power of faith in proportion as they had increased in wealth and social position. He observes that, whereas godliness necessarily tends to prosperity, unlimited prosperity tends to destroy godliness, and calls upon all who would check the stagnation that was threatening God's cause to give themselves more fully to fasting, to almsgiving, and to prayer. Is not this the immediate duty of Christians to-day? A revival is sorely needed. A revival is part of God's ordinary way of extending His kingdom—a revival, therefore, may be expected. Let every Christian at once seek to revive himself. Let every Christian pray more, give more, and fast more. I do not mean mere abstinence from food. Eating and drinking made up the whole of the simple life of the East. It is well for us to reduce our eating and drinking to the simplest forms, abstaining from wines and tobacco, and avoiding all making "provision for the flesh," but fasting is still more needed in the way of separation from the false excitements and unwholesome pleasures of the world, fasting from the materialistic, pleasure-worshipping spirit of the age But this only in order to lead to clearer vision and closer communion. Our eyes must "see the King in His beauty."

The true Christian is one who has God as his companion and the world under his feet. The one is impossible without the other. No monastic discipline can exorcise the love of the world, but it vanishes before the all-satisfying love of Christ. Get a revived faith, a revived sense of the sinfulness of sin, and the tremendous pressure of Eternity, a revived assurance of the marvellous love of God, a revived joy in the triumphs of His grace in your own salvation, your own daily deliverance from sin. When you are revived yourself, others will be revived through you. Fire must spread, but fire is easily choked. Remove at once anything that is choking the fire of your devotion, get a clear draught heavenwards, and an adequate supply of the fuel of the Word. It is the Church's own fault if she is feeble and impoverished. Heaven is not bankrupt. The riches of God are inexhaustible. Amidst all the complaint of our straitened condition the Master's word comes to us, opening out the sure way of revival: "Hitherto have ye asked nothing in My name; ask and ye shall receive, that your joy may be full." But the asking must be "in His Name," and this is impossible unless the daily life be also "in His Name." For our prayers are homogeneous with ourselves. Seek to be filled with the Spirit, so that the lordship of Jesus Christ shall be a reality in every detail of your daily life. Then the prayer of faith, rising up continually from consecrated lives, will surely open the windows of heaven, and blessings more than we can contain will be poured out.

THE NEW CURATE.

A Story of the Irish Coast by W. M. O'Kane.

THE entire village was tremendously excited at the prospect of obtaining a curate. There never had been such a person in Tramore, yet the villagers, and indeed some of the "quality," with true Irish instinct, insisted upon speaking of the coming individual as "the new curate."

Dr. Kelly, the rector, had begun to feel that his work was getting beyond his powers. He had private means, and could, consequently, afford to consider the interests of his parish rather than his own. When he found that he was compelled to resort more and more to his old sermons, and that visitation of his people had become a burden almost too grievous to be borne, he wisely decided to call in help in the person of a young curate-assistant.

Tramore is a peculiar place. It is in the north of Ireland, but bears a strong family resemblance to the Galloway villages that lie opposite across the Channel. There are not many Roman Catholics resident in Tramore, but Presbyterians are quite as numerous as Church people. Presbyterian influence is accordingly strongly experienced. The people, and especially the men, are keenly interested in the "sarmon." The service may be slovenly and careless, but let the discourse be good, and all else is forgotten. Now the rector had fallen off in his preaching, and the people had fallen off in their attendance. Hence the necessity for the curate, and hence also a lively curiosity as to his gifts and graces.

In addition, the storms and controversies of the outside world had so far affected the former calm of Tramore as to produce in the bosoms of the ancient guardians of orthodoxy a fear that any young man might easily be tainted with either advanced views in matters of faith or ritualistic tendencies in matters of practice. Hence a certain attitude of mental armed neutrality towards the new curate—whoever he might be.

"'Men! this boat goes into the shed only over my body.'"—p. 39.

Amongst the female parishioners the interest was keenest. The advent of another "man buddy" into a community only too destitute of that particularly desirable commodity was indeed something to talk about and speculate upon. Two of the younger members of village society put up their hair immediately. One young lady who was about to go to a situation as governess decided to postpone her departure for a couple of months. Several who were hesitating between the shop and the dye-works determined to risk new costumes. Almost the only girl who appeared insensible to what was about to happen was Muriel Kelly, the rector's only daughter. Perhaps, as some of the other girls suggested, she was as excited as any—if she were, she had, at all events, the art to conceal it.

The rector met the curate on his arrival, and walked with him through the village to his lodgings.

"Quite a busy little town," ventured the curate, after they had passed the third bevy of well-dressed young ladies.

"Well, it is not always so lively," replied the rector, with a twinkle in his eyes. "This seems to be shopping-day for most of the ladies."

"Oh!"

Before the rector left he invited his assistant to the rectory to join Mrs. Kelly and himself at their evening meal. He made no mention of Muriel, a circumstance that proved unfortunate for poor David Lyle.

On arrival at the rectory David was shown into the drawing-room. He bowed to the lady, who rose at his entry.

"Please do not light up," he requested, as she moved towards a standard lamp. "The fire-light is so charming."

The lady seated herself in an easy chair, just within the shade thrown by the fire and just without the shortened focus of the new curate's eyes.

"I think I knew your son at college," timidly ventured the curate, as the lady did not seem particularly disposed to open the conversation.

"Indeed!" was the abrupt response.

"A very nice fellow he was too, and a great kick at football."

"Really!"

This was painful. The rector's wife was evidently a contrast to her husband in geniality. Had the light been a little better, or had he himself been less diffident, he might have wondered at the curious sparkle in the eyes; but then, had the poor fellow looked into those eyes he would have known that they belonged to a young and angry girl, and not to an elderly and circumspect matron. It was almost a relief when the lady rose to her feet and walked towards the door. The curate turned the handle with a queer sinking sensation at his heart. He was beginning to suspect. As the light from the hall fell on the wavy hair and pretty face of Muriel Kelly his sensation became actually painful.

"I am afraid," he stammered, "that I have made a mistake."

"I am afraid you have," was the withering reply, given with an appropriate glance. Then she added, as she swept across the hall, the now superfluous information, "I am Miss, not Mrs. Kelly."

At dinner the curate thought it his duty to apologise for the mistake he made, and he was not a man to shirk any duty, however disagreeable.

"I am very sorry indeed, Miss Kelly, that I didn't know you weren't your mother."

She looked at him with eyes of great bewilderment.

"You see," he added lamely, "you were practically in the dark."

"You might have known from my voice," she retorted, with that lack of logic which is one of the chief charms of her sex.

Of course, it was in the curate's mind to reply that she had merely uttered two short exclamations, but he wisely refrained from going deeper. Although all inexperienced, his instinct told him that the proverb concerning sleeping dogs refers primarily to angry girls.

On the first Sunday of the curate's ministry the church was full—a circumstance that was not repeated for some time to come. He only read the lessons and preached, but he made mistakes in his reading, fumbled in turning the pages (of course, both lessons required this), and actually stopped for a full minute in the sermon.

"Whut d'ye think o' him?" asked the churchwarden.

"Think o' him!" echoed the treasurer. "Naething, sir—naething. He reads like a boy in the second book, an' can prache as much as a cuddy!"

"Whun the doctor has naething tae say he talks Greek, but whun he has naething tae say he jist says it," added the churchwarden.

Margaret, his wife, was standing near. She evidently felt for poor Lyle, and joined in the conversation to some purpose.

"John Thompson," said she—and when Margaret used both Christian and surname she was usually listened to with some attention. "John Thompson, the first time you pulled an oar you fell on your back in a basket o' codfish."

It soon became painfully evident that the new curate was anything but a success. Always a student, he had all a student's shyness and diffidence. Physically he did not appeal to the men whose lives were, for the most part, spent in taking from the unwilling sea spoil for daily bread. Many of the women, with superior spiritual instinct, clung to him and supported him bravely, but most of the men were becoming rare visitors to church, and some had been known to assert openly their contempt for the new arrival.

However it happened, it was to Muriel Kelly that David Lyle went for sympathy—and got it. Their inauspicious beginning had been forgotten, and Muriel, who knew the village people better even than her father, became the very stay and support of the curate. For his part Lyle liked the place and he liked the people. If only these big-boned, large-muscled, red-faced men could gain the necessary respect for him, he felt that he could do much to sweeten and beautify their lives. Muriel advised him simply to go on doing his duty, and his chance of gaining their respect would come Summer passed into autumn and winter came upon the land, and still things were not much better in Tramore. Lyle had improved greatly in his preaching, but the men remained prejudiced against him. Muriel was of opinion that the prejudice would have to be broken down suddenly or remain for ever.

The first big gale of the season was late in coming. Christmas was at hand before the waves leaped the grass-grown rock tops and the wind lifted the corn-stacks from their pillars. The boats were made safe, and the men, gathered in a group, watched with feelings of satisfaction, seeing that all was right, the waves break over the head of the pier. Night gathered down upon them, and the sea became grumbling darkness. Suddenly the storm cloud over the sea was cut by the curved line of a rocket. Instantly all eyes searched the gloom. When another streak of fire rushed out the men shook their heads ominously, and murmured, "Aye, it's the Ship Rock again!"

The Ship Rock lay just off the village, and derived its name from the number of vessels wrecked on the reef. The tide set strongly in on the rocks, and helped the north-east gales to bring many a stout ship to destruction. The men of Tramore in the old days, when wreckage was loot, looked upon the Rock as a special gift of Providence. Indeed, it was said that many of the present generation had, when lads, been taught to pray at their mothers' knees, "God bliss ma an' da an' sen' a ship on the Rock afore mornin'." Yet these same lads, despite the assumed downward tendency of the age, had become men who often risked their lives cheerfully to save the life and property of others.

To-night there was anxious debate A vessel was on the Ship Rock, and the rocket apparatus was useless to throw a line so far out to sea. The lifeboat was brought out into the wind and blinding spray, but for once the coxswain hesitated and the crew hung back. It was not to be wondered at. The night was heavy and dark; the wind tore fiercely into the mouth of the little harbour; the sea rushed and roared as though driven by all the furies. It would be a hard task even to launch the boat. But what would it be to reach the reef? Not often did the women complain, but to-night they, weeping, entreated their husbands and brothers not to venture out.

David Lyle stood alone and watched the discussion. No one thought of consulting him. When work was to be debated a weakling could have little to say. The rector and his daughter stood a little apart. Muriel kept an eye on the curate. Something, she knew, was going to happen.

At last Lyle saw, with a feeling of almost exultation, the men begin to drag the boat back towards the boat-house. He placed himself directly in its path. The rector made a movement to pull him aside.

"Let him alone," Muriel exclaimed imperiously, placing a firm hand on her father's arm. "He has got his chance at last. See if he can make the most of it." Somewhere behind the flash of her eyes was the jubilant feeling that he would "make the most of it."

"Men!" he exclaimed—and his voice rang clear above the hiss of the wind—"this boat goes into the shed only over my body. There are fellow-creatures perishing out there on the reef. It is our duty, as men and Christians, to help. I will go in the boat with any others, but I will not permit the life-boat to be withdrawn."

The men were astounded. This was a new rôle for the curate. Perhaps his words sounded a little bit mock heroic, but they did not notice. In the glare from the coastguard blue light, as he stood in the track of the boat, he looked nobler, more manly, than he had hitherto appeared. It must be confessed that several of the women forgot their former anxiety for their husbands in a feeling of pride for their clergyman. Another pause came in the roar of the tempest.

"You are no cowards. You have faced death before now. God will keep us! Who will go with me?"

"I'm ready," bluntly exclaimed the old salt who had steered the boat since she had first come to the coast.

His example was soon followed by men who were but half-hearted in their defection, and at the next lull the boat was rushed into the rolling waters. The curate stood at the stern wearing a life-belt a dozen sizes too big for him. The old steersman had entreated him to remain ashore, but he was not to be persuaded.

Then followed the period during which those who tarry earn their reward. It seemed as though days had passed before the boat again appeared within the light shed over the yeasty sea by a huge bonfire built in a sheltered rock hollow. With joy unspeakable she was drawn ashore, and the shipwrecked crew taken possession of. And then it was found that the wrecked vessel was a coasting schooner, and had amongst her crew two young fellows from Tramore itself. One of these had been pulled aboard the boat, in a half conscious condition, by the curate himself.

The lad was tenderly enough lifted from the boat, and the crowd gathered round, each one eager to help. The curate alone hung back. As he stole off into the darkness he was conscious of a quick flash from eyes brighter than flames of fire, and the soft swish of a skirt, as a girl turned again to see how the operation of restoring the half-drowned youth was progressing. The curate had received his "Well done."

The following Sunday will long be remembered in the village. The morning congregation was much as usual. Just now it seldom varied, wet or dry. The real test of a clergyman's power was the number who thought it "worth while" to come in the evening. The rector now seldom appeared at evening service, and the congregation had dwindled to the meagrest dimensions. This Sunday, however, there was no room for complaint regarding either the number or the attention of the congregation.

When David Lyle entered the church what seemed a perfect sea of faces met his astonished glance. Tramore knew how to appreciate courage as well as theology, and there was not, in consequence, a seat to be found for full thirty people who stood throughout the entire service. The Presbyterians, who usually came surreptitiously at harvest-tide or Christmas, showed themselves boldly. Poor Lyle was completely nonplussed. When he looked at the crowded pews and thought of their former emptiness, his nervousness was increased a hundredfold. Never, perhaps, since his first sermon had he preached so badly. But there was no sign of weariness or impatience. Perhaps most of those present heard only the roaring of the wind and sea, and saw only this delicate-looking lad leaning over the side of the life-boat to bring to safety one of their number.

Lyle waited long in the vestry that the people might have time to disperse. It was lost time, because when he appeared the little God's acre was crammed with living men, women, and children. The curate hesitated, and had there been light to see, those near him would have observed tears in his eyes. Hats and caps were raised as he passed with downcast eyes; many a murmured "God bless you!" reached his ears. When the pillars of the gate loomed through the darkness the confused cleric began to breathe again, for he thought that deliverance was near. But all was not yet over. Before he left the crowd behind, a thin, piping voice rose clear and distinct on the night: "Three cheers for the new curate!" And the quiet of the Sunday eve was broken by three great cheers that might almost have roused the dead sleeping around.

The churchwardens, on the following Wednesday evening, gravely discussed this unwonted outbreak.

"Siccan a thing was nivir heerd tell o' in Tramore afore," exclaimed Gilbert Dalzell.

"Aye, aye," acquiesced John Thompson. "'Twas a scandalous thing tae dae, I'm afeerd. But, man, Gilbert, for the life o' me I cudna' help joinin' in."

David Lyle is now the popular rector of the parish, and Muriel still rules in the rectory.

PUBLIC MEN IN THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.

By A. Wallis Myers.

THE centenary of the Sunday School Union, celebrated this year, is an event which, if it does not stir the nation's interest like the jubilee of a monarch, at least stimulates the imagination of a great army of Christian children. From the day that Raikes employed his first four teachers to instruct a handful of bairns gathered from the back streets of Gloucester, the Sunday school has gradually grown into a national institution, the members of which in various countries now total up to twenty-five millions, the scholars in the schools of Great Britain and Ireland alone falling little short of seven millions. Taken by themselves, these figures are an immediate proof of the welfare and hardihood of the movement; taken in conjunction with the unnumbered instances of reclamation and social good bestowed on its adherents, the success of the Sunday school system is certain.

The romantic story of Raikes's first Sabbath school in the West of England, and of shoemaker Kemp's first class in Hoxton Street, London, is familiar to all readers of THE QUIVER. Who has not heard how James Kemp trudged all the way from Hoxton to Gloucester to hear from the great pioneer's own lips the methods which he had so manfully adopted; and how that Kemp returned to London stimulated with pious zeal, bent on opening the doors of his own house for the instruction of the youthful scalliwags of his district?

(Photo: Florman, Stockholm.)

PRINCE BERNADOTTE.

(Photo: Florman, Stockholm.)

PRINCESS BERNADOTTE.

Since those early days of inception many men of note and distinction in public life have given at least one day each week of their busy lives to Sunday school work, often foregoing hours of well-earned repose in order that the spiritual welfare of little children may be furthered. It is a pleasure, and not an irksome duty, in which they engage; but it may safely be said that Sunday school teaching and Bible class instruction by celebrities has demanded, and will continue to demand, the sacrifice of many of those secular luxuries which other men would fain attain.

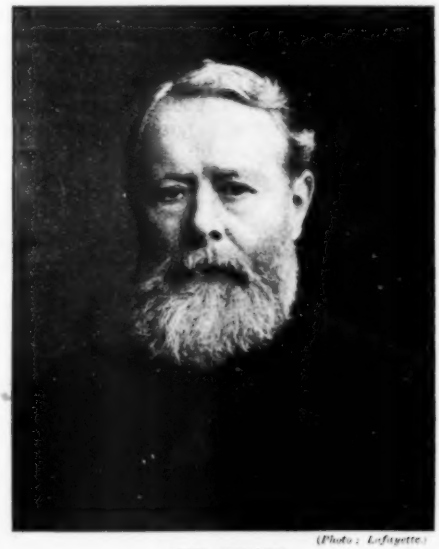
In Sweden, for instance, we have one striking example of a Royal Prince renouncing his rights as possible heir to the Throne in order that he might marry a Christian lady, who is now the Princess, and follow his desire to engage in religious and philanthropic work. When the Rev. F. B. Meyer had been staying with the Prince and Princess Bernadotte at their home, he recalls that their last words to him on Saturday night were: "Will you excuse us if we have breakfast an hour earlier on Sunday morning? because it is our custom to go with our children to our Sunday school, which is always preceded by a prayer meeting for half an hour, and that we never miss." It has been a beautiful thing to see the Prince and Princess and their four children depart early in the morning to attend these services. Their English guests do not accompany them, and know nothing by personal observation of what is actually done at the Sunday school. But Mr. Meyer, for one, says that his admiration and love for them grows as he knows them better. Their home life is ordered so simply and beautifully that one cannot but be impressed with the perpetual presence of God under their roof.

(Photo: E. Bieber, Berlin.)

COUNT A. BERNSTORFF.

(Photo: Lafayette.)



LORD OVERTOUN.

Before we leave the Continent, some reference is demanded to the splendid work organised by Count A. Bernstorff, who has been connected with the Sunday school movement from the very beginning. When in November, 1863, the veteran Sunday school missionary Mr. Albert Woodruff, from Brooklyn, New York, came to Germany, he soon interested the Count, who was then a young man of nineteen in Sunday schools. A year later the latter largely helped to start the Sunday school of the Evangelical Society, and ever since has remained a warm friend of the cause. He is still the superintendent of a Sunday school containing about two hundred children, for whom he built a hall in his own house in Berlin.

After the death of Pastor Prochnon, in 1887, Count Bernstorff was elected President of the German Sunday School Committee—a post he still occupies with great distinction, and as such he has taken the chair at six national conventions. When it was initiated, the Sunday school movement met with much opposition in Germany, every kind of lay work being unknown ; but, thanks chiefly to the zeal and tact of Count Bernstorff, it soon conquered all prejudices and made itself at home and even appreciated. In the beginning there were only four children's services in Berlin, nothing being done in the rest of the churches to bring the little ones to Christ, such efforts being left entirely to the family. At the present time there is no parish in Berlin without at least one Sunday school ; in most of them there are several. All the great missionary agencies have their schools—even the Young Men's Christian Association—in order to give their members experience of spiritual work. Count Bernstorff has visited both of the World's Conventions in London, and was recently over here for the centenary celebration of the Sunday School Union, of which he is a Vice-President.

Cases where peers of the realm have regularly taught in the Sunday school are, it is to be feared, sufficiently rare to attract attention ; but it may not be generally known that three past Lord Chancellors—Earls Hatherley, Selborne, and Cairns—were all zealous workers in this department, while the late Lord Herschell, before he became such, taught for several years in the school connected with his father's chapel in

(Photo : Lafayette.)

LORD KINNAIRD.

John Street, Edgware Road. To-day we have Lord Overtoun, Glasgow's premier citizen, as one of the few noblemen taking an active part in the furtherance of the Sunday School Union ideals. Although a millionaire, furnished with every opportunity to make Sunday a day of secular pleasure, Lord Overtoun has sedulously devoted himself on the Sabbath to instructing a Bible class of five hundred young Scots, among whom he is immensely popular. With the welfare of young men his lordship is closely identified, and, among other good works, he pays a well-known Scotch minister a round sum a year to devote his energies to preaching the Gospel. Lord Overtoun thoroughly believes in athletics for young men. He is a keen sportsman himself, fishes with zeal, and is not to be despised at golf. But none of these recreations finds a place in his Sunday programme. In that respect, as in many others, he sets a practical example.

LORD KINNAIRD AND THE SHOEBLACK BOYS

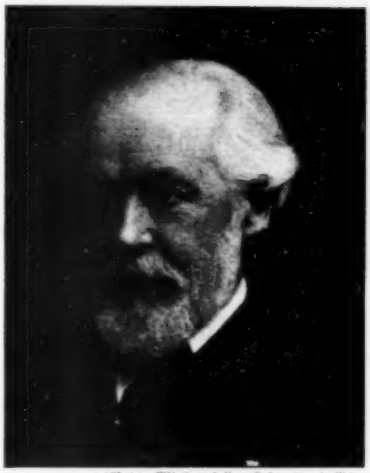
Lord Kinnaird is of course, another peer who has given his best to the children on a Sunday. For the last thirty-six years he has been a ragged school and a Sunday school teacher, his instruction principally taking the form of a service for shoeblack boys, to whose welfare he is so keenly devoted. Lord Kinnaird, whose interest in young men is a byword, appreciates the supreme importance of Sunday school work as the chief hope of keeping in touch with each succeeding generation of boys and girls. It is thus that he strives, whenever possible, to bring himself into close personal touch with his scholars.



Although three Lord Chancellors have taught in Sunday schools, there is apparently no Judge now sitting on the Bench who personally conducts a class, although the present Lord Chief Justice, Lord Alverstone, was a teacher in his youth, and still cherishes a warm sympathy for the work. It is perhaps only natural the Lord Chief Justice should be unable to find the time at present, though we remember that the late Mr. Thomas Ellis (the chief Liberal whip) once left a meeting of the Cabinet in order that he might not disappoint his assembled class.

SIR J. McDOUGALL AT GREENWICH.

Another very busy man whose interest in the Sunday school has ever been real and sincere, is Sir John McDougall, last year's Chairman of the London County Council. Sir John was one of a large family reared in Manchester, and first began to teach in Sharp Street Ragged School when he was quite a youngster, his first charges being infants. It was here, as he himself has said, that he first learnt his intense love for children;

(Photo: Elliott and Fry, Baker Street, W.)

SIR J. McDOUGALL.

(Photo: Mault and Fox, Piccadilly, W.)

MR. GEORGE WHITE, M.P.

here that that love had full scope. A gentle yet firm disciplinarian, Sir John McDougall soon earned the affection and trust of every child. Those were the dark days before the passing of the Act of 1870, and the ill-fed bairns had to be taught the rudiments of reading and writing before the Bible became anything like a potent factor in their lives. Sir John was one of the first to persevere in the educational task, and he also devoted all his leisure moments to procuring meals for his young pupils. When, at the age of twenty-five, the ex-Chairman of the London County Council came to London, he almost immediately became honorary secretary of the West Ham School Board, the first to be established after that of London. Simultaneously he threw himself into Sunday school work in connection with the Wesleyan body. Removing subsequently to Greenwich, Sir John started a school of ragged street arabs whom he himself collected in the side streets of that riverside town. Having secured the use of a building, he would sally forth alone, and, diving into the lowest quarters of Greenwich, would capture little torn and shivering lads and lassies, provide them with warmth and clothing, and then instruct them in the Divine truths of the Gospel.

(Photo: Russell and Sons, Baker Street, W.)

MR. F. F. BELSEY.

Sir John McDougall has put on record the fruit of his experience as an active teacher. "I think," he says, "the need for Sunday schools is as great as ever, but the schools should be so adapted to the tastes of the scholars that they may enjoy learning to be and to do good. To my mind, the great things to enforce are the love of God and the kindly service of one to another. I do not think the superintendent ought to be responsible for the ordering of the whole school; his discipline should not be that of a jailer in a prison. A kindly, affectionate discipline is what is required, and a sense of humour is to be encouraged, so long as it does not develop into boisterous mirth."

(Photo: H. J. Whitlock and Sons, Ltd., Birmingham.)
MR. GEORGE CADBURY.

Among members of Parliament who take an active part in Sunday school instruction are Mr. J. H. Whiteley and Mr. George White. The second is most indefatigable in his weekly duties at St. Mary's Baptist Church, Norwich, with which, remarkable to relate, all five partners in the firm of which Mr. White is chairman are connected. For some years Mr. White has been superintendent of the Sunday school and leader of the first day adult school for men, and in his devotion to the work he has been an example to all. It was no light programme that he carried through for years—to begin with the men's school at nine o'clock, which involved a walk of nearly two miles from his house to the chapel; to be at the reading desk at the morning and evening services in the sanctuary; and at the Sunday school in the afternoon. Mr. White's manner in the Sunday school is like the man—straightforward and businesslike. He is respected by every man, woman, and child, for his character is absolutely above reproach. Moreover, he has never failed to regard his duties at the Sunday school as equal in importance to those he fulfils as Chairman of the School Board, as magistrate, or even in the House of Commons.

The Sunday school has commanded the energies of many another gentleman who has held high municipal office, but none who have devoted so much of their daily lives to its welfare as the present President of the Sunday School Union, Mr. Francis Flint Belsey, J.P. It is difficult to bring within our limits a record of Mr. Belsey's strenuous life. A native of Rochester, he has done much for the town, twice filling the mayoral chair and twice contesting a Parliamentary election. He also founded a workmen's club when none was available in Rochester, and subsequently, when two others were started, converted it into a branch of the Y.M.C.A. and a temperance hotel. Of his Sunday school labours it would be impossible to speak too highly. For forty-five years he was connected with the Vines Sunday School at Rochester, which under his superintendence reached a membership of seventy teachers and seven hundred scholars. His preparation classes for teachers, two of which he conducted every Saturday evening, effected much good, and are remembered to-day with grateful pleasure. Gifted with great organising capacity and tact, Mr. Belsey was soon brought into official contact with the Sunday School Union, and at the request of its council he attended the International Convention at Toronto in 1881, and subsequently he became Chairman of the Council and one of the trustees of the Union—honourable positions which he now holds by annual re-election. Mr. Belsey was President of the World's first Sunday School Convention, held in London, and it was his privilege to take the chair at the meeting at which Dr. Clark first unfolded his scheme of Christian Endeavour to an assembly of English Christians. But why go on? Mr. Belsey's name is too well known in every Sunday school to need prominence here. Suffice it to add that the President of the Union has specially interested himself in promoting the increased efficiency of the schools and the improvement of the teaching. He was one of the first to employ the blackboard in the Sunday school.

It may not be generally known that one of our greatest living scientists was once the superintendent of a Sunday school, this being Sir William Huggins, K.C.B., President of the Royal Society. Another well-known public man and a great naval architect, Sir Nathaniel Barnaby, has been a teacher in the Sunday school for sixty years, and has been the superintendent of his present school at Lee for more than half that period. A devout Christian and a passionate lover of children, Sir Nathaniel is never happier than when taking a class of youngsters, and, though he is one of the last to court recognition, yet he is not a little proud of the diploma recently presented to himself and seven colleagues as the result of twenty-five years of service in the same institution. "Whoso would know the crowning delight of life," says this eminent naval architect, "let him spend himself in helping to make the lives of the children beautiful."

One of the richest men in the Midlands, Mr. George Cadbury is also one of the simplest livers, and for more than forty years he has never failed to rise every Sunday morning at six o'clock in order that he may conduct a Bible class in Birmingham, which numbers many hundreds of men and youths. In the winter months the road is dark and dreary for his five-mile journey, and often it is in a very dangerous state; but, no matter what the weather may be like, this eminent philanthropist arrives at the school on his bicycle in time to breakfast with the teachers of his branch classes. From half-past seven till eight a friendly discussion is held as to the various needs of individual scholars and the work of the school; then the classes are convened, and at their conclusion Mr. Cadbury cycles back to his home.

(Photo: Maull and Fox, Piccadilly, W.)

SIR NATHANIEL BARNABY.

ONE PERFECT YEAR.

A Complete Story by E. Burrowes.

"HOW long do you give her?"

The man's voice was hoarse and shaken, but the great doctor's eyes met his unflinchingly. Perhaps he was only too well accustomed to such a question, and such a case.

"One year," he said briefly. "No more. I am sorry, but you had better know the truth at once. Do as you think best about keeping it from her, or telling her. She'll probably find it out in any case."

"Yes. She'll find it out in any case. Thank you, doctor. I suppose there is nothing to be done? Nothing you can suggest to make things easier for her?"

The words were difficult to say, but the doctor must have understood. There was a queer, hard gleam in his eyes as they met those of the other man—the husband.

"Nothing of consequence," he said evenly; "she will not suffer much, and you can let her do what she likes, and go where she likes. It will not matter."

The words rang in Wygram's ears as he stumbled out into the glaring sunlight of the July afternoon. It will not matter! They had been married barely two months: that was the horrible cruelty of the thing—he fought against it in vain, as he walked along the hot pavements, seeing no one, and heeding nothing in his misery. He remembered how she had treated it as a joke at first: laughed at him, and called him fussy, and an old molly-coddle, because he insisted that a doctor must be sent for. He knew that there must be some cause for the lassitude and languor which had overtaken her already when their honeymoon was scarcely over. They had laughed at it together, and that very day she had been in the highest of spirits. When she consented to see a doctor she insisted on choosing her own; but he was pleased that she chose the one man in London who would surely understand her case and do what was needful. The name of Haviland was one to conjure with just then; but young Mrs. Wygram fixed on him because he was a friend of her childhood. So to Haviland she went joyously and light of heart, and he listened to her tale of weakness and languor, and looked at her with the attentive eye of the seeker after mysteries, and then told her to eat well and take care of herself, and to go into the country if she liked it better than London, and then he dismissed her with a smile. That was all.

But there was more behind. Wygram guessed as much, and paid a private visit to Sir James Haviland, and heard dully, and with a horrible sickening clutch at his heart, the words of doom.

One year.

When he reached home she was looking out for him from the flower-filled balcony, where pink geraniums hung their heads in the heat. In her white gown she looked like a flower herself, and he was struck afresh by the wonderful colour in her soft cheeks and the sparkle in her eyes. She looked so well—so happy, smiling down at him, as he pulled out his latch-key, but those two ominous words fell upon him as a bolt out of the blue.

"Where have you been all this time, Giles?" she asked, when he joined her on the balcony under the awning. "I thought you were never coming in!"

"I had business in the City, dear," he answered evasively. He could not tell her! He would not tell her: it was cruel—it was unspeakable. Why should there not be some mistake? Doctors were not always infallible, his heart cried out to him as he chattered gaily; and he answered her at random and with miserable, averted eyes.

* * * * * *

Three months later they were in the country. Shooting parties had come and gone. Visitors were leaving every day, and Wygram knew that he and Helena would at last be alone together again. He longed for, and at the same time dreaded, that solitude à deux which but a little time ago he would have hailed with joy. Now a shadow stood between them, for he had not told her yet. As each month, each week, each day passed he knew the hour was coming when that most difficult of things must be told; and then one morning Helena looked up from a letter she had just opened, and unwittingly solved the terrible problem for him.

"A letter from Sir James," she said; "he wants to come to us for a few days' rest, Giles. I believe that he makes an excuse to bother me with treatment or something; but, of course, he must come. It will be nice to have him."

So Haviland was coming down. Then let him tell the horrible thing. It was inhuman to leave the dreaded task to him: to expect him to tell the being he loved most on earth that only nine short months of life remained to her. He shuddered, and looked forward to the coming of the doctor with relief.

When he came he was the only guest—everyone else had gone, and there were just those three: the husband, the doomed wife, the doctor whose fiat had gone forth three months ago. He was overworked, he said, and tired out; a few days' complete quiet and rest in the country would work wonders; and he was anxious to see how Helena was getting on—this with a smile at the girl at the head of the stately table. He had known her ever since she was a mite in short white frocks, and tumbling curly hair. He told her with a smile that he was a privileged person, and that therefore he was quite entitled to prescribe for her as he pleased. Wygram looked on and listened to the ghastly pleasantry with set face. She must be told, and Haviland must tell her.

He sought him out a day later, and called him to his study. Helena was singing in her boudoir—he could hear the soft sound of the piano in the distance as he shut the door, and turned to the physician.

"Will you tell her?" he said abruptly. "For I—I can't."

Haviland shot a questioning glance at him. "Tell her?" he said. "That——"

"Wygram waited in silence."

"Yes; you know what she must be told. Heaven help us both! She does not know it yet; I've never had the pluck to break it to her, and you must do it for me. Isn't it too much to expect of me?"

He turned away and looked out of the window, and Haviland watched him with a curious gleam in his keen eyes. He had just come from a prolonged interview with Mrs.

Wygram; he had insisted on it half laughingly, half seriously, and the result had startled him.

For a moment there was silence; there was something suggestive of cool deliberation—a careful balancing of pro and con—in the doctor's attitude and thoughtful air. Once he opened his lips to speak, and stopped short with the words almost trembling on his lips. Finally he said:

"I have just seen Helena again. You may remember that I expressed a wish to have another examination later on. . . . I have just made it."

Wygram swung round.

"And——" he said eagerly, new hope springing to life in his face.

Haviland looked searchingly at the other man's set white face—at the lines which were beginning to show on his forehead, telling of anxiety and care.

"I can but hold to my first opinion," he said slowly, and Wygram bowed his head in silence. There was, then, no hope, and the one year had now dwindled to little more than eight months.

"As to telling her," said Haviland presently in his slow, even tones, "I must leave it to you. She may know it already; there is something akin to the marvellous in a woman's intuition; where we ponder and hesitate to believe, she knows. I cannot help thinking that it is so with Helena."

So the precious time passed. Haviland left, refreshed after his short holiday, and the Wygrams settled down alone for the winter. There was some talk of wintering abroad, suggested by Wygram in the wild hope that a warmer climate might prolong the precious life over which he was watching; but Helena would not hear of it—Haviland had said nothing mattered, that she was to do as she liked—so Wygram gave way. He wondered a dozen times a day whether Helena knew—whether she guessed—whether he should tell her. But he put off the evil day, and thrust it from him fiercely. The agony of suspense lay heavy enough upon him—let him bear it alone. It was when the fateful year was drawing all too rapidly to a close, and Wygram dreaded to see a change in the girl's loveliness, that she said to him one sunny April day:

"Do you know we shall soon have been married a whole year, Giles? Just think of it!"

He tried to meet her smiling glance without flinching.

"Nearly a year, darling. So we have. It has flown, hasn't it?"

"On wings," she said happily, "and it's been just perfect, Giles. Whatever happens now, we shall be able to look back upon one perfect year."

"One perfect year! He looked at her quickly. Did she know, then? Had she guessed?

"Whatever happens now, we shall have had one perfect year."

She looked down at him with a smile.

"How solemn you are," she said gaily; "you have been so for such a long time, Giles. Is there anything the matter? Or were you worried about me? Why, I'm ever so much better; I'm getting quite fat, and as strong as possible. I thought I was going to be very ill at first, but I'm nearly well."

He winced at her words. Either she did not know, or she was purposely trying to deceive him, thinking perhaps that he was in ignorance of the doom hanging over her head. Whichever it was——

The door opened and a maid came in with a pile of letters on a tray.

"Three for me, four circulars for you, Giles, and a letter; oh! and a newspaper."

Wygram got up; his fingers closed on the letter; he knew the handwriting. It was from Haviland. The rest of his correspondence he thrust into the waste-paper basket.

"I must do a little scribbling before tea, dear," he said; "I shall not be long."

He felt he must get away to read the letter alone; he could not bear her smiling eyes upon him, and he shut himself into his study and opened the letter.

At first he hardly understood the meaning of the clearly written words which covered nearly a sheet. He read it twice before he took in their complete sense. The letter was dated the previous day, and addressed from the house in Harley Street in which the dread fiat had been given out.

"DEAR WYGRAM,—You will read in to-morrow's paper of the accident, which must result in my death, probably in a few hours' time. Therefore I need not mention it in this letter; time is short, and I have something to say to you which must be said before I shuffle off this mortal coil. I don't ask your forgiveness, nor do I excuse myself. I simply make a confession to you, which is this: I told you some nine months ago that Helena was doomed—that her indisposition came from a perfectly incurable disease, and that she had only a year to live. It was a lie; it is a lie. She is now practically well, and I knew it when I was with you in the autumn. You will naturally wonder what reason I had for treating you in this manner, and for perjuring my immortal soul—as some folk would call it. I ask you, Have you never heard of revenge? Or jealousy? Or unsatisfied love? These were the motives that prompted me to lie to you. Ever since I can remember her I have loved her; once I thought I should win her—though she never, I think, guessed my secret; then you came, and my dream was shattered. I—I hated you, and when Helena came to me and asked my advice and treatment, I saw with a flash of devilish lightning a way by which I could crowd into one year of your life all the unspoken agony and pain and grief which was given to me to bear. I did it. I knew it had the effect I meant it to have, and—enough. I'm at the end of my tether, and somehow I fancy I shall make a better exit from the world if I—confess. That's all I have to say; tell her or not, as you like; it doesn't matter much either way. In an hour or so I shall be beyond the power of human fury or forgiveness.

"James Haviland."

For a long time Wygram sat motionless with the letter before him. He was stunned. By slow degrees he began to realise what this letter meant; what a load of darkness and grief it lifted from him; what a rose-coloured future it showed him—for him and Helena.

He sprang to his feet.

It had all been a lie! All the nine months of agony fell from him—his face lightened, grew younger; it was as if a sponge had been passed over his countenance, erasing all the lines and signs of anguish and haunting fear which he had been at such pains to hide from Helena. And then another thought flashed upon him. He need never tell her! She need never know of the horrible thing which had crushed him during those nine months.

"Thank Heaven!" he muttered brokenly. "Thank Heaven!"

And never once did he think of the man who had wrought this havoc in his life for revenge. He had no room for any thoughts but those of Helena—and the new and wonderful future before him.

He turned again to the table and looked at the letter; perhaps the hand that had penned those lines was now still for ever. The thought sent him in haste to the daily paper; he searched its columns, and then his eye was arrested by a paragraph which stated that the eminent physician, Sir James Haviland, had been knocked down by a hansom while crossing the Strand the previous morning, that the injuries were of such a nature that no hope was entertained of his recovery.

Wygram dropped into his chair. A revulsion of feeling swept over him. What he had suffered, for nearly one year, the dead man had suffered for—how many?

The door opened softly, and Helena slipped into the room. She saw her husband, with his head bowed on his arms, sitting at the table; she saw an open letter at his side. She recognised the handwriting, and instinctively she thought she knew what had happened.

"Giles, dear," she said, her hand on his shoulder—and she felt how he started under her gentle touch—"Giles, dear, I know all about it; you need not have hidden it from me. I think I guessed."

He looked up, with such joy shining in his eyes that she drew back startled.

"You know—what?" he asked.

"That—I am more ill than you thought," she said bravely. "I guessed there was something like that when you looked so grave, and Sir James came down again and—let me see his letter, Giles—yes, I must; you shall not keep it from me any longer."

She tore the letter from his hand, and read it through. Wygram waited in silence; after all, she would not judge the dead man hardly.

He waited five minutes—six—then——

"Giles!"

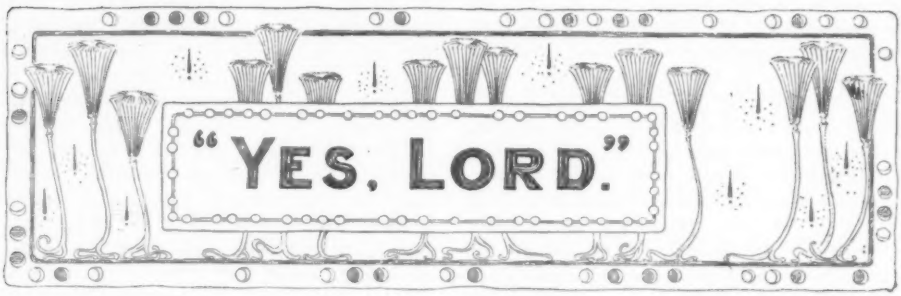
He caught her in his arms, and hushed her sobbing as one would soothe a child.



* * * * *

Wygram was right. Helena was not hard on the dead man.

"I never knew—I never guessed," she said pitifully, "but—can I ever forgive the pain he made you suffer?"

But I think she did in time. For she says that perhaps if it had not been for that dark shadow which had hovered over them, that one year would not have been so perfect.

"Whatever happens now, Giles," she said, with her hand in his, "we shall always be able to look back on one perfect year."

By Thomas Spurgeon, Pastor of the Metropolitan Tabernacle.

AT a recent meeting for prayer and testimony, an experienced Christian told of how the words "Yes, Lord," on the wall of his room had helped him to a devout and trustful frame of mind. Hearing of this, I began to reflect on the advantage of having such a motto hung in my heart, enclosed in the golden frame of a sanctified memory. Moreover, I commenced to contemplate the questions that my Lord might put to me, and to wonder if, in every case in which the reply ought to be in the affirmative, I could unhesitatingly answer, "Yes, Lord." Naturally enough, my mind reverted to the golden days "when Jesus was here among men," and to the occasions on which the disciples and others responded thus to the Lord's inquiries. To five of these I propose to ask the attention of my readers, in the hope they also will have a "Yea, Lord" ready for each of their Master's questions.

1. "And when Jesus departed thence, two blind men followed Him, crying and saying, Thou Son of David, have mercy on on us. And when He was come into the house, the blind men came to Him; and Jesus saith unto them, Believe ye that I am able to do this? They said unto Him, Yea, Lord. Then touched He their eyes, saying, According to your faith be it unto you" (Matt. ix. 27–29).

This is the "Yea" of unquestioning faith in Christ's power. These afflicted suppliants knew the secret of prevailing prayer. Somehow or other, they had discovered that, whereas without faith it is impossible to please Him, there is nothing that delights Him more than absolute trust in His love and power. Their eyes of faith were open, though natural vision had been denied them. It is better to see the things that are invisible than the things that are temporal. Faith's far-seeing eye perceived that the Son of David could do this mighty deed, and with a word unlock to sealed eyes the beauties of earth and sky. There were two blind men, but there was only one voice, and that said solemnly and certainly, "Yea, Lord." What magnificent faith this saying proved! for there must have been some inward promptings to fear and unbelief.

Oh, for such sublime and simple confidence! The "Yea" of absolute and unquestioning trust declares that there is nothing too hard for the Lord, and sweetly sings, "I know that Thou canst do everything."

Do we seek the opening of the eyes for ourselves, or for others? Let us not limit the Holy One of Israel; let us cherish no doubt that He Who has come to give both life and light can open the eyes of the understanding, and make those who were sometime darkness to be henceforward "light in the Lord."

> "Pass me not, O mighty Spirit,
> Thou canst make the blind to see;
> Witnesser of Jesu's merits,
> Speak the word of power to me!"

The faith of these seekers was specific. They believed for "this." That they might receive their sight was the one thing that they desired of the Lord, and after that they sought with a direct and definite faith.

It is just here that we often fail. Our petitions are far too vague and indefinite. "Generalities are the death of prayer."

We should have a well-defined longing in our hearts; then we shall be better able to return a decided "Yea, Lord," to the inquiry which tests our faith. Let our dealings with our God be prompt, pointed, and personal—I had almost written businesslike. Above all, we will rest assured that He is able—gloriously able. Then He will honour our trustfulness. "Those who trust Him wholly, find Him wholly true."

This "Yea, Lord," was triumphant. It demanded and secured the boon. There could be no refusal to such "firm and lasting" faith. Nor could there be long delay. "Then touched He their eyes," and His touch immediately poured celestial day upon the eyeballs of the blind.

That touch has still its ancient power, and so has the "Yea, Lord," of unstaggering faith. If we say "Yea," He will not say us "Nay."

Moreover, it will be with us as it was with these sightless men of Palestine, to whom it was done according to their faith. We have the measuring of our own mercies. Only when the wife of the prophet could borrow no more vessels did the oil stay. It is ever so. The blessing exceeds our utmost wants. "He giveth more grace." The fountain is always overflowing. Methinks I see a crowd of thirsting souls hastening to the well-head with vessels "not a few." They are of all shapes, sizes, and descriptions; but the sparkling water fills them every one. And still the fountain gushes with refreshing streams. There is enough and to spare. Much of it seems to run to waste. So do we gather around the "Fount of every Blessing" with our "empty vessels." We ask and have. If we are straitened, it is in ourselves. To every "Yea" of confidence on our part our mighty and merciful God replies with His own "Yea" of abounding blessing. His favour is the echo of our faith, and the echo is always sweeter than the voice.

> "To praying souls He always grants
> More than they can express."

2. "Jesus saith unto them, Have ye understood all these things? They say unto him, Yea, Lord" (Matt. xiii. 51).

We have here the "Yea" of intelligent acceptance of Christ's teaching. The "Good Master" had been speaking in parables concerning the kingdom of heaven. "Without a parable spake He not unto them; that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet, saying, I will open My mouth in parables; I will utter things which have been kept secret from the foundation of the world." The parables of the sower, the tares, the mustard seed, and the leaven He had spoken unto the multitude. Having sent the people away, He explained some of these to His disciples, and spoke the additional parables of the hidden treasure, the pearl, and the draw-net. It was then that He inquired if they had understood His teaching. There was need for the question. It is more than possible to follow a story but to miss its sense. Allegorical pictures must be looked carefully into if their meaning would be found—a glance will not suffice. One may admire the illustrations in a volume without at all grasping the purport of the book. We do well to welcome the question of our wise Teacher as He seeks to discover if we have truly received His instruction; and if His types and emblems have been more to us than are the engravings in a book to a thoughtless child or a casual reader.

Christ asked if they had understood all. Everything He said had its meaning, and bore an important relation to the rest. To miss some might be to mar all. All that He provided was worth receiving. There was no husk in His wheat. Well might He say, "Have ye understood all these things?" We ought not to be content with mastering the main drift of any spiritual matter, or with remembering the gist of the Lord's message to us. The details are not trifles. We are to live by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God. Be it evermore ours to pray, "That which I know not, teach Thou me."

To this inquiry, so heart-searching and so full of meaning, the pupils replied unhesitatingly, "Yea, Lord." We do not wish to do them an injustice, but we cannot repress a wonder as to whether they really did. Perhaps they were not so lowly as they might have been. Yet, as Jesus did not rebuke them, we will cherish no suspicions. Certain it is that there was no disposition to reject His teaching. They showed a commendable willingness to learn, and they doubtless supposed that they had proved apt scholars.

Thus does the gracious Master still deal with those who sit at His feet. He tells to them His truth, and explains what is mysterious. How patiently He toils! What infinite pains He gladly takes to impart His wisdom! Line upon line, precept upon precept, here a little and there a little. He questions and cross-questions, gives opportunity for the mention of a difficulty or for further inquiry, and teaches to profit all the time.

Happy are those learners in the school of Christ who can honestly say, "Yea, Lord; we have entered into all the secrets. Thou art so apt to teach, that we could hardly fail to understand. Thou hast broken it so small that we had little difficulty in digesting the truth." The lessons have proved so delightful that the learners were charmed into comprehending them. Then will He say to us as He did to them, "Therefore every scribe which is instructed unto the kingdom of heaven is like unto a man that is an householder, which bringeth forth out of his treasure things new and old." We are taught that we may teach. If we understand these things, happy are we if we do them.

3. "Jesus said unto her, I am the resurrection, and the life; he that believeth in Me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth in Me shall never die. Believest thou this? She saith unto Him, Yea, Lord; I believe that Thou art the Christ, the Son of God, which should come into the world" (John xi. 25–27).

We will term this the "Yea" of personal acknowledgment of the person, and office, and work of the Messiah. We have the Gospel here from the lips of the Saviour Himself. Life and resurrection are in Him. They are ours by faith in Him. For this purpose came He into the world. Those who are physically dead live in eternal blessedness through Christ, and those who are still in the flesh shall never die spiritually if they believe in Him.

The solemn question that comes to each of us is, "Believest thou this?" Do I credit it, not in a general sense, but particularly and personally? The Redeemer puts the inquiry to us as we weep over the havoc that sin and death have made. Do we believe Jesus of Nazareth and of Bethany to be indeed the Christ? Do we believe that believing in Him secures eternal life? "No man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost."

Martha's confession was a bold one; she did well to answer so promptly to so sudden and searching a question, although she hardly knew the full import of her reply, for her views of the Messiah's character and office were necessarily imperfect. What privileges we have "upon whom the ends of the world are come." Our "Yea" ought to be unequivocal and full of meaning. When Christ Who is our life shall appear, then shall we also appear with Him in glory. "I know Whom (not, in Whom) I have believed, and am persuaded that He is able to keep that which I have committed unto Him against that day."

4. "For a certain woman, whose young daughter had an unclean spirit, heard of Him, and came and fell at His feet: The woman was a Greek, a Syrophenician by nation; and she besought Him that He would cast forth the devil out of her daughter. But Jesus said unto her, Let the children first be filled; for it is not meet to take the children's bread, and to cast it unto the dogs. And she answered and said unto Him, Yes, Lord: yet the dogs under the table eat of the children's crumbs" (Mark vii. 25–28).

Let us consider the "Yea" of admission of Christ's verdict. This sorrowing woman had had a strange experience. Jesus had dealt with her as He had treated no other applicant. First she met with dead silence: "He answered her not a word." Next came what must have sounded like blank refusal: "I am not sent but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel." Reproach followed refusal: "It is not meet to take the children's bread, and to cast it unto the dogs."

With what splendid faith the seeker urged her suit! What seemed like reproach she turned into a mighty plea. It must be noted that the Revised Version renders her "yet" by the word "even." She quite agrees with Christ. "Yes, Lord, I am no better than a dog. I have no such special claim as have the daughters of Abraham. Thy verdict is absolutely correct. I accept Thy comparison. I accept it the more willingly, for the little dogs are not denied the fallen crumbs. On Thine own showing there are crumbs for the pets under the table, dogs though they be. Perchance there is a stray dog among them sometimes. Well, then, I will be under Thy table if I may not be at it." There was no contradiction, no murmuring, no pride. And thus the boon was secured.

For salvation and the gifts that follow we have but to take the place that Christ assigns. We shall get crumbs, at all events; and Christ's crumbs are better than the devil's loaves.

Oh, to say "Yes" even to His rebuffs—indeed, to all He says! We want more and more of the spirit of children who have been trained not to contradict. Christ's estimate is always true. I love the lad, of whom J. B. Gough used to tell us, who had such confidence in his mother that when his companions sneered at her decision concerning a matter in dispute he answered, with his blood at boiling-point, "If mother says it is so, it is so if it isn't so!" "Yes, Lord—yes, Lord; all Thou sayest I endorse. Inclination and outward circumstances may seem to run counter to Thy statement, but I assent to it at all hazards."

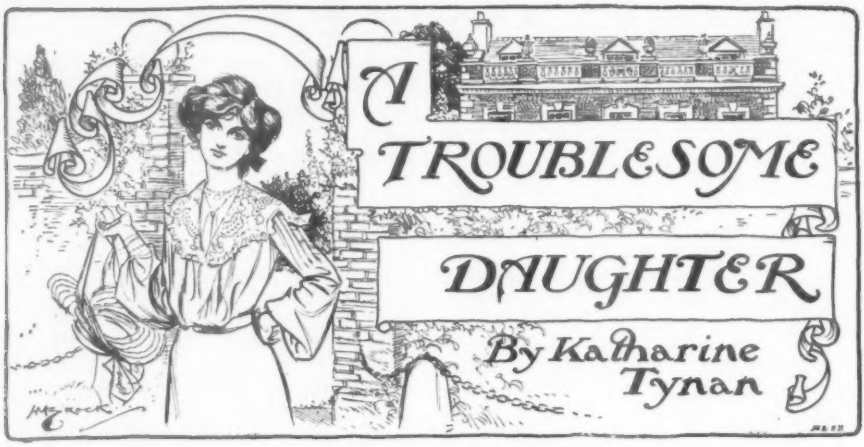
Verily, I am beginning to see how good a thing it is to have this motto, "Yes, Lord," hanging before my mind's eye all the days.

5. "So when they had dined, Jesus saith to Simon Peter, Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou Me more than these? He saith unto Him, Yea, Lord; Thou knowest that I love Thee. He saith unto him, Feed My lambs" (John xxi. 15).

We close with a consideration of the "Yea" of fond affection. Note that Peter did not resent the inquiry. When it was repeated thrice he felt hurt, though he need not have done so. Whom the Lord loveth He questioneth, as well as chasteneth. I never read that He asked Judas if He loved him. At the first putting of this question Peter received it gladly. I think he was grateful for an opportunity of declaring that his Lord was still dear to him. In whatever form the inquiry reaches us — for Christ still questions by His Holy Spirit—let us never dream of complaining that it is put.

Peter did not hold his peace. Silence is golden sometimes, but not always. Brass filings have been recently substituted for gold dust, and Satan tries to make us mistake brazen sullenness for golden silence. When self-examination is prompted within us, or opportunities are given for secret questionings, it will not do to be dumb. Come, come, my soul; Jesus demands reply.

Moreover, Simon did not evade the question. Some have a special gift in this direction. They will not come to close quarters. But so plain a question demands a plain answer. "Do I love the Lord or no?"



Nor will it suffice to refer to Christ's knowledge. Simon did so, it is true, but not until he had answered "Yea, Lord." Some do not pray, because "God knows all about it." That is a reason for, and a great inducement to, prayer. We are not breaking the news to God when we tell Him of our wants and woes. He knows, and sympathises ere we approach His seat.

Who could have wondered if Simon had hesitated? The memory of his fall might have inclined him to pause. At least it might have made him preface or qualify his statement. Thank God, it did not do so. It is as if he said, "Yes, Lord, I love Thee, despite my shameful sin. Truth to tell, I loved Thee all the time, deep down in my heart of hearts." Oh, ye who have slipped and failed, take heart from this experience! Here is one who had blistered his lips with oaths and curses, and had thrice denied his Lord; yet he can truly say, "I love Thee"; and Christ accepts his declaration, and commissions him to most important service. Fear not to say, "Yea, Lord," however black the past, if it has been truly repented of.

It is true that Peter substituted another word for that which Jesus used for love. Christ's reference had been to love of a high, holy, and heavenly sort, like that which angels have to their King, and which Jesus cherished for Martha and her sister and Lazarus. When Christ, in solemn tones, asked him, "Dost thou, in full determination of will, and in profound reverence and devotion, love Me?" Peter, perhaps, felt that he could not soar so high; so he employed another term. His word for love indicates something more human—the love of lovers, and of parents, and of children. Or was it that, wanting to express the warmth and ardour of his affection, he spake of a more emotional love? "I love Thee dearly, Lord; Thou knowest it full well."

By this "Yea" Peter confessed that Jesus was dearer to him than aught beside. "Lovest thou Me more than these?—more than these fish?—these boats?—this gear?—these means of livelihood?" "Yea, Lord!" "Lovest thou Me more than thou lovest James, and John, and Nathanael, and Thomas, and the rest who were standing near?—more than thy friends and comrades?" "Yea, Lord; Thou art the dearest of the dear."

Reader, what is thy reply? "To love Jesus best of all" is true religion. And if thou lovest Him so certainly, give proof of it. To say "Yea, yea" is not enough. There are lambs to be fed, and sheep to be tended, and a cross to be carried. True love, like Jesus', cannot be hid.

A SERIAL STORY.

CHAPTER I.

JUDY, A TOMBOY.

IT was more than a month since Judy Evelyn had come home from her French finishing school to the Red House—one of those imposing old red-brick houses behind high walls, of which there are two or three along the high road where it runs through the village of Stannington.

Thirty golden evenings had passed since that one when Judy had made a sort of royal progress around the Green, beginning with Mr. Jupp, at the post-office—who was not a Stannington man, and was dour to all the world except Miss Judy—going on to Miss Stone, the dressmaker, and Stocks, the socialistic postman, and ending with Mrs. Foulser, at the Green Dragon, who had a deal of live-stock as well as two little new grandchildren to exhibit to Miss Judy.

Judy's aide on that occasion was Master Jack Winstanley, the only child of Major Winstanley, of whose abilities all Stannington was proud, and Lady Mary, his charming invalid wife. The Court, Major Winstanley's place, stood cheek by jowl with the Red House. A green private road under beautiful overhanging elm trees divided the gardens of the two houses. Each garden had the same little iron gate, the same three moss-grown steps ascending to it. It was like a glimpse into Paradise for the tired wayfarer to ascend those steps and peer between the iron bars of the gate into the formal Dutch garden of the Court, with its peacocks and swans and ships in full sail cut in the yews and holly; or into the gayer, less ordered sweetness of the Red House garden, with its stretches of velvet turf, its beds of sweet old-fashioned flowers, its arches of roses, and great clumps of hollyhocks.

That summer afternoon, when Judy had made her triumphal progress around the Green, Master Jack Winstanley had been at home from Harrow, and amiably willing to carry Judy's basket of gifts from Paris in her wake. Judy had forgotten no one, and the pride and joy of the recipients may be imagined. Only once had Jack grumbled, and that was when Judy had included in her benefactions Stocks, the postman.

"He won't go to church," grumbled Jack, "and he won't take off his hat for 'God Save the King.' I don't think you ought to encourage Stocks, Judy. I don't mind Mrs. Stocks and the kiddies; but, hang it all, I can't stand Stocks! He sings out 'Good morning!' as cool as you like when he sees me, without a 'sir' to it, or as much as touching his hat. I'll punch Stocks's head to teach him manners one of these days. I shouldn't mind so much for myself, but he treats the Pater just the same."

"Never mind, Jack," Judy had said, laughing. "Stocks is a good fellow at heart. It's only his way of showing his independence. He's polite enough to me"

"If he wasn't—if he ever isn't," Jack had said fiercely, "just let me know, Judy."

Then, because he would not approach the Stocks domicile, he had taken a stroll round the Green, his hands deep in the pockets of his snowy-white cricketing trousers—there had been a match that day. He knew that he was the cynosure of all eyes on the Green, where he was almost as much beloved as Miss Judy Evelyn herself, and where his grown-up ways were a source of great delight to people who had known him for the thirteen years which separated him from babyhood.

Presently he had drunk a glass of cowslip wine at the Green Dragon, and had given his opinion on the fat Berkshire boar with as knowing an air as Farmer Brodie himself.

Alas, the end of the triumphal progress was that Judy was late for dinner—the very first evening, too.

"What shall I do, Jack?" she had asked in a flutter, when the clock at the Manor House pealed the half-hour. "I shall never be dressed and in the drawing-room by a quarter to eight; and, see, it has grown quite dark while we have been talking to Mrs. Foulser."

"You won't get into trouble the first evening," Jack had said consolingly. "Besides, your father is sure to stand up for you; and I can't imagine anybody being afraid of Mrs. Evelyn, either."

"Mother only looks grieved," said Judy ruefully; "and that is what I dread so much, for, you see, I adore mother. I always have, Jack; and I believe I have always been grieving her ever since I was born. She can't know how much I care. Mabel and Bertha never grieve her. Odd, isn't it, Jack? Yet I don't believe they'd mind half as much as I if they did."

All that, however, was ancient history, and Jack Winstanley would soon be back at Harrow.

"A very good thing, too," said Mrs. Evelyn, in one of her private talks with her husband. "That boy seems to think Judy has nothing to do but run all over the place with him, as though she were still a little girl with her hair down her back instead of nineteen years of age."

"Running about with Jack won't do her any harm, Helen," said Mr. Evelyn easily. "It's good for her. I wish Mabel and Bertha would take to running about with Jack Winstanley. They sit too much at their embroidery and flower painting. They haven't got half the complexion of Judy, although she is brown and they are fair. They are indoors too much."

"Their tastes are so feminine," said the mother. "I can't imagine them running about with Jack Winstanley. His tastes—of course they are all right for a boy"—Mrs. Evelyn was one of the women who give a wide latitude to a boy—"but I can't imagine Mabel and Bertha sharing them. Where do you suppose he took Judy yesterday?"

"I know," said Mr. Evelyn, with a grin. "Ratting! Ju told me. Jack's mad about that new terrier of his. The rat escaped. Ju said she was very glad; and Jack thought it very low of her not to take the dog's point of view."

Mrs. Evelyn did not smile.

"You encourage her, Marmaduke," she said. "Poor little Judy. I wish she had the calm and sweetness of her sisters. She is so undisciplined."

"She worships you, Helen."

"I know. Even her love is extravagant."

"Do you remember when she was a small child, and she had been naughty and afterwards sobbed herself asleep; and we found that her little arms were closed over an old shoe of yours for comfort?"

The mother's eyes filled with tears.

"Poor little Judy! I remember."

"You always speak as though Judy somehow were to be pitied."

"Because, poor child, she hurts herself. She is passionate and rebellious and undisciplined."

"Never with me, Helen."

Mrs. Evelyn turned away from the discussion as though there had been many such; as, indeed, there had been.

"I know she has a noble nature," she said; "but she needs training, pruning. She is too luxuriant, too apt to stray over her proper borders."

"You won't get her to keep to a groove, Helen."

"A groove is the safest and sweetest place for a woman," Mrs. Evelyn answered immovably; "and I've made up my mind, Marmaduke, that Judy had better go back to the schoolroom and do another winter's work with Miss Meredith. I shall arrange for music and singing lessons twice a week at Upminster; but for the rest, the discipline of the schoolroom will be useful to Judy."

"Ah!" The father's voice had a note of disappointment. "It will be a blow to Ju. I thought she was to hunt with me."

"That can wait. Why not the other girls?"

Mr. Evelyn shrugged his shoulders.

"They can't ride. If I was a young fellow and in love with Mab or Bertha, I might be content to miss all the good runs and go round opening gates for them. Judy rides like a—like a man."

"Poor Judy!" said the mother again. "But she mustn't run wild for the sake of the hunting. Next winter, Marmaduke."

Mr. Evelyn looked thoughtful.

"Have you forgotten that Judy's fate may be settled by next winter?"

"You mean your cousin Peter's will? I haven't forgotten it. I must say I don't like the idea of a young man walking in and selecting one of my girls. It seems an indelicate thing to me."

"I know, Helen. Still, the dear old fellow was thinking of you when he made his eccentric will. He had so fallen in love with you—and no wonder—that he wanted his boy to marry one of your daughters."

"Maurice may have seen someone he likes before now," Mrs. Evelyn said, almost hopefully. "He is nearly twenty-five. It isn't likely he has gone heart-whole all this time."

"If so, he will not come in June," Mr. Evelyn said.

"It is so awkward springing a cousin on the girls after all these years. If they had grown up together, it might have been better for the realisation of the old man's wishes."

"I don't know. They might have been too sisterly and brotherly. I have made inquiries, Helen, and I hear nothing but good of Maurice Evelyn. He is a handsome, attractive fellow, too, I am told; and—no one could resist your daughters. We are not likely to secure that additional ten thousand pounds apiece for the girls which Maurice was to give up if by his own choice he does not marry one of them."

"The girls don't want it," said Mrs. Evelyn. The will of old Mr. Peter Evelyn was always a fretful subject with her. "We have enough of our own."

"Then Judy must marry him."

"He is certain to choose one of her sisters."

"Dear me, how awkward it would be if he were to like one who didn't like him, while another would have been willing to take him. It's a subject for a Gilbert and Sullivan opera," said Mr. Evelyn, with what his wife thought an unbecoming levity.

"We can put the whole disagreeable business out of our minds for some months at least," she said a little coldly.

"I must confess it would be pleasant to have a lad about the house," Mr. Evelyn said; and then, seeing his wife's eyes fill, added hastily, "My dearest, I am so sorry; I forgot."

Mrs. Evelyn went to the window and stood looking out, as though to recover herself for a moment, then came back and kissed her husband.

"You are always good to me, Marmaduke," she said, "and you must not think I repine at the will of God."

The Evelyns' only son had been drowned at twelve years old in a heroic attempt to save the life of a schoolfellow. In her heart Mrs. Evelyn kept a room, swept and garnished, set apart for that proud and poignant memory. She believed in keeping narrow ways for her daughters. She would have given much latitude to a son. And for the sake of the schoolboy who had come running back to kiss her that morning of the day which was to prove the most terrible of her life she had a yearning over all boys. Else, be sure, Jack Winstanley would never have led Judy into all the unladylike scrapes which had punctuated her girlhood.

So Judy went back to the schoolroom. At first the sentence had no very terrible sound The mild social round of Stannington life did not appeal to her. She did not grudge her sisters the few parties which were likely to come their way that winter. For all her tomboy ways, she was a lover of books. She supposed she would be allowed to take whatever course of reading she would; and she was dearly attached to her old governess, Miss Meredith.

Judy, who found unexpected attractions in all manner of things, saw the winter in rosy colours. Even if hunting with Papa was postponed for a year, yet she and Merry together would make the kingdom of the schoolroom a delightful place. She would read all manner of books. She would take long afternoon walks with Merry, and come home in the gloaming to a schoolroom tea, where they would make their own toast; to which Cook, who, in common with all the servants, adored Judy, would send up weird dainties such as appeal to the untroubled digestions of the young. She and Merry would read together and talk together, and have music together; and Merry would tell her over again that love story which Judy had known these many years, in which the principals were Miss Meredith herself, of twenty years ago, and her cousin Willie in the merchant service, who had broken a sixpence with her and given her a ring and a locket with a coloured photograph—an unbelievably artless thing—in it; and, after all, had married another woman

Alas, for Judy, these visions faded like a dream. Mrs. Evelyn had mapped out her little girl's days for her in quite a different fashion. There was to be no desultory reading. Mrs. Evelyn's choice of books for Judy was such as she herself would have been satisfied with at Judy's age. A half-hour of music, a half-hour of German, a half-hour of astronomy, a half-hour of French, a half-hour of needlework, a half-hour of painting. When Judy had gone through her routine, she might find recreation in such writers as Emma Jane Worboise and Miss Sewell, and in the less exciting novels of Miss Charlotte Yonge.

"But I can't," cried Judy in despair. "I can't make my life into a sort of tesselated pavement. In half an hour I couldn't get interested in anything."

When Miss Meredith repeated this speech to Mrs. Evelyn she merely remarked that the constant giving up must be a useful discipline to Judy's spirit. She was a very devout woman at heart; her own trend was rather towards detachment than attachment, and, though her loves were fond and faithful ones, she held her attachments in a certain terror, as though they were only tolerated, and never quite blest.

"But I can't," cried Judy again. "I can't go on like this. My mind is full of rags and tatters, beginnings without endings, endings without beginnings. I want something to break my teeth upon, Merry. And I can't read those frumpish books; they don't entertain me, they don't rest me. Those half-hours are knocking my nerves all to pieces."

There had been some six weeks of Mrs. Evelyn's régime by this time, and it was the first suggestion of nerves in her own case Judy had ever made.

Miss Meredith was troubled. She wanted to do the best for Judy without offending Mrs. Evelyn, to whom she was deeply attached, as all her dependents were. The opportunity came when Mr. Neville, the Vicar, who had once been a Harrow master and was a very distinguished classical scholar, after a talk with Judy, offered to teach her Greek. "Something to break her teeth upon"—it was the very thing Judy wanted. And the proposition coming from the Vicar must be an unexceptionable one.

She carried it to Mrs. Evelyn with very little trepidation, to have it refused with as much vehemence as Mrs. Evelyn's gentle nature was capable of.

"Greek!" she said. "No; it is the key to the Pagan world, to all manner of undesirable knowledge. What have we Christians to do with such things? I suppose a scholar like Mr. Neville looks at things differently; but I should be very sorry for any girl of mine to learn Greek."

Miss Meredith brought the refusal back to Judy sorrowfully. Judy looked as though a door beyond which lay unending delights had suddenly been slammed in her face.

"Never mind, dear," said Miss Meredith consolingly. "Your dear mother must know best; and, after all, it is only for a little while, Judy. Can't you bear it for a little while because it is the will of the mother you love so fondly?"

"Oh yes, I can bear it," said Judy, her face brightening. "Supposing I try to cut my life up into the tesselated pavement, and do it without grumbling, do you think mother will approve?"

"I am sure she will, Judy."

Judy did try, and was rewarded by the sight of her mother's pleasure.

"Why isn't my little girl always like this?" asked Mrs. Evelyn, with a hand on Judy's bronze curls.

"I would have cut myself into little squares," said Judy, with characteristic exaggeration, "to have mother speak to me like that."

CHAPTER II.

THE FAIRY GODMOTHER.

FROM the upper windows of the Red House, where they had not been built up in the days of the window tax, you saw the Green, dark and soft as velvet, lying beyond the fine avenue of elm trees that is the high road as it runs through Stannington.

Across the Green are many houses embowered in trees; two or three houses of gentlefolk, with their humbler neighbours creeping close to them, all, gentle and simple alike, surrounded by their little gardens packed so close with flowers that they are mosaics of colour. Beyond the Green is the park of the Manor House, with its spreading trees and dappled, silky-skinned deer feeding in the glades. Beyond the park is the Hill, which Stannington is very proud of, because it is so high and beautiful in its clothing of gorse and heather above the pine woods, and looks over so many counties that it may almost be called a mountain.

Almost opposite the Red House, across the Green, is an old-fashioned, diamond-paned house—The Cottage—where Lady Flora Lindley, the widow of the late Squire Lindley's brother, lived. The daughters of the late Squire, Miss Primula and Miss Rosamund, still lived on at the Manor House, although Lady Flora's only son was Lord of the Manor of Lindley, and the Manor House had come to him in tail male after his uncle's death.

He had not chosen to dispossess his cousins. Some people said it was because he was too poor to keep up the place as it should be kept; others, again, that it was his old kindness for Miss Rosamund that would not let him evict her sister and herself from the home they were so tenderly attached to. People said he owed little kindness to Miss Prim, who had assisted Lady Flora in keeping him from marrying Miss Rosamund years before. The breach between the two branches of the Lindley family was, indeed, the little sensation of life at Stannington. Some said Lady Flora had been in love with Squire Lindley before ever she took his brother. Those same gossips would have it that she had planted herself down at The Cottage, cheek by jowl with the almshouses, in order to flaunt her poverty in the Squire's face. If that were so, said others, why didn't she induce her son to let her reign at the Manor House, of which she was now mistress by rights? To which the others replied that the Misses Lindley paid a handsome rent as their cousin's tenants, and everyone knew how poor the present Squire was; besides, Captain Philip Lindley was not one to be browbeaten by his mother, even though in that matter of the old love affair between him and Miss Rosamund his mother and Miss Prim had somehow done him out of his sweetheart between them.

In these days Judy thought more than ever about the Lindley romance, over which she had dreamed dreams from her childhood. When she was supposed to be reading Emma Jane Worboise for recreation her eyes and thoughts wandered from the pages, which she had irreverently called "frumpish," to the high, twisted chimneys of the Manor House, and lost themselves in conjectures about the lovers.

Sometimes she saw Lady Flora setting out across the Green with her troop of dogs at her heels, all barking furiously. In her youth and prime Lady Flora's features had been almost too pronounced for beauty. Her expression had lacked the womanly tenderness and softness. In old age she was a very magnificent-looking person. Her white curls framed a face with a healthy colour in it yet, and a pair of sparkling dark eyes that seemed to see everything that was going on. Lady Flora always dressed in black with a high widow's cap, and walked with a gold-headed cane. She came and went in all weathers, and except at church no one ever saw her with any protection on her head except the widow's cap. She had made herself the undisputed Queen of the Green, and went into every house with barely the formality of knocking at the door. When she saw a stranger she had a way of regarding him with her piercing eyes, as much as to say, "Who are you, and what is your business?" so that harmless cyclists whom she came upon in the bar of the Green Dragon were apt to put down their bread and cheese and glasses, and murmur a hasty apology for they knew not what.

She had effectually put the Misses Lindley out of court as ladies bountiful; which was a bad thing in a way for the people, as they had more to give than Lady Flora, and were—at least Rosamund was—ever so much softer-hearted.

But as the years passed Miss Prim secluded herself more and more in the Manor House, and only paid a visit to the Red House, or the Court, or to Sir William and Lady Hunter at the Moated Grange, when she was sure Lady Flora was not to be met with. Not but what Prim, if she did meet her old enemy, could give her as good as she got—unlike poor Miss Rosamund, who, having one day accidentally encountered Lady Flora in Mrs. Evelyn's drawing-room, nearly fainted as the old lady swept haughtily by her.

Lady Flora was Judy's godmother, but had taken extremely little notice of her since she had given her her christening-cup, with one exception, and that was the last time Captain Philip was at home, when she had swooped down on the Red House one day and carried off sixteen-year-old Judy to lunch at The Cottage.

Judy was dreadfully shy of the tall, dark, handsome, stern-looking soldier, whose face, however, had softened wonderfully as he looked down at Judy's head, the rippling waves of which were exactly like the coat of his own red Irish setter.

Lady Flora had been effusively affectionate to Judy that day, but had forgotten all about her again as soon as Captain Philip had left. Everyone knew that Captain Philip and his mother were estranged over the old trouble about Miss Rosamund; but there was no sign of it apparent to Judy's eyes, except that he was almost too polite and attentive to his mother for happy love.

In Stannington so little happens that people remember things. Elsewhere, so long ago was it since that short time of bliss when Philip Lindley and his cousin had been betrothed lovers, people would have supposed that the old feeling was over and done with, if, indeed, they remembered it at all.

Why, Miss Rosamund—Miss Rosamund must be thirty-seven or thirty-eight, although she had such a girlish look, with her tall, slender willowy figure; her pure oval face, delicately tinted; her kind, faithful, short-sighted brown eyes; her hair that rippled still so prettily, and had not a grey hair in its soft, gold-brown masses.

But sometimes the shadowy romance failed Judy for comfort. As the winter turned round, and she was still bound to the schoolroom, every hour of the day planned out for her, Judy grew sick of mental inanition.

She had her days of flat rebellion, when she would fling some unoffending book from her into the fireplace, to be recovered with difficulty by Miss Meredith. These were the days her mother thought of on the good days when she said, "If you were always like this, little girl!"

Not that Judy played pranks with her books in her mother's presence. She would become listless, and cradle her hot forehead in her hand after such outbreaks, till Miss Meredith began to wonder whether Judy were really going to be ill.

"Setting out across the Green with her troop of dogs at her heels."

Everyone was more or less dispirited in those days, when the blackest news was coming from South Africa, and one blow followed another so fast that people had no time to lift their heads after one till another was dealt them.

Lady Flora walked about the Green with her head higher than ever in those days, and paid special visits to the mothers of one or two young soldiers, the wives of one or two reservists who belonged to Stannington, and was kinder and softer than people were used to know her.

During the days after Christmas, when the days seem shorter and blacker than ever, although they are really lengthening, Judy got influenza. Hardly one of the household escaped, but it left in Judy's case a very miserable depression.

Miss Meredith was very unhappy about her charge.

"Couldn't you lose yourself in a book?" she suggested.

"I might," said Judy grimly, "if I had a book."

Miss Meredith went to Mrs. Evelyn, again without result.

"You humour Judy too much," she said; "I will speak to her."

She read Judy a long, gentle lecture on the desirability of rousing herself and not yielding to moods, which left Judy more profoundly unhappy than before.

"If anyone would only give me a finger, Merry," she said, "it might pull me out of the slough, but I am quite unable to of myself."

Stannington was filled with wet fog right on into February. All the damp pastures smoked incessantly; every standing pool of water gave out an unwholesome breath. The world was thoroughly sodden and wretched, and Judy took to sitting silent an hour at a time biting her nails, an unbecoming habit which she had left behind her in her early childhood, impelled thereto by copious applications of what she had called "Bitter Alice" to her finger tips.

She was too old for "Bitter Alice" now, and so perturbed was Miss Meredith by this new symptom that she was about to appeal on the sly to that power behind the throne, Judy's father, when something unexpected happened.

One morning Lady Flora walked unannounced into the drawing-room, where Mabel and Bertha were huddled over the fire, coughing their influenza cough, and their mother was cutting out baby garments for the mothers' meeting, and announced that her son had been wounded.

Three dismayed faces looked at her with sympathy and eagerness for more news.

"Not dangerously," she said; "but he'll be out of it for the rest of the campaign. He carried his colonel out under fire. He's recommended for the Victoria Cross, and he's got his majority."

She stood in the midst of them, her proud old head erect, her eyes bright and defiant.

"Don't you envy me, Helen Evelyn?" she asked.

Mrs. Evelyn turned away her head.

"So far as we're permitted to envy anyone I do envy you," she said.

"Where's Judy?" the old lady asked next.

"In the schoolroom."

Lady Flora lifted her hands.

"How much longer is she going to be kept there? Why, Judy must be—yes, Judy must be pushing on for twenty. Time for these girls to make way for her."

Lady Flora was often rather rude, and except for a heightening of her colour Mrs. Evelyn betrayed no feeling at this speech.

"I want Judy," said the old lady, tapping on the floor sharply with her cane.

But before anyone could summon Judy the door opened, and Judy herself came in in the tumultuous way which had often excited her mother's disapproval.

"Oh, do you know that we have a real hero in Stannington, mother?" she cried. She was carrying the newspaper in her hand, and held it as though it were a banner. "Captain Lindley——"

"Major Lindley, if you please," corrected Lady Flora. "I've brought my own good news. To think that none of you had seen it in the paper but this child!"

"Marmaduke went off at seven o'clock to Upminster," said Mrs. Evelyn apologetically. "I did not know you read the paper, Judy."

"Papa said I might——"

Judy's colour began to fade again.

"What have you been doing to yourself, child?" asked Lady Flora, seizing her by the wrist. "You're as yellow as a China orange."

"I can't get out of doors," said Judy dolorously, "to shake off this wretched influenza."

"Stannington is pestilential just now. None of us ought to be in it. I've a fine jaunt for you, Judy. What do you say, Helen? I'm off to the seaside for a month or six weeks—St. Mary's Cove. I was there years ago. It is full of the sun and roses and butterflies to-day, while we are steaming. I want my godchild. She wants a change. Let me have Judy."

Mrs. Evelyn looked half unwilling, but she caught the longing look in Judy's eyes, and for once did not think of the duty of denying one's self. It was true Judy wanted the change; and, besides, Lady Flora kept Mrs. Evelyn, as well as everyone else, in wholesome awe of her.

They put up at a pretty little hotel under the chalk cliffs, which seemed flooded with sun all day long. The Cove was indeed full of roses and butterflies and the songs of birds. In the Cove spring had already come. The sunshine on her face awoke Judy the morning after her arrival. They breakfasted in a bay of the pretty dining-room, with a window open, and blinds half drawn against the brilliant sun.

Even the first day Judy's shadowy troubles seemed to fall away from her. She basked in the sun and the sea-wind, she lay among the sun-warmed pines on the hillside, till the joy came back to her heart, the vigour to her limbs. She had the joy of the convalescent. The world and life were so much sweeter and more precious to her because they had been cold and empty.

Lady Flora let her alone, let her wander where she would over the high wind-swept downs, let her find health in the little flowery nooks on the cliffs that presently would be splendid with bee-orchis and carpeted with almost every wild flower known in England.

"It is nearly time to go back?" Judy said one day, meeting the bright old eyes fixed on her curiously.

"You want to go?"

"Not yet."

"Ah, I thought not. I am the fairy godmother, child. It is the way of fairy godmothers to neglect their godchildren for quite a long time, but to be very good to them in the end. Enjoy your days, child. We are here till April, till Philip comes home."

"Not really, godmamma?" cried Judy in incredulous delight. "But what does mother say?"

"I have her permission."

"Mab and Bertha ought to have a chance. They had the influenza, too."

"They don't happen to be my goddaughters."

It was a blissful time. Slowly, brightly, the days turned round till at last they were on the very edge of April.

"I shall be so sorry to leave the Cove," said Judy.

"It will be very gay at the big hotel," said Lady Flora; "and presently there will be Philip."

"Of course. How glad you will be to get him back again!"

"We are going to be very gay, little Judy, I can tell you. I am going to take you to a grand military reception at the Castle. Lady Waldersee has sent a card for you. Philip will be by your side."

"Mother will say 'No.' I am not yet out," said Judy, with wistful eyes.

"Hoity-toity! Has a godmother no rights? Your mother has consented, miss."

"I have no frock fine enough," said Judy.

"It is the privilege of fairy godmothers to provide Cinderellas with frocks. We go to town to-morrow."

Judy lived in a whirl of delight and anticipation. The next day they went to town. Lady Flora had heard that Liberty's was the place to provide a charming frock for a young girl.

"I have a nest-egg," she said, "which shall be squandered for you and me. Silver-grey brocade for myself, and my Honiton. Philip must not be ashamed of his mother. White satin, thick and creamy, for you. I don't know anything about Liberty's, I always went to Jay's myself. I remember Caroline Glastonbury——"

Lady Flora was off on some reminiscence of early days and the great lady of the countryside, who had left Stannington behind her long ago, and, being widowed, with a grown-up son, had gone to live among the poor in the East End.

After the frocks were bought on that bewildering day, there were still three hours to train time.

"What shall we do?" asked Lady Flora. "There is the Tower, there is the National Gallery; you have never seen the Abbey; you are perfectly new to London. Where shall it be, little Judy?"

"The Duchess of Glastonbury," cried Judy, with sudden inspiration. "I remember her as though in a dream. I was sitting in my white silk frock on a footstool at mother's feet. There was a tall boy in a velvet suit. The Duchess was like a queen. I have always wanted to see her since."

"Why, so you shall. I should never have thought of it myself, but I remember that I used to be very fond of Caroline Glastonbury. She was a very human creature, if she was heavenly. Even I felt her beauty of holiness."

"Even you, godmamma!" said Judy, with a radiantly grateful glance, which pierced Lady Flora's hard old heart, and made it feel quite soft with pleasure.

CHAPTER III.

THE BEAUTIFUL DUCHESS.

THEIR way lay for a time between great rows of glittering shops, through the thick of the traffic, along Oxford Street and Holborn, through the City, crowded with frock-coated, top-hatted men, all scurrying along with mental absorption written on their faces. Scarcely a woman was to be seen, and when there was one she looked as preoccupied as the men—some typewriter or female clerk hurrying back to her desk after snatching a hasty meal.

The rubber-tyred hansom rolled smoothly over the asphalted pavements. Judy, leaning forward, glanced eagerly from side to side at the black human stream that overflowed the pathway and walked in the road; at the ornate buildings, palaces of business; at the blue sky so high overhead; at the names over the occasional shop-doors, the names of the streets on the corner houses.

She was thrilling with excitement. The stir of busy life in the air communicated itself to her. Even the fearless sparrows in the streets delighted her as they picked up a living with the fearlessness of the London child. She could put associations to the historic streets, and chattered like a magpie to Lady Flora, who was looking so amiable that Stannington would not have known her.

"Newgate, child!" she repeated. "And "'My mother sent me out to find you.'"

Christ's Hospital! Where did you learn about the places? Perhaps I learnt myself in a time that is now ancient history, and have forgotten. How could anyone suppose you would know so much about places where you have never been before?"

"I didn't think I should know so much. Perhaps I learnt it in a former life! Perhaps I picked it up in desultory reading, for I have done some desultory reading, although mother bans any reading that is not useful and systematic. Oh, do look, there is the Mansion House. Do you suppose we might call on Gog and Magog? Oh yes, godmamma, there's no doubt I've found time for desultory reading, in this life or some other. Miss Meredith says I suck up the knowledge that pleases me as a sponge sucks up water."

They had left the Bank behind and passed Aldgate, and were in the broad Whitechapel Road, where Judy declared she could smell the river.

She looked about her a little disappointedly. "It doesn't look so miserable," she said; "I've seen parts of London much more miserable, although they were thoroughly respectable. One thought of the East End as being without the sun and the moon."

They turned into a narrow street, sordid and miserable.

"This is better," she said, drawing a deep breath. "Do you suppose the Duchess lives in a place like this? It seems as if only criminals ought to. Oh, I hope there are no children here. Did you see the faces of those men carrying the bags? They looked downright criminal. Now, this is something like the real East End."

"I'm glad your imaginations please you," said Lady Flora, looking amused. "I daresay the criminals are no worse than foreign Jews. Ah, there is a church. That looks civilised. And here is the Duchess's street—River Street. Isn't that what's written up, Judy? Tell the man, 'No. 45.'"

This was another dingy street. The houses were high enough to shut out a deal of the sky and the sun, and the thoroughfares were so narrow that the windows looked into each other. The roadway was full of children playing, and slatternly women stood and gossiped at the doors. The houses showed many broken panes of glass, and had apparently, when last they were painted, been done in soot or something equally black.

"And to think of Caroline Glastonbury living here!" said Lady Flora under her breath.

No. 45 stood out from the rest of the street by means of clean curtains, a green-painted door with a brass knocker, and a general air of smartness.

The door was opened to them by a little hunchbacked dwarf of a man, who had a look like a redeemed Caliban. His ungainly smile was friendly when they asked for the Duchess. Yes, her Grace had come back last night. If they would be so kind as to wait, he would take up their names.

He showed them into a little parlour, the dingy age of which had been made bright by a band of pale yellow distemper above the worm-eaten wooden panelling of the walls. The room had very little furniture. A square of cream-coloured matting on the floor added to the lightening of the room, which had a suggestion of sunshine. There was a table, some chairs, a blotting book and writing materials on the table, with a copy of the "Imitation of Christ." Else the room was bare, except for a vase of narcissi on the mantelshelf.

While they waited Judy sat smiling at Lady Flora, who noticed her sniffing delicately, as at some pleasant odour.

"The flowers smell sweet?" the old lady asked. "They are too faint for me."

"It is not the flowers," said Judy, with a little air of rapture; "it is the odour of sanctity. I smelt it the instant I entered the house."

As she spoke the little hunchback appeared to conduct them to her Grace's presence. Lady Flora had sent up no name.

They followed him up a steep staircase, dark by reason of the dark panelling it possessed in common with all the rooms of the house; but the way was brightened by the engravings of sacred subjects from the old Italian painters which went with them all the way.

At the top of the second flight of stairs the man opened a door and stood holding it for them to enter. The room beyond was very like the room downstairs, only that it possessed three windows, and so was lighter and brighter.

At the upper end of the room there was a large businesslike desk. Behind it sat the Duchess, facing a formidable heap of papers.

There was one other person in the room—a young lady, simply and elegantly dressed in grey, and wearing a large hat with white feathers.

The Duchess looked up expectantly as they came in; then left her desk and advanced to meet them, peering a little at them from beautiful large, velvety brown eyes, which had, Judy thought, a heavenly compassion in their expression.

"Not Flora Lindley?" she said, her face altering and growing joyful. "Not really Flora Lindley! To think you should have found me out in the Far East! And this child—who is this child?"

"Judy Evelyn," said Lady Flora, holding the Duchess's two hands and shaking them vigorously. "Marmaduke Evelyn's little girl, my god-daughter. I should never have dared to come, only Judy persuaded me."

The Duchess relinquished Lady Flora's hands to draw Judy to her and give her a warm kiss.

"Why, I remember you a little girl with a bronze head of curls," she said. "And, now I come to look at you, the head is not very much changed. Little Judy! Dear me, to think of little Judy as a young lady. I believe I was to present you, Judy, and I'll do it. I shall be presenting someone else on her marriage soon, and we might do the two things together. Come here, Violet, my dear."

The girl in grey came to her side, and was introduced as Miss Wyndham.

"She's going to be married in four weeks' time," the Duchess explained, "to my son, the Duke. You remember Caradoc, Flora, though I believe he was a little lad on a Shetland pony the last time you saw him. I remember quite well that last visit to you. I haven't been to Stannington since. I am so much obliged to Violet, who is going to make me a dowager. I've had too much coming and going between River Street and Grosvenor Square. Violet is going to take all that off my hands. Once Caradoc is married, I shall never leave River Street any more."

"As though we should permit that," said Miss Wyndham, blushing and sparkling.

"Violet is in retreat with me here," went on the Duchess, "as a preparation for her marriage. I can only keep her a week. There will be so many preparations, so much to be done, before our young couple can marry."

She drew down Miss Wyndham's face to hers with the most tender affection. The girl was standing behind her chair, looking down at her with almost adoration in her pure face. It was the loveliest face, Judy thought, the features so delicate, the colours so shining, the large grey eyes so full of dreams and visions.

"I wish I could stay all the time," she breathed in a rapturous way.

"Poor Caradoc!" said the Duchess. "He is already distracted enough, with a fiancée who will disappear into the murk of the East instead of lighting the West for him. And now, child, these friends of ours will have some tea. Will you see about it? We do most of the work of the house ourselves," she explained to Lady Flora, who wore an amazed look. "We are quite a little community. You'd be surprised at how many are willing to help. What is it, Violet?"

Miss Wyndham had paused when she reached the door, and turned a radiant, questioning face in their direction.

"Would Miss Evelyn like to come and help?" she asked.

"I should love to," Judy said.

"You'd better send us some tea here," said the Duchess.

"If it's all the same to you," interjected Lady Flora, "I'd like to drink my tea in whatever way you're in the habit of doing it, Caroline."

"It will mean sitting down with some fourteen young women. So many of the regular workers here were accustomed to making a meal of their tea that I have changed my hours to suit theirs. We dine at two o'clock, tea at 4.30, and supper at nine."

"I should like to sit down with the fourteen young women," said Lady Flora. "If you are doing a thing, why not do it thoroughly? And it will be heaven to Judy. There, run away, child. It's amazing how many things Judy finds heavenly."

"She looks a dear child."

"She is. Helen doesn't appreciate her. She's a little outside Helen's experience. By the way, I congratulate you on the future Duchess. She is very beautiful."

"She is as beautiful in her character as she is in her face. And as simple as a child. My son is romantically in love with her, and no wonder. They will be very happy. She will be in the world, yet not of it. I have no belief in laying down the duties of the station in which God has placed one. It is sometimes possible to belong more truly to the other world because one keeps a firm grip of this."

"Yes!" said Lady Flora, with comically lifted eyebrows.

"Oh, I am of the world, very much of the world. Caradoc had a great reception last night, or, rather, I had. I wore rose and gold brocade and the family diamonds. I shall appear once more—at Caradoc's wedding; then I shall be free."

"And the young Duchess. Is she also of the world? She looks it more than you."

Lady Flora gazed reflectively at the Duchess's black serge robe, cut like a nun's, and the deep white collar, that made the most shining frame for her still beautiful colouring.

"Last night Violet looked like a—like a queen."

"She looks like a Duchess-elect to-day."

Meanwhile, Miss Wyndham had led Judy to the back room on the first floor—a long, narrow room with a window overlooking a poplar tree which, amid all the dinginess, was like a green flame at this moment. The room was furnished plainly as a refectory, with a long, narrow table and wooden seats.

Judy looked on with delight while Miss Wyndham took a coarse but spotless linen cloth from a drawer, and, covering the table, proceeded to set on it the materials for a substantial tea.

"Can't I help?" she asked eagerly. "I can cut bread and butter. Do let me try."

The tea service was of the plainest possible white china; but the spoons were silver, and everything radiant with cleanliness, and there were plenty of flowers about the room.

"The Duke has them sent up from Glastonbury," Miss Wyndham said, with a bright blush; "and our bread and butter and honey and cream come from there. Of course, the shops are not good here, else the Duchess might consider it her duty to deal with them. And so many of our helpers are not over strong—the London kind, you know, wiry enough, but not often hungry, and requiring to be tempted to eat."

"I wish I could stay here always," said impulsive Judy.

"We are all like that," said Miss Wyndham. "I wish you could come and stay a little bit. The poor are very poor about here. You can't imagine the things the Duchess does for them; and we learn from her example not to be squeamish about what we do. I know while the Duchess has been at Grosvenor Square Hilda Trevanion, who's devoted to her, has been looking after some of her patients. There were some disagreeable things to do; but, as Hilda said, "What wouldn't one do for the beautiful Duchess?"

"I feel just like that," said Judy.

"Oh, but you mustn't," said Miss Wyndham, with a quaint seriousness. She was ladling jam into a preserve dish. "You must just do it for God. She won't let any of us show any attachment for her."

"But we must feel it all the same," said Judy, with a rapt upward gaze.

"Now I think everything is ready, and I'm going to ring the bell. I do wish you could stay a few days, Judy. I may call you Judy, mayn't I? I should take you round to such queer places. Of course, we have to be very obedient, and we're not allowed to go to really bad places—she does that herself—or where there's infectious disease; and one of the elder women always comes with us."

She was interrupted by the quiet entry into the room of a number of women, young and old. Some few were quietly but beautifully dressed girls of their own class of life. Others, again, were apparently dressmakers, shop assistants, perhaps superior servants. Judy thought they all looked very contented, with a tired look under the content, as though in some other world they had had a bad time.

The Duchess came in and took the head of the table behind the teapot, while Lady Flora sat at her right hand.

Judy was introduced to the women who sat on either side of her, both of the working class, and fell to talking to them shyly and eagerly, while Miss Wyndham smiled at her between the plates of brown bread and butter which Judy had cut of a shadowy thinness.

She said afterwards to Lady Flora that she had never, never enjoyed anything so much.

"Caroline Glastonbury was always a charming woman," said Lady Flora, "and she carries her atmosphere with her. I don't approve, as a rule, of sitting down to meals with working women. It makes them uncomfortable, even if it does not make us. I am bound to say that Caroline's working women seemed perfectly at their ease."

"I want to go back there and stay," said Judy.

Lady Flora smiled a wise little worldly smile.

"My dear," she said, "you will change your mind in a little while. Wait till you have come out at Lady Waldersee's reception. I daresay those girls—the ladies I mean—really enjoy the work for the sake of contrast. Of course, Caroline does it thoroughly; but then Caroline is a saint!"

"Why did she do it?" asked Judy in an awed whisper.

"Why, because she was a saint, child. She made a beautiful wife to the Duke, and a beautiful mother to Caradoc; and always was, and always will be, a great lady. That's what I like about Caroline. I am not a religious woman myself; but I've seen a deal of religion which was arrived at by way of a broken heart. But Caroline—Caroline has always been religious, and with her religion meant pure joy. You can see that she is the happiest woman alive."

"Oh, I can see it, I can see it," said Judy, trembling with excitement. "I do wish I could be with her, and learn from her. I should be perfectly happy."

"My dear," said Lady Flora, "seeing what I've been doing for you to-day, I consider you an ungrateful minx."

Judy flew at Lady Flora and hugged her. Perhaps she was the one creature in the world who would have dared to hug Lady Flora. And the old lady, pretending to repulse her, seemed all the time highly pleased.

CHAPTER IV.

THE HERO.

MRS. EVELYN did not withhold her permission for Judy to go to Lady Waldersee's reception. She gave it, indeed, quite graciously, and Lady Flora handed Judy the letter to read.

"You see," she said, "that you need not have been so alarmed. I was quite safe in buying the frock before I had permission for you, after all."

"Ah, no," said Judy, shaking her head over the letter. "It has been just a touch-and-go thing, godmamma. I can read between the lines that mother has been in agonies, and that they have not yet ceased. She has been discussing the matter with papa, and they have argued it out for days; and papa, who is easy-going, has said at least a thousand times, 'Let Ju have her fun'; and when it has all seemed settled mother has had another horrible spasm of misgiving because I'm not out, and because Mabel and Bertha have not yet had a season and been presented."

Lady Flora laughed.

"I don't know where you find it all, minx," she said; "but I daresay you're right and it is there. You're a horribly clear-sighted child."

Judy suddenly flung herself at Lady Flora in an agony.

"Oh, don't say that," she cried, "don't say that. It seems as if I had been finding out something I oughtn't to about mother. And she is such an angel. It's only that I'm not worthy of her at all, and that I am always grieving her."

"Whirlwind!" said Lady Flora in consternation. "Why, you are always the most loyal child."

"I oughtn't to go to Lady Waldersee's at all," sobbed Judy, "because I know it distresses her; and I wouldn't, only that I've let you buy that beautiful frock."

"Now you're talking nonsense," said Lady Flora in an alarmed voice. "Hadn't you better read your own budget? I see you have quite a big letter there."

"From Lady Mary Winstanley," said Judy, drying her tears. "Oh! and she is in London. If we had known it, we might have gone to see her when we were up. Perhaps it is just as well, for then we shouldn't have seen the Duchess, and I wouldn't have missed the Duchess for anything. Still, I should have loved to see Lady Mary."

Since Judy had been with Lady Flora the election for the seat which the death of old Mr. Knox had left vacant had taken place, and Major Winstanley had been returned. It was a matter of immense interest to Judy. Now the Major, instead of being tied up at Stannington, wasting himself on the business of a magistrate and a country gentleman, would have scope for his great abilities. How proud and happy Lady Mary would be! And how Jack would swagger! And how proud Stannington would be of its member!

Judy had forgotten her recent tears, although they still hung undried on her long lashes. Lady Mary wrote in high spirits, for her. It was delightful to be in the midst of life again, and to see the change in Hugo. They had a house with balconies overlooking the river, and Lady Mary really found the air more invigorating than that of Stannington. And old friends had found them both out; and great personages had called, and prophesied things of the Major that had made Lady Mary's heart beat high with pride and pleasure. When could Judy come to her for a long visit? They would have a carriage, and drive round the town. Lady Mary had actually been for more than one carriage drive. She was longing to see Judy. As soon as Lady Flora could give her up she must come for a long visit. The Major would take Judy to Harrow for the Speech Day, and think how delighted Jack would be; and much more to the same purpose.

It was the morning of the day Major Lindley was to arrive that these things happened. Long before the boat could possibly be in sight they were on the Admiralty Pier. It was a beautiful day, and Judy had put on the one frock purchased by Mrs. Evelyn of which Lady Flora thoroughly approved.

"'Mother!' he said with an air of grave gladness."—p. 70.

It was a thin cloth of a pastel shade of pale grayish green, and nothing could have become Judy's prevailing tints of red-brown better. She was wearing some red-brown pansies, and when she joined Lady Flora in the drawing-room of the hotel the lady held her at arm's length, surveyed her critically, and then nodded emphatically several times.

"You look well, child," she said. "We must wear our best to do honour to Major Philip."

She herself was wearing a huge bonnet of brown, somewhat Early Victorian in style, with nodding white feathers. She had a beautiful fichu of old lace about her black silk shoulders, and over it a sable stole which she carried over her arms in a way reminiscent of the Books of Beauty, of which there were many at the Red House. In these fine feathers she looked a very grand old lady indeed.

"How fine you are, godmamma," said Judy. At Stannington Lady Flora's black was often rusty, having borne the brunt of many suns, of much wind and rain.

"The old modes are coming in again," said Lady Flora calmly. "Did you think no one but you was to have a new gown? . . . Ah, there is Philip!" she cried, catching at Judy's hand, as the boat glided by the pier. "There is Philip. Do you see him? He is half a head taller than all the others, although the others are tall—some of them. See him there, looking over the side. No wonder you do not recognise him, child. Why, he is gone to skin and bone, my boy!"

Her agitation was piteous. As Judy held the trembling little hand in her own firm young grasp she realised that they were all wrong about Lady Flora. Judy was recasting her old impressions, was getting a glimpse of the tragedy behind the estrangement which the indomitable old spirit had borne with so brave a face.

Now the boat was steady. The sailors were fastening the ropes round the posts on the pier. There was a commotion among the passengers on the boat. They were crowding to the gangway, laden with all manner of small parcels. The gangway was down. They were coming off. Ah, here at last was Major Philip.

"My boy!" said his mother, so inaudibly that Judy wondered if he had heard.

"Mother!" he said with an air of grave gladness, stooping to kiss her cheek.

Then he turned and looked at Judy. They had withdrawn a little apart, out of the rush of the crowd.

"And who is this?" he asked, a pleased recognition dawning in his eyes. "Not little Judy? Why, how you have grown, little Judy."

"One does grow in five years," said Judy, blushing at his gaze; "but I've done growing. I promise I shall not surprise you again."

"I am not so sure about that," he said, with a humorous gleam in his eyes, which made Judy feel, all of a sudden, less frightened of him. "You always did surprise us. Do you remember when you carried Jack Winstanley's tin of bait for him to church, and spilled it in the pew during service?"

Judy made a face.

"I should object now as much as mother—poor mother—did then. One outgrows one's toleration of live bait."

Judy's dainty little shudder seemed to fascinate the Major.

"Well, we'd better be getting on," he said, withdrawing his gaze from her slowly. "I see the porter has taken my things. Let us walk; it is only a little way. It is delightful to breathe English air again."

"'Oh, to be in England now that April's there!'" sighed Judy, not so low that he did not hear her.

"Ah, Browning knew what he was about," he said, with a quick glance at her; "yet I'm not sure that the most delightful thing of all is not to see the faces of English ladies. How well you look, mother! Her recklessness about wind and rain agrees with her, Miss Judy."

"It agrees with everyone," said Judy fervently.

"I snatched her away from sitting over the fire at the Red House, Philip. She had had influenza, and was approaching a nervous crisis, I think."

"Poor little Judy!" said the Major as he might have said it to a child.

For this day—just for this one day—the impalpable barrier between Major Lindley and his mother seemed to be broken down. Judy hoped, with all the fervour of her affectionate heart, that it would never be rebuilt.

"And when shall we return to Stannington, Philip?" asked Lady Flora as they sat at lunch amid the mosaics and marble of the hotel dining-hall. "They are waiting to welcome you there with 'See the Conquering Hero Comes.'"

"I hope they're not so foolish," said the Major. "If I thought they really were, I should hesitate about going back. Indeed, I'm in no hurry. I want to pick up as quickly as I can. Let us stay here for a few weeks. The place seems full of the sun. Stannington is a dear place, but one does not pick up there."

"No, one does not," assented Lady Flora. "I shall, of course, do as you wish, Philip. You need not be lonely. The Waldersees will be glad to have you here, and you will have the garrison."

"Of course." Major Philip dismissed the Waldersees and the garrison with a certain indifference. "I want to get up there on the chalk cliffs and bask in the sun, and when the wind is not too violent I want to get out over the Downs."

"I could never climb up," said Lady Flora.

"No, dear; but Judy can. I remember Judy's prowess in the matter of exercise. We shall live out of doors."

"I ought to go back—after the reception," said Judy hesitatingly.

"I shall write to your mother to-day," said Lady Flora with decision; "she will not refuse me."

"I oughtn't to let you write, godmamma," said Judy; "for, of course, mother will consent, but only because you are the autocratic sovereign of Stannington, and she knows very well that she dare not refuse you."

"And a very good thing for you, too, Miss Judy," said Lady Flora.

"Too many beautiful things are happening to me," sighed Judy. "I know I shall have to pay for it one of these days."

She was not really very anxious to get back to the schoolroom and the little repressions of her daily life, and she could not help feeling proud, if a little frightened, to think that she was going to be Major Lindley's companion, as he had suggested.

Perhaps, however, as he found out friends in the place he would discover someone much more congenial and interesting than Judy Evelyn, who was not yet even emancipated from the schoolroom. She did not know whether the thought brought her relief or not. It would be great and glorious to be the companion of the hero who was presently to receive the Victoria Cross from the King's own hands; but, then, on the other hand, what should she find to say to him that would be worth hearing? Would he talk down to her as he would to a child? Would he weary of her?

However, Judy's misgivings were set at rest very soon. After lunch she left mother and son together, and wandered out to the sea front with a novel. Mops and Chloe, the dearest of Lady Flora's rabble of dogs, who were taken everywhere with their mistress, accompanied her.

She was sitting with the book unopened in her lap, looking out to the line where the sky and sea met, thinking, if the truth must be told, how much more interesting life was—that is to say, life away from Stannington—than a novel, when Major Lindley sat down beside her.

"My mother sent me out to find you," he said. "She wanted her afternoon nap. She said we need not be in a hurry to return, as she meant to have a good nap. She suggested that we might wander over the Downs, and have tea at a village inn, if we could find one."

"What a lovely plan!" cried Judy, dimpling and sparkling. "But I hope Lady Flora is not tired. An afternoon nap! Why, she never takes such a thing."

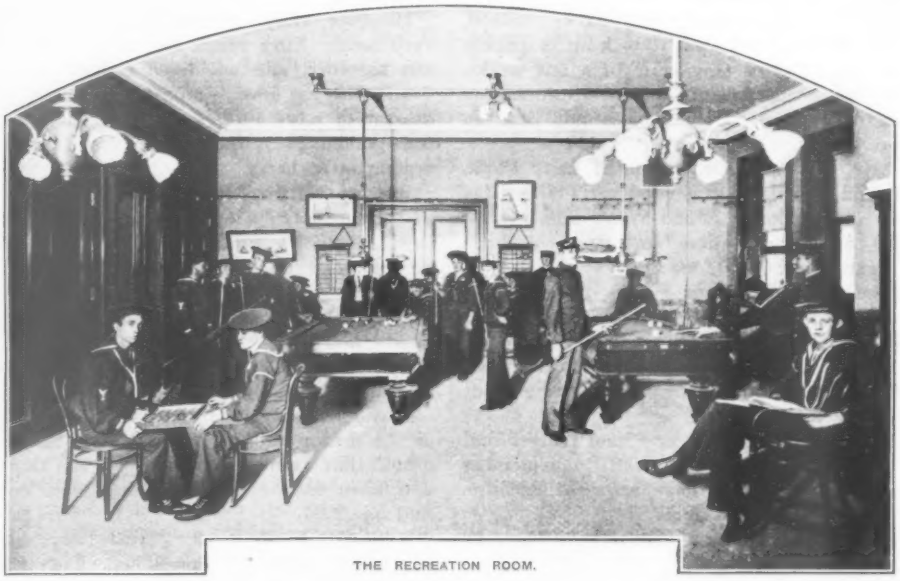
"She expressed her wish for it this time, at all events. I daresay the excitement of our meeting has tired her. Shall we take that path? It looks particularly inviting. I think I shall be able to manage it, though I'm not quite my own man yet."

When they returned, with only just time to dress for dinner, Judy's arms were full of flowers, notably the bee-orchis, which nodded in her hat and was stuck in her waistbelt.

"Well, my child," said Lady Flora, when Judy hurried to assist at her toilet—Judy had taken the place of Lady Flora's maid—"has it been pleasant?"

"Lovely," said Judy. "Such a dear inn. We had tea in the garden under the apple trees. There were beehives and black pigs and canaries and ferrets. And such old red twisted chimneys! And oh, godmamma, I thought I should have been so afraid of Major Lindley, but I shall never be afraid again."

"Ah!" Lady Flora turned away her head. "That sternness of aspect is not really natural to Philip. He was the sunniest boy."



"Why, I think," said Judy, "that the sunniness is coming back."

[END OF CHAPTER FOUR.]

XUM

AN AMERICAN WELCOME FOR SAILORS AND SOLDIERS.

By Day Allen Willey.

THE RECREATION ROOM.

WHEREVER the flag flies above an American warship, whether lying in the harbour of New York or on the other side of the world in Manila Bay, one can hear the sailors speak of an American woman who is more esteemed by the men who wear the blue jackets than any other of her sex. The sailors and marines in the United States service, as well as the soldiers, have good reason to think of Miss Helen Gould with affectionate regard, for she has devoted much of her time and energy to ministering to their needs and providing ways and means to brighten their lives, and at the same time lift them up morally and mentally.

Miss Gould is one of the wealthiest women in America, and for that matter in the world, and the money at her disposal has been liberally used in a way which has benefited thousands. Realising the isolation of those who have enlisted in the American military and naval service from the rest of society, and the many temptations to which they are subjected when not confined to duty, one of the principal plans pursued by Miss Gould has been to establish places here and there where they could have a diversity of innocent amusement, as well as shelter and other privileges, so that it would not be necessary for them to visit saloons and the lodging-houses which are too frequently centres of vicious influence. Thanks largely to her efforts, several of the principal seaports of the United States, as well as towns in Porto Rico and the Philippines, have been provided with social clubs, which indicate by their attendance the way in which the men who carry the rifle and cutlass appreciate what is being done for their welfare.

The principal resort of this kind was recently opened in the city of Brooklyn, and is probably the finest building erected for its purpose in the world. It combines the features of social club, hotel, savings bank, temperance saloon, and even has a department devoted to gymnastics.. In fact, the tar who has shore liberty can find more forms of recreation here than if he were to visit a dozen different amusement resorts. It is devoted exclusively to sailors and marines, and is under the management of the International Committee of the Young Men's Christian Association. This structure, when equipped with all its appointments, cost nearly £50,000, all of which was the generous gift of Miss Gould. It is an imposing edifice in appearance, rising to a height of seven storeys above the street, including the roof garden which surmounts it. The architecture is very attractive in design, and the garden referred to is really an ornamental as well as a useful feature. Open every hour during the day and night, sometimes the visitor may see a line of fifty or more of Uncle Sam's men formed in the lobby on the ground floor waiting to register for a room, as they would at an ordinary hotel. It frequently shelters 250 persons in a night, and at times is so crowded that the attendants have been obliged to place cots and mattresses in the corridors and apartments outside of the sleeping rooms to accommodate their guests.

AMERICAN SAILORS' AND SOLDIERS' HOME, BROOKLYN.

On entering each man is required to register his name, and is then assigned a room or a berth for the night. This is the only formality required, and as long as he desires to remain he is welcome, provided he behaves himself in a proper manner. It may be said here that the guests seldom abuse their privileges, and if one comes into the place under the influence of liquor, uses bad language, or acts in any other improper way, the other sailors frequently take a hand in removing him from the building, for they realise that it is their home, temporarily at least, and are as desirous of maintaining order as the superintendent and his assistants. But it can be said that it is necessary to eject very few of the visitors, and that the decorum which prevails would do credit to many a gathering of men in the higher walks of life.

Suppose the reader of this article accompanies the writer on a little tour of the building. Perhaps the most interesting feature will be the appearance of the men themselves. Representing many nationalities, the register bears signatures which are written in a remarkably legible hand, showing that not a few of them are well educated. A very small number are so ignorant that they are obliged to have the clerk register for them. Coming and going almost continually are not only native-born Americans but sturdy sons of England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales, Germans, and an occasional Frenchman; but the greater portion of the naval force is made up of the Anglo-Saxon class referred to. Naturally the most interesting time to visit the building is just after the arrival of a warship in the harbour. The men having "shore liberty" enter in squads, sometimes a dozen or a score at a time. They well know the popularity of the place, and hurry thither in order to secure rooms before all are taken. Having registered, some of them pass across the marble reception hall to the neat restaurant, joining the throng already seated at supper and enjoying the luxury (to them) of fine linen and good service. Others enter the "game room," where the click of billiard balls and an Æolian piano playing the latest popular airs are heard. Beyond the game room is a bright room with broad fireplace, furnished with long correspondence tables, with pens, paper, and ink supplied in abundance. The number of letters being written by bluejackets on the correspondence paper with the little red flag, and the frequent trips to Uncle Sam's letter box in the reception room indicate that this combination of facilities is resulting in the gladdening of many hearts all over the land with letters from the "boy" in the Navy. This busy scene before us is not an unusual one, for, upon glancing over the register during a lull in the registry, we are surprised at the totals indicating each day's business: 113, 156, 218, 227, 195, 130, 236, 228 guests—this is the way they run on the list on the last used pages of the big book.

While studying the register, an interesting conversation has been going on between a big sailor, with three red stripes and an eagle on his sleeve, and the man behind the desk, in which the words "allotment," "paymaster," "safe keeping" are frequently used, ending with the man leaving with the clerk a big roll of bills and signing his name on a card evidently prepared for the purpose. From the clerk, who was himself once a sailor, we learn some interesting facts about "allotments." It seems that a sailor can "allot" a certain part of his wages, if he so desires; that is, he may have any amount up to a certain percentage of his salary sent each month to any specified individual. So much confidence is placed in the Naval Association that the monthly check from the pay director of the Navy to the secretary of the association to cover the various allotments amounts to over $3,000. This is placed on interest at the bank. This system is teaching the men to save, and enables them to draw their money whenever desired. Over $21,000 has been handled for the sailors during three months in these allotments and for safe keeping.

A GROUP OF SAILORS IN THE HALL.

GAMES ON THE ROOF.

Noticing a sailor carrying a long, peculiarly shaped bundle on his shoulder, we follow him to the floor below, and there find that it has been placed in storage in a large room full of compartments already well filled with these bundles. The man in charge informs us that these are sailors' hammocks, and bags containing their clothing, and numerous small, square, well-built boxes termed "ditty boxes," in which the sailors keep all kinds of small articles on board ship. Adjoining this room is another one containing nearly 500 lockers. These are nearly all taken and used by sailors, some of whom are "at the ends of the earth," for storing their clothing and belongings. Glancing into the plunge-bath room, where are several sailors having a swim, we descend to watch a spirited game of bowling between picked teams. After enjoying this animated scene and watching the shooting in the rifle range adjoining, we take the elevator and go to the seventh floor. Here we find the blue again in evidence, seated around small tables on the brilliantly lighted roof garden, smoking, playing games, and reading. At the farther end of the building, a completely equipped Troy laundry is placed, and is doing a rapidly growing business in bundle work for sailors, as well as turning out the innumerable sheets, towels, pillow cases, etc., which roll in daily in papier-mâché carts from the various floors of the bedroom system. These bedrooms, which occupy the fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh floors, are 8 by 10 feet in size, and are neatly and comfortably furnished, light, and well ventilated.

Perhaps an hour or so has been spent in the tour of this home for Jack ashore, but what we have seen is well worth the time and effort. One of the most interesting features is the manner in which everything is systematised. It may be said that the various departments are run like clockwork. In the restaurant the food is not only of good quality, but properly cooked. The beds are amply supplied with clean linen and blankets, although the building is heated by steam throughout, so that during the coldest weather a proper temperature is maintained. It is lighted by electricity; and, although considered fire-proof, is provided with means for the men to escape in case any portion should ignite. The gymnastic and other apparatus is of the best quality which can be procured, and there are enough appliances to allow the men to stretch their muscles in any manner desired. The average sailor is naturally fond of music, and during the regular meal hours an abundance of it is furnished, which greatly adds to the enjoyment. During the summer season the roof garden is, of course, one of the most popular portions of the building, and here the sailors and marines frequently get up an impromptu concert, singing solos and choruses which attract an interested audience in the street below.

In thus providing for the comfort and enjoyment of the sailor Miss Gould believed that much could be accomplished from a religious standpoint, but the building is open to all no matter what their creed. Prayer meetings, song services, and Bible studies are conducted several times a week, and those who desire to attend are cordially welcomed. On Sunday the services are naturally more elaborate in character. It can be said, however, that the meetings both on week-days and Sundays are very largely attended, and the majority of the men manifest a deep interest in them, while the records show that not a few conversions have resulted. One of the greatest results of the establishment of this sailors' home is that thousands of men yearly make use of it during their time on shore, in preference to visiting the saloons and other questionable resorts, thus squandering their money and often ruining themselves morally and physically. It is perhaps needless to say that the institution has the hearty encouragement of the commanders of the warships, as well as the approval of the United States Navy Department, on account of the work it has already done for the moral and physical welfare of the men-of-war's men.

THE DINING ROOM.

FAITH, HOPE AND CHARITY.

By the Very Rev. J. H. Bernard, D.D., Dean of St. Patrick's.

"And now abideth faith, hope, charity, these three; but the greatest of these is charity."—1 CORINTHIANS xiii. 13.

T. PAUL has been speaking of the diversity of the Spirit's gifts, of the variety of the endowments and talents and opportunities which God has given to man to be used in His service. One man's gift is not another's; that he has the greater gifts, as he supposes, is no reason why he should despise his brother, who has the lesser, for all alike are needed if God's purposes for the world and for humanity are to be fulfilled. We may not condemn or undervalue that which we do not understand. But, although the gifts of God to man be thus diverse, and although every talent has its use, as St. Paul explains, he does not permit us to make the mistake of supposing that all gifts are of the same value, or that one is as good as another. "Covet earnestly the greater gifts" is his counsel. And it is of the three greatest gifts which have been bestowed upon human souls that we are now to think.

In one of the collects we are taught to pray that God would give us all the increase of faith, hope and charity; and when we put these three together we are following the teaching of St. Paul. Not only in the text—although there very plainly—does he join the three, but in epistles to other churches besides that of Corinth. When writing to the Colossians he commends their "faith in Christ Jesus, and the love which they have to all the saints, because of their heavenly hope." * So, too, he speaks of the "work of faith, and labour of love, and patience of hope," † which were conspicuous among the Thessalonians. The panoply of the Christian warrior includes, for his imagination, "the breastplate of faith and love, and for a helmet the hope of salvation." ‡ It is, then, not a mere trick of phrase, but the deliberate expression of his thought when he declares that faith, hope, and love differ from all other gifts in this, that they abide, while others pass away and are forgotten. The knowledge which enriches mankind, the powers of speech which exert so wide an influence, whether for good or evil; the gifts of prophecy and of speaking with tongues—all these and their like are indeed great gifts, to be used with serious thankfulness to God Who gave them, but they do not last. "Whether there be prophecies or tongues, they shall cease; whether there be knowledge, it shall be done away." They are the endowments of man in his progress through this world; but it is not upon earth that man's ambitions can be perfectly realised or his ideals fully accomplished. Such gifts as these are the equipment of man in that first stage of his education through which he passes on earth. But he does not bring them with him into the higher stages of being into which death introduces him. "When I was a child, I spake as a child, I felt as a child, I thought as a child; now that I am become a man, I put away childish things." They are among the endowments of the human race in its infancy. But some gifts there are which endure, which are essential to any true human life here or hereafter. St. Paul tells us what they are. "Now abideth faith, hope, charity, these three." These remain; these follow men into the unseen world beyond the grave, for without these in some measure they would cease to be worthy of the name of men.

Perhaps it seems at first a strange saying, and yet the longer we reflect on St. Paul's words the more true we perceive them to be: These three—faith, hope, love—are essential endowments of humanity; and we cannot conceive of ourselves as alive in any real sense without using and enjoying them all.

Faith abides. Do we say that the Apostle is here using rhetorical language, and that, in fact, faith is just the one virtue which shall be least needed in the next world? Is it not the very trial of this life, one asks, that faith is demanded at so many points? Will it not be the very blessing of blessings of the next life that faith will be replaced by sight, when all the puzzles and perplexities which trouble us here shall receive their answer in the unclouded vision of God? And yet, however legitimate it may be to hope that the larger knowledge of the next life may relieve us from many embarrassments of belief which the narrowness of our present circumstances imposes upon us, I do not know why we should suppose that the life of the future shall be entirely destitute of the exercise of faith. Would anyone really desire such an existence? A life in which each step was unerringly marked out for us, in which rigid demonstration and scientific evidence took the place of trust and loyalty and the ventures of faith which friend makes for friend, and rejoices that he is called to make them! I do not think that any of us would desire to live such a life. For the fact is that faith is an essential characteristic of human nature, and it cannot be eradicated without a maiming and impoverishment of our personality. Faith is a widely different thing from credulity. The one is the offspring of ignorance; the other, in so far as it has to do with our fellows, is our inheritance from countless generations of men who have gone before, associated in the intimacies of social life, and trusting each other for mutual support and inspiration. Nay, further, faith is a necessity of our intellectual existence; for, go back as far as we may in our quest for truth, we must reach at last some first principles, which we accept as axiomatic and which we cannot prove. A life lived without faith in something is an impossibility; even as a life lived without faith in our fellows would be a life lower than that of the brutes. Nay, the life of the future must rather be a life in which faith shall reach out towards its objects with a surer confidence than our present experience can permit us even to imagine. For belief in God is a deeper emotion of the soul than can be satisfied by the most unerring demonstrations, whether of sense or of logic. It is not because God is unseen that we are called upon to believe in Him, but because the instinct of faith can never be satisfied by the conclusions of the intellectual faculty. Faith abides, and must abide, if we are to live our fullest life.

* Col. i. 4, 5. † 1 Thess. i. 3.
‡ 1 Thess. v. 8.

And so with hope. Is it said again that in a perfect condition, such as we suppose the condition of the blessed to be, there will be no room for hope in the security of attainment? We know very little about the future life, but if it be a life in which there can be no joyful anticipations of happiness to come, it would not be a life to which men could look forward with much eagerness. The hopes of continual progress, of growth in the love of man and of God; these hopes we cannot suppose to be absent from the life of the blessed. It was with a true instinct that Dante wrote, "Abandon hope all ye who enter here," not over the gates of Paradise, but over the gates of Hell.

And love abides. We do not need that anyone should tell us that. That is the most permanent and the most enduring thing in life, the thing for which men will give up all else, even life itself. And a future without it, without the communion of soul with soul, without the interchanges of love and charity, would be a consummation from which every thinking person would earnestly pray to be delivered. Love abides, for it is the greatest thing that man and nature have reached. This is the most splendid product of that wonderful history which we call the evolution of humanity; it cannot go to waste. Rather let us say that God does not despise or confound the work of His own hands. Herein is that saying of St. Paul confirmed: "Now abideth faith, hope, love; but the greatest of these is love."

These are the three essential graces of human life as we know it. I have said nothing about the special forms which they assume when the light of the Gospel is thrown upon them. That is not difficult for us to understand. But it is worth noticing that, as they are the essential qualities of all human life, so in their perfection, transfigured and glorified by the teaching of Christ and in the person of Christ, are they the essential qualities of the Christian life—of the life of the Church, which is the Body of Christ. We need to fix our attention far more than we do on these essential things, not on the side issues of religious controversy. And these are the essential things for a church as for a man—faith, hope, charity.

The first is faith—a steadfast clinging to the unseen, an assurance that what we see is not half of the reality of things, in some respects less important than that which we do not see, a conviction of the reality of the supernatural gifts which the Lord Christ is ready to give to us, and does give to us, for strength and blessing. It is the question of faith in any form which is the test question at this moment for the churches of Western Christendom. For whatever may be said of the aids to the acceptance of religion which are afforded by the elimination of its supernatural core, we may be quite certain that the resulting forms of belief will be something widely different from the religion of Christ and His Apostles. You cannot dispense with the supernatural, for it is at the heart of Christianity. Faith in God, in His power, and in His compassion, abides, and must abide. It is an essential characteristic of the Christian life.

And so of hope. A church which does not look forward is doomed; its decay is only a matter of time. Hope is at the root of all vigorous effort for national or ecclesiastical reform. As with a nation, so with a church. If it content itself with looking back on a golden age in the past, on forgotten glories and long-lost privileges, it must at last lose its place and its station in the Kingdom of God. The inspiration of hope provides the one permanent impulse towards progress and achievement and victory over the souls of men. And the Church can find the inspiration of hope nowhere but in the figure of the risen and glorified Christ, Who rules powerfully in her midst as her Master and King.

"Faith, hope, charity; but the greatest of these is charity." The charity which, unenvious and tolerant, is long-suffering and kind, patient in its quest for souls, which never fails, for it is the spirit of the Master Himself, Who in resourcefulness and pity is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.

MOLLY'S HUSBAND: AUNT MARGARET'S STORY.

By Mrs. G. S. Reaney.

IT certainly was the strangest "romance in real life" which I ever came across. Molly was such a fine high-spirited girl. She had all the young men of the village at her feet long before she was out of her teens, but she showed no intention of settling down in married life for many a year to come. I don't mean to say that she actually allowed her admirers to propose to her, and then—as I've seen some girls do in my day—laughed at their folly, and declared she meant to stay single all her life, they needn't be troubled to think any more of her. No; Molly was not one of that kind, she was really no flirt. She did not plan or endeavour to make men in love with her; but she had that unconscious fascination of manner which will attract, and, attracting, often awakens deeper feelings. Molly's sweet, childlike manner seemed to appeal for help and protection, and the hearts which longed for the right to offer both were always of a certain noble kind. Molly was a country flower, pleasant to the sight of all true lovers of the country, but possessing no attractions to the town-bred, who value nothing that has not had hothouse cultivation. It seemed always the more staid sort of folk who made love to her. It was a wonder to everybody, the talk of the whole country round, when, without any warning or preparation, it was announced that Molly was engaged to young Joe Maclean, who was on a visit to the old country from Australia, where he had made money and reputation as a sheep farmer. He was ten years older than Molly; a fine fellow to look at: open brow, clear blue eyes, hair which glittered in the sunshine—"decidedly red" the young fellows called it who had been in love with Molly, but his mother would have described it, had she been living, as "rich auburn." He had broad shoulders and a wide stretch of footstep as he walked—a kind of colonial tread, as if the village pavement, with its narrow confines, was no village pavement at all, but an open prairie. To see Molly by his side in courting days was a sight. It was a real picture—the big strong man, bronzed with colonial sunshine; and Molly, round of limb, compact in form and feature, a trifle pale, but with a perfect wealth of sunlight shining about her face, and stepping out beside him with short, decided little steps. It was a sight to make one say, if you had a heart at all inclined that way, "God bless the two!"

And their wedding day was for all the world a real fair day in the village. Everyone brought out their best, and the gay colouring in bonnets, hats, and sashes looked like Nature's flowers among the green of spring fields and trees and hedges.

Molly's first trouble came when she found her husband had no intention, after all, of going back to the Colonies. He wanted to try his hand at shopkeeping; so he settled down in the nearest town, and our village maiden went through new and trying experiences. She loved her husband with an honest, whole-hearted care, and that carried her over all ordinary troubles. Babies, one, two, and three, were born, and Molly looked radiant with happiness. Then a shadow crossed her face, and her laughter seemed to have lost its joyous ring. She worked early and late, helping her husband in the shop, an elderly woman acting as her servant, glad of a home, unmindful of wage; but about the fifth or sixth year the business fell off—prosperity waned, troubles threatened. Molly knew the cause, but hid it away. No one guessed that the reason lay in the fact that her Joe had grown unsteady. I know how she would plead with him to return to sober ways. I know how she gave up her supper beer to keep "the hateful thing" out of the house; but Joe was fascinated . . . and the steps downwards were easy . . . Oh! how she wished for her poor mother, and still thanked God that she had not lived to see the day of her Molly's misery. Her father—long ago married again and with a young family springing up—ventured to interfere, but it only made matters worse for Molly. Joe accused her of babbling about home matters outside. As a true wife she was in honour bound to silence—and so forth.

Molly's little Agnes—her third child and only girl—was in her fourth year when Joe had to give up business and take a situation. He moved further off from Molly's friends, and she, poor girl, had a rough time in consequence. But she held on her way until her very patience and forbearance seemed to indulge her erring husband rather than to check him. Many a time would she pour out her troubled heart to me in a letter; and I was lying so helpless on my couch or I would have fled to her side. (It was quite twenty years since I had lost the use of my legs, and I was fit for nothing but to live in my little almshouse, and count up God's mercies to me. I could use my hands and write back words of comfort. This I did to the best of my ability, you may be sure.)

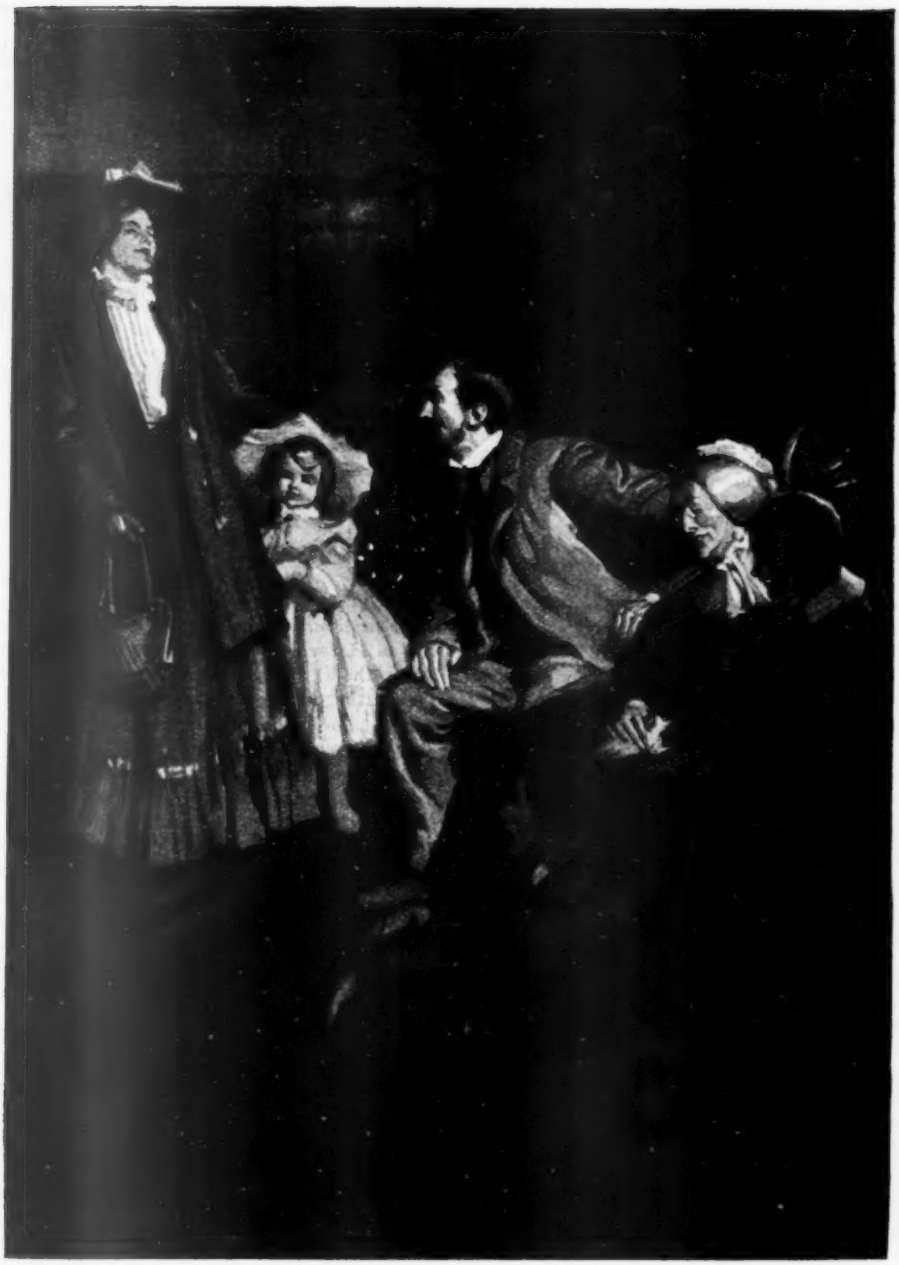
Joe was spending his earnings more and more from home. He was an industrious man and a good workman. Poor Molly found it was pretty well slavery working as she did to keep things going, and at the same time earning necessary funds for clothing. So one day she had a talk with Joe and said: "Will you agree to a separation? I'll get a home for Agnes" (a nice motherly woman had offered to take her at a charge Molly meant to meet by her own earnings), "the boys can shift for themselves with your help, and I'll go out to service. It's a pity for us all to drift down-hill together. We're losing to-day what a lifetime cannot get back for the children."

Joe was very quiet, but treated the proposal with a high hand; and Molly, explaining that she was going to service to work for herself and Agnes, father would help them, parted from her boys one evening, bidding the brave little fellows to "mind and say their prayers, never to touch strong drink, be punctual at school, and always to go to church on Sundays."

Joe made as if he did not mind. He kept the house sweet and clean—sparing time which otherwise would have been spent in a public-house—and cooked at night for the morrow's meals. He even managed to stitch on tapes and buttons, and all seemingly went well. Molly used to hear at first from the elder boy; but these letters ceased in time, and she had no news. And this is what happened: Joe got tired of doing housewifely duties, and then things suffered.

Molly paid a flying visit one day when he was at work, and found a sadly neglected home. Her two little sons were out—at school, where they took their dinner and spent the day. She got in through a neighbour's house, had a good spin round, brushed up the little coats and trousers of her boys, washed out the soiled linen and hung it up to dry; then made off again before the return of her people.

They came home to think that an angel had visited them; but the lads said nothing, and the father kept silent. And again and again, always once a week, this happened. Joe thought it was some neighbour "fussing" round; he was too proud to acknowledge his obligation, and so the matter drifted.



But there came one day when Molly found her eldest born—a little fellow of twelve—lying alone in the house suffering from debility; no fever, but the waste of insidious decline. In a moment her heart was broken. How could she leave the child? How stay?

Another plan suggested itself—she would take him away. But where? As housekeeper to an invalid gentleman where one servant was kept, she had managed these special weekly visits, planning her journey by suitable trains; but it was another thing to find time to take her little boy where he could be under her care. Then it was she thought of poor Aunt Margaret, and she came and asked my help. Might Harry stay with me? A little planning and it was done, but Joe's consent had to be gained. I wrote for Molly; he took no note of my letter. Meanwhile the poor mother was distracted with grief. She gained leave from her master to visit her boy daily, and one evening (being loth to leave him) Joe came in and found her on her knees.

Poor Molly had, like many another, found her only hope and comfort in this hour of trouble was with God, and out of her heart's need she was praying aloud for help and blessing.

Joe stepped out of the house, he thought unnoticed. He wandered up and down—passed and repassed his favourite public-house, had no care or longing that way, so never thought to enter.

So that was the ministering spirit who for weeks past had kept the home so "spick and span." Fool that he was never to make sure it was a mother's hand that did such service for the youngsters! And she had found out how ill the boy was. Would she make sure it was his neglect had caused it? Aunt Margaret had written, and he had been churlish and had not answered her letter; but he would go home and tell the wife she could have the boy away.

"And upon this the door opened, and Molly came in with little Agnes behind her."—p. 82.

When he got back he found young Harry all alone, sobbing his heart out. Mother had torn herself away to go back to her duties. Then Joe lifted the crying boy on his knee, for he was thin and frail, and bid him check his tears, brighter days were coming. To-morrow he could take a holiday from work, and the two would pay Aunt Margaret a visit, and take Willie with them.

* * * * *

And so the three arrived all unawares to me; and Joe was gentleness itself, and wept over his misdeeds and told again the story of his love, and wished he could go back to sober days and win Molly as he won her then.

Shall I ever forget his face as he spoke of finding her in prayer, and how he knew he'd be a better man if he had kept his Sundays and turned away his steps from public-houses? And for comfort I said to him a rhyme I had learnt from his Molly's grandmother, my own dear mother:—

"If you've forgotten to be good,
And taken up with sinning,
Begin again, begin again,
All life is a beginning."

And then, while we were talking, who should pass the window but Molly.

"Shall I go?" said Joe, standing up and turning red. "She'll maybe not care to see me."

"Keep your seat," I answered. "Molly's too true a wife to be other than glad to meet her old fond husband. It was the cold and neglectful Joe she schooled her heart to leave!"

And upon this the door opened, and Molly came in with little Agnes behind her.

Never to my dying day shall I forget the tender look which came into her face as she saw us all together there. Joe rose and stepped up to her as she stood surprised.

"Come, Molly, forgive an erring husband and find room for him once more in your noble heart," he said; and then he broke down and sobbed. And Molly took his bowed head between her hands and kissed his curly hair, and wept soft glad tears as she said something about, "You've never left my heart, Joe. It was your other self I had no room for."

Oh, what a tea we had! Joe went out and bought us things—he said, having had a shop, he best knew how to cater; and the invalid, why he seemed to get almost well again with the joy of it all.

Of course, he wasn't well for all that, because it was on his account that Joe went back to his sheep farming in Australia. Not that Molly minded going. She was overjoyed to begin life afresh in a strange land with her husband as she knew him in those early married days—the same, but changed. He was to-day a sober man of prayer.

Yes, there's the family group they sent me last Christmas; I hang it where I can see it. Molly doesn't look a bit like ten years older, but she is for all that; and Joe looks so dignified and nice, you could see at a glance he was used to ordering servants about. And Harry, that broad-shouldered fellow, who could have believed that he was once that delicate, consumptive lad! I don't wonder they count Agnes a beauty, she looks a real open-air living lassie; and Willie is almost as big as Harry. As to the other three, I don't know them, you see, except as they favour their father and mother. Funny though, isn't it, that Molly should have called their last born little girls Peace, Hope, and Joy? There's something quaint and something picture-like about the thought. Joe wanted them called Margaret after me; but Molly said she knew I'd like the other way best, and in truth I do.

Ah! it's all mercies along the road I tread. It's no trouble to me, though, to feel I'll not see Molly again, perhaps, this side of Heaven. The good Father's got us all in His keeping, and all life's roads which run along the "narrow way" lead on to Him, whether they pass through the Old Country or the Colonies. I am content. I love to go over my sweet Molly's story. It's for all the world like it was at the Creation—darkness before light. "The evening and the morning were the first day."

SCRIPTURE ILLUSTRATIONS AND ANECDOTES.

FOR BIBLE READERS AND TEACHERS.

BASED UPON THE INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

NOVEMBER 15TH.—David's Trust in God.

Passage for reading—Psalm xxiii.

POINTS.—GOD'S CARE OF HIS PEOPLE.
1. In life gives food and guidance.
2. In death cheers by His presence.
3. In eternity provides a home.

ILLUSTRATIONS. A Father's Guidance. A little boy sat on a saddle in front of his father, and held the reins which controlled a restive horse. Unknown to the boy, the reins passed round him and were also held firmly in the father's hand. The father saw occasion to pull one of them. With artless simplicity, the child looked round, saying, "Father, I thought I was driving; but I am not, am I?" How often in David's life was God holding the reins and directing his way! He took him from the sheep-fold and sent him to Saul's court. He brought about his friendship with the King's son which stood him in such good stead. He gave him wisdom to rule, and patience under trial. He, by His Spirit, restored him after his great sin and brought him back to Himself. God's goodness and guidance were with him always.

No Fear of Death. Among the few remains of Sir John Franklin, the great Arctic explorer, there was a leaf of the "Student's Manual," by Dr. John Todd—the only relic of a book. From the way in which the leaf was turned down, the following portion of a dialogue was prominent: "Are you not afraid to die?" "No." "No! Why does the uncertainty of another state give you no concern?" "Because God has said to me, 'Fear not. When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee.'" In this faith Sir John Franklin lived, and in this faith, amid frozen seas and rivers, he died; and this leaf is preserved in the Museum of Greenwich Hospital.

Heaven Our Home. In the last dreadful civil war in America, troops of the Federals and Confederates were on one occasion encamped on opposite sides of the same river, and one morning the brass band of the Northern troops played their national air, and all the Northern troops cheered and cheered again. Then on the opposite side of the river the brass band of the Confederates played "My Maryland" and "Dixie," and then all the Southern troops cheered and cheered. But after a while one of the bands struck up "Home, Sweet Home," and the band on the opposite side of the river took up the strain; and when the tune was done the Confederates and the Federals, all together united, as the tears rolled down their cheeks, in one great "Hurrah! Hurrah!" "Well, my friends," said Talmage, the American preacher, as he told the story, "Heaven comes very near us to-day. It is only a stream that divides us—the narrow stream of death—and the voices here and the voices there seem to commingle as we sing praise to God; and the chorus of the united song of heaven and earth is 'Home, sweet home, for ever with our God.'"

NOVEMBER 22ND.—The World's Temperance Lesson.

Passages for reading—Proverbs xx. 1; xxiii. 20, 21; 29—35.

POINTS.—DRINK. 1. In the present is deceitful.
2. In the future leads to misery.
3. Is always harmful.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Signs of Intemperance. I remember the case of a man, whose face had become quite changed. He had given way to secret drinking. His whole appearance told what a miserable slave to drink he had become. On a certain occasion a friend said to him, "May I speak with you?" "Certainly you may," he replied. "Well, friend, the truth is you have given way to drink, until, unconsciously perhaps to yourself, you are a victim of intemperance." "I?" said the man with surprise. "I am not, indeed; you are mistaken." "No," said the faithful friend, who was not to be put off or cheated by this deceitful denial, "you have but to look in the glass. Nothing but excessive drinking could produce your present appearance. Eight years ago you looked clean, sober, healthy; now you have the testimony of your own experience and the faithful witness of the mirror against you." This is the glass that those who drink should look into.

Habit. Far above the falls of Niagara a man may row down the river and turn back whenever he will; but further down there comes a point beyond which he cannot turn. He cannot tell the exact place, as the tides and currents are so treacherous. So also is it when anyone forms the habit of excessive drinking. He cannot tell the exact time when the point is reached beyond which he is helpless and on the swift road to ruin.

NOVEMBER 29TH.—David's Charge to Solomon.

Passage for reading—1 Chronicles xxviii. 1—10.

POINTS. 1. He must serve God with all his heart.
2. He must take heed to God's commandments.
3. He must build a sanctuary for God.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Rules for Life. Make God's will the first and last of all you do. So begin your work that you may have Him at the end ; otherwise it would have been better not to have begun. Wealth, as a rule, hinders rather than helps the way to Heaven. Let your care be how to "live well" in God's sight, and you may be sure that you will not die poor. So live with men as remembering always that God sees you. So pray to God as if every man heard you. Do nothing which you would not have God see done. Desire nothing which may wrong God's honour to grant. Bear trials as wholesome medicines good for the soul. In a word, "be in the fear of God all the day long." This it is to serve God with all your heart, and those who thus act need fear no evil, for "blessed is the man that feareth the Lord."

Obedience and Faith. A captain is bringing his vessel from the Mediterranean, an almost tideless sea, to one of our inland ports. When he gets to the mouth of the river a telegraphic message is flashed to him, "Lighten your ship ; be ready at a certain hour, and the tide will bring you in." When the hour comes the sails are ready, the anchor weighed, the cargo lightened ; and as the result he sees the wide wastes before him filled with water, his ship floated over the harbour bar, and carried safely into port. So in matters of salvation and eternal life. If we are to be saved we must be ready and willing in the day of God's power. That carries us at last into port with no effort of our own, and leaves us safely harboured there throughout eternity. To fear God and keep His commandments is the whole duty of man.

DECEMBER 6TH.—Solomon's Wise Choice.

Passage for reading—1 Kings iii. 4—15.

POINTS. 1. The King's humility.
2. His moderation in asking.
3. His wisdom in his choice.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Humility a Source of Honour. In the evening of the day that Sir Eardley Wilmot kissed the hand of his Sovereign, on being appointed Chief Justice, one of his sons, a youth of seventeen, attended him to his bedside. "Now," said the father, "I will tell you, my son, a secret worth your knowing and remembering. The elevation I have met with in life, particularly this last instance of it, has not been owing to any superior merit or abilities, but to my humility, to my not having set up myself above others, and to a uniform endeavour to pass through life void of offence towards God and man."

Humility and Cheerfulness. "The peculiar characters of grass which adapt it specially for the service of man are its apparent humility and cheerfulness—its humility, in that it seems created only for lowest service, appointed to be trodden on and fed upon ; its cheerfulness, in that it seems to exult under all kinds of violence and suffering. You roll it, and it is the stronger the next day ; you mow it, and it multiplies its shoots, as if it were grateful ; you tread upon it, and it only sends up richer perfume. Spring comes, and it rejoices with all the earth, glowing with variegated flame of flowers, waving in soft depth of fruitful strength. Winter comes, and though it will not mock its fellow plants by growing then, it will not pine and mourn, and turn colourless and lifeless as they. It is always green, and is only brighter for the hoarfrost." Solomon, in his moderation in asking, showed a humble and contented spirit, like the grass.

DECEMBER 13TH.—The Dedication of the Temple.

Passage for reading—1 Kings viii. 1—11.

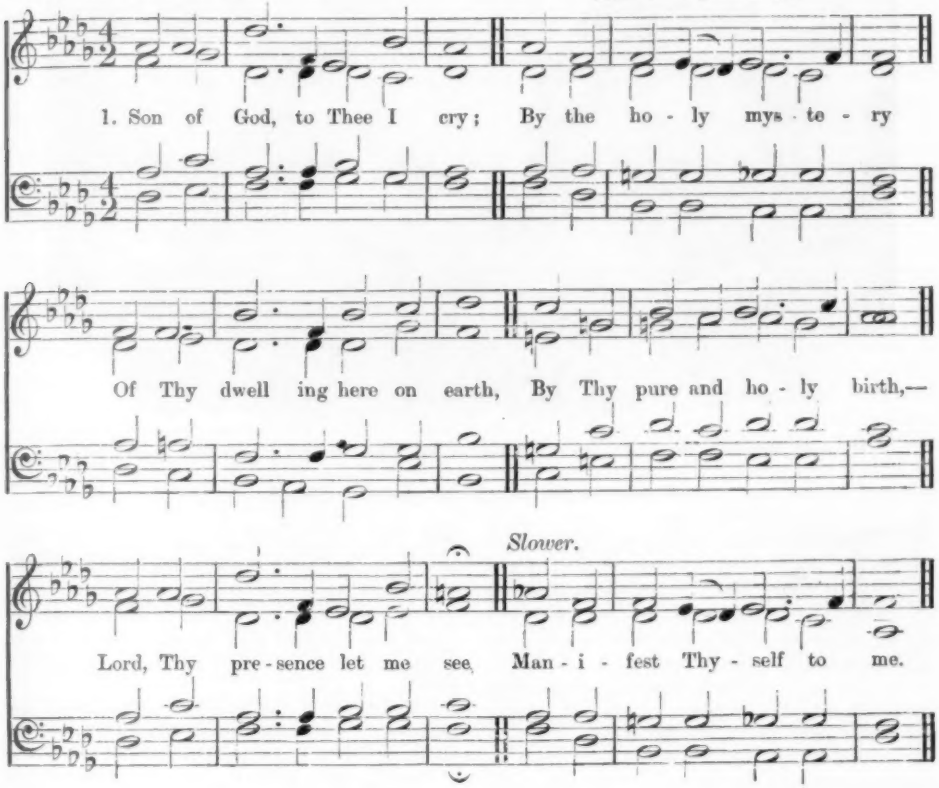
POINTS.—THE TEMPLE. 1. Finished and furnished for God.
2. Dedicated with sacrifices to God.
3. Accepted with glory by God.

ILLUSTRATIONS. The Blessedness of Giving. A merchant of St. Petersburg, at his own cost, supported several native missionaries in India, and gave liberally also to Christian work at home. On being asked how he could afford to do it, he replied, "Before my conversion, when I served the world and self I did it on a grand scale and at the most lavish expense ; but when God, by His grace, called me out of darkness, I resolved that Christ and His cause should have more than I had ever spent in the service of the world. And as to giving so much, it is God who enables me to do it ; for at my conversion I solemnly promised that I would give to His cause a fixed proportion of all that my business brought in to me ; and every year since I made that promise it has brought in about double what it did the year before, so that I can easily double my gifts for Him." Nothing is too much or too great for the service of God.

Gifts and Prayer. In mining operations, the full and empty carriages and vessels being connected together, those which have been emptied are from time to time raised up the ascent by the descending of those that have been filled. So let the descent of God's mercies and the gifts bestowed out of His fulness raise your empty vessels to receive from His inexhaustible treasure all that you need.



God's Glory. The Roman Emperor Trajan could not conceive how God could not be seen by mortal eye. "You say," said he to Rabbi Joshua, "that your God is everywhere. I should like to see Him." "He is indeed everywhere," said the Rabbi, "but no mortal eye can behold His glory." The Emperor insisted that it must be possible to see God. "Well," said Joshua, "suppose we go first and look at one of His ambassadors." The Rabbi took the Emperor out at noon, and bade him look on the sun, blazing in meridian splendour. The Emperor could not see, for the light dazzled him. Said the Rabbi, "Thou art unable to bear the light of one of His creatures ; how, then, couldest thou look upon the Creator ? Would not such a light annihilate thee ?"

XUM

"Son of God, to Thee I Cry."

Words by RICHARD MANT, 1831.

Music by the REV. W. J. FOXELL, M.A., B.Mus.
(Minor Canon of Canterbury.)

2. Lamb of God, to Thee I cry;
By Thy bitter agony,
By Thy pangs to us unknown,
By Thy Spirit's parting groan,—
Lord, Thy presence let me see,
Manifest Thyself to me.

3. Prince of Life, to Thee I cry;
By Thy glorious majesty,
By Thy triumph o'er the grave,
Meek to suffer, strong to save,—
Lord, Thy presence let me see,
Manifest Thyself to me.

"'My dear,' she said, and there was an odd little catch in her voice, 'have you quarrelled?'"

A Complete Story by F. H. Sweet.

THE girl gave a pitiful sob as the train curved away from the station, showing through the car windows the rugged slope of Hog Back, with the few isolated cabins in their little clearings among the pines. High up toward the ridge, and above all the other cabins, a tiny wreath of blue smoke curled over the trees and lost itself in the clouds. That was from Herk's chimney, and he was cooking his dinner. Then the girl's shoulders straightened suddenly, and her gaze left the window.

The woman in the next chair had drawn her skirts a little closer when the figure slipped past and dropped into the seat; but as the girl turned, and she saw the sweet, wistful face in the depths of the big sun-bonnet, her fingers relaxed and the folds of the skirt fell back into their former graceful curves. At that moment the conductor entered.

He came straight to the girl, for she was the only passenger who had taken the train from the mountain station. As he stopped beside her chair she held out a handful of small coins. Then the woman noticed that the eyes beneath the sun-bonnet were large and beautiful, and that the long lashes were wet with the tears that were being resolutely held back.

"Where to?" asked the conductor; then, without waiting for a reply, as his eyes swept down the coarsely clad figure, "Haven't you made a mistake, my girl? This is a parlour car."

"I reckon hit's all right," answered the girl listlessly; "the man outside said for me to git in quick. Here's yo' money."

"Where do you wish to go?"

"Anywhar the train stops; hit don't matter 'bout no partic'ler place, so long's thar's houses an' people an' a chancet to get work. You all needn't bother 'bout no extra stoppin' on my 'count."

"Well," doubtfully, "this money will take you as far as Ridgeboro, thirty miles. That is considerable of a place. But suppose we go into the next car. You have evidently made a mistake. This car is extra. And, anyway, the chair you are in has already been taken."

"My brother is enjoying his cigar and will not be back for an hour or so," spoke up the woman suddenly; "let the girl have the chair, conductor. I am glad to have her occupy it."

The conductor looked from her to the girl undecidedly, then slipped the coins into his pocket and walked away. The girl turned to her neighbour.

"How's he mean extra?" she inquired. "I never ast no price an' I give him my money."

"Perhaps he thought you might not want to give any more than was necessary," the woman suggested. "Passengers have to pay extra for using the chairs in this car."

"O—oh!" The girl half rose. "Don't ye reckon he took hit out o' my ninety cents?"

"No, I don't think he did. But it doesn't matter. The chair is mine."

But the girl was standing now.

"I don't want nobody to give——" she began, when the woman reached out and touched her on the arm.

"Sit down, my dear," she smiled pleasantly; "you are my guest, you know. If I should go up to your home on the mountain, wouldn't you let me have a chair to sit on?"

"Of co'se; but——"

"That is all I am doing now. The chair is temporarily mine, and it is unoccupied. I am glad to have you make use of it."

The girl remained standing for a few seconds, then sank doubtfully upon the chair, and soon after turned to the window. A rugged, pine-wooded slope was sweeping by, and on it were small clearings and cabins, and blue smoke losing itself in the clouds; but it was not her slope and cabins and smoke, and presently her gaze came back mistily into the car. The woman was gazing out at the slope also, for it was wild and good to look upon. Then in the reflection on the window glass she saw the girl's hand go to the bosom of her dress and draw out a small tintype such as were made by cheap, wandering photographers. The woman at first saw without observing; then realising what she was doing she suddenly turned her chair so as to shut out the reflection, but not before she saw the tintype raised passionately to the girl's lips. It was only when she heard a low sob, instantly checked, that she swung her chair back again, sharply.

"My dear," she said, and there was an odd little catch in her voice, "have you quarrelled?"

The girl started, her eyes opening wide. "Y—yes," she hesitated; "but how'd ye know?"

"Oh, women have a way of divining such things, perhaps. Is he nice?"

"Nice? Herk nice?" The girl drew a long ecstatic breath, which ended in a sob. "He's the best man on the whole mount'n, the strongest an' best-lookin' an' best-workin'."

"And you—quarrelled?" There was a low, retrospective note of sadness in the woman's voice, which she did not appear to realise herself. "Quarrelled," she repeated. "Was Herk to blame—altogether?"

"N—no, not all," confessed the girl, frankly. "I—I started it. But Herk's a strong man, an' ought to give in."

"Men are sometimes stubborn, even when their hearts are breaking. It is the woman who should give in, especially if she's a little in the wrong. Love means so much more to her, and—and it is so easy for one's life to be ruined. You must go back and make it up with Herk, dear."

"I can't," shortly.

"Would you like to go through all your life without seeing or hearing from him, just living for yourself?"

"But I wouldn't," with sudden alarm in her voice. "Herk's plumb sure to come an' look for me arter a while." She half rose as the train began to slacken speed, her face flushing. "Hit's Brant's Bridge," she explained; "seven miles from our place, an' whar I airned my ninety cents sellin' calamus roots. Herk bought my ring here, too. Oh, yes, he's plumb sure to come for me."

"Perhaps," the strained lips were forcing themselves to say; "but don't wreck your life on such a chance, my dear. That's right," as the girl rose with sudden resolution in her face; "go back and explain to him. If he is a good man—as I think he is—he will understand and meet you halfway. And you must allow me to advance you the fare back—you can repay me some time, you know. I am glad for you, dear. I once knew a quarrel like this, and there was no making up. The man went across the sea and never came back. He never will come——"

She stopped abruptly, her lips parted, her eyes wide. Her brother was approaching from the other end of the car, and behind him, crowding by him, was a tall eager man whose face was glowing, whose arms were outstretched towards her. As in a dream she felt the girl grasp her hand and kiss it, and heard a broken, joyful, "Good-bye. No'm, I can't take yo' money. Hit's only seven miles, an' I can walk hit easy. Good-bye. Hit's the fust time I was ever in a train, an' I won't never forget ye." Then the girl was gone; and then—the man was beside her.

TEMPERANCE NOTES AND NEWS.

By a Leading Temperance Advocate.

ON USING THE PRESS.

AMONG the small band of Temperance workers keenly alive to the power of the press as an aid to Temperance work, a foremost place must be given to Mr. H. J. Osborn. More than a quarter of a century ago, when he was prominently identified with the work of the Western Temperance League, the official organ of that association contained many contributions from his pen urging a more persistent circulation of Temperance literature. After his removal to London he became associated with Mr. Arnold F. Hills in the work of the United Temperance Council and the Ideal Publishing Union. Upon the changes consequent on the transference of the National Temperance League's publication depôt to the Ideal Publishing Union, Mr. Osborn undertook the direction of the depôt, and more recently still he has become the proprietor of the National Temperance Depôt, with its varied stock and valuable copyrights. His intimate knowledge of the different phases of Temperance effort, his lifelong experience as a practical worker, and the high respect in which he is held by all sections of society, make him essentially the right man in the right place at the head of this historic Temperance publication concern. It is his ambition to cater for every department of the movement, so that those who, on the one hand, wish to purchase whole libraries for their Temperance societies, or who, on the other hand, only want a supply of leaflets for a mission, can have their needs promptly met. Mr. Osborn is a leader of the Temperance forces at Southend-on-Sea, and was elected to the Borough Council some few years ago by a very large majority. The contest mainly turned on the Temperance question. He was formerly the editor of The United Temperance Gazette, and is now the editor of The Temperance Mirror, and also of The Temperance Register, a new monthly which is calculated to do good service in reaching the thoughtful and cultured classes.

(Photo: W. S. Campbell, Creed Lane, E.C.)
MR. HENRY J. OSBORN.

TEMPERANCE SUNDAY.

The return of Temperance Sunday in the Free Churches, which occurs this month, once again presents an opportunity for arousing the interest of religious people to the paramount evils of intemperance. There is still a great lack of knowledge among the upper and middle classes as to the claims of the Temperance question. The pulpit affords a splendid opportunity for quickening the interest in our work. There should be a Temperance meeting on a week night following Temperance Sunday, and a definite attempt thus made to enlarge the membership of the local Temperance societies.

THE TEMPERANCE HOSPITAL.

The custom of having a Christmas collection in the various Bands of Hope in aid of the Temperance Hospital has stood the test of twenty years or more, and although some of the adult societies have joined in the effort, they are but few in number. The hospital just now stands in pressing need of energetic support, and, with the War and Coronation out of the way, it is hoped that this year's collection will break the record. If those who have never joined in the effort will do so this time, and if those who have hitherto collected try to get "half as much again" as they sent in last year, the hospital authorities will be cheered and encouraged in their labour of love.

FEMALE INTEMPERANCE.

The newspapers have recently given some deplorable instances of ruined homes as a result of female intemperance. In the neighbourhood of Paddington a lady who has for many years conducted a large Mothers' Meeting, has recently invited qualified speakers to pay a kind of surprise visit to her meeting and give the mothers a friendly talk on the subject. Many of the women cannot get out to the ordinary evening Temperance meeting, so that this special effort may be the means of influencing some who have not been reached hitherto.

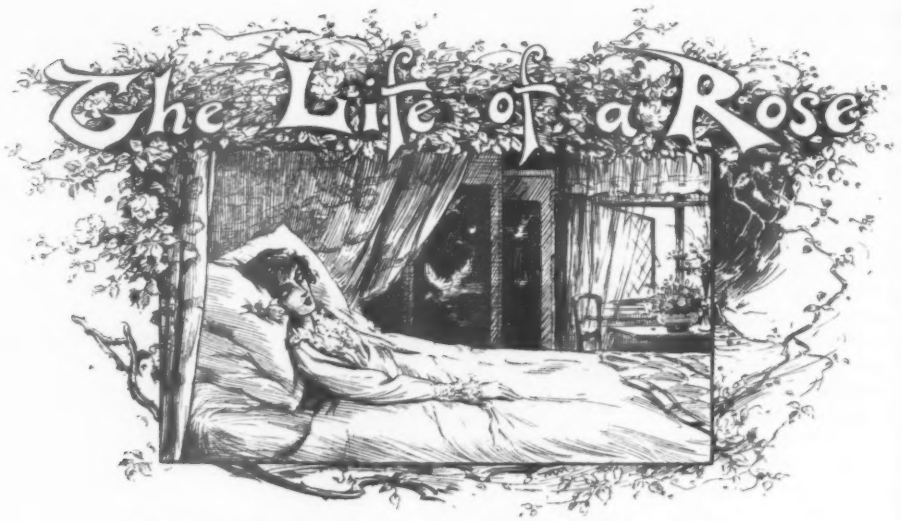
YOUNG MEN'S SOCIETIES.

In connection with many places of worship there seems to be a disposition to revive the literary and debating societies which were such a power for good in the 'seventies. Such societies afford a fine opportunity for discussing the Temperance question. A good, vigorous debate on the compensation question, or a paper on the present state of the licensing laws, will serve to spread the light among the future electors and heads of families. In view of the next General Election, Temperance workers should be on the alert to educate public opinion by any and every available means. Another good subject for a young men's society would be "The Early Heroes of the Temperance Reformation." The story of the men who laid the foundations of the cause is full of deep interest, and presents many lessons of faith, perseverance, and endurance, with which the young men of to-day will be all the better for being brought into touch.

(Photo: W. H. Selby, Gold Coast Colony.)

CHIEF ZACCHÆUS COKER OF CAPE COAST CASTLE.



A COLONIAL WORKER.

The hereditary chief Zacchæus Coker, whose portrait we present this month, is a recruit of the Independent Order of Good Templars. He is attired in the native costume of Cape Coast Castle, as he appeared when waiting upon the late Colonial Secretary prior to the Coronation. He is fully sensible of the great evils which have resulted from the demoralisation of the native races by the liquor traffic, and takes a very warm interest in the promotion of the Temperance cause. The marvellous way in which Good Templary has proved to be of service to all sorts and conditions of men, in all sorts of climates, is one of the most interesting features of present-day work. Mr. Joseph Malins, J.P., the Grand Chief Templar, has from the first developed the missionary aspect of the Order, and its plantation in our colonial possessions has always been very dear to his heart.

POOR LAW SCHOOLS.

The development of Bands of Hope in the Poor Law Schools of the country is a most encouraging sign of Temperance progress. To equip the children of the State so that when they are turned out into the world they may be able to withstand the temptations to drink is clearly a Christlike thing. The Chase Farm Schools, Enfield, has a most successful work conducted by Mr. C. W. Garrard, who constantly receives deeply gratifying letters from boys and girls who have been trained in Temperance principles in the Chase Farm Schools Band of Hope, and are now earning their living in different parts of the world. At the Hornchurch Cottage Homes in Essex a similar work is also conducted by Mr. Garrard, with like encouraging results.

An Allegory for Young and Old by Flora Schmalz.

THE June sun's rays were warm and fervid; they had travelled round the large, old-fashioned garden until they reached the quiet corner where the rose-bush stood alone in the shade. And now the fresh green leaves were flecked with flickering lights, which danced hither and thither in a perfect frenzy of joy and wonder.

It was a memorable Midsummer Day, for to-day the solitary rose-bud which the tree had borne was opening her petals, one by one. Words cannot picture the delicate fragrance of those unsullied, blooming petals. No wonder that the sunbeams were waiting to kiss them into life! No wonder that, as each curling beauty was gradually disclosed, the buoyant zephyrs hurried to the spot, longing to fan and brace up the flower into the fulness of strength and of absolute perfection.

The heart of the rose quivered and palpitated, in sympathy with the leaves that surrounded her. It thrilled with gratitude towards the sun and the breeze; it went out with good will, as she realised her kinship, and was in ecstatic harmony with every living thing.

Yet, as evening drew nigh, a strange sense of loneliness made itself felt. The great sun-power had withdrawn his beneficent influence. There was hardly a movement in the silent, dew-laden air. Every bird had gone to roost; at least, so she thought, until a sudden burst of unexpected melody turned the stillness into music. Then she listened, as if in a dream, while the nightingale related to her the old Eastern love-story of his early ancestor and the primeval rose. It was all so new and strange to her that, when the bird went on to sing her own praises, she grew pinker and pinker in the moonlight with a blush that never left her again.

The song came to an end with a superb shake—an epitome of the burden which it had conveyed.

"Life is love;
Love is life."

The rose shivered; she knew not why, save that she was born into a world of suffering, and had learnt what sorrow meant. Her lover was gone, and she now divined that she should never see him again. The song had spoken of life; it had likewise revealed to her that she must die. But love, it transpired, was eternal, and to give herself for another was to live for ever.

On the following day the sunbeams returned to caress her. The summer ether brought a message of expectancy, as it fluttered through the foliage, until it reached the rose, in all her fresh young loveliness, and stirred her once more into rapture.

A few days later it became evident that she had attained the zenith of her beauty, and yet she experienced a feeling of vague disappointment; she still yearned for that which had not come to pass.

XUM

Once in the garden she had caught the sound of a hitherto unknown voice, the ripple of happy, childish laughter. A glimpse had been granted her of a being, new and marvellous—of an exquisite human flower. It was a little maiden of six summers, whose eyes were deep blue, like the violets, and whose hair had threads of gold in it, like the sun.

But since this happened so long ago it seemed as if the garden had been wrapt in a deeper stillness, and as if the house in the background were sunk in sleep. A feeling of indescribable sadness, of dim foreboding, began to haunt the place; the sun's visits appeared to grow shorter, and the shadows fell dark and thick. Could it be purely imagination, the rose conjectured, or was the hour of tragedy at hand; that supreme hour of which the nightingale had warned her in his song, and to which all nature, in this teeming summer pageant, was slowly tending? For the culmination of each leaf and flower was reached and past, and already their outward beauty was assuming a subtle and inner meaning.

In the sun's fierce heat the rose commenced to droop and hang her head. The gardener had become oddly negligent of late, and the root of the plant lacked moisture, which the dry earth failed to supply. As the day declined the conviction seized her that the edges of her petals were ever so slightly crinkling up. What if, before very long, they should be tinged with brown? What if she should be left here, in this isolated corner, until she were over-blown? To wither, perchance to mildew, and then, sad fate! to die alone—her fragrance wasted, and her life uncrowned!

The shades of twilight were gathering round, when the sound of a child's sobs struck on the heavy evening air—those long-drawn, heart-wrung utterances of a grief so profound and unavailing, that the memory of it in after years will still cause a pang.

The sobs came nearer, and with them a patter of childish footsteps on the gravel walk. It was the little maiden, who had sought this silent corner, to weep out her heart alone. Now and anon she would pause, as if exhausted through emotion; then, with a passionate cry of "Mother," a fresh paroxysm would ensue. Until, spent at length, she perforce grew calmer, and when the church bells in the distance rang the hour of prayer, lifted her head to listen.

The next moment she spied the rose, blushing, beautiful, and radiant, as if with a newborn hope.

"Take me, pluck me, dear little one!" the flower would fain have cried. "I can suffer with thee—I will dry thy tears."

And, as if in answer to this unspoken petition, the little girl advanced, and stooped to inhale the rich aroma, sweeter and more potent than in her brief existence she had ever known.

"Mother loves roses," the child whispered to herself. "I will take her this one, and perhaps it will make her well."

So she stretched out her hand and pulled at the rose, until the stalk snapped, and the flower was severed from the tree.

Then a strange tremor ran through the sap of the rose. She glowed and thrilled in the child's warm clasp, though she knew that her own life was over. But before her lay a vision of great possibilities, for her act of self-renunciation was begun, and she was willing to give herself for another. Yes, she was fading, and would soon fade faster, but the precious perfume remained, and the rose was persuaded that this essential part of her being would never die.

A splash of water came to relieve her faintness, which she at first mistook for dew. But presently she knew it to be a tear-drop, which had fallen from the violet eyes so wistfully fixed upon her.

Then the little maiden went back to the house, and sped up the stairs to her mother's darkened room. She entered on tiptoe, and, gaining the bed, softly laid down the rose on the pillow—close to the girlish face so white, and wan, and sorrowful.

The sufferer's eyelids flickered in her state of semi-consciousness. She had not heard her child approach, though she at once became aware of the presence of the rose. And, as the flower exhaled her life-giving essence, memory bore her back to that idyllic Roseland, where the roses never lose their freshness, but blow for ever, with a perennial bloom. It was there she had first met her soldier-husband, when, in the vicarage garden that was her home, he had asked her for a rose. Life since that moment had grown real and earnest, sanctified and complete. It was not until he left her to fight for his Queen and country that she feared lest her time of roses should have passed away. And it was to this wearing suspense concerning his fate, that the illness was due which had prostrated her.

But now she dreams, as the rose's exhalation penetrates both heart and brain, that she is back in Roseland again. Her loved one is with her; she feels his warm breath on her cheek, and listens once more to his tender words. It was the scent of the rose that had brought her so much happiness, and though the rose thirsted for water in vain, not a single sigh of complaint escaped her

"So she stretched out her hand and pulled at the rose."

When the trained nurse, who had been watching, saw that her patient was asleep, she wandered out into the garden. Then the child knelt down by the bedside, and repeated all the prayers that her mother had ever taught her.

Through the open window could be heard, in the distance, the wondrous trill of the nightingale. And the rose knew that, as he had come to sing a love song at her birth, so had he returned to chant a dirge over her untimely end.

In her sleep, the invalid hovered between life and death. Yet if her dreams were sweet, how much sweeter was the reality which awakened her!

"Father—dear father!" was the jubilant cry of the little maid, when she was lifted from the ground by a pair of strong arms, which her childish instinct told her could only belong to one.

A kiss upon her lips, and the girl-wife opened her eyes, to behold the face she loved best bending tenderly over her. Health and hope came stealing gently through her veins, for the shock of a great gladness had galvanised her back to life, and the dread borderland was left behind.

"Don't be afraid, dear," she whispered in the wish to calm his fears. "Your return is not too sudden: it was the rose that told me you were coming."

Then she raised the rose, all pale and parched, and, after pressing it to her lips, held it against those of her hero, who kissed it in his turn.

So the heart of the rose rejoiced, and passed away into Roseland, whence it came. But the withered husk of the flower was consigned to a secret drawer, where it is still preserved, by those whose Roseland she had restored to them, as a most precious relic of the past.

SHORT ARROWS

WORD AND WORK IN THE MASTER'S NAME.

OUR CHRISTMAS DOUBLE NUMBER.

THE December number of THE QUIVER will, as in past years, be a double Christmas number, for which several special features have been arranged. First and foremost among these features we would place the Presentation Plate, which consists of a handsome Rembrandt photogravure of the great picture by Mr. W. Q. Orchardson, R.A., entitled "Her Mother's Voice," which is now in the National Gallery of British Art. The painting is reproduced in a large size for framing, and will, no doubt, be a welcome addition to many homes. The number will also contain four other Rembrandt photogravure plates, entitled respectively, "A Yuletide Carol," by Percy Tarrant; "In Time of Trouble," by Edward S. Harper; "Christmas Morning," by Percy Tarrant; and "Charity," by Walter Langley, R.I.

(Photo: Elliott and Fry, Baker Street, W.)

MR. W. Q. ORCHARDSON, R.A.

(The painter of "HER MOTHER'S VOICE.")

New Stories.

In addition to instalments of the two serial stories which we begin in the present number, there will be found in our December issue an enthralling Christmas novel of one volume length, entitled "The Hill of Difficulty," written especially for this magazine by Mrs. C. E. C. Weigall, whose work is familiar to every reader of THE QUIVER, and illustrated by Sydney Cowell in a series of full-page plates. Short stories will be contributed by Morice Gerard, Scott Graham, G. E. Farrow, and other well-known writers.

Other Features.

Archdeacon Basil Wilberforce writes on "Why I am an Abstainer," and a seasonable devotional paper is contributed by the Rev. Alexander McLaren, D.D., while Sir Frederick Bridge sends a new musical setting of a favourite Christmas hymn. The Dean of Gloucester contributes the first of a series of articles on "The Makers of Modern Christianity," the subject of his paper being "St. Jerome the Scholar." There is a paper on Mr. Andrew Carnegie and "The Secret of his Success"; and, while Mr. Frederick Dolman writes on "Christmas in Recent Art," Mrs. S. A. Tooley takes us "Round the World with Santa Claus."

"The Quiver" Series.

WE draw the special attention of our readers to the announcement in our advertisement pages of this issue of the first two volumes in "THE QUIVER Series," which it is intended to associate very closely with this magazine, and which is to consist of works which will appeal particularly to those among whom THE QUIVER circulates. "The Life and Work of the Redeemer" and Dr. Cunningham Geikie's "The Holy Land and the Bible" open the series, and the price at which the volumes are issued is one which brings them within the reach of every QUIVER reader.

A Bishop's Chair.

THE pending resignation of the Bishop of Manchester gives point to the accompanying photograph, which shows the beautiful carved oak chair presented to Mellor Church, Lancashire, by Mr. R. A. Yerburgh, M.P., the lord of the manor. The chair, besides the Bishop's mitre in the centre, bears two full-length figures, excellent likenesses, of the late Bishop Fraser of Manchester and the present Bishop, who is just about to resign.

THE BISHOP'S CHAIR.
(Beautifully carved oak chair with figures of two bishops.)

"Trespassers will be Prosecuted."

PROBABLY this is only a builder's formality, but it always strikes us as a singularly incongruous motto to put up outside any house of God which is nearing completion. It especially jarred upon us during a country walk on an evening of last summer. It was Sunday night, and the crude, staring placard seemed harshly out of tune with the prodigal bounty of nature, the green boughs bending over us, the honeysuckle in the hedges, and the holy Sabbath calm. It was the Greek philosopher who graved above the portico of his temple, "Let no uneducated person enter"; but it was Someone greater Who said, "Come unto Me."

Search the Scriptures.

WE Protestants can never be too thankful for the blessings of an "open Bible," and we are always encouraged in freest private access to the Word of God. There is no excuse amongst us for the lamentable and ludicrous ignorance which prevails where the Bible is practically a sealed book to the laity. It would be about the middle of the eighteenth century that Dr. Johnson told Boswell he had met an Italian gentleman in London, of distinction and education, who had observed to him, "We have in our [Romish] service a prayer called the Pater Noster, which is a very fine composition. I wonder who is the author of it?" We cull an illustration, apparently authentic, from The Evangelical Magazine for 1807. A "professor of the Gospel" and his family were driven, by reason of a fire which nearly destroyed the town of Chudleigh, to take shelter in a farmhouse, the master of which was a Roman Catholic. To comfort his distressed visitor, the farmer kindly bade him remember what the Bible said about Hercules telling a waggoner, who was in difficulties, to put his shoulder to the wheel and push, and promising that if he then failed to get the team along he would help him. "My dear," said the hostess, who was a Protestant, "that tale of yours is not in the Bible." "Yes," replied the consoler, "it is in Isaiah or Jeremiah—I don't know which." R. L. Stevenson, in his "Vailima Letters," describes how two Samoan Roman Catholic priests endeavoured to entertain him during a call, in no very reverent manner, with details of the Gospel stories, which they evidently supposed would have the interest of the absolutely unknown. We happened once ourselves to be under the care of an Irish manservant, who was certainly not remarkable for his knowledge of the Scriptures. "When I was young," he once said to us, "I attended a gentleman through Palestine, and we stayed at —— and ——" (mentioning two of the best-known scenes of New Testament history). "If I had known then what happened there as I do now" (this with conscious pride), "I should have taken a deal more notice of things than I did." Again let us Protestants be grateful for our scriptural privileges, and avail ourselves of them to the full. Without the Bible every soul must remain starved and stunted, and no nation has ever continued stable and great.

"The Quiver" Heroes' Fund.

THE latest act for recognition by THE QUIVER Heroes' Fund comes from Preston, where, on the night of August 1st, Richard Young heard cries proceeding from a house near his own on Mill Hill. When he reached the place he found that a quantity of clothes had caught fire, and that the kitchen was filled with smoke so suffocating that, to make a way into the place, Young had to crawl on his hands and knees. In the kitchen had been left a five months' old baby, in a cradle near the fireplace, and some of the burning clothes had actually fallen on to the little one before he reached it and carried it outside. Entering the house again, he went upstairs and rescued another child, aged eighteen months, and made his escape with it by breaking the bedroom window. The little baby was so badly burned that it subsequently succumbed to its injuries, but the older child was none the worse for the adventure. This case having been reported to the Editor of The Quiver, investigations were kindly undertaken on the spot by the local authorities, and when it was decided to present the silver medal of The Quiver Heroes' Fund to Richard Young, Mr. Alderman Greenwood, the Mayor of Preston, was good enough to make the presentation at the police court on the morning of August 28.

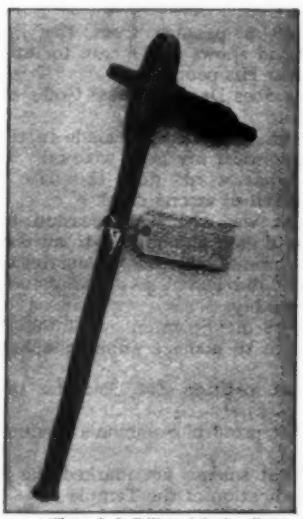
A Hint from the Pearl.

When our Lord compared the Kingdom of Heaven to a jewel so lovely as a pearl, did He perhaps intend to express the beauty, as well as the preciousness, of real religion? If so, there are many Christians who might add the virtue of winsomeness to their other undoubted merits. It is not by sourness of disposition that we shall commend the Gospel we profess. Let us not melt our pearl, as Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, is said to have done when she drank a health to Antony—in vinegar.

"It will Spoil the Congregations."



When an observation such as this is made to a minister in connection with the fact that, owing to alterations, the organ cannot be played for a few Sundays, it sets him sadly wondering what (if his friend's supposition be a sound one) can be the precise value of the worship which some people profess to render to Almighty God. Do we come to church or chapel to get the same æsthetic delights from music (only more cheaply) that we should expect in a concert room, or do we come to offer to our Creator the best that we can of ourselves—our attention, our prayers, our praise, our alms—because we feel that we love Him, and that we owe Him all? So far as music has cost love, labour, genius, money, it may worthily be presented to the gracious Giver of good; but so far as it is merely intended to tickle our own ears and feed our selfishness, it is worse than sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal. The most passionate lover of music, whose heart is right in the sight of God, has never been kept away from His house because the organ has not been played. A congregation of true worshippers is never "spoilt."

The Cross that Conquers

In one of the letters which he wrote home during his American tour last summer the Rev. R. J. Campbell describes his visit to Plymouth Rock, the spot where the Pilgrim Fathers landed. He reminds us how during the bitter cold and hardships of the first winter in New England about half died, within six months, of the one hundred and one pilgrims who had come out in the Mayflower. Those who survived left the graves of their comrades levelled and unmarked, so that the Indians might not guess how busy death had been in their brave little company. As we look at Mr. Campbell's pathetic picture we reflect on the mighty and stalwart nation into which those few half-starved survivors have grown, and how the Indians, who were such formidable adversaries, are a well-nigh vanished race. It was the faith brought by those poor, persecuted pioneers from our inhospitable shores which gave them a heritage in the land of their adoption, and which is the most potent factor in progress and civilisation. Those fifty graves were the first outpost of victory, as a valley of dry bones may become "an exceeding great army."

A Slight Distinction.

A certain society, which is doing an excellent work amongst girls, has, as one of its professed objects, the "promotion of temperance and thrift." "Do you know what 'thrift' means?" asked a lady lately of a class of young maidens who are in training to be admitted as members. For some time there was no answer. At last a diffident hand was put up. "Well, Maggie, what is thrift?" "Please, miss, taking that as doesn't belong to you!" The words "thrift" and "theft" are certainly somewhat alike; but the ingenuous damsel's reply warns a teacher not to take too much for granted, for there are many "locked doors to knowledge."

(Photo: S. B. Hollings, Calverley, Yorks.)

THE AXE THAT KILLED JAMES CHALMERS.

The Martyrdom of James Chalmers.

A painful interest attaches to the photograph of an axe which we reproduce with this note. The weapon was given to Captain Mackay, the harbour master at Brisbane, by Captain Harvey, with the explanation that it was found by the punitive expedition which visited New Guinea after the murder of Mr. Chalmers, and with it were a skull, some bones, and some remnants of clothing, which were identified as those of Mr. Chalmers. With the aid of an interpreter it was ascertained that the axe belonged to the chief Turotere, the actual murderer, and beyond a doubt must have played its part in the tragedy of 1901.

As Sand upon Shore.

AT a favourite seaside resort it had been a golden afternoon; the blue waves were dimpling in the July sunshine, and scores of little castle-builders, with their spades and buckets, and grand sand bulwarks, and large stones fetched by big brothers from the beach, had been particularly busy. Really, two or three of the turreted and moated mansions looked quite imposing structures. But this day the small labourers were not fortunate with the tide, and lost the fun of demolition. Heavy eyelids had drooped over tired eyes before the grey and ghostly waters (for the weather changed at nightfall) crept up to work their inexorable will. We wandered to the shore, and beneath sombre and sullen skies, while a keen wind blew and the darkness deepened, we watched castle after castle surrounded, dashed down, overwhelmed—and the flood rolled on. And as we gazed at what a few hours before had been the bright playground of happy children, we thought how our works, which seem so stable, and are sometimes decked with such rainbow hues, would soon vanish and be forgotten. And Time, "like an ever-rolling stream," flows on.

"THE QUIVER" FUNDS.

THE following is a list of contributions received from August 25th, 1903, up to and including September 29th, 1903. Subscriptions received after this date will be acknowledged next month:—

For "The Quiver" Waifs' Fund: "A Working Woman," 10s.

For Dr. Barnardo's Homes: "Bradford," £1, 17s. 6d., 10s., 5s., 3s. 6d., £1 2s. 6d.; "Omnerwood," £1; L. R., Newcastle, 5s. The following amounts have been sent direct:—"Gracedieu," £1; "Lochalsh," 5s.

For The Children's Country Holidays Fund: G. J. T., Rochester, 10s.; B. M. P., 5s.; Alice Bush, Clifton, 5s.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

BASED ON THE INTERNATIONAL SERIES OF LESSONS.

QUESTIONS.

1. Quote a passage from the Psalms in which David shows God's care for and watchfulness over His people.

2. How does David express God's care of us in the hour of death?

3. To what is reference made in the words, "Thou anointest my head with oil"?

4. In what words does the wise man set forth the evil of strong drink?

5. What was the last occasion on which King David gave an audience to all the princes, nobles, captains, etc., in his dominions?

6. What did David give to Solomon at this great assembly?

7. Where did Solomon go at the beginning of his reign to make a public thanksgiving to God?

8. What petition did Solomon present to God?

9. What proof of Solomon's wisdom is mentioned?

10. What solemn act marked the beginning of the dedication of the Temple?

11. In what way did God show His acceptance of the Temple as His sanctuary?

12. What portion of Solomon's prayer at the dedication of the Temple was long after remembered by the Jews?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 1212.

133. "I acknowledge my transgressions, and my sin is ever before me." (Psalm li. 3.)

134. To the ceremony of cleansing a leper. Before the leper could return to his home the priest took a bird and killed it, and with a bunch of hyssop sprinkled the blood upon the leper as a sign of his cleansing. (Psalm li. 7; Lev. xiv. 1; etc.)

135. That God would altogether forsake him, as is expressed in the words, "Cast me not away from Thy presence, and take not Thy Holy Spirit from me." (Psalm li. 11.)

136. Psalm xxxii. 3.

137. To the cities of refuge, to which the offender might fly and be hidden from his enemies. (Psalm xxxii. 7; Num. xxxv. 6.)

138. Psalm xxxii. 10.

139. "Absalom stole the hearts of the men of Israel." (2 Sam. xv. 6.)

140. He got David's permission to go to Hebron with a bodyguard, under the pretence of fulfilling a vow, and there he had himself proclaimed king. (2 Sam. xv. 8–11.)

141. Ahithophel, one of the chief counsellors of David, of whom it is said his counsel was "as if a man had inquired at the oracle of God." (2 Sam. xv. 12, and xvi. 23.)

142. In the wood of Ephraim, which was a source of great danger to Absalom's army. (2 Sam. xviii. 6, 7.)

143. Absalom was slain while hanging by his hair from one of the trees, and his followers then fled. (2 Sam. xviii. 9, 14, 15, and xix. 8.)

144. The greatness of a father's love, even for a rebellious son. (2 Sam. xviii. 33 and xix. 4.)

XUM

A YULE TIDE CAROL.

FROM THE PICTURE BY
PERCY TARRANT, BY PERMISSION OF
C. W. FAULKNER & CO., GOLDEN LANE, E.C.,
THE OWNERS OF THE COPYRIGHT.

XUM

By Sarah A. Tooley.

"Ho! Santa Claus—our own since Infancy—
Most tangible of all the gods that be!—
As first we scampered to thee—now as then,
Take us as children to thy heart again."

SANTA CLAUS is undoubtedly the fleetest traveller in history, and as the children's patron saint he is careful not to risk his reputation by disappointing his devotees. It would be dreadful to contemplate the distress occasioned if Santa were to fall over a precipice while crossing the Alps, lose his way on the western prairies, be stopped by icebergs in the North Sea, overcome with heat in Australia, or, worst of all, turn lazy. But he has never failed us yet, so we may accompany him on tour with confidence.

It has not been ascertained, I believe, where Santa Claus reposes after his supreme effort at Christmas, and consequently we do not know where he starts on his beneficent round of the globe. He himself, however, began life in the fourth century as a model baby, named Nicholas, who was so pious that he refused on fast days to take the nourishment offered by his mother. As might be expected, he became a great Bishop. He ruled over the diocese of Myra, and eventually was canonised as Saint Nicholas, the "patron saint" of children and sailors. Hundreds of churches were erected to his memory, and his day, December 6th, has continued to be observed in various countries. His name was gradually corrupted into Santa Claus.

The connection of St. Nicholas with the giving of surprise presents began in this way, according to legendary history: A nobleman of Padua, unable to provide marriage portions for his three daughters, was about to adopt a desperate course, when St. Nicholas went secretly to the house one night and threw a purse of gold through an open window. It fell at the feet of the father, who straightway used it to portion his eldest daughter. St. Nicholas repeated similar gifts on two successive nights to provide dowries for the other daughters, but on the last visit the nobleman caught the mysterious benefactor by his garment. St. Nicholas, however, made him promise that he would not reveal his identity to anyone—hence the secresy which has surrounded the good saint even to the present day.

"THE YOUNG QUEEN . . . DELIGHTS TO AID SANTA CLAUS IN SELECTING PRESENTS FOR THE CHILDREN ABOUT THE COURT."

A further quaint legend is told concerning his compassion for the young. In the course of his travels St. Nicholas came to the house of a wicked butcher-man who had murdered three innocent boys, and kept them in pickle for seven years. When the saint made his appearance the butcher offered him refreshment.

"Will you have of ham a slice?
I will not, for it is not nice!"

* * * * *

"Of this veal you'll take a bit?
No! I do not relish it!

* * * * *

"Give me of the little swine,
For seven long years have lain in brine!"

The butcher turned white and fled, and the saint, discovering the pickle tub, waved the lid open and raised the murdered children to life. In the Bodleian Library at Oxford is preserved a fifteenth-century illuminated manuscript which has a figure of St. Nicholas in ecclesiastical robes, holding a crozier in the left hand, while he extends the right in benediction to three boys who are seen rising from a tub at his side.

It was probably on account of his popularity with sailors that the cult of St. Nicholas became so firmly rooted in the maritime country of the Netherlands. He is the only saint who has survived the Reformation in Holland, so we will imagine Santa Claus to begin his tour in that little kingdom. On St. Nicholas Eve, December 5th, every Dutch child prepares for his coming. They know that during the night he will arrive on his white horse, bringing presents for all good children, so they put their shoes by the chimney, which he is believed to descend and strew carrots upon the hearth. In the morning the carrots are gone, having, of course, been consumed by the white horse of Santa Claus, and the shoes are filled with presents. Naughty children only get a birch-rod, and Santa has been kept informed of their behaviour by his black boy—a very unpleasant person who sneaks in the chimney. A famous painting by Jan Steen, entitled San Nicolaas, illustrating this custom, is in the State Museum at Amsterdam. In the foreground the good child is shown holding a figure of Santa Claus in its arms and surrounded by gingerbreads and good things, while the naughty boy stands in the background crying because there is only a birch-rod in his shoe, and the maid is holding it up in derision.

St. Nicholas Day is devoted to honouring Santa by all kinds of merrymaking, and is practically the Dutch Christmas festival. True, both December 25th and 26th are called Christmas Days in Holland, but they are observed as Sundays. The young Queen from her earliest years has kept St. Nicholas Day in good old style, and delights to aid Santa Claus in selecting presents for children about the court. Her Majesty also keeps December 25th, with all its popular customs.

In the neighbouring kingdom of Belgium Santa Claus has a busy time, and it is said that the Christmas stocking first originated there. In Brussels, as St. Nicholas Day approaches, the confectioners' windows present row upon row of boy bishops in chocolate. Many are made in a block, representing St. Nicholas in mitre and robes, blessing the three little children whom he is supposed to have raised to life, as in the picture at Oxford already referred to. No matter what other presents Santa puts into the stockings or shoes of the Flemish children, they are not satisfied unless they get a chocolate bishop!

In Germany St. Nicholas or Santa Claus visits each home as Christmas approaches to inquire into the behaviour of the children. He is sometimes, according to the old custom, accompanied by his Knicht Klaubauf, personated by someone who knows the children. The good are rewarded with sweetmeats and asked what presents the Christkind shall bring them; while the naughty are put into the pannier of Klaubauf and carried away to punishment. From time immemorial German parents have threatened refractory children that St. Nicholas would have them carried off at the end of the year. In North Germany bands of young men used to go from house to house in December to carry off the naughty children, but the shrieks and terror occasioned became a scandal, and the authorities of Munich and other places had to forbid the practice. Santa Claus was very pleased at this, for he would much rather be regarded as the Christkind who comes to fill the stockings which the children place for his gifts. It is he, too, who inspires the delightful family gatherings which take place in every home of the Fatherland on Christmas Eve, when the children dance round the magic tree with its coloured lights and glittering presents. In some parts of the country tables are spread and lights left burning during the entire night of Christmas Eve, so that the Virgin Mary and the Christkind, who pass through the house when everybody is asleep, may find refreshment.

But Santa cannot stay longer in Germany, for he has to assist at similar functions in Denmark and Scandinavia. There he becomes the Woden god of Norse mythology, a cheery, hearty old Father Christmas, who showers gifts from firs and other evergreens upon his favourite children who pass beneath. However, as it is not always pleasant to walk in the woods in December, Santa Claus visits the young fir trees on the parlour tables on Christmas Eve and showers his gifts from them. King Christian always commands Santa Claus to be present in the Knights' Hall of the Amalienborg Palace, Copenhagen, on Christmas Eve, to distribute gifts to an eager throng of little royalties. In the country houses of Denmark the children put sheaves of corn on the gables for the refreshment of Santa Claus's white horse.

In Sweden, too, there is a great deal of surprise present-giving, and, of course, it was Santa Claus who inspired the custom of putting sheaves of corn on posts outside the farmhouses for the birds, because they cannot conveniently hang up their stockings.

"IN THE COUNTRY HOUSES OF DENMARK THE CHILDREN PUT SHEAVES OF CORN ON THE GABLES FOR THE REFRESHMENT OF SANTA CLAUS'S WHITE HORSE."

Our fleet-footed traveller does not spend long in Russia. He finds it an awkward country to travel in, and there is so much fuss about passports. The Emperor's little daughters are well acquainted with him, and so are a few other children in St. Petersburg, who look for his coming on their Christmas Eve, which is January 6th (Old Style), according to the usage of the Greek Church. But the majority of children in Russia know nothing of his delightful surprise visits. If Santa Claus went amongst the peasantry he might be suspected of treason, and get whisked off to Siberia in the middle of Christmas night with his parcels for the remainder of the globe undelivered!

Santa Claus is generally supposed to be a genial old bachelor, but in Switzerland he becomes a married man. As he goes his rounds in the land of William Tell distributing his gifts on St. Nicholas Eve he is accompanied by his wife "Lucy," in peasant dress, with high cap and short petticoats, who carries presents for the girls while he takes charge of those for the boys. Switzerland is, I believe, the only country in which Santa Claus divides the honours of almoner in chief.

A BELGIAN CHOCOLATE CHRISTMAS BISHOP.
(By permission of Vve. Meyers et Fils, Brussels.)

In Austria a curious custom survives in the south, of young men going from house to house personating St. Nicholas to examine the children in their catechism and award gifts according to merit. On going to bed the children place baskets or dishes on the window-sills for his gifts. In Austria, too, Santa Claus suffers a diabolical association. He is supposed to bring a saintly figure of himself to good children, while to the naughty he gives a demon, or krampus. But such is the depravity of human nature that many boys and girls prefer to get a krampus. Saints and angels are good and prosaic, but the toy imps are delightfully grotesque. The finest ones are as big as a child of eight, and are covered with black fur. Their faces are hideous, with red lips, and red tongues hanging out of the mouth, and they carry birch-rods in their hands and a further supply in a basket on their back. Early in December the St. Nicholas markets open in Vienna, and the stalls are covered with figures of angels and krampuses. A kind of gingerbread, called "liver" cake, is also a speciality of the season.

Nowhere does Santa have a gayer time than in France. At midnight on Christmas Eve, when all the clocks of Paris are ringing chimes, and friends and neighbours exchange greetings as they leave the churches after the midnight service, he comes to every house as the little Jesus, Jean Noël, and fills those myriads of shoes, some of them dainty bottines, others only poor little sabots, which the children place on the mantelshelves or on the hearths. In every home the grand Christmas supper or réveillon is served on tables covered with wax lights, flowers, and bonbons; even the poorest manage to have a festive meal. After it is over, and the games are done and the guests departed, Jean Noël descends the chimney, and with his luminous hand fills the children's slippers with bonbons. The New Year, too, is a busy time for Santa in Paris, for he becomes the good old "January," who peeps out of the bags of sweetmeats which everybody gives to everybody, presides over the wondrous toy fair in the boulevards, and slips presents under the children's pillows at night.

We must, however, accompany Santa into provincial France to see him engaged in the older and more picturesque as well as superstitious customs. In remote parts of Brittany and Berry, the great Yule log cosse de nau is still dragged to the house-place with mirth and song. According to tradition, it should be cut from an oak at midnight, or it may be a trunk of olive wood. On Christmas Eve it is placed in the great open fireplace, sprinkled with holy water by the head of the house, or by the youngest member of the family, and as the village bell rings the midnight hour, is lighted with a brand saved from last year's log. Then the children retire to a corner and repeat their prayers. Meantime loving hands place presents and packets of bonbons on the two extremities of the great log, and then the children are called to see what Jean Noël has brought them. A prettier scene cannot be imagined than the little ones clustering around the hearth in the light of the blazing log, dancing with delight over the Christ-Child's gifts. Games are played and Noëls sung, and so the Cri de Joie is celebrated. To-day it is becoming the fashion to hang the gifts on little trees, arbres de Nau, standing on the hearth, but this lacks the picturesqueness of the old custom of hanging them on the ends of the Yule log.

THE AUSTRIAN "KRAMPUS"

"AS HE GOES HIS ROUNDS IN THE LAND OF WILLIAM TELL DISTRIBUTING HIS GIFTS ON ST. NICHOLAS EVE HE IS ACCOMPANIED BY HIS WIFE 'LUCY.'"

In Rome Santa Claus places his gifts in an urn, from which the children draw presents by lots, while the Christmas log burns brightly on the hearth. In olden days, and still in some of the country districts of Italy, Santa Claus is an old woman called Befana, who may visit every child on the eve of January 6th, which is the old style New Year's Day, rewards the good with presents, and carries off the naughty children to her subterraneous dwelling. At midnight the walls of the houses turn into cream cheese to admit Befana, and after her departure they return to stone. The little Italian children address all kinds of letters and petitions to Befana, and while they are asleep on the eventful eve, parents steal to the bedside and there place the desired presents. The next day all classes exchange gifts, and there is much merry-making. Long ago the Cardinals came to the Pope's palace to celebrate Befana, when latto was played, and wine and dainties put up for prizes.

In the Italian villages, too, the children

listen at Christmas time for the pifferari, wandering musicians, who play the old melody which—so the people tell us—the shepherds sang on their way to Bethlehem. The air has never been written in musical notation, but handed down from one pifferari to another.

The grandees of Spain—another home of superstition—are not superior to our good friend Santa Claus, and December 24th is observed as a half-holiday to prepare for Pascuras de Navidad. On the following day Christmas boxes are freely given, but no Spanish child would be satisfied unless Santa Claus bestowed some mazapan, an almond paste which is sold in great quantities in the streets of Madrid. The young King always had a magnificent golden manger in the palace on Christmas afternoon, when the sons of the nobles came to pay their homage to his youthful Majesty, dancing round the manger playing castanets and tambourines. Santa, too, was busy in the palace distributing gifts from the Christmas tree.

Santa Claus, like the Christmas tree, is a comparatively modern institution in our own country, and I am inclined to think that he was popularised here by that charming American story-writer Miss Wetherell. In the 'fifties and 'sixties all the young people were reading "The Wide, Wide World" and "The Christmas Stocking," in which books the mysterious visits of Santa Claus are described. It was about that period that English children first began to hang up their stockings on Christmas Eve, and the custom has gone on increasing until Santa Claus is looked for in every household. He has given his name to a society for providing gifts for poor invalid children, and he appears in character at all our great hospitals to shower books and presents upon the suffering ones. Still, Santa Claus is only our Old Father Christmas under a German name. With his white beard, holly-crowned head, and flowing robes, he is in appearance the same beneficent character who appeared in the Mummers' Plays in mediæval times to distribute Christmas cheer. I have seen an old representation of him riding a goat. He has the time-honoured hoary head, with a holly wreath. In one outstretched hand he carries the wassail bowl, in the other a loaded basket, while from under his arm peeps the face of a little child. However, we are quite prepared to welcome Father Christmas under his newer name of Santa Claus.

"THE CHILDREN ARE CALLED TO SEE WHAT JEAN NOËL HAS BROUGHT THEM"

We must tarry no longer in Europe, but cross the Atlantic, and there we shall find that the Dutch colonisers of New York firmly established the children's friend, San Nicolaas. Even Puritan New England, with its rooted antipathy to

"HE APPEARS IN CHARACTER AT ALL OUR GREAT HOSPITALS."

"saints," could not resist Santa Claus, and opened its heart to receive him. So each Christmas Eve he harnesses his reindeer, loads up his sleigh, wraps himself up to the eyes in buffalo skins, and visits young America. He finds a perplexing postbag awaiting him, for his devotees in that country have a decided way of asserting their wants, and send him copious epistles. New York postmen have a perplexing time trying to deliver letters to "Mister Santar Clause, No. 1, Air Street," or at the "North Pole, Siberia," or the "Green Mts., Vermont," where the Christmas trees come from.

In the Southern States Father Christmas has reigned since the days of Washington. The woolly-headed piccaninnies know him well, and come to the houses of the white folks early in the morning, crying, "Chrismus gif'! Chrismus gif'!" and are rewarded with presents. All day long they scamper about, letting off crackers and blowing rams' horns, until Father Christmas threatens that there will be no more "gifs" if they make so much noise.

In Canada the children listen for the sleigh bells of Santa Claus as he comes over the snow-bound roads with his cargo of good things. In lonely farmhouses of the distant prairie, stockings are hung in the inglenooks ready for his coming; sometimes he gets delayed, like the English mail, and the stockings are kept waiting until the New Year. In the French settlements by the St. Lawrence River, Santa becomes Jean Noel, who rains bonbons on the hearth under the arms of the blazing log.

When he comes to the Tropics Santa would gladly throw off his furs and greatcoat and don "ducks" and a panama, but the children of Australia and New Zealand will not hear of this. Though it is true they keep Christmas camping out, having boating parties on the river, or going expeditions into the country, still they must have the same old Santa on Christmas Eve who filled the stockings of their parents in the Homeland.

IN THE STRAITS OF TIME

A ROMANCE OF OLD FRANCE.

By Christopher Hare, Author of "Dreams to Sell," Etc.

SYNOPSIS OF CHAPTERS I.–III.

The story opens in the reign of Louis XIV. Two young girls of noble birth—Yvonne Elisabeth de la Féronniere, of a Huguenot family, and Gabrielle de Beaumanoir, who is betrothed to the Duc de Maillebois—are being educated at the famous Abbaye aux Bois. In the midst of a game with their companions they outpass the convent grounds, and suddenly find themselves adrift in the streets of Paris.

CHAPTER IV.

IN the very heart of Paris, Gabrielle and Yvonne were like wanderers in a strange land. They had known no other entrance to the Abbaye aux Bois than the approach through the great courtyard, from the Rue de Sève, and the lane at the back of the grounds was to them an undiscovered country.

When by their own rash deed they found themselves outside the protecting walls, their only impulse was to hurry on and escape from those dreaded footsteps behind them, never doubting that a few minutes would bring them safely home. Clasping each other by the hand, with throbbing hearts and downcast eyes, they pressed forward; but in their ignorance they took the wrong turning, and went farther astray. To these cloistered children every unwonted sound was a menace. Each passer-by might be a deadly foe, as they realised at length that their startled flight was taking them at every step farther from their sanctuary.

In that darkest moment, suddenly there was a clashing of the great cathedral bells, and straightway a distant belfry clock chimed the hour. It was four o'clock—the hour for vespers in the quiet convent chapel—and the girls looked at each other with the dread conviction on their pale, awestruck faces that now their absence must be discovered, and all hope was at an end. They had hurried blindly on until they found themselves in a dark, narrow street, with houses stooping forward across the way overhead, and almost touching at the eaves. Over the rough cobblestones men and women passed backwards and forwards, seemingly bent only on their own business or pleasure, and quite unconscious that heaven and earth had been shaken to their very foundations.

A dim feeling of relief began to creep over the two friends. In that motley crowd there might be some kindly soul who would take pity on them, and they began to look about for someone who would inspire enough confidence for them to dare ask the way back to the convent. Just then a mongrel cur from the gutter smelt at them suspiciously, and, as Gabrielle drew aside in haste, her hood fell back. Some feast-day revellers, lounging at the door of a cabaret, caught sight of the fair young face, and rushed forward, with unseemly jests, to bar her advance. The terrified girls, feeling that all their worst fears were realised, did not venture to retreat or cry out, only clung together in frozen fear and dumb despair.

XUM

But in the hour of their deepest need a friend was at hand. A tall, venerable-looking man, with white hair, clad in a sober suit of black, was passing on the other side. At a glance he saw their peril, and, with ready presence of mind, crossed the narrow street and took Gabrielle by the hand.

"Come, my children; 'tis well I met you. We will go home," he quietly remarked, as though they belonged to him. "Excuse me, Messieurs," he added, as he elbowed his way through the bullies, who, taken by surprise, let them pass, and a moment later were engaged in a noisy brawl amongst themselves.

"The terrified girls . . . only clung together in frozen fear and dumb despair."

Not a word was spoken for some minutes, as the girls hurried breathlessly on, trying to keep pace with the long steps of their protector. They were too much overwhelmed with fear and shame to offer any explanation, and started with fresh alarm when, in a low grave voice, he asked:

"Where are you two young girls bound for? Your friends ought to know that the streets of Paris are not safe for you!"

Yvonne could not restrain a little cry of surprise, for the voice and manner seemed strangely familiar to her. She took courage to look up. Ah, it was impossible to mistake that thin, deeply lined face, the sensitive mouth and mild eyes shadowy with thought. The sudden exquisite sense of relief was almost more than she could bear, as she found breath to cry aloud:

"Monsieur de la Forêt! Is it possible that you should have come to our rescue? And I never knew that you had left our dear Poitou! How are they all at Croizette? You know me, Monsieur le Pasteur?" she added eagerly, as she pushed back her hood and stood before him, impatient to be recognised.

The Huguenot minister looked earnestly at her, with ever-growing dismay.

"Can it indeed be Mademoiselle de la Féronniere? But this is no place for you, we cannot talk here," he added with anxious haste, as he noticed that passers-by were turning to look and listen. "Come to my lodging, Mesdemoiselles—it is close at hand—and tell me how I can serve you."

He led the way, and they followed a few steps down the street, then beneath a low archway into a barely furnished room, where an inkhorn on the table, and a few books with worn leather binding, bore witness to the habits of a scholar.

"There are friends of mine from Croisette, members of my flock in bygone days, who dwell here and are ever ready to receive me. Should you need help or advice at any time, you will always find a sure welcome from the André Migaults, 97, Rue des Sabatiers."

"I will remember; but, tell me, Monsieur, have you been long in Paris?"

"Not many days. I came here on a private mission, under the protection of Eleanore, Duchess of Brunswick, sister of the Duc d'Olbreuse, to see Madame de Maintenon on behalf of our persecuted brethren. She was brought up in our faith, and now, when we are threatened on all sides, her influence might be most precious."

"Have you seen her?" asked Yvonne eagerly.

"Yes; Madame granted me an audience only yesterday. She listened to me with much courtesy, spoke of our trials in the kindest and most sympathetic manner, and in the end dismissed me with vague regrets.

"Alas! there is no help there," he added with deep emotion, "for Madame owned that the King was set against us, and that she durst not speak in our favour. My chastisement is just. I came hither contrary to my better judgment, for what saith the Lord: 'Put not your trust in princes.'"

There was a moment's silence; then the old pastor spoke again with his wonted calm.

"Tell me, my child, how has time dealt with you since you were taken from us? We heard that you were placed by your guardian in the Abbaye aux Bois? Have you passed unscathed through the unreal, enervating atmosphere of convent life, amid all the allurements of an alien faith?"

"Ah, what can I say?" sighed Yvonne, and her eyes filled with tears as the memory of her past years rose up before her. "I seem to have been ever a looker-on, with no part of my own to play. It has been a time of deadness for my soul. I have lived on from day to day, with scarce a thought above this earth, absorbed in the routine of study and amusement, careless of my religion, careless of my God."

"My poor child! you judge yourself severely. Think how a flower springs up and blooms, all unconscious of its own growth. Trust me; you have but slept awhile under the watchful care of your Father in Heaven, who has never forgotten you. When He calls, you will awake, strong to do His will."

"Monsieur, she maligns herself!" exclaimed Gabrielle impulsively. "Everyone will tell you that she is a pattern to us all—so good and true, with never a thought of self. There is no one like her; and this adventure to-day, it was all my fault!"

"At least Mademoiselle has a warm friend," was the courteous reply. "But I am still in the dark. Tell me, what has brought you into the streets of Paris?"

It was Gabrielle who told the story from the beginning of their game, the great hunting party and its disastrous end, taking all the blame upon herself. She casually added that this piece of folly was the more unfortunate in her case, as she had recently been betrothed to the Duc de Maillebois.

Monsieur de la Forêt listened with a grave face.

"Mesdemoiselles, I fear this is no light matter. Even a childish frolic may have grave consequences, and by this time there must be great anxiety at the convent with regard to you. Gladly would I take you back myself, but I fear that I should be no welcome ambassador. Have you no friend of influence and position who would plead your cause with Madame l'Abbesse, and obtain her pardon for this rash escapade?"

"Why, surely yes!" cried Mademoiselle de Beaumanoir eagerly. "There is my sister, the Marquise de Chamans, whose hotel is in the Rue de Varennes, which cannot be very far off. She will take us home to the Abbaye aux Bois, and make our peace, if anyone can!"

"Then I perceive that we must not lose a moment in finding your sister," said the Huguenot pastor, in a tone of relief. "I will conduct you at once to her house. In a delicate matter of this nature a woman's tact is much to be desired."

The little group of anxious pilgrims set off without delay, and made their way through the narrow, crowded streets, until at length, after much wandering, they reached their destination.

The stately mansion of the Marquis stood back from the road, and was approached through great iron gates and a spacious courtyard. A carriage was drawn up on the shady side of the quadrangle, but in the absorbing anxiety of the moment no one took much notice of it. Under the arched portico stood a lacquey in blue and white livery, who watched the new arrivals with an insolent stare.

This was not the style of visitor he was accustomed to admit—this old man with his well-worn, sombre suit, not even relieved by orders or decorations; and the two girls in plain black gowns which a serving-maid would scorn to wear. Trudging on foot, too, dusty and travel-stained!

"Can I see Madame la Marquise de Chamans? Is she within?" asked the pastor, with quiet dignity.

"That's as may happen! If she is, I'll lay a pistole that Madame won't see you!" was the sneering reply.

But the man had presumed too far. Mademoiselle Gabrielle de Beaumanoir took a step forward, and turned upon him with an imperious tone and manner, which belied the outward humility of her school-girl attire. No convent training could make that daughter of a noble house forget that she was one of the ruling race, born to command, who for generations had looked upon their domestics and inferiors as the dust beneath their feet.

"How do you dare thus to answer a gentleman who does your mistress the honour of calling upon her? Trust me, she shall know of your insolence if you do not conduct us straight to her presence!"

The serving-man started at the voice, so like that of Madame; and it flashed upon him that this must be her young sister from the convent, who had come home with her only the other day. But he resented the sharp reproof, and resolved to be even with her yet. He remembered the visitor who was at that moment with his mistress, and felt that the game was in his hand.

In all great households every detail of the family history seems to be known at once by the merest scullion, and the man made a shrewd guess that there was something wrong here. With suspicious alacrity he made a cringing bow, and led the way into the lofty panelled hall, hung with coats of armour, where a knot of gorgeous footmen loitered about with unsuppressed yawns, or beguiled the time with petty games of chance, in mimicry of their betters. One or two looked up, with careless indifference, as the little party passed up the grand, polished staircase and through the first chamber, hung with rare old tapestry.

A sudden doubt assailed Gabrielle, for through the embrasure of a window she had caught sight of the carriage waiting in the quadrangle below. "Stay!" she exclaimed. "Is Madame la Marquise alone?"

"Madame receives to-day, and Monsieur le Duc de Maillebois is with her," replied the lacquey, as he advanced with alacrity to open the folding doors of the salon.

But the young girl was too quick for him.

"Then announce only Monsieur de la Forêt, Pasteur of Croisette. We will await him here." She spoke in a tone of command, and the man obeyed her, somewhat to his own surprise.

Madame de Chamans rose to meet her visitor; then stood wondering at the tall, venerable figure, a perfect stranger to her.

"Madame, I pray you to pardon my intrusion," he began; "but we have urgent need of your help."

Full of his own kindly purpose, the old man was undismayed by the sight of this young and beautiful woman, surrounded by all the magnificence, which seemed a meet setting for her. Yet he paused, slightly embarrassed by the presence of a third person, a gentleman past middle age, in elaborate court dress, who sat negligently leaning back in a great carved ebony chair, and raised his eye-glass to examine the new-comer.

"Would not, perchance, a letter have sufficed, Monsieur?" asked a clear, crisp voice, with a faint touch of haughtiness. "I presume that you appeal to me on behalf of some charitable work?"

"I do, indeed, venture to claim your charity, Madame la Marquise. Will you graciously permit me to tell you a short story?"

He did not quite understand what complications might have arisen, but his instinct told him that no diplomacy would avail like the simple unvarnished truth. There was a subtle charm about this Huguenot preacher, whose life was spent in the guidance of men and women, and whose delicate touch could finger the human heart-strings like those of a lute.

The great lady's interest awoke. She courteously signified her consent, and motioned him to a seat. But Monsieur de la Forêt preferred to stand, and thus he told his tale.

"It so chanced, Madame, that to-day being the name-day of Barnabas the Apostle, there was holiday at a great convent school In fantastic mimicry of life and sport, the young girls chose to perform a hunting scene, and selected two of their number to play the part of stags. These were fleet of foot and eager to win the game, in the course of which they came upon a gap in the high encircling walls of the garden, caused by the fall of a tree. Being closely pressed and only intent upon present escape, the foolish maidens gave no heed to consequences, and sprang down to the lane outside, in full assurance of returning when their pursuers had passed by."

Here Madame de Chamans interrupted with a startled exclamation, and gave a quick, anxious glance across the room at her companion. But in a moment she recovered herself, and awaited the end of the story with ill-concealed impatience.

"I regret to say that when these two young ladies found themselves without the wall they were startled to see that their return the same way was impossible, for the stone barrier was too high and steep to climb. The outside world was so strange and terrible to these cloistered maidens, that when they failed to make their voices heard by their companions they were utterly at a loss. Startled at the sound of passers-by, they hurried away in search of the convent gates, but not knowing which way to turn. So they wandered on, going further astray, when by good fortune I met them and——" He drew a long breath, and considered how far it was well to speak of Mademoiselle de la Féronniere's recognition.

Now all this time the door towards the antechamber had been left half open, and at the moment of Madame de Chaman's startled cry her glance had happened to rest on a little round mirror hung on the tapestried wall opposite. What was the pictured face that met her eyes? Surely it could not be—and yet, there was no doubt, those were the sparkling eyes, the clear-cut, delicate features of Gabrielle her sister!

In one flash her quick instinct had filled out and completed the whole adventure. She saw it all, and boldly decided at once on her own plan of action. When the story was finished, she rose from her seat with languid ease, and stretched out both hands towards her visitor.

"What a delicious escapade!" she laughed. "How can I thank you enough, dear Monsieur, for bringing the truants straight back to me?

"Come, my dears," she added, throwing open the door and going to meet the two girls, "do not play hide-and-seek any longer!"

Then lightly kissing her sister on both cheeks, graceful and self-possessed as ever, smiling she led her forward.

"Monsieur de Maillebois, you must be the judge. How shall we punish these naughty girls? Shall we send them to the Bastille?"

The Duke had risen with a deep bow, to meet the blushing Gabrielle.

"Indeed, Madame, the young ladies need all our sympathy and comforting assurances after this untoward adventure, for which their courage and high spirit was alone to blame!" was the chivalrous reply.

"Now, that is exactly what I shall tell Madame l'Abbesse when I take these children back to the convent, this minute!" cried Madame de Chamans, in supreme content. "And I will quote you, Monsieur!"

"But as Mademoiselle Gabrielle is here by this unlooked-for chance," he pleaded, "may she not first tell me her wishes with regard to the setting of her diamonds, about which, Madame, I came to consult you?" And he waved his hand towards the glittering jewels, spread out on the table by his side.

"Not to-day, Monsieur le Duc," was the decided reply. "We have the honour of wishing you good-evening." And Héloise swept a low curtsey.

"At least, Madame, you will favour me by making use of my equipage, which waits below in the courtyard?" was his humble petition. "I will return home on foot; but first, I too would express my deepest gratitude to this gentleman for his timely aid."

He turned towards Monsieur de la Forêt, who had taken the opportunity of having a few last words with Yvonne. Then, with mutual compliments, the whole party took leave together, swept away by the impetuous haste of their hostess.

As she drove back to the Abbaye aux Bois, with the two girls, she scolded them well herself, and made them understand the full enormity of their behaviour. But she was as good as her word, and pleaded their cause so cleverly that Madame l'Abbesse, overwhelmed with joy and relief at the safe return of her

"'Monsieur de Maillebois, you must be the judge.'" lost children, was disposed to receive them with pity rather than blame.

In the convent itself Gabrielle and Yvonne became quite heroines of romance. Their escapade was a nine days' wonder, and then slowly faded away into dim tradition, to be spoken of with bated breath in long after years.

CHAPTER V.

AT THE CHÂTEAU DE BEAUMANOIR.

IT was more than two months later—a glorious day of early autumn, when the Château de Beaumanoir looked at its best, a mellow pile of grey walls rising high amid encircling woods Light blazed on narrow mediæval windows beneath sloping gables of roof, and the fret of turret and quaint chimney stack made a jagged, picturesque outline against the sky.

On the south front, where the magnolia blossoms opened out great silver cups amid the glossy leaves, was a broad stone terrace, in a belt of sunlight, guarded by black-boughed cypresses.

Here a solitary figure, in a hunting coat of russet velvet, paced to and fro, pausing each time at the top of the balustraded steps, to look out into the distance with a wistful, yearning gaze. There was a charm of airy vastness in the view over the flat landscape, where long, low shadows lay across the fertile meadows, parted by hedgerows bronzed and polished with the summer sun. Near by, the blue gleaming of a lake, through a belt of tall white poplars, gave the last touch of beauty to the landscape. Northward the great forest of Marly, the delight and frequent haunt of King Louis, bounded the sweeping wooded grounds of the chateau.

But the Comte de Beaumanoir gave no thought to the beauties of Nature around him. His eyes were fixed on the long, straight road, a legacy of Roman conquest, which seemed to stretch away till it was lost in the distant horizon. Surely he could discern, a long way off, a moving speck, a cloud of dust. But so many times had his eager hopes been doomed to disappointment that he scarcely dared to murmur:

"Is it Réné at last?"

Ah, this must not be! He would no longer suffer the suspense to unnerve him, and with a strong effort he turned away. His steps unconsciously led him round an angle of the terrace, towards the north side, whence a hum of life rose from the stables. Here there was a busy stir of expectation, for many guests were expected on the morrow, the eve of his daughter Gabrielle's wedding. With this thought in his mind, he looked round with something of uneasiness, unable to conceal from himself that an air of neglect and desolation hung heavy on the old place—at least, so it would strike a stranger.

Rank grass grew amid the cobblestones of the courtyard, the windows seemed to be bulging out, doors hung half-rotten on their hinges, and even the walls showed signs of decay. Yes, times were bad. There had been no money to spend on repairs; but now a change would come. Once his daughter was married, every crown should be spent on the old home, for Réné's sake!

Cheered by these good intentions, the Count's genial temper quickly shook off the momentary depression, and he turned with a gay word of encouragement to the peasants, who were bringing in stores of straw and provender. But all the time, in his own despite, his heart was on the watch, and when the sound of wheels caught his ear, he knew that this time his instinct had not deceived him.

A post-chaise lumbered into the yard, someone sprang to the ground with a cry of joy, and father and son were in each other's arms.

"Ah, Réné, I knew you would come! 'Tis a long journey from Toulon, as I well know, yet I had looked to see you these two days past," exclaimed the older man when they were alone together on the sunny terrace.

As he spoke he held his boy at arm's length to have a good look at him, and, in truth, the sight for which he had hungered so long was one to gladden any father's heart. A tall youth, in the gallant uniform of a naval officer, square built, with a candid, vigorous face bronzed by exposure, and radiant eyes brimming over with mirth and good temper.

"'Tis good to be at home again!" he cried, in a tone of conviction. "And, father, I should have been here twelve hours sooner, but that my mare broke down at Anvers, and I had much ado to hire even the sorry beast I drove hither. Jacques I left behind to bring on Rouge-gorge by easy stages."

"Well, you are in good time, dear boy, for the guests only arrive to-morrow, and the wedding will be the day after."

"Ah, yes, so your messenger brought me word. Dear little Gabrielle, I can't fancy her a bride—a duchess, too! But you are quite satisfied, father?" he added, with a touch of anxiety in his voice.

"'Tis a splendid match, Réné, and holds good promise for her happiness," was the steadfast reply. "The Duc de Maillebois is one of our old nobility, and has great wealth to keep up the honour of his name. He is a man of high repute, who has led the quiet life of a scholar, and in his dealings with us has played the part of a chivalrous gentleman. His only fault is in the date of his birth!"

"Ah, so I heard. Too old for such a child. What says Gabrielle herself?"

"Need you ask, Réné? Do you take me for a tyrant to my children? Of course, it is her own free choice!" was the prompt rejoinder. "To tell the truth, I had no hand in the matter. Héloise arranged it all. You will see both your sisters here to-night. They have lingered in Paris till the last moment, absorbed in chiffons and diamonds!"

"The doing of Héloise, say you? Well, she has ever had her way since we were children, when she led all the games and ruled us with a rod of iron."

"Believe me, my son, in this matter she has done well. Monsieur de Maillebois is generosity itself. He asks no dowry, the corbeille is immense, and as for the jewels—but that will not interest you. Tell me about yourself, Réné. You have your promotion? I hear, too, of your gallant charge at Genoa, from one who has the best right to speak," he said, with a meaning smile.

"Father, have you seen the Admiral? I know he is in Paris, but that you should have such good fortune!" was the eager cry.

"Yes, I met the Sieur du Quesne a few days since. He has come to the Court to make his report to the King's Majesty. And what think you? He has promised to come to the wedding!"

"This is joyful news! How proud we shall be to have him here—the greatest seaman France has ever known, the glory of our age!"

"Ah, my son, I know you of old. Once on the subject of your hero, there will be no end to it!" interrupted his father, with a smile. "Trust me, we shall have no lack of distinguished guests. Héloise has seen to that But what am I thinking of? While we talk, you must be well-nigh starving after your long journey Come, Réné."

As he took the lad's arm with tender pride, and led him to the house, he felt that such a happy moment almost repaid him for the long weary months of absence.

An hour later young Beaumanoir was alone in the great solemn hall, where the lengthening shadows fell athwart the polished floor. No longer dusty and travel-stained, he lay lazily stretched at full length on a bear-skin couch, revelling in the delicious sense of rest and leisure after the hurry and fatigue of many days. He looked up dreamily at the faded tapestry of the walls and the half-effaced painting of the coats-of-arms on the carved ceiling. How well he remembered it all! Nothing was changed since his boyhood, save that everywhere was the sign of fading and decay.

Was it like this in all great houses? And was it the common lot of nobles to be for ever in lack of money, like his father? A shadow passed over the young man's open brow as he suddenly recalled words of which he scarcely took in the full meaning when they were spoken: "The Duc de Maillebois asks for no dowry."

Could it be that here was the true reason of this marriage, that his sweet sister Gabrielle was to be sacrificed for the honour of the impoverished family? To save the remnant of the estates for him, the heir? Stung to the quick at the mere suspicion, he started up, his whole frame rigid with resolve. This must never be! Heaven forbid it!

At that moment a near sound smote his ear, and, turning, he saw that the door towards the terrace was pushed open, and a flood of light poured into the sombre place. Framed in the setting of the doorway, stood a tall, slight figure of a girl in softly-flowing white drapery; her delicate profile was outlined against the sunset sky, and she was crowned with coils of fair hair, the colour of ripe corn, in the ruddy glow. He gazed awestruck for scarce one breathing space on the enchanted vision; then all seemed blurred and blotted out, as in the light of common day, when two young girls tripped with dancing step across the threshold. The merry ring of a familiar voice sounded in his ears.

"You see, Yvonne, I told you this was the quickest way round. Come and look at this dear old hall. Ah, what games we used to play here when I was a child. Why, who is this?" she cried, as her eyes became accustomed to the dim light. "Réné, you have come?" And forgetting all else, his sister sprang forward to throw her arms round his neck.

"Where is Héloise?" he asked presently, when the first excitement of their eager greetings was over.

"Oh, poor dear, she is overwhelmed with affairs. She has everything to arrange, you know. I left her in the midst of a crowd of her own servants, whom she had sent on beforehand, unpacking bales of arras hangings and silken cushions, and such like, to transform the old place; but, above all, she has brought her famous cook, Ledru, who has vowed to outdo himself at this great picnic, as he calls it!"

"Framed in the setting of the doorway, stood a tall, slight figure."—p. 111.

There was a pause, and her brother looked round towards the new-comer.

"Oh, I forgot you, Yvonne dear I entreat your pardon. Allow me to introduce my brother, the Chevalier Réné Gaston de Beaumanoir, to Mademoiselle Yvonne Elisabeth de la Féronniere, my dearest friend."

She spoke the names in the clear sonorous tones of a herald, with an air of solemn formality which was so unexpected that the two looked at each other with a sudden smile and were friends as once.

Gabrielle was in a mood of joyful unrest.

"Oh, Réné, how I have longed to see you again!" she cried. "Tell me all about everything, all your fighting since last we met. Why, it must be nearly three years ago."

"No, surely that is impossible!" he replied. "I was at home for a few weeks just after the Algiers expedition."

"But don't you remember that Madame l'Abbesse would not let me have my sortie then, for it was the time of my first communion? It had been put off for a year. Why was it, Yvonne? How had I got into trouble? Was it about the chapel bell?"

"No, dear," replied her friend with assumed gravity. "It was the penance when you all rebelled against Madame Sainte Bathilde, and barricaded yourselves in the classroom."

"Ah, yes, you are right, and we never should have yielded, but the nuns were mean enough to send for some of our mothers, and Héloise came! Oh, how she scolded me! But she would have done it herself. What fun it was!" exclaimed the girl.

"You seem to have had no lack of adventure yourself. Was Mademoiselle de la Féronniere also amongst the rebels?" asked Réné with interest.

"Unfortunately, she missed it all, for she was ill in the infirmary; but she would have been certain to counsel submission, and then take all the blame when her advice was not followed. Now, don't waste any more time, my dear boy, but tell us what you have been doing," pleaded his sister.

"Where shall I begin? Would you like to hear about the corsairs of Tripoli?" he asked.

"Yes; that sounds interesting. Do begin quickly!" said Gabrielle eagerly.

"Well, I must go back three years when, after endless piracies on the high seas, a strong party of these corsairs actually had the audacity to attack and carry off a French ship from the coast of Provence. We got wind of this through a fishing-boat, and under Admiral du Quesne set sail at once to pursue them, although we had but four men-of-war and three chaloupes. The pirates had the breeze with them, and sped so well that they reached the seas of Greece and took refuge in the port of Chio.

"I was sent straightway to the shore in a chaloupe, with a trumpeter, and a letter to the Pacha of Chio, that he should give us aid and compel the corsairs to release the French vessel; but he treated us with contumely, and actually fired on our chaloupe. Thereupon, when we returned to the Admiral and told him how we had fared, he gave orders straightway to blockade the port and to cannonade the corsairs and the town of Chio. It was my first taste of warfare, and I shall never forget the wild joy of that hour, the flash and thunder of the bombs around me, the reckless audacity of it all! It was life indeed!"

"Ah yes!" said his sister, half under her breath. "I know the mood—just what we felt when we thought the nuns would send for soldiers to fire on us!" The others laughed.

"Gabrielle! Gabrielle! You ought never to have been a girl! But the best of my story is to come. The Pacha of Chio sent for help to the Sultan, Mahomet IV., and the great man fell into a mighty rage against us, a mere handful of Franks, and despatched forthwith a fleet of eight-and-thirty galleys to make an end of us. But when they came towering down upon us in their pride, what think you? Why, we blockaded them, too——"

Here the story was abruptly interrupted, for at this exciting moment there was a tapping of high heels on the polished floor, a rustling of silk, and the Marquise de Chamans came floating in through the gallery door with a beaming smile on her face.

She had already heard of her brother's arrival, and hastened to meet him with delight; for, woman of the world as she was, Héloise had a soft place in her heart for this gallant young fellow, for whom she had so long schemed and laboured, and whose career she had watched with so much pride and interest.

His coming thus opportunely, in time for the great event, gave the final touch of perfection to all her elaborate plans. The young Chevalier Réné de Beaumanoir, fresh from his well-earned laurels, would be another centre of interest to the distinguished company of wedding guests whom, by her tact and skill, the young Marquise was about to gather together in her father's ancestral home.

A sudden thought had flashed through her mind as she came unawares upon the young hero of many fights and his spell-bound listeners.

Héloise was a born diplomatist, and her quick instinct had not failed to note her brother's warm enthusiasm, and the eager upturned face of the young girl by his side to whom his words were addressed, and who drank them in with such naïve admiration and delight. The watchful elder sister could never forget how low had fallen the Beaumanoir fortunes, and that Réné could only look to inherit in the future the ruined mansion and poverty-stricken estates of his forefathers.

Why should not this chance meeting bring him fortune and happiness in the days to come?

She remembered that Mademoiselle de la Féronniere was a great heiress, and that her broad, sunny lands in fertile Poitou were a dower which might well tempt even a peer of the realm.

With Madame de Chamans to think was to act, for she knew that one hour of friendly intimacy in the home would outweigh a whole decade of formal meetings. With a bewitching smile, she glided forward and stretched out her hands in impulsive greeting.

"Ah, Réné, my good friend! How well you have timed your coming! We are a family party until to-morrow, and there is work for us all. Our dear wilderness of a garden is at least rich in flowers, and you must help me to deck the old house with gay blossoms, and make it ready for the fête. Come; there is no time like the present, before the evening dews have fallen. I will lead the way!" she cried, and lightly caught Gabrielle by the hand.

[END OF CHAPTER FIVE.]

Christmas Carol.

Words by J. CAWOOD.

Music by SIR FREDERICK BRIDGE, M.V.O., Mus.D.
(King Edward Professor of Music; Organist of Westminster Abbey.)

THE SECRET OF HIS SUCCESS.

SOME GOLDEN RULES OF MR. ANDREW CARNEGIE.

By E. Bruce Low, M.A.

ENORMOUS energy, of inflexible will, with the keenest business capacity, Andrew Carnegie has raised himself into a position unparalleled in history. Where shall we find, in the whole range of human biography, the case of a lad, driven by sheer want from his native land, resolving to become the trustee for the thrifty poor, and devoting fifty millions sterling and the vast knowledge of human experience, gained by a strenuous struggle from poverty to affluence, to the service of humanity?

To understand the motives and aspirations of the man, we must regard him not as the powerful Steel King, employing 40,000 workmen, and able to bring the magnates of the Billion-dollar Trust to accept his imperious terms on shortest notice. Our quest must take us to the humble weaver's cottage in Fife and to the modest home of boyhood at Pittsburg, for there we shall find the mainspring of Andrew Carnegie's lifework. In the daily struggle of the honest poor, the spectre of approaching old age is seldom absent from the bread-winner's mind, and dark indeed is the prospect for the widow and children when death enters the home and earnings cease. It was for the sake of his widowed mother that Carnegie, while but a lad, resolved to seek wealth, "so that her old age might be spent in comfort and in peace." To-day he cherishes the memory of his humble home, and, above all, the vision of his "mother—holy name—his nurse, teacher, guardian angel, saint, all in one," to use his own words; and he adds, "I know how sweet and happy and pure the home of honest poverty is, how free from care, from quarrels, how loving and united its members." And it is to multiply such homes, to spread a higher and healthier tone through our educative systems; to give to every boy and girl desirous of developing the intellect the opportunity to do so; to break down the senseless barriers to promotion which class privilege, intolerance, and the snobbery of wealth have hitherto succeeded in erecting, so as to reserve to mediocrity hereditary emoluments and preferments; to bring within the reach of the poorest the highest thought in literature and the soul-awakening influence of music and art; in such and a hundred other ways to strengthen the forces of social improvement in the community, and to instil the habits of self-help and self-respect in the individual—these are among the objects which this new species of plutocrat has set before us in life. How vastly different from the life of the motley crowd of money-makers who have groped their selfish way in bygone centuries! What a glorious tribute to pay to the hard-working, warm-hearted mother, who endowed him with her own unselfish love for her fellow creatures!

A PART OF MR. CARNEGIE'S WORKS, NEAR PITTSBURG.

The writer had occasion lately to ask Mr. (now Dr.) Carnegie for some advice for the benefit of certain young men in whom he was interested, and this was his answer: "I know of no line of all that has been written by man for man more precious than this, from our own Burns:

'Thine own reproach alone do fear.'

If any man, young or old, wins the approval of his own conscience, he is on the right path, sure." On another occasion, referring to the same line of Burns, he said, "Let me commend that as your rule of life. What your conscience tells you to be right should be your only standard; action contrary thereto, your only wrong. The court in which the lawgiver speaks directly to the conscience of man is the kingdom of God within man. I beseech you to keep this ever in mind."

In all his work we find that character for honesty and solid worth are preferred to all else, and the necessity, which exists in all careers, of weighing our actions and projects by the approval of conscience is insisted on. It is worth while here to review the heights of success to which this great practical rule of life led the humble cottar's son. When he retired from business, he was undisputed king of the iron and steel industries. He was the largest employer of labour in the world. His Steel Company, with its capital of twenty-five millions sterling, owned ten great works. Two hundred thousand persons depended upon him for their sustenance. One subsidiary concern—the Coke Company—was the largest of its kind in the world. Its coal-fields extended to 40,000 acres. Every day the railway waggons required to carry the coke to the foundries covered five miles in length. The plant in the steel works alone was capable of producing 3,000,000 tons annually. The profits for one year amounted to nine millions sterling. Never before in the history of our planet was the inertia of Nature overcome and converted on such a gigantic scale, by the strong will of one man, for the use and benefit of his fellows. It is, then, of supreme importance that the views of so powerful a mind regarding the conduct of life should be weighed, and, as far as possible, followed by the rising generation.

(Photo: Cassell and Co., Ltd.)

THE BIRTHPLACE OF ANDREW CARNEGIE.

We have shown that the mainspring of his business career was his laudable desire to provide for the comfort in old age of his beloved mother. The same noble simplicity runs through all his ambitions. Not long ago the writer had the opportunity of handing to Mr. Carnegie a letter, written in 1825, by George Dempster, then proprietor of Skibo Castle, of which the Scoto-American became owner in 1895. The letter, besides containing an account of life at Skibo, went on to identify among the writer's acquaintances several of Sir Walter Scott's characters in his latest novel. With great modesty Mr. Carnegie wrote in reply, "The autograph letter of the former laird of Skibo is highly valued, and will have a permanent place among the records pertaining to Skibo. Mr. Dempster was one whom the present laird takes for his model, and only hopes he can approach him, who lives still in the memory and affection of the people."

If further evidence of warm-heartedness were required one need only cite the incident which is told by Mr. Carnegie himself—with a laugh at his own expense—of his visit, along with another American millionaire, to hear one of London's famous preachers. After an eloquent sermon came an appeal for contributions to some charitable object. At first the two strangers smiled to each other, thinking that such matters are common to both sides of the Atlantic, and selected a modest coin to meet the case. As the speaker proceeded, however, the appeal struck such a responsive chord in Mr. Carnegie's heart that he emptied the contents of his purse into the collection plate. On reaching the street after the conclusion of the service, he was about to call a cab, when he turned to his friend to inform him that he would have to pay the fare, as he himself was penniless. "What! Did you give him your last dollar?" said the friend. "So did I." They determined to conceal their poverty and excess of charity by walking the distance—some miles—to their hotel.

(Photo: W. Crooke, Edinburgh.)

MR. ANDREW CARNEGIE.

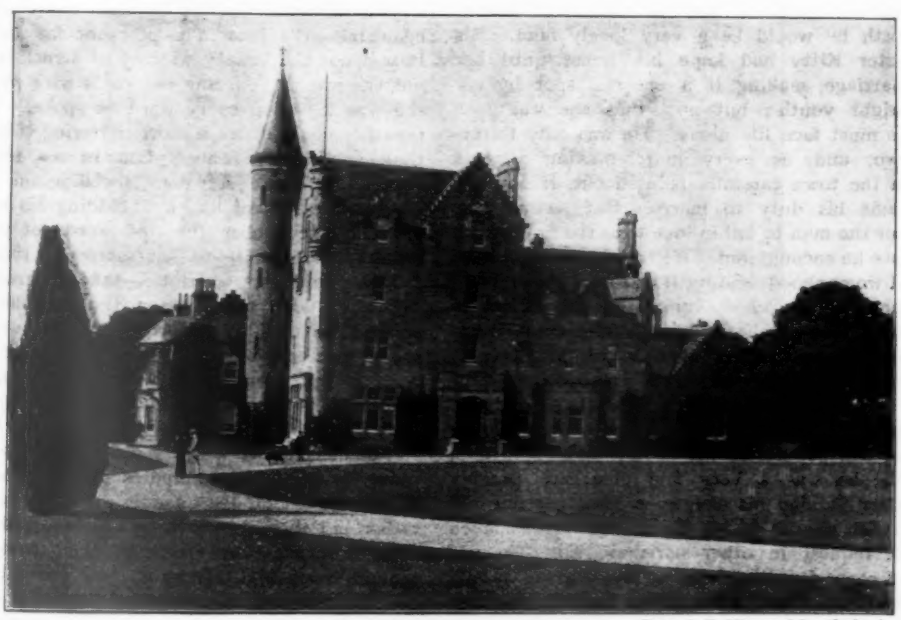
With the proofs already given of filial regard for the aged mother, who was his constant companion and care till the day of her death at the age of eighty, and the evidence of the total absence of self-conceit exhibited in the letter which we have quoted and in his life generally, together with his many acts of charity and benevolence, our impressions of Andrew Carnegie, the keenest man of business among the smartest mercantile community of the world, become strangely transformed. While we retain our conviction of his enormous will-power, strength of intellect, and commercial insight, we discover an unsuspected joy in life and almost youthful optimism which are only to be found among those who have lived wisely, having escaped the pitfalls of early life—thanks to the attractions of home and their own high standard of self-respect—and who have consistently struggled to follow the dictates of conscience in the varied relations of life. We know from his own lips that the great step which he took, in resolving to devote the prime of his life to the cause of humanity, was inspired by the words of the Founder of our religion, addressed to the young man burdened with riches, who came to Him for guidance in the conduct of his life: "Sell all and give to the poor."

When discussing the best fields for philanthropy he made the confession: "The gospel of wealth but echoes Christ's words; it calls upon the millionaire to sell all he hath and give the highest and best to the poor, by administering his estate for his fellow-men, before he is called to lie down and rest upon the bosom of Mother Earth. So doing, he will approach his end no longer the ignoble hoarder of useless millions; poor, very poor indeed, in money, but rich, very rich, in the affection, gratitude, and admiration of his fellow-men; and, sweeter far, soothed and sustained by the still small voice within which, whispering, tells him that, because he has lived, perhaps one small portion of the great world has been bettered just a little. This much is sure, against such riches as these no bar will be found at the gates of Paradise."

It is from actual experience of life among the honest poor that Andrew Carnegie has seen that the road to Heaven lies not by the barren path marked out by the directing posts of religious sects, creed, or ceremonial, but by the narrow way and the strait gate of conscience, charity, and self-abnegation; and he has satisfied himself that it is not by "vain repetitions" of formulæ, or by ostentatious frequenting of the synagogue, that the purpose of life is fulfilled, or the assurance of the eternal blessing secured; but only as the reward of work done for the elevation and social and spiritual advancement of humanity. "Inasmuch as ye have done it to one of the least of these My brethren, ye have done it unto Me." For all such workers the kingdom is prepared "from the beginning of the world."

Fortunately for the young men of his time, Andrew Carnegie has set himself to lay down for their benefit certain rules which he has found essential to success, and they are particularly addressed to those who, like himself, begin on the lowest rung of the ladder of life. To the son of the thrifty working-man, who must begin to earn his living in his teens, he awards by far the highest chances of outstanding success. All the chances, he thinks, are with an early start in business. College education is by no means essential, for he notes that everywhere it is the poor boys of the past who are the successful men of to-day. Out of a long list of the founders of the greatest businesses, it was found that not one had a college training, although many college graduates were filling subordinate posts as assistants of the practical men at the top.



The necessary elements of business success are the same in all careers, from medicine to dry goods. These principles are thrift, energy, concentration, and "brains." To lads about to make a start in life the watchwords are supplied: "Begin low. Avoid alcohol. Never speculate nor become surety." In office or workroom show a willing disposition. The first step is to attract attention by special industry. In particular, should opportunity occur to save the firm from loss by pointing out certain risks or errors unnoticed, take a stand early. Give your reasons. You may be wrong in part, or your warning may not be accepted; but your anxiety will not be forgotten. In Yankee parlance, "You have begun to boss your boss." You have shown that certain business may be trusted in your hands. Some day it will arise that the head of that branch is absent. You are sent for. It is a sure indication that your services have been recognised. Promotion must follow. One sure test applied by every employer is, "Does a young man live within his income?" If so, his credit is assured. Lay by. When credit is needed, it is at hand. It is always the making of the first hundred pounds that tells. For every hundred saved, your banker will gladly give another on loan. Thrift is always recognised. There is ever a "boom in brains." The first condition of progress is concentration. Your energy, thought, and capital must be settled on your business. Do not be impatient. Carnegie endorses Emerson, "No one can cheat you of success but yourself." Above all, aim high, respect yourself, consult conscience.

Such are a few of the maxims, culled from his writings, which this great captain of industry has offered to the young men of his time. In him we find realised the supremacy of conscience in business. In his works, "The Gospel of Wealth" and "The Empire of Business," all may learn —whatever their sphere in life—how the sternest features of honest poverty may be, perforce, relaxed into the smile of prosperity, through the application of the Golden Rules chosen by him:

"Thine own reproach alone do fear."

and that other, which he has adopted as his personal crest (emblazoned, appropriately for this son of Vulcan, with the symbol, a right hand holding the thunderbolt), the sublime command, "Dread God."

(Photo: G. W. Wilson and Co., Aberdeen.)

SKIBO CASTLE, SUTHERLANDSHIRE MR CARNEGIE'S HOME.

THE MARRIAGE OF BISHOP BRANDON.

BY SCOTT GRAHAM.

A Complete Story.

I.

THE pretty bride and her soldier husband, Captain Cree, had just started for Brindisi, en route to their future home in India; and Arthur Brandon, vicar of the important Northern town of Wheelsworth, and Mrs. Cree's only brother, realised with a sudden sigh that henceforth he would be a very lonely man. His sister Kitty had kept his house until her marriage, making it a cheerful spot by her bright youth; but now that she was gone he must face life alone. He was only thirty-two, and, as every match-making mamma in the town carefully pointed out, it now became his duty to marry. But Arthur was not the man to fall in love with the first pretty face he encountered. He had a very high ideal of womanhood, and until he found the embodiment of his ideal, complete and perfect in every respect, he was resolved not to marry. Wherefore the fair maidens of Wheelsworth had long angled for him in vain.

He was already a man of mark in the diocese. He held strong views on many social questions; he was popular in the town; and, more than all, he was a very fine preacher. Sunday after Sunday his eloquence filled the fine old parish church to its doors, and he was much in request in other parishes also. The sea of eager faces confronting him seemed to lend him inspiration, his sensitive, clear-cut features lighted up, and he spoke as one who feels he has a message to deliver, a commission from on High to help those who sit in darkness and the shadow of death. It was a very common-sense and practical doctrine that he preached, and one very suitable to the hard-headed citizens of that grim Northern town: the Gospel of honest work, the Gospel of getting up and going on, the Gospel of truth and honour in all business dealings. Many a merchant of Wheelsworth, ashamed for the first time of practices which would not bear the light of day, dated his conversion to a higher standard of commercial morality from some trenchant utterance of the great preacher at St. Mary's.

It was one sunny spring morning, when the great church was crammed as usual, that Arthur from the pulpit became aware of a beautiful girl's face in a pew not far away. It was not the beauty which first struck him, but the intense, burning eagerness with which she was following every word he spoke. No preacher could desire a more flattering tribute than such intense absorption in his utterances. He was, just then, dwelling on the discouragements of life, and bidding his congregation remember the fine words of poor dying Anne Brontë to her sorrowing sister: "Take courage, Charlotte—take courage." When we look round upon the bewildering sorrows, the maddening disappointments, which crowd this sad earth of ours, we do indeed need to take courage, if we would not sink in despair altogether. Some good people, he added, made light of the trials of this life, and saddened their already disheartened comrades by perpetual reminders of the punishment reserved for the ungodly; but he would rather bid them try to take courage, and do their best. If they spent all their days in the castle of Giant Despair, how could they ever hope to reach the Celestial City?

It was just then their eyes met—his and hers. He knew nothing about her, not even her name; but something in the thrilling glance of those dark eyes made him feel that the others in the huge congregation were mere accidents—he had preached to her, and her alone, and had been understood by her, and her alone.

Thereafter, half unconsciously, Sunday after Sunday, he looked for the beautiful face, which was always there, and preached with the certainty that at least one hearer was in complete sympathy with him. Others might come to the parish church because it was respectable, because a stirring sermon gave them something to think of on a dull day, because they wanted to criticise other people's clothes and display their own; but this girl, he felt sure, came to St. Mary's because she was crushed beneath the burden of some terrible sorrow, and needed somebody to console her, if that were possible.

"That young man will be a bishop some day," prognosticated Mr. Attrill, the Vicar's churchwarden, as he walked home one Sunday with his wife. "That sermon of his just now, 'I have compassion on the multitude,' was the finest thing I ever heard. Why, you'll hardly believe it, but he made me feel as if I could actually be sorry for the very criminals in our gaol! Eh, Maria?"

But Maria did not answer. Her mind was running on many things which that sermon had placed in a very different light. And when she reached home, Sunday though it was, she at once sought out a poor, timid, downtrodden nursery governess to whom she had given notice for some trifling fault; telling her she had changed her mind, and she need not leave. Poor Miss Norris, crushed by the thought of her few accomplishments, and dreading to become a burden on her slenderly endowed widowed mother, was quite touchingly grateful for her employer's kindness and condescension. But it seemed to Mrs. Attrill, as she thought over some sentences heard that morning, as if she could never be harsh to a subordinate again.

"'Oh, you don't know what you ask!'"—p. 122.

That same week Arthur made Mabel Stanley's acquaintance. He held a Bible class at a large girls' school, whose principal, Miss Oakley, was his friend. Amongst the governesses, sitting in a little knot apart from the long table round which the pupils sat, was his attentive hearer at church. Afterwards, as he lingered for a little talk with Miss Oakley, she introduced him to the stranger.

"This is Miss Stanley, my music mistress—and an old pupil," she said kindly. And they shook hands.

After that they met fairly often, at the Bible class, at the breaking-up party, when the girls gave a concert, at the Town Library, or in the streets. Always, when he could, Arthur endeavoured to talk to her, but was conscious of a shrinking reserve which pervaded everything Mabel said and did. She did not live with Miss Oakley, but in apartments; and, after hours, gave private lessons on her own account. Thinking she must often feel very lonely, he offered to introduce her to some of the leading ladies of the congregation, and invited her to join the choral society, the working party, and a tennis club which had been formed for the young people of his flock. But nothing could draw her out of her shell. She refused all suggestions, and declined all invitations. She did not want to know people, she said; it—it interfered with her work. And she continued to live a solitary life in the busy town, as though all the ordinary desires and aspirations of youth were dead within her.

Without in the least knowing why, he felt vaguely sorry for her. Miss Oakley hinted she had seen better days, and she was so entirely out of the common groove that she interested him more powerfully every time they met. He himself, now that Kitty had gone, was conscious of being a very lonely man. It was well enough to spend his days, as he did, in a continual bustle of work; but there were many hours when he was shut up alone in the quiet Vicarage, and he yearned for a sympathising woman's voice and smile. Her life was lonely too. Why should not the two solitary ones combine to make a cheerful whole? True, he knew almost nothing of her history; but she was a cultivated gentlewoman, and Miss Oakley vouched for her socially, so no more was needed.

He overtook her one day in a secluded nook of the umbrageous Botanical Gardens; and almost before he was aware he found himself asking her to be his wife. An expression of absolute terror dilated her beautiful eyes as she listened. "Oh! you don't know what you ask!" she shivered. "But it's all my fault for coming here under my maiden name! Miss Oakley thought it would be better, as, if I called myself 'Mrs.,' people would naturally wonder why my husband isn't here——"

"Your husband!"

"Yes! Forgive me for not having told you I was married, but I—I never thought it would matter! He is in Portland Prison, undergoing five years' penal servitude for forgery."

Accustomed as he was to hearing sad tales of sorrow and suffering in going about his large parish, for a moment the magnitude of her burden struck him dumb. So young, a mere girl, and gently born and bred—to be fettered for life to a convict!

She went on, with a kind of strange composure which struck him as more pathetic than any amount of tears. "Don't pity me too much! It's all my own fault, for I would have him, in defiance of all my friends. I was only a girl—indeed, I had only just left Miss Oakley's—when I met him at a garden party. He was a young solicitor, and we both fell in love at once. I am what people call 'well connected'—my father is a country squire, and my uncle is member for Compton; and, altogether, we are accustomed as a family to think a good deal of ourselves. I was silly and inexperienced, and I thought it fine and romantic to defy my father when he forbade Hugh the house. He disapproved of him personally, not liking tales he had heard about his fondness for billiards and cards and late hours; but I wouldn't believe a word against him, and in the end we made a runaway match. My people cast me off instantly, but I don't know that I should have felt that so much if only Hugh had been—been different. But I soon found out he was—not a good man. He drank, and had a taste for low amusements. I can't tell you all I went through until—until one day he was arrested for forging a client's name, and tried, and sentenced to penal servitude. My family were more furious than ever at my disgracing them so; and I tried several ways of earning a living until kind Miss Oakley came to the rescue with the offer of a post with her."

He was silent a few minutes, and then said: "How long is it since—since——"

But he could not finish the sentence.

"Since my husband was sent to prison? Nearly four years; he will be released on ticket-of-leave before long, and I shall have to go back to him! Oh, when you preached that sermon quoting 'Take courage, Charlotte, take courage!' I could almost have believed you knew my story, and meant to encourage me. I shall need to be very brave in the future, I'm sure."

He thought what it must be for a woman of her refinement to look forward to spending the rest of her life with a man evidently unprincipled by nature, and still further debased by the vile companionship of a convict-prison, who would find every avenue of honest employment closed to him. Death, he felt certain, would be an infinitely preferable alternative to one of the proud Stanleys

"God help you!" he burst out passionately.

She looked straight before her with a set, white face. "It's all my own doing—I try to remember that! I would marry him; and I've no right to complain if, having sowed the wind, I have to reap the whirlwind!"

"But you were so young," he urged pityingly. There was a lump in his throat which prevented him adding more.

They were close to one of the gates, and, stopping, she held out her hand. "We must part here," she said. "I have never thanked you for the great honour you have done me in asking me to be your wife. I feel it more than words can express. Henceforward, if we meet anywhere, let it be as mere acquaintances. In any case, I shall soon leave Wheelsworth. When my—when Hugh is released, I must go to him, and probably he will try to earn a living in London. So good-bye, and—and go on preaching sermons to comfort people and lift them up! I shall never forget some of the things I have heard you say at St. Mary's! You will be a great man some day—you deserve it; and when you are think sometimes of a humble friend—a convict's wife—who learnt from you that to sit wringing one's hands in the castle of Giant Despair isn't half so fine a thing as just getting up and going on!"

She turned away abruptly, her face wet with tears, and hastened out at a great pace. He stood looking after her like a man in a dream.

A few months later Mabel Lovell sat in a London lodging, trembling at every footfall on the stairs, lest it should be that of the erring husband, whose return she had looked forward to much as the condemned criminal awaits the day of death. Presently he came in; and one glance at his face dispelled any lingering spark of hope she had left. Nevertheless, sunk and brutalised as he was, she forced herself to greet him kindly, with her arms about his neck. So Arthur Brandon would have had her receive the wandering sheep, she was sure.

Thenceforward Hugh Lovell's course was steadily downwards; and, tied to a degraded sot, Mabel had to endure being dragged from depth to depth. She tried to do her duty by her husband, but what it cost her no words can express. There are some pictures of human misery too painful to dwell upon; and her case is one.

II.

TEN years had passed, and Arthur Brandon, after being for some time head of a theological college, was appointed bishop of the important diocese of Culminster. When it transpired that the new bishop was not only unmarried, but apparently proof against female fascinations, there was much fluttering amongst the many eligible maidens who would have dearly liked to date their letters from "The Palace." But he decidedly avoided general society. Dinner-parties and "at homes" saw him not, but in the city slums, or wherever there was good work to be done, he was indefatigable; whilst on Sundays his silvery voice, ringing through the arches, crammed the great cathedral to its very doors. His was still much the same message which he had delivered at St. Mary's; only deeper, fuller, more penetrated with the insight derived from a great sorrow and wider comprehension of life.

In making acquaintance with his people, he was especially struck by the frequency with which the name of a Mrs. Clayton occurred on subscription lists and on charitable committees. He learnt she was a widow, and doing a great work amongst the factory girls and shop assistants of the city. She gave up all her time to furthering the welfare of young women; but when he expressed a wish to meet her he was told that she never accepted invitations or paid calls. She was not a Culminster woman, but had settled in the city some years before, and little was known of her own personal history, except that she had brought introductions to one of the clergy of the place.

One day Bishop Brandon, who was fond of doing unconventional things, decided to pay a surprise visit to a small orphanage for crippled children he had often been asked to inspect. The door was opened by a juvenile maid, who, evidently overcome by the magnitude of the occasion, left him standing on the hall mat whilst she flew to summon the matron. From a half-open door on the right came the sound of gay tunes played on a piano by a master hand.

"No, children, no; I can't stop to play any more now," said a woman's voice, as "Caller Herrin'" concluded amid loud applause. "But I'll come again to-morrow, and teach you some more nursery rhymes—if you're good."

"We're always good!" rose a shrill chorus; and then the door was opened, and, with a start, Arthur Brandon found himself looking into those beautiful dark eyes which had so thrilled him years ago at Wheelsworth. Older, sadder, her dark hair slightly touched with silver, the one love of his life was still strikingly handsome. He had seen and heard nothing of her since she left the North. But before either of them had recovered their presence of mind the little matron came bustling forward, and whisked the bishop away before he knew where he was. He went through the house like a man in a dream; but before he left he asked for the name and address of the lady who had been playing to the children, and was told she was Mrs. Clayton, who lived in a small house on the London Road.

He lost no time in seeking out the little band-box which she merely used in order to eat and sleep. Her story was soon told. Her husband had been dead five years, but her family was still implacable, her uncle the member having been raised to the peerage. Her godmother had bequeathed her a thousand a year on condition that she assumed her name of Clayton. Oh, yes, she was quite happy and content, she added, in reply to a question, though it was a trial to be still estranged from her family. She had chosen Culminster as her abode because nobody knew her story there, for, her kind old friend Miss Oakley being dead, she had no ties left in Wheelsworth.

"I was a lonely man as vicar of St. Mary's; but I'm ten times lonelier here, in my great echoing palace, with nobody but my chaplain to talk to," said the bishop, after a pause. "I shall never marry anybody but you. Now that there is no obstacle between us, promise that you will be my wife before long. Our aims and hopes are the same, and—and I have always loved you, and shall love you till I die."

But she shook her head. "It can never be! As Bishop Brandon you are still more hopelessly out of my reach than as vicar of St. Mary's."

"But why, my dearest?"

"Because I am the widow of a convict, and the stigma must cling to me as long as I live!"

"How could it? You yourself are personally blameless; by family and education you are entirely my equal; and your unfortunate marriage, when you were an inexperienced girl, would only make people sorry for you," he urged eagerly.

"A bishop's wife should be beyond cavil in every way. If I married you, every malicious tongue in the diocese would say that I had entrapped you in order to rehabilitate my stained name through your unassailable social position. People would probably cut me, and certainly such a marriage would not win approval from the other bishops."

"I should be the last man to sanction deception of any kind; but need anybody in the diocese ever know the story of your first husband?"

"I may escape comment now that I am only Mrs. Clayton, of no special importance to anybody. But the instant a marriage was talked of between us every gossip in the place would begin to ferret out my antecedents; and the fact that my husband was a convict would be discovered immediately, for discreditable secrets always do leak out, by some marvellous agency. You know what the pride of birth and breeding is in these cathedral cities, and probably people would refuse to call upon the convict's widow. Though neither you nor I care for what is generally called society, still it would hurt you if the ladies of the place ignored your wife, and a bishop is not at liberty to flout all his people's prejudices."

"There might perhaps be some unkind tittle-tattle at first; but we should soon live it down."

"There are some things that can never be lived down. And, Arthur, believe me I love you far too well to drag you down and cripple your usefulness by giving scandalmongers occasion to say you have married beneath you."

And from this resolve nothing could move her, though he pleaded long and eloquently. At last he went away, though with the firm intention to renew his suit at the first opportunity. But he little knew the strength of words had done them, and he listened with a wan smile. But he knew the ache in his own heart could never be stilled.

One morning he was at the station, waiting for a train, and idly watching the antics of a couple of small boys from the bookstall, who, from opposite platforms, were calling to will given to a woman who loves. In a few days the little house was denuded of all its furniture, and Mabel, with scarcely a farewell to anybody, departed to join a band of workers in a London East End settlement.

"Awakening from a fevered dream, he beheld a beautiful vision."—p. 126.

To Arthur Brandon a double desolation seemed to settle upon his great lonely house. But his sermons grew more inspiriting than ever, for he was preaching to himself now; and he needed comfort as much as the poorest and saddest amongst his vast congregation. People came and told him how much good his each other and playing monkey tricks, as such young imps love to do. Accustomed to rush across the rails a hundred times a day, instead of going over the bridge like the passengers, familiarity with danger had made them careless, especially as the officials took no notice of their pranks. Just after a pilot-engine had come snorting and puffing through, one ordered the other to bring him a Times from the bookstall, to which the derisive answer was that he might come and fetch it himself; whereupon the insulted lad instantly started to cross the metals, meaning to inflict dire punishment upon his disobliging friend. He would have reached the other side safely had not the driver of the engine, which was merely being shunted, suddenly reversed his levers to run backwards through the station. He could not, of course, see the boy, his back being towards him; and when a horrified shout arose it was too late to attempt to pull up. In another second little Giles Todd would have been battered out of all recognition, had not Arthur Brandon, with a wild leap, jumped from the platform and fairly hurled the child out of the way. But, even as he did so, the buffer caught him, and the shuddering spectators turned away their eyes.

* * * * * *

He did not die, though he lay in mortal danger many weary weeks. And oh! what a wail went up, not only from Culminster, but from many another place, when the doctors reluctantly pronounced that the great preacher, the earnest reformer, would never walk, or even stand, again. His mental powers were quite unimpaired; but, a shattered wreck, he must from henceforth live the secluded life of an invalid.

He was very human, and for a time after hearing this dread sentence it seemed to him death would be far preferable. It was too cruel to be cut off from active life in the very fulness of his powers—to see so much good work waiting to be done on all sides of him, and to be obliged to leave it to others. He had never been a slothful or unprofitable servant. Why, then, should he be thus turned out of the great vineyard in the heat of the day? He closed his eyes with a groan. Not for one minute did he wish little Giles Todd—who had been incessant in his inquiries during his illness—had been crushed by the engine instead of him; but oh! to see the ripe grapes hanging in great clusters in the vineyard, and not to be able to lift so much as a finger to gather one!

He had seen very few visitors, both because he shrank even from the tenderest sympathy and because the doctors wished him kept very quiet. But one day, awakening from a fevered dream, he beheld a beautiful vision: Mabel, standing by his couch, with a smile of divinest tenderness on her noble face, a smile which somehow made him think of his mother, though she had been dead many a year.

"'Take courage, Charlotte—take courage,'" she murmured softly, laying her cool hand on his hot fingers. "Once upon a time you helped me along a very stony bit of life's road; and now I'm going to help you in my turn! I've been here some time, but they wouldn't let me see you before. Oh, yes, I know all about it! I can understand how hard it all is; but, dearest, I'm prouder of you as you are than I ever was before!"

"A poor, broken, useless wreck," he murmured despondently.

"A man whose bravery has done more good than all the sermons he ever preached! Twice you asked me to marry you in vain; but now I come to propose to you myself! Arthur Brandon, will you marry me?"

"Darling, it would not be right to tie you to a wretched cripple who will never walk again! And I shall be no longer bishop of this diocese. Well-meaning friends have urged that I need not resign my see, as I can have a suffragan to travel about and do the really hard work, and I might still preach and attend the services in an invalid chair specially made for the purpose. But I feel that would not be right. This diocese requires a strong, active man, and I will not take its revenues without doing its work. So, dearest, I shall be a very poor man. My private income is small, and I cannot consent to become a pensioner on the bounty of my successor. So it is out of the question for me to allow you to sacrifice yourself for life; for the doctors say I may live for many years."

She stooped and kissed him. "As for money, thank Heaven, I have enough for both. And as to the rest—I owe you a debt I can never repay, and my whole life is too little to give to the man who rescued me from the castle of Giant Despair!"

* * * * * *

The spiteful busybodies of the city, unable to say that the convict's widow had angled for a home in the bishop's palace, in order to regain her social position, turned their venom upon Arthur himself, expressing surprise that he could be so selfish as to ask a beautiful woman, still young, to share his pitiful existence. But it did not strike the very few privileged to attend the eight o'clock wedding in the cathedral—which the bridegroom had insisted upon, though the doctors advised a marriage by special licence in his own house—that either of the contracting parties looked as if they needed much pity. As the bride came down the nave, after the ceremony, beside her husband's invalid chair, she looked like a happy girl; and his face, as he was wheeled slowly along, his hand fast clasped in hers, expressed a bliss seldom granted to mortals.

The proud privilege of pushing the chair had, at his earnest entreaty, been granted to little Giles Todd, who wore a white bow of huge dimensions in his buttonhole in honour of the occasion. The bishop had become the object of his deepest veneration; they had had a long talk together, and now he no longer cheated customers out of their change, or gave impertinent answers to his superiors, or listened with a laugh when older men, who should have known better, indulged in coarse jests in his hearing. He had quite settled it in his own mind that he was going to be a good man when he grew up; and, if Arthur Brandon had never done any other good deed than this, surely it was worth while to have lifted even a little ignorant bookstall boy an inch nearer the stars!

The newly married pair went at once to The Hermitage, a quaint, old-fashioned house on the outskirts of the city, standing in a lovely garden, which Mabel had chosen for their future home. A suite of rooms on the ground floor, with French windows opening on to the sunny terrace, was assigned to the invalid; and, though he never left the precincts of his home again, he none the less was surprised to find how much of solace life still held. Finding he fretted at the change from consuming activity to long hours spent on the sofa, wise Mabel thrust a pen into his hand, and bade him write the message he could no longer deliver verbally. A charming volume of essays on social questions was the result, the composition of which beguiled many weary hours of pain. And thereafter whatever an eloquent pen could do to lessen the crying evils of our time his did. The wise, well-considered writings of Bishop Brandon on all the burning questions of the day became a distinct social force, though their author lived the life of a recluse. It was understood that the Brandons never received ordinary callers; but many a perplexed clergyman and weary parish worker, distracted by the painful problems which beset the earnest reformer, came to the bishop, and beside his sofa learnt such lessons of wisdom, moderation, and true charity as sent them back to their work new men. And every Sunday Arthur gathered round him a number of that class who are proverbially the hardest to reach, and yet who must be reached if England is not to sink into wickedness and unbelief altogether—lads from sixteen to twenty, who seldom entered a place of worship, but who responded in a wonderful manner to the cultivated gentleman who talked to them as his equals, giving them higher ideals of life than they had ever known before. And yet they would have indignantly resented the supposition that they went to The Hermitage to be preached at; they had a friendly chat with the bishop, and nothing more.

One warm September evening Mabel, who had just returned from visiting one of her pet institutions, stood on the terrace looking down upon the old city spread out beneath her feet. An intense peace brooded over the whole scene. The sun was setting in an absolutely cloudless sky, and all the west was a wide arch of purest gold. It seemed impossible to realise that storm-clouds could ever gather again in that serene sky. To her it seemed like an allegory of her own life. How bitter, how stormy, had been her youth! How often had she prayed God, in her blindness, that she might die, and thus find an escape from her misery! But now all that rending heartache had passed away, leaving nothing behind but the most exquisite peace!

Her husband, who, as usual on fine days, had been wheeled out on his sofa to the terrace, gazed at her motionless figure, as she stood there absorbed in deep thought. "Dearest, what is interesting you so profoundly?" he asked at length.

"I was thinking how many people there are nowadays who deny that there is any answer to prayer," she responded slowly, her eyes still fixed on the radiant west. "I can only say that if God had granted some prayers of mine—wicked prayers—I should not be here to-day, perfectly happy and content, save for—for your lifelong deprivation, Arthur."

He sighed for a moment, as she turned and laid her hand tenderly on his, and then his brow cleared. "To have you always with me is sufficient compensation for all earthly ills, Mabel," he said softly.

And, hand in hand, they watched the stars gradually come out, one by one, to shine calm and golden above the strife and din of this perplexing world.

CHRISTMAS IN RECENT ART.

By Adrian Margaux.

OUR grandfathers and grandmothers are fond of comparing the Christmas of their young days with the sort of Christmas which has to content the present generation, much to the disparagement of the former. To some extent the national festival has doubtless lost its more picturesque aspect since the introduction of railways and the migration of the people to the towns. At any rate, it is difficult to account otherwise for the small part which Christmas has taken in the art of recent years. From being one of the most fertile Christmas has become one of the most barren of subjects for the painter's brush. Several years have now passed since the exhibition of the Royal Academy has contained a single picture relating in any way to the greatest anniversary in Christendom. Christmas, in its picturesque aspect, seems to be in danger of sharing the fate of May-day.

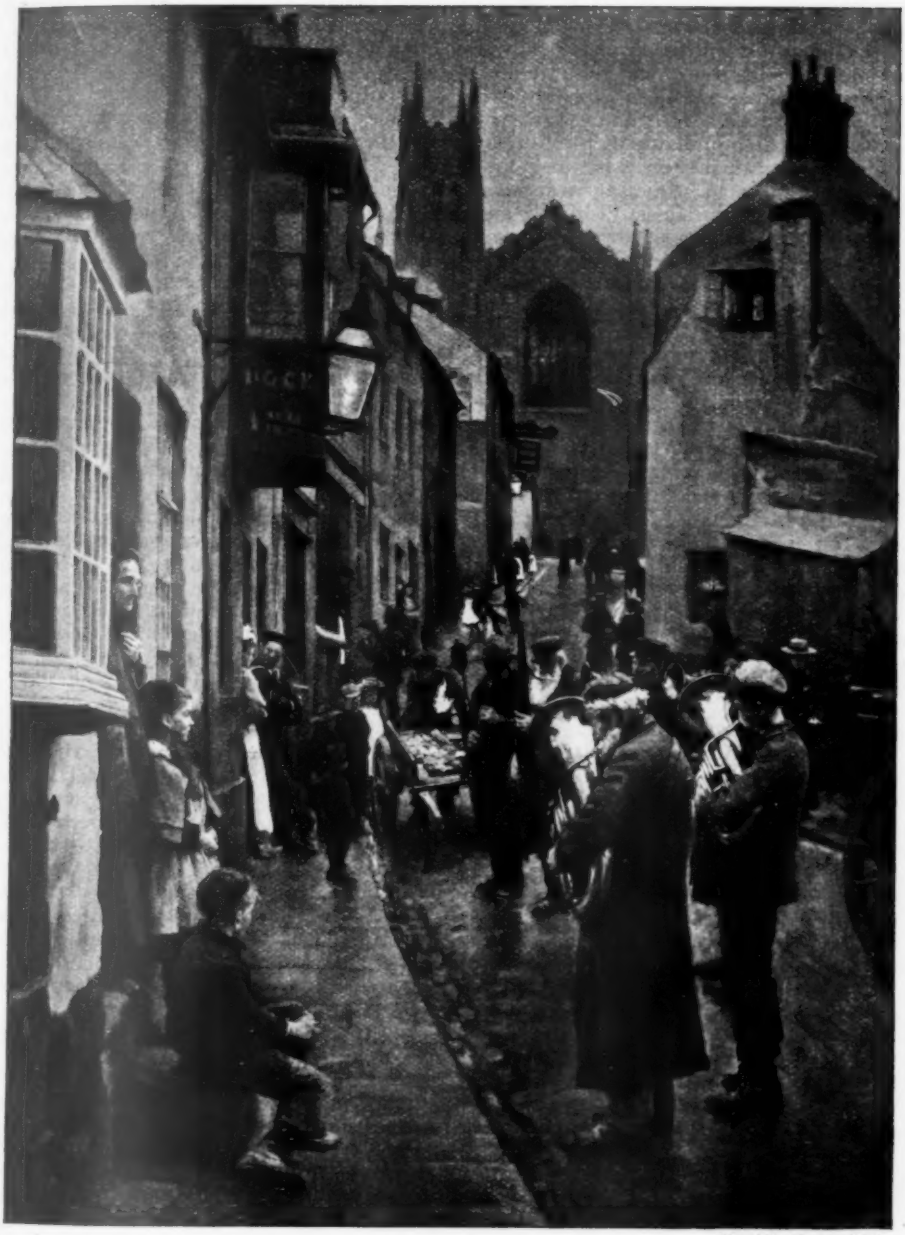
The illustrated papers still issue their Christmas numbers, but they have ceased to be an important manifestation of Christmas in art; the engraving or coloured plate which has the slightest reference to the season has become conspicuous by its rarity. Until the last year or so, however, these Christmas numbers led not a few artists

(By permission of Mr. Arthur Lucas, 58, Baker Street, W., Owner of the Copyright.)

THE FIRST CHRISTMAS MORN.

(J. M. Thomson.)

XUM



CHARITY.

FROM THE PICTURE
BY WALTER LANGLEY, R.I.

UNIV. OF MICH.

XUM

(Copyright: Virtue and Co.)

CHRISTMAS EVE.

(From the Picture by Stanhope A. Forbes, A.R.A.)

to endeavour to give form and colour to the popular feeling for Christmastide as a religious festival, an opportunity for family reunion, an occasion for merry-making, and a period generally of peace and goodwill. The most distinguished of this number among present-day artists is probably Mr. G. A. Storey, A.R.A. Mr. Storey was commissioned by the proprietors of the Graphic to paint the principal subject for their first Christmas number in 1874. It was called "Grandmamma's Christmas Visitors," and represented two or three little boys and girls bursting into an old lady's room in high glee with sprigs of mistletoe in their hands, the subject being suggested by the then editor of the Graphic, Mr. W. L. Thomas. After its reproduction in the Christmas number the original picture was purchased by a great Sheffield manufacturer, whose fancy it had taken as a reader of the Graphic. It was eventually presented by him, with other pictures, to the municipal art gallery at Sheffield, which bears his name. In the Mappin Art Gallery it still hangs, an interesting souvenir of mid-Victorian sentiment on the subject of Christmas. Mr. Storey painted another picture for the second Christmas number of the Graphic, but this had a less definite association with the Christmas season, its title being "A Minuet, or the Dancing Lesson."

Another well-known artist of to-day, Mr. J. C. Dollman, did several similar pictures for the purposes of reproduction—usually in colours—for the Graphic Christmas numbers. Their character is, perhaps, sufficiently indicated by their titles—such as "A Christmas Dinner in Danger," a child bringing home the Christmas dinner with several dogs still prancing around her, and "The Squire's Christmas Box," a bluff old gentleman in hunting-coat, knee-breeches, and top-boots, riding through the village distributing largesse among the children as they run and caper in the snow. The former incident was such as might still be witnessed in many a town, but the latter, it is to be feared, almost belongs to a bygone order of things.

The artist nowadays has difficulty in finding any Christmas custom or episode which possesses a real living interest. Even the weather—in popular belief, at least—of late December has radically changed from the weather of tradition; the snowy landscape and the flaming log have alike ceased in consequence to form practicable backgrounds. On the other hand, nothing has taken their place as distinctive features of a Christmas picture. People wondered over the title of Sir John Millais's picture, "Christmas Eve," which was exhibited at the Royal Academy in 1888, a picture in soft autumnal tints, of the old castle of Murthley, in Scotland, until it was explained that the work was so named merely because it had been finished on the preceding December 24th. The daring action of the distinguished artist was significant of the fate which had befallen the traditional Christmas picture.

In these circumstances Mr. Stanhope Forbes, A.R.A., and Mr. Joseph Clark must be accounted fortunate in having discovered for representation on canvas Christmas customs that have survived the nineteenth century. Mr. Forbes, who has made Newlyn, the quaint little neighbour of Penzance, his home for many years past, depicts the lingering Cornish custom which sends forth the musicians of every town and village to serenade their neighbours on December 24th by way of welcome to Christ's natal day. Mr. Forbes's picture, which, like Sir John Millais's, is simply named "Christmas Eve," shows the musicians of Penzance performing in one of the oldest and most picturesque streets of that town, all the figures being painted directly from life in accordance with Mr. Forbes's invariable practice when painting Cornish subjects like this. The picture was painted when the young artist, although not so well known as he is now, had already won the liking of the Cornish folk among whom he lived, and had, therefore, no difficulty in persuading the Penzance musicians to give him the necessary sittings. It will be noticed that no attempt has been made to give the scene the aspect of severe winter: in the far end of Cornwall traditional Christmas weather is really of the most rare occurrence.

Mr. Joseph Clark's picture, "The Christmas Dole," may be said to be representative generally of Christian benevolence at this glad season of the year. But it had its origin in a charity of the village of Hazelbury, in Somersetshire, where part of the artist's earlier life was spent. As a tablet in the village church records, Mrs. Mary Mountford in the year 1817 gave the rent of two and a half acres of land in the parish for the maintenance of her tomb, and provided that the surplus should be distributed in bread for the poor at Christmas-time. The surplus, notwithstanding agricultural depression, is still large enough to provide a goodly number of loaves for many of the poorer villagers. The place of distribution is the baker's cottage, and seated at the table are the squire and parson, giving the tickets and checking names. The figures of the villagers were all painted by Mr. Clark from the actual recipients of the dole. The picture was exhibited at the Royal Academy in 1889, and purchased by Mr. G. Dibley.

In "The First Christmas Morn," by the late J. K. Thomson, we have presented the religious meaning, apart from the festive associations, of the day. The beautiful symbolism of this work, together with that of a companion picture, "The First Easter Morn," has given it in black and white reproduction a world-wide circulation. Mr. Arthur Lucas, the art publisher, had rather a curious share in the origin of both pictures. A few years ago Mr. Lucas purchased from Mr. Thomson a picture which the artist had exhibited at the Royal Academy under some Greek title. The subject it suggested to Mr. Lucas when he saw it at Burlington House was "The First Easter Dawn." The artist consented to make the small alteration necessary to transform the Greek myth into a piece of Christian symbolism, and to re-christen the picture in accordance with Mr. Lucas's view. The reproduction achieved so great a success that Mr. Lucas was led to commission Mr. Thomson to paint "The First Christmas Morn" as a companion picture. The two subjects have undergone five distinct forms of reproduction with the imprimatur of Mr. Lucas, the publisher spending upon them altogether upwards of three thousand guineas—to say nothing of piratical reproductions in America and elsewhere. Judged by the number of prints sold, it is Mr. Lucas's opinion that "The First Christmas Morn," with its companion, has had the greatest popular success of any religious subject picture during the past quarter of a century.

This was the only success of its kind, it may be added, that Mr. Thomson, who was an art teacher in the North of London, ever achieved. Mr. Lucas gave him commissions for several other religious or semi-religious subjects, but none of them ever "caught on" with the public. Painting portraits, for which he had some local reputation, and holding classes in his own house as well as at some of the middle-class schools of North London, Mr. Thomson had probably not sufficient leisure to do full justice to the talent which "The First Christmas Morn" undoubtedly shows him to have possessed.

There is no falling off in the fervour with which Christmas is celebrated in our churches, and in his recent pictures Mr. Percy Tarrant has shown practical recognition of the fact. With the old traditional Christmas the village church is inseparably associated, but nowadays the towns contain vastly more people than the country, and Mr. Tarrant is up to date in every detail. The artist lives at Clapham, and any of the leading places of worship in that London suburb might have given him the subject for both "Christmas Morning" and "A Yule-tide Carol." Both pictures were painted with the definite view of reproduction in black and white, and in this form they are widely popular. Mr. Tarrant has done a great deal of black and white work himself, as our own pages have frequently shown, but if he were to follow his real bent he would confine himself to oils and water-colour, with figure painting as his serious occupation, and landscape as a pastime.

In France, Christmas has lost its old place in the popular imagination much more completely than in England. As was to be expected, the season of Noel is almost non-existent as a subject for French art. The catalogues of the salon during the past twenty years afford only two exceptions, I believe—M. Jules Breton's "The Christmas Turkey" and M. José Frappa's "Santa Claus: a Symbol." Both works are far removed from the reverent spirit in which the subject of Christmas is usually regarded in this country. M. Breton's picture is a very unattractive representation of the killing of a turkey in a snow-covered farmyard, although, regarded simply from an artistic standpoint, it is doubtless quite worthy of the high fame of the distinguished artist whose studies of French rural life have for many years been one of the features of the salon. M. Frappa's "Symbol" is a bicycle, ridden by Santa Claus, laden with the children's presents, and the incongruity of the idea is not fully excused by the painting, excellent as this is. Of Christmas, as the English people know it and love it, the French artist, like the rest of his countrymen, can still have no conception.

(From the Painting by Joseph Clark.)

THE CHRISTMAS DOLE.

Why I am an Abstainer.

By the Venerable Basil Wilberforce, D.D., Archdeacon of Westminster.

THE Editor of THE QUIVER asks me to state why I am an abstainer: it would perhaps be more to the point to ask: Why, thirty years ago, did I, or any-one like-minded, become an abstainer? In those days the practice was attended by certain inconveniences. Sir Benjamin Richardson had not delivered the Cantor lectures; Sir Victor Horsley had not denounced alcohol and all its works from the highest standpoint of science; friends warned us that we should die; men of standing in the churches accused us of substituting dependence on a pledge for the grace of God, of casting a stigma upon the initiatory ordinance of Christianity by a repetition of the baptismal vow; and one leading religious newspaper gravely proposed that all total abstainers should be excommunicated. "The thoughts of men have widened." To become a total abstainer to-day is not only recognised as a laudable fruit of Christian charity, but also as the wise adoption of a rule of diet guaranteeing the healthiest physical life. Thirty years ago the impulse to become a pledged abstainer from alcohol was wholly moral; it originated in a keen realisation of the fact that humanity is an organic unity, in which "each is bound to do for all what he alone does best." The suggestion of an awakened conscience was emphasised by the consideration of that stirring utterance in the tenth verse of the prophecy of Obadiah, "For the violence done to thy brother, shame shall cover thee in the day that thou stoodest on the other side." And thus we became total abstainers, regardless of the baneful consequences with which we were threatened.

If experience has made the practice of total abstinence easier, the same experience has added cogency to the utterance of the prophet. Broader theological conceptions, and keener realisation of the solidarity of the race, have necessitated a wider assent to the declaration, "For the violence done to thy brother, shame shall cover thee in the day that thou stoodest on the other side."

What, in the long history of humanity, has ever been, in reality, the greatest evil?

It is not for the purpose of framing an epigram, but because I believe it to be absolutely true, both to Scripture and philosophy, that I express my belief that the greatest evil in this world, throbbing as it is with the fever of mortal sin, is "standing on the other side"—Christian indifference to the existence and purpose of evil; the crust of criminal apathy, of guilty acquiescence, which the worship of self causes to encase the heart, blinding the eyes to man's greatest charge in this little life—namely, his individual responsibility towards God and towards that humanity in which God has expressed Himself and which He has called His child.

The attitude of the truly great man is never that of indifference to this responsibility. When violence is done to his brother, he is never found standing on the other side, or, as the margin translates it, "aloof."

Daniel Webster, when Secretary of State for America, was asked upon a public occasion what was the most important fact that had ever occupied his mind, and he replied, without hesitation. "My individual responsibility towards God." A man who can thus reply, thus think, possesses the Divine enthusiasm for humanity, and will be found on the right side. The man who thinks not thus knows little of moral reform of noble enterprise, and when violence is done to his brother he is too timid to protest, too selfish to stoop to share the cross, too covetous of popularity to denounce the wrong, too cowardly to face openly the oppressor; and for him there remains the withering condemnation implied in the verdict, "For the violence done to thy brother, shame shall cover thee in the day that thou stoodest on the other side."

THE CHRISTMAS DOLE.
(From the Painting by Josef Israels.)

XUM

I consider, then, the masterpiece of evil to be indifference to evil in the churches, and the crown and consummation of sin to be accomplished when the people of God cease to be aggressive and refuse to hear the cry of them that have no helper.

This, to me, contains the only key which can even partially unlock the mystery of the dark side of creation. To believe in a Supreme Omnipotence whose name is Love is to disbelieve in the co-existence of absolute good and absolute evil in the same world. Whatever evil may be, I am irrevocably convinced that it cannot be unending, that it cannot exist apart from God's sanction, that it could not have originated except in some mystic manner by the direct permission of Him "without Whom was not anything made that was made"; that for purposes of wisdom, which we are not able to explain fully, it is permitted to shock, terrify, and revolt us. But to endeavour to account for it by inventing another power, God's equal and God's enemy, is worse than an idle dream; it is a paralysing superstition, the destroyer of hope, of effort, of aspiration.

Moreover, I contend that the simplest analysis of humanity proves that the principle called evil, which has been the puzzle of the philosopher and the perplexity of the theologian, has proved, under the Divine overrule, the bugle-call to activity, the training ground for the athletes of God, the awakener to keep good on the alert, the schoolmaster for the formation of character, the scourge to eradicate selfishness. I contend that without it pity, tenderness, self-sacrifice, endurance, fortitude, resignation, forgiveness—pearls of wondrous beauty—would never have been called into existence; and, while I confess that the world would be perfect if men always chose good rather than evil, that they would be better—or, indeed, could have any rational existence as moral beings at all—unless the possibility of evil was presented to them I utterly deny.

It is not, then, evil in itself that is, so to speak, evil; it is the refusal to recognise it as the stimulus to do good that is the crown and consummation of guilt. To look down into the depths of distress and not care to relieve it, to live in the midst of records of misery and crime and feel not one jot or tittle of responsibility towards it, is a greater sin than the shame and curse and defilement into which so many are born as an inheritance.

I say it with full consciousness of the solemnity of the utterance, but, granting that what is called the Fall of man was evil, assuming God's attitude towards sin to be what the Bible represents, for Him to have gazed into the repelling hopeless mass of sin-stricken humanity and not to have become Incarnate, to redeem, sanctify, and save, would have been a greater evil than the evil of the Fall. And His spirit must pervade His people. "If any man have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of His." The greatest sin, therefore, is not to care about sin; the greatest evil is for the professor of the religion initiated at Bethlehem, sealed on Calvary, vivified on the first Easter morning, and universalised at Pentecost, to have no part in the struggle between darkness and light, "to stand on the other side" when violence is done to his brother.

Statesmen sometimes have spoken contemptuously of the "Reubens" of politics, of the cowardly neutrality of men who stand aloof when their brethren are struggling for liberty and life. The "Reubens" of the Church are the mildew of the world; and when they refuse to lift one finger to provide a remedy for the festering mass of guilt and disease in which their brethren are overwhelmed, the ancient denunciation glows and burns with new fire as the verdict is recorded, "For the violence done to thy brother, shame shall cover thee in the day that thou stoodest on the other side."

Obviously, this obligation rests upon all religious corporations; but if there is a community on God's earth to whom the words apply with searching force, it is to the members of the privileged, powerful, influential Church of England, with her open door to every home in the land, from the throne to the hovel, and her exceptional position as the authorised teacher of the nation. And if there is a notorious wrong and violence done to a brother, indifference to which is shameful and criminal, it is the wrong done to the masses of the people of England by the immense accumulation of the power of the traffic in intoxicating drink. On such a subject there is nothing new to tell, for all eyes can read and all intelligences estimate the evidence; it is simply the old record of social demoralisation, political corruption, obstructed education, blighted morality, and national deterioration. Strong drink was never known in England, in quantity or in quality, to be more perilous than it is at this moment; the distribution of the immense brewing and distilling concerns—those wholesale manufactories of widows, orphans, and broken hearts—into joint-stock companies, the circulation of their shares into hundreds of needy hands, has increased the peril by rooting the plague more deeply into the monetary self-interest of the national life. Defenders and proprietors of the drink system are multiplied, and the plague marches on. And so powerful has the vast liquor monopoly become politically that we are now positively threatened with legislation the effect of which will be to create, for the first time in the history of our country, a vested interest in a licence. So soon has Lord Rosebery's prophecy come to its fulfilment, "If the State does not control the liquor traffic, the liquor traffic will control the State."

What means the pauperism in wealthy London which Mr. Charles Booth has been revealing in his recent publications? Is not this destitution the logical outcome, the inevitable reaping, of the reckless multiplication of public-houses and gin palaces in the poorest districts of the metropolis? Did not Samuel Morley, the friend of the people, the whole-hearted philanthropist, declare, after years of close study, that three-fourths of the distress of London were preventable, as being the direct effect of drink?

We have all been reading with profound interest Mr. Bodley's monumental work on the coronation of Edward VII., and especially his able summary of the reign of Queen Victoria.

It would be a valuable contribution to the literature of the subject to produce from authoritative statistics a table illustrating the power of alcoholic pollution upon the wealth and well-being of the people of England during the reign of Queen Victoria. Not to touch upon the ruined characters, blighted intelligences, broken hearts, the moral poison infused into the blood of the race, the mere money loss to the nation would be shown to be sufficient to account for all the social disorganisation and financial distress which is so conspicuously exposed by Mr. Booth.

I quote from the figures of one who has often been challenged, but never confuted. The sum is too colossal for realisation—it can only be repeated and wondered at; but the total expenditure in intoxicating liquors during the reign of Queen Victoria amounts in round numbers to £4,712,000,000.

Supposing that the money thus spent had been saved—that the paupers, criminals, lunatics, police, gaolers, etc., instead of being supported by rates levied upon others, had been, as they ought to have been, engaged in useful labour, and that all the idlers and vagrants who roam about the country, or spend their time drinking when they should be working, had been busily employed; and suppose, further, that the accidents, disease, and deaths which have resulted from drinking had been averted, and that the people who have been prematurely cut off, instead of being in their graves had been producing, what a mass of wealth would have been realised! And what boundless comforts would everywhere have been provided for the people's wants!

The best judges are of opinion—and, did space permit, I could give good reasons to show that their opinion is but too correct—that the indirect cost and losses resulting from our habits of drinking are at least equal to the money directly spent upon the drink. This would double the £4,712,000,000, and give us a total loss of £9,424,000,000. I will, however, to be within the mark, and by way of allowance for the revenue, etc., which is derived from alcoholic liquors, estimate the indirect loss only at one-half, or £2,356,000,000, and, adding this to the direct expenditure, it still gives £7,068,000,000 as being the cost and loss thus resulting from the liquor traffic. Add to this more than half a century of wife beating, murders, child starving, lunacy, and despair, and you have the dark side of the condition of England during the reign of the best sovereign who ever occupied the throne.

When will our legislators see—when will the Church force them to see—that national heart disease is not curable by improved dwellings, or preferential tariffs, or old-age pensions; that nothing will ever heal the wound of England's national life but an altered attitude towards England's national sin and its prolific causes; that other remedies are but fooling and child's play whilst the gigantic curse remains; that the petty tinkering with symptoms with which statesmen and philanthropists have hitherto been content is but time wasted, while the working classes alone are spending some forty millions every year (as much as all they pay for rent) in maddening, pauperising, wasteful drink?

If it were possible to flash into the mind of every Christian reader of this paper a single glimpse of the child misery occasioned by drink—of the starved, beaten, cursed, kicked, mutilated, demoralised little ones of our great cities, neutrality towards so gigantic a curse would be no longer possible. The powerful voice of the late Dean of Canterbury uttered in the pulpit of Westminster Abbey these burning words: "While threats and blows resound in that curse-laden air, the children—the ragged, miserable, half-starved, degraded children—the children who will grow up hereafter to recruit the ranks of the felon and the harlot, huddle together in mute terror. They do not cry; such children seldom do shed tears. Nature could never furnish a fountain to meet such demands. Often they make their escape into cellar or chimney, or hide themselves under the rotting heap of rags or straw, and do not venture to creep out, half suffocated, till the drink-maddened fiend whom they call 'father' is away, or till he has slept off for a time the vitriol madness. And in most of our large towns there are whole streets, and alleys, and districts of such drunkards' homes—infamous streets which hide hundreds of blighted families, the disgrace of our civilisation and the disgrace of our Christianity. The only things which flourish there are the public-houses, which, confronting the minimum of virtue with the maximum of temptation, drain from the wretched neighbourhood its last life; and, like the fungus on the decaying tree, feed on the ruin which is their boon.

We have heard much of 'Horrible London,' and of the bitter cry of its abject. What makes these slums so horrible? I answer, with the certainty and the confidence of one who knows, Drink! And what is the remedy? I tell you that every remedy you attempt will be a miserable failure; I tell the nation, with the conviction founded on experience, that there will be no remedy till you save these outcasts from the temptations of drink. Leave the drink, and you might build palaces for them in vain. Leave the drink, and before a year was over your palaces would still reek with dirt and squalor, with infamy and crime. Of the trade in general, which ministers to this temptation, I will say nothing; but at least in such vile streets as these, whence, day and night, this bitter cry of abject cities rings in the ears of the Lord God of Sabaoth, I should have thought that any man who believes in God, that any man who calls himself a Christian, would have been not ashamed only, but afraid to swell those geysers of curse and ruin."

No man or woman working for God amongst the masses of the population can fail to be penetrated with a conviction of the truth of these words. This Judas drug, which kisses before it betrays, replies constantly in the affirmative to the touching query, "Can a woman's tender care cease towards the child she bare?" Enslaved by alcohol, the kindest mother's heart is changed into a stone. A mother in Lancashire, besotted with strong drink, sits over the fire with her infant in her arms. Mechanically she turns up its garments and holds the little feet to the blaze, and falling into a heavy narcotic slumber, which no shrieks of pain can disturb, she becomes unconsciously the murderer of her own child. A mother in a provincial town returns to her home maddened with whisky. After angry altercation with her husband, she hurls at him a lighted paraffin lamp, which falls upon the bed where her two boys of five and six are quietly slumbering. One is burnt to death where he lies; the other is carried shrieking in agony to the hospital, to linger a few days in suffering unspeakable till death comes to his relief. Is there anything effeminate, fanatical, or absurd in an eye-witness of such a scene of misery as this registering a vow that a drug potential for such dire destruction shall never in any form pass his lips again?

To look abroad and note the fiery tracks of the besetting sin of this nation, to which has been committed in a special manner the stewardship of the Gospel, is to be confronted with a problem likely to tax the whole energy of the Church. The Colonial Temperance Conference, held some years ago in Prince's Hall, London, lifted a corner of the veil, and elicited from the two then Archbishops a protest, which we hoped at the time would have been preliminary to more zealous action. The King of the Maories touchingly described, by an illustration drawn from nature, the wholesale destruction of his people through the imported vices of the white men. "Before the white men came," he said to Sir George Bowen, "the beautiful honey birds flitted from flower to flower like feathered jewels, thrusting their long tongues into the flowers, and sharing the sweetness with the stingless native bee. But the white man came, and with him came the European honey bee with its deadly sting, and the unsuspecting birds, thrusting their tongues into the flowers, were stung to the death, until the species has become extinct. It is thus that you English have destroyed us; our simple people have thrust their tongues into your strong drink, and it has stung them to the death, and they are perishing off the face of the earth."

Now it is just here that the place of personal total abstinence comes in. The time will come assuredly, if the nation is not to sink into nothingness, when the labour of reformers, and the spread of education, and the continued extension of the franchise will bear fruit in the determination of the masses no longer to permit the world to be turned into a jail or a hell for them, that brewers and distillers may become millionaires and peers. But the Christian who is in any measure a partaker of the Divine distress in human misery cannot wait till the Gallios are awakened; experience, ten thousand times confirmed, has proved that absolute, uncompromising total abstinence from that which has ensnared him is the only cure for the intemperate. And that these may be encouraged, shielded, uplifted, and saved, the followers of Christ feel impelled to be "bound with them" in the bonds of total abstinence. The most effective remedial agency in Great Britain at this moment is the total abstinence movement. It is not based primarily upon scientific argument, though every honest conclusion from science is in its favour. It is not rooted and grounded upon the amelioration of the temporal condition of the working classes, though happiness and prosperity inevitably follow in its train. Though it is true that total abstinence prolongs more lives than all the doctors in Europe, saves more money than all the savings banks in Great Britain, prevents more crime than all the policemen of the United Kingdom, yet it is not upon these grounds that its claim is based. It demands attention from the Christian Church inasmuch as it is the literal carrying out of the inspired command, "Remember them that are in bonds as bound with them," and "It is good not to drink wine if it cause thy brother to offend."

On these grounds total abstinence is unassailable. It is not hampered with the contention that alcohol is evil in itself, or that it is intrinsically sinful to partake of a glass of wine; but it is a voluntary assumption of the principle underlying the second commandment—namely, that in times of the exceptional prevalence of certain forms of evil, safety requires total abstinence from that which in different circumstances might be legitimate. Though sculpture and painting were not evil in themselves, there was no safety to a race semi-barbarised by long slavery amongst image worshippers save in the command, "Thou shalt not make any graven images." To those saturated, pauperised, dominated by the drink idolatry, there is no safety save in the rule, "Thou shalt not touch any alcohol"; and as there is no law to compel, the Gospel principle pleads with the strong to stoop to the level of the weak, and, by leading the way and setting the example, "bear their burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ."

Tens of thousands have joined the total abstinence movement, of all classes, all ranks of society. They repent not of their decision. It is peace giving, because it separates from complicity with the evil; health giving, because it keeps the system free from an unreal stimulation and a deceptive anodyne; philanthropic, because it swells public opinion against the blighting curse of millions; Christ-like, because it involves in its inception a certain denial of self, a minute measure of reproach, a likeness to Him who restored a lost world not by dictating plausible moralities to it from a sapphire throne in Heaven, but by laying aside His own glory, making Himself "of no reputation," assuming the nature of the sinner, and, amidst the sneers of Pharisees, the indifference of Sadducees, and the cowardly absence of professing disciples, dying upon the cross.

In company, therefore, with tens of thousands of my fellow-men and women, I am an abstainer not because I believe alcohol to be the devil in solution, but because it is written, "For the violence done to thy brother, shame shall cover thee on the day that thou stoodest on the other side," and because it is written again, "We that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not to please ourselves, for even Christ pleased not Himself."

THE MARQUISE RING.

A Single-Chapter Story by Nora O'Mahony.

"ARE you sure that you couldn't have put it into one of your pockets, John?" Mrs. Carew asked anxiously.

"Quite sure, my dear! Haven't I tried at least a dozen times? Those are the clothes I wore yesterday, too."

"I know, but men have such a ridiculous number of pockets, they never know where to look for anything!" She spoke a trifle crossly.

"Here, then, try my waistcoat pockets yourself; it isn't likely I should put it anywhere else. But, Emily, you were always a deal too careless about that ring! How many times have I not picked it up about the house, and hidden it away, just to give you a caution about your carelessness!" It was his turn to be impatient now.

"It wasn't that I was careless, but too careful, I think, because I didn't like to wear it while I'd be washing my hands, or making bread, or messing about the kitchen, fearing the stones would get loose and fall out."

"Kitty knows nothing of it, I suppose?"

"She says not; but, between ourselves, John, I have my doubts. I have often seen her looking at that ring with a kind of longing, and only last Sunday the minx had the audacity to put it on her finger, and to wear it all the afternoon."

"That's your carelessness again! to leave it lying in her way. But don't allow any false suspicions of Kitty to enter your mind. I often think you are a deal too hard on her. The child is as good as gold, and you may safely believe anything she tells you. It will turn up presently, no doubt, when you least expect to find it. Good-bye now, dear; I'll be back as early as possible." John Carew kissed his wife's cheek in somewhat mechanical fashion, put on his hat and coat, and hurried off to his business in the City.

Mrs. Carew, a handsome, stout, sandy-haired woman of middle age, was her husband's second wife. His first had died within a few years of their marriage, leaving him one little son, David, to make somewhat less desolate his great loneliness. David was a bright, golden-haired lad of eight or nine when his father one day received a telegram informing him of the serious illness of Mary Stanley, who was a distant cousin of his own, and a young widow with only one child. Her husband had died suddenly some years before, leaving his widow quite unprovided for. By lace-making she had tried to earn a very modest living for herself and her baby-girl, but if it had not been for John Carew's unobtrusive kindness, it was more than doubtful if she had been able to keep body and soul together. So in her extremity, and having no other friend to turn to for help, she had sent to him to come to her before she died. This was how it came that a few days afterwards John Carew had carried home the little gipsy-eyed, black-haired, five-year-old Kitty to be a welcome companion and playfellow to his own fair-haired boy. The two children were very happy together, and became devoted to each other.

Then one day, about ten years before the time at which our story opens, Mr. Carew had brought home a new wife, to be a companion and housekeeper to himself and a mother to his motherless boy and the little gipsy-eyed cousin.

The new Mrs. Carew had not been blessed with any children of her own, which was perhaps the reason she was so little tolerant of childish ways and noise. However, for David, now grown a young man and gone away to sea, she had in time developed an almost genuine affection. But Kitty, with her shy, reserved, proud little ways, she never could come to look upon as anything but an unwelcome intruder; though wisdom had taught her not to obtrude this opinion too glaringly on her husband's more generous mind.

She was very jealous of his evident affection for the little girl, who as she grew up became more useful and helpful every day, and loved above all things to attend on "dear Uncle John," as she called him, though in reality the relationship between them was nothing nearer than cousinship. Mrs. Carew often found, to her intense chagrin, that Kitty had anticipated his wishes and wants before she herself had discovered them. David's affection, too, for his cousin was something of a thorn in her side; she felt that the girl had ousted her from the position she should rightfully have held in both men's hearts. She was captious and jealous by nature, with the hot, ungovernable temper which is said to be the heritage of red-haired people: purse-proud too, having come of a well-to-do family, and having brought her husband a handsome fortune; and yet she could be mean and niggardly to a degree. Mentally she regarded poor Kitty as nothing better than "an almshouse brat," though she hitherto had not dared to whisper it above her breath.

To-day, after her husband had gone away, she felt intensely irritable. The lost ring, an extremely handsome "marquise" of diamonds and sapphires, had cost a great deal of money, and had been a recent present from her husband. For the twentieth time she searched every drawer and possible hiding-place in her own room, and indeed through the whole house, but without effect. She went at last in search of Kitty to ask her again if she knew anything of the lost ring. Kitty was sitting on her bed, humming a tune, and trimming a new spring hat with bunches of violets and velvet ribbon. It increased Mrs. Carew's annoyance and irritation tenfold to find her so carelessly and happily employed.

"Well, so this is what you are at!" she said bitterly, "while I have been spending my morning looking everywhere for my ring! Tell me the truth, now, girl! Are you quite sure you know nothing of it?"

Kitty flushed red and shamefaced at the vindictive, accusing tone.

"Why, of course, Aunt Emily, I know nothing about it. Surely you don't think I do?"

"I am not sure at all about it! What business had you ever to handle the ring, much less to wear it? You know I caught you wearing it more than once."

"I am very sorry, aunt. I only picked it up when I found it lying about, and it was so pretty that I had to try it on. But I have not seen it since you last wore it—really, Aunt Emily, I have not!"

"How can I believe you? Just turn out all your boxes and drawers now, and let me see if you have hidden it away. The ring has disappeared, at any rate, and who else would have taken it? Not Mary, surely, after all these years here!"

Mary was the one servant of the establishment, and had been there since David was a baby in arms. It was only the strength of her affection for "Master David" and the "old master" that had kept her faithful to the household during all those years, despite the exacting and ill-tempered ways of the new mistress.

Kitty's face flushed painfully under the cruel accusation, and her eyes filled up with hot tears.

"How can you say such things, Aunt Emily?" she said, choking back an angry sob. "Here are my keys. I'll open any drawer for you, and you can see for yourself if I have taken your ring and hidden it away."

Mrs. Carew was already rummaging the drawers, opening each box and looking hurriedly through it, and throwing all Kitty's treasured belongings in a careless heap on the floor. After vainly searching amongst them she stood up at last to go, treading heavily on one of Kitty's most precious trinkets as she did so. It was a tiny gold locket, containing in one side a miniature of Kitty's mother with herself a baby on her knee; in the other a portrait of her father—a dark, handsome, intellectual-looking man.

As she heard the glass crunch beneath her aunt's careless footsteps, Kitty gave a little cry of pain and anger. In a moment she was on her knees, weeping as she picked up the broken fragments. The gold locket was crushed out of shape, the miniature paintings broken into tiny pieces, and for ever hopelessly defaced!

"How dare you, Aunt Emily!" the girl cried hotly. "Oh! how could you be so cruel! What will Uncle John think when I tell him?"

The woman glared at her angrily. This open defiance and accusation were something entirely new to her.

"You had better go and tell him at once, perhaps. Don't dare threaten me with your Uncle John, you impertinent minx," she cried in a burst of fury. "Your 'Uncle John,' as you call him, is a fool. If he were not, he would never have taken a workhouse brat like you into his house, to rob respectable people, and then dare to flout them." She turned back again at the door. "Let me tell you, young person, if that ring isn't restored before nightfall, I'll call the police in. Perhaps when you are in gaol you'll think better of giving it up."

She went out at last and banged the door noisily behind her, leaving Kitty still kneeling on the floor, in an agony of shame and trouble and bitter indignation. She had borne a long time with her aunt's harshness and evident dislike, but never before had the latter revealed the hidden depths of her hatred.

The girl knelt long that morning at her bedside, weeping bitterly, with her face buried in her hands, seeking vainly for consolation and telling herself again and again she could not be happy another day under Aunt Emily's roof. There was no one she could turn to to tell of her trouble. That threat, too, of her aunt's about calling in the police, absurd as it seemed, left her horribly frightened and miserable.

That night, when Mr. Carew came home to dinner, Kitty's room was empty: the girl was nowhere to be found. A few of her things had been taken away, evidently hurriedly packed in a bundle. There was not as much as a line left to tell him where she had gone to.

John Carew was in a state of frenzy over his "little Kitty's" disappearance. His wife, too, was much upset by this unexpected result of her fit of temper, though she took good care to hide from her husband her own share in the business. At heart, perhaps, she was glad to be rid of the girl, and told herself, and indeed hinted openly, that this was the last proof wanting as to the person who had stolen her ring. But though her husband advertised, and hunted everywhere for news of the girl's hiding-place, neither Kitty nor the ring were anywhere to be found.

More than a year passed by—not as happily for Mrs. Carew as she might perhaps have expected. True, she was rid of Kitty's presence in the house, but it did not make her any the happier. Her husband had been a changed man since the day of the girl's disappearance. He suspected that his wife had had more to do with that disappearance than she cared to acknowledge, and in consequence he had grown cold and silent and openly distrustful of her.

David, too, when he came home for his first long holiday, and found that Kitty was gone, was very angry, and openly accused his stepmother of having purposely got rid of the girl. Since that first holiday he had not cared to come a second time. He seemed to have taken a bitter dislike to his father's wife, which intensified John Carew's gloominess a hundredfold. Mrs. Carew, moving restlessly about her household duties, or sitting at her work in the evening, watching with an aching heart her silent and inert husband, felt sometimes that she would have given all she possessed in the world to have had the despised and disliked Kitty safely back again.

It happened about this time that Mr. Carew, who never missed an opportunity of doing a good turn when he could, sent home one day a workman to make some alterations in the garden behind his house. The man seemed hungry and ill-clad—having been a long time out of work—and it was more for kindness' sake than from any necessity that Mr. Carew had given him a few days' employment.

When the work was finished and the man had been paid, John Carew told his wife to gather some of his own old clothes in a bundle, and give them to "the poor fellow, who hadn't a decent rag to his back." Mrs. Carew was of a nature to allow such things to grow moth-eaten and green from age rather than give them away to any poor creature for nothing. However, she must do as she was told.

She selected an old suit of her husband's, carefully picking out one that was well worn. She looked doubtfully and regretfully at the buttons, saying to herself that they might easily prove useful for something else, and, taking a scissors in hand, began clipping them off. Her husband meanwhile regarded her with a grim and critical gaze, which but partly veiled a look of contempt.

As she removed each button carefully, she suddenly felt, at the bottom of the waistcoat in the left-hand corner, below the pockets, something hard and round. Without seeking to guess in the least what it might be, she unearthed, with the help of the scissors, from between many folds of cloth and lining

"'Forgive me, Kitty; forgive me, child!'"—p. 142.

—the long-lost marquise ring! It had slipped through a hole in the pocket and remained hidden there ever since!

Mrs. Carew could only look at her husband in open-mouthed astonishment, and with an ever-increasing sense of guilt. This was what she had accused poor Kitty of stealing, the ring which had become lost through her own criminal carelessness! Her husband had doubtless picked up the ring somewhere, and put it absent-mindedly in his pocket, as he had often done before.

She felt dumfounded and utterly ashamed. Presently, out of the trouble of her mind grew a determination that she would know no rest till she had found Kitty and made atonement.

But where could she turn to look for her now? That was the trouble. Mr. Carew and David had exhausted every effort to find her, and in vain. It was hardly likely that she would succeed where they had failed.

But one day, a few months afterwards, she herself suddenly came upon Kitty in the simplest and most unexpected way. She was doing some shopping, and as she waited for the attendant to bring her the piece of material she had especially asked for, her attention was caught by something familiar in the figure of a young girl who sat near her, accompanied by a handsome little boy. The girl, whose back was turned towards Mrs. Carew, was inspecting some muslins displayed for her selection; her black dress was somewhat shabby, though neat and tidy, and the little collar and cuffs of white lace were scrupulously fresh and clean, giving an air of daintiness and refinement to their wearer. She wore a black straw hat trimmed with violets and purple velvet. It was the very hat that Kitty was trimming on the day when she had accused her of theft.

In a moment she was standing before the girl with pleading eyes and trembling, outstretched hands. Kitty looked up at the face above her, with its sadly aged and sorrowful look, and her own softened.

"Forgive me, Kitty; forgive me, child!" Mrs. Carew was saying. "Oh, Kitty, won't you come back to us? We all want you—Uncle John, and I, and David—oh, so badly! The house has never been the same since you left it. I found the ring after all, and now I know what a wicked, cruel, bad woman I was to accuse you of stealing it."

She paused for breath, and then went on again, without waiting to be answered:

"Oh, Kitty, come back; come home! If you knew how Uncle John has missed you, and David! David has only been home once since you went away. He blamed me for your going, and hates me. Where have you been all this time? We have searched everywhere for you. Oh, Kitty, forgive me, and come home!"

She stopped at last, breathless from the long, pleading speech. Big tears were rolling quickly down the lined and strangely faded cheeks; her voice had choked and grown inarticulate with sobs which she vainly tried to suppress. The little boy in Kitty's charge looked up at her in childish awe and wonder. The shop attendant coughed uneasily.

Kitty took the shaking hand in hers—she wanted badly to cry too, and felt she could not say much to her just then. But her tear-filled eyes and happy smile showed the woman plainly that she was forgiven. She would not let Kitty go, however, till she had given a promise to come and see her uncle that very evening.

The result of that visit was that in a few weeks' time Kitty had given up, not without some tearful and tender regrets on her side as well as his, the tuition of the little boy with whom her aunt had met her. It had been her first and only situation as governess, and she had grown so fond of her little charge that only for her Uncle John's pleadings, and Aunt Emily's self-accusings, and perhaps also because of a haunting desire to see Cousin David at home once more, she would never have wished to give him up.

No mother could have been more kind or more tender than Mrs. Carew proved to be after that. It appeared as though her whole nature had undergone a complete change during those unhappy months when Kitty seemed lost and dead to them all.

Years afterwards, when Kitty and David were happily married, and Kitty had a beautiful little boy of her own who reminded her at times of the curly-headed little lad who had been her first and only pupil, Mrs. Carew fell suddenly ill and died. The whole of her fortune was bequeathed to "Mrs. Catherine Carew" and to her heirs after her, while of the many personal gifts left to her husband, in trust for Kitty, not the least valued was the handsome marquise ring, studded with diamonds and sapphires, which had been the cause of so much trouble, and, in the end, of so much happiness to them all.

XUM

THE CHARITIES OF CHILDREN.

By E. S. Curry.

THERE is an old woodcut in "Cassell's Encyclopædia" representing Edward VI. at an open window, listening to the sermons of Bishop Latimer. The boy King was led from what he heard to found and endow several hospitals in London — Bethlehem being one of them—tor the sick and suffering. Is this the earliest record of a child's charity?

Nearly forty years ago, the author of "Parables from Nature," in her Aunt Judy's Magazine, named after her own child, asked for the sympathy and help of her young readers in the founding and endowing of an "Aunt Judy's" Cot in the Hospital for Sick Children, the mother of all such hospitals. This was followed by others, founded under the same auspices, their record being:

1868. The "Aunt Judy's Magazine" Cot for Girls. Founded in perpetuity by the Readers of Aunt Judy's Magazine by payment of £1,000.

1876. The "Aunt Judy's Magazine" Cot for Boys. Founded in perpetuity by the Readers of Aunt Judy's Magazine by payment of £1,000.

1885. The "Aunt Judy's Magazine" Cot, in memory of Mrs. Gatty and her daughter, Mrs. Ewing (Aunt Judy), for a like sum.

Thus began the organised enlisting of the children in the work of charity.

If you want anything done, "Ask the children." seems to be the same all over the world. The loving little hearts and fingers have pressed on their eager claim to share in their elders' care for others. In ever-increasing proportions, and in widely varied forms, the "Charities of the Children," poor as well as rich, have become an appreciable contribution to the charity of the world.

What can the children do?

Their record is simply amazing. It includes such varied objects as the maintenance of Cots in Hospitals for Sick Children and the purchase and support of Missionary Ships; the support of deformed and afflicted children in Homes and Orphanages, and the giving help and pleasure to many such in their own homes; the support of a School of Industries for the Blind in Alexandria, and of a Chapel for the Red Indians in South Dakota; the founding of Coffee Houses and Drinking Fountains; Memorials to the dead soldiers of the War, and teaching and bringing up their orphaned children; apprenticing boys to trades, and outfitting girls for service; providing boots and clothing and holidays for such as would have none; brightening children's lives by the simple means of a letter or magazine or toy; helping the Indian Famine Fund, and supporting and training native children; providing scholarships for boys and girls in India, China, Japan, Canada, South Africa, etc., and the adoption of such children for education and start in life. And these are not nearly all the outlets for the children's work. All the Missionary Societies enlist the help of children, either through the Sunday Schools or by special organisations.

Perhaps the simplest way of learning something of this "Children's Charity" will be to look at some of the different works in their order of starting. It will be noticed how one effort has always led to another, in perhaps a slightly different direction, as needs, not already grasped in full, became manifest. And closely connected with the children's work—indeed, helping it on in a way which would not otherwise have been possible—must be reckoned the help of the magazines and papers which identified themselves with its success; giving it splendid impulse and encouragement. Following Aunt Judy, the Editor of Little Folks in 1882 started his little readers in the same good work, in which example he has been followed by other papers which include children among their clientèle.

Cots in Hospitals for Children seem so natural an object to interest children that it was no wonder that they became at first the favourite objects of our young people's work. "A little child that we can pay for!" the children say with delight; and the foundation of "The Children's Association in aid of the North-Eastern Hospital for Children" responded to this desire of the children. It was two-sided in its aim: it wished "to promote an interest among the children of the upper classes in the welfare of the children of the poor; and to encourage the use of the talents and leisure time of children, so as to be of practical benefit, by providing funds for the maintenance of the hospital and its offshoots.

1882. Twenty years ago, the Editor of Little Folks asked his readers to collect £1,000 to found a cot in the East London Hospital in Shadwell. Before the year was over £2,000 had been received. A cot was also founded in the North-Eastern Hospital for Children; and now a ward in the same hospital has been completed and six cots endowed. In many other ways the Little Folks children work. The establishment of drinking fountains in Leeds, Glasgow, and Shoreditch is one of their works.

How is it possible for children to do such work? These are some of the ways which the little folks have found possible:—They sell small articles of their own making, hold little sales, or give concerts among their friends, sacrifice their time, and often also their personal enjoyment by giving up their Christmas and birthday presents. One sells her chickens and eggs; another, dolls and sweets; many send clothing and pictures to the children in the hospitals. And these are but samples of what the ingenuity of children can effect.

1885. The Ministering Children's League was founded by the Countess of Meath in her London parish, with the original intention of "teaching and helping the children who compose it to be unselfish, kind, and obedient, inside as well as outside their own home." It began with a little band of children who met in a London drawing-room, and has grown in a very remarkable way, numbering now about 40,000 members. Wherever English folk have gone all over the world the League has penetrated; its simple motto, "No day without a deed to crown it," making it adaptable to all needs and circumstances. Good parents are glad to encourage their children in habits which produce thought and service for others,—especially when the initial rule, suggesting and guiding this service, is for the obedience and charity which make home life beautiful. The President of the League since its foundation has been Prebendary Ridgeway, of Christ Church, Lancaster Gate, to whose help in organisation the League owes much. Its rules are elastic, each branch being free to take up any charity, whether local or special, which appeals most to its members; or to help on the institutions organised from the centre. Of these are the following—a large choice for charity: Convalescent Homes, Homes for Destitute Children, a Hospital, a Chapel, a School of Industries for the Blind, a Home for Epileptic Children. All these, besides other works of mercy too numerous to mention, are the marvellous outcome and result, in the first instance, of the desire of a good woman to save the children of her own class from the misery of selfishness, and to teach them to think of others. So small a seed, as it doubtless seemed to those inaugurating the first little band of children! So large a tree is the result of its eighteen years' work! A short account of the founding of the Egyptian School of Industries, and the Epileptic Home for Children, may be interesting. The former is a school for blind boys, in Cairo, who would without its aid have gone to swell the number of blind beggars so familiar to travellers throughout Egypt. The boys are taught mat- and brush- and basket-making, and are able to sell their work. It is hoped that the present pupils will in turn become teachers, and that many more sufferers will be thus benefited.

The foundation of the Epileptic Children's Home is thus described by Lady Meath, in one of the League's papers:—"During last year two cases of epileptic children in workhouses were brought to my notice. The CHRISTMAS MORNING.

FROM THE PICTURE BY
PERCY TARRANT, BY PERMISSION OF
C. W. FAULKNER & CO., GOLDEN LANE, E.C.,
THE OWNERS OF THE COPYRIGHT.

UNIV. OF MICH.

XUM

first was that of a little girl shut up in a ward where numbers of adult epileptics were sitting together. The child had nothing to do, she was taught nothing, she had no other children to play with. The doctor in attendance pointed her out to me as a case quite unfitted to be in such surroundings, where she was only likely to grow worse instead of better. The other case was still more piteous. I was being taken through the wards of a workhouse, where insane and epileptic patients were confined. In one room were suffering creatures who looked scarcely human. They were a horrible sight to behold. As we passed them, a child came up—she was in the same ward—and extending her hands, piteously cried, 'Take me away! Take me away!' It was heartrending to see the little one's anxiety to get away from such awful surroundings." This appeal was replied to by the founding of the Epileptic Children's Home, Hayling Island. Other works of the League are a Memorial at Capetown to soldiers lost in the War, four soldiers' orphans in training at the League's Training Home at Ottershaw, Coffee Houses, etc. The League has followed the Empire, new branches having already been started at Port Elizabeth and Johannesburg.

1888. The Children's Union of the Church of England Waifs and Strays Society has for its special work the care of the Crippled Children undertaken by the Society. These poor children, by reason of their physical infirmities, are not fit for the ordinary Homes, as they require special medical and surgical attention and treatment. It began by a band of children under Mrs. Crofton, the President of the Children's Union, undertaking the maintenance of one cot in the Society's Home at Tooting, now removed to Byfleet. From this little beginning the Children's Union has grown into its 351 branches, numbering about 11,000 members, and raising £4,000 per annum. It entirely supports three homes, and pays for special cases in two other homes. Thus it provides special treatment for fifty cripples in St.

"TAKE ME AWAY! TAKE ME AWAY!"

Nicholas Home, Byfleet, which is a feeding home for the one at Surbiton, where twenty-two boys over seven are taught tailoring, with a view to earning their living later, when suitable places are found and a start in life given them. Twenty girls in the corresponding home, also fed from the Byfleet Home, are taught machine knitting, basket work, and advanced needlework. Besides these, there is St. Chad's Home at Leeds, for eighty girls physically or mentally unfit for domestic service, where the girls are taught laundry work and machine knitting; and the Bradstock Lockett Homes at Southport for forty children; providing thus Northern and Southern homes for the children. The record of the Children's Union is a wonderful one, not only of work done, but of example and inspiration to similar work, taken up by other societies following closely in its steps.

1889. The Children's League of Kindness for South London interests children in working for children, and tries to provide pleasures as well as substantial and permanent assistance. It supports children in homes, apprentices boys to trades, provides outfits for girls going to service, finds food in cases of sickness or urgent distress, and helps to holidays. Some of its last year's work shows its aims. It supported four boys in a cripples' home, three girls in an orphanage, another in a training home, an incurable child in the Cheyne Hospital, and another with spinal disease, whose mother had used her deformity for begging. Many partly paralysed or injured babies, the help for whom it is hoped may be only temporarily needed, are amongst those who have received its assistance. Its members are expected to supply toys and clothing, but are not asked to give money, which is supplied by their elders, who are associates. All the help is voluntary, and no money is spent in offices or on workers.

1891. The Sunbeam Mission has similar aims, and its work is so simple that many parents, who find it difficult to let their children visit the poor in their homes, welcome its work in arousing their sympathy and help for the sick and suffering. The members are asked to send a magazine to a poor or suffering child in London or some large town; and by means of occasional letters, and the gift of a toy or flowers, or some useful garment, to brighten some poor child's life. No subscriptions are required, the small membership fee of sixpence making the Society self-supporting. In many cases the work thus begun has widened in scope, and the interest established in the little sufferers has been continued in other directions.

1890. The Children's Salon, in connection with The Gentlewoman newspaper, was begun with the motive, in the first instance, of encouraging its members "to work at and develop whatever special talents they possessed, and to use those talents in behalf of others not so happily situated as themselves." The first money thus gathered endowed a cot in the Victoria Hospital for Children, which has been followed by cots in four other children's hospitals. Besides these the Salon has contributed £700 to the Queen Victoria Nurses' Fund, has endowed an emergency fund for the London Schools Dinner Association, and has helped the Irish Distress Fund, the National Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children, Truth Toy Fund, and other charities. The Gentle- woman pays all office, staff, and other working expenses, so that every penny of the Salon proceeds goes to the charity.

GIFTS FROM THE CHILDREN'S LEAGUE OF KINDNESS.

1892. The Young Helpers' League, in connection with Dr. Barnardo's Homes, works for the crippled, deaf and dumb, blind, ailing and incurable children, who, in addition to their destitution or homelessness, are thus heavily handicapped by physical suffering. It helps all Dr. Barnardo's Homes, including

A LITTLE FOLKS' COT.

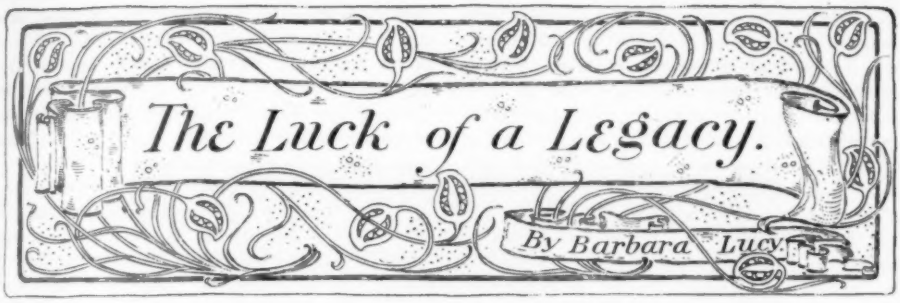
Her Majesty's Hospital for Sick Waifs in Stepney Causeway, the infirmary cottages at the Girls' Village Home, and the hospital at Babies' Castle, also the homes for little incurables at Bradford and Birkdale, the Convalescent Home at Felixstowe, and the Deaf and Dumb Home at Hackney. It supports 322 cots in these hospitals, its members numbering 70,000, living in all parts of the world.

1894. The Children's Sunbeam Society of South Australia was started by a working man, with the object "to be helpful to children, and to teach them to be helpful to one another," in connection with the Adelaide Observer and Evening Journal. Most of his "sunbeams" have not much to spend—a penny, or threepence, or sixpence, generally representing the outside of their powers of giving. But how the small sums have mounted up, and what have they not been able to accomplish! Nearly £5,000 has been raised! Two cots have been founded in the Adelaide Children's Hospital costing £63 per annum, £600 for a crèche has been given, where the children are "minded" whose mothers have to go to work, £1,000 for the Queen Victoria Home for Convalescent Children, several hundred pounds for homes for orphans, and other shelters for the poor and suffering, help for the Indian Famine Fund, for the London Fresh Air Mission, and many other charities, and an annual Christmas meal to some 4,000 children. Truly an imperial charity this one, started by a working man through his love of children, and supported by the "not rich."

1900. The Young Leaguers' Union in connection with Dr. Stephenson's Children's Home and Orphanage collects money by special associations of children, in much the same way and for the same purposes as the Young Helpers' League. In the same way the Sunday School Union uses its Guild of Help to create and maintain interest in Sunday Schools, for helping the country and convalescent homes of the Union. It is quite impossible to tell in adequate detail the story of the wonderful work done by all these associations of children. Those given are merely typical cases.

But we must just glance at the missionary work of the children.



1889. The Sowers' Band of the Church Missionary Society has now nearly 600 bands of children in England, and others in India, Africa, and elsewhere abroad. In Australia it has many bands. It supports two missionaries of its own, and forty-two girls in a boarding-school in China, besides assisting the Society's schools, hospitals, and churches nearly all over the world. The Young Sowers make money by their labour in every conceivable way, boys as well as girls turning their talents to use. One factory girl made £17 one year by the sweets she had made and sold.

1897. The King's Messengers of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts are instructed and examined in missionary knowledge, and after being thus first interested in mission work are then given work to do. It has nearly 700 branches, helping chiefly the women's work, the Zenana, teaching, medical and nursing work of the Society in India and other countries. It also maintains scholarships in the numerous mission schools of the Society throughout India, and in China, Japan, North Canada, the West Indies, South Africa, etc. Some of these schools train the children as teachers or members of other professions, to which by birth they belong, but from which their faith would otherwise exclude them; and they are supported throughout their school career. The King's Messengers also support cots in Indian hospitals. There is a special branch of invalid children, to whom their membership, with its blessed privilege of helping others, is a source of great interest and happiness.

The work of the children in missionary charity continues throughout the year. In each Sunday School of church and chapel as the Sundays come round, the children's pence and farthings are gathered, mounting up to a goodly sum—from £10 to £40 or £50 being a frequent annual collection from each school. The missionary branches of the Baptist, Wesleyan, and Congregational Churches, both in England and Scotland, have also, as well as their Sunday School collections, special associations of young people who collect large sums during the year. The London Missionary Society has a unique work for its children. They buy, fit out, and maintain its missionary ships; surely a wonderful "Children's Charity"!

"ALMOST unaccountable thing!" said Miss Drury, laying down an envelope on the table.

"What's the matter now?" said Miss Mary, looking up, her sharp old face expressing surprise and annoyance. She held big cutting-out scissors in her hand, and had been in the act of calculating how many shirts she could get out of so many yards of stuff, when her sister's remark sent it all out of her head.

"An invitation card for Mr. Buxton's funeral," answered Miss Drury. "I did not even know he had passed away."

"I saw it in the paper," said Miss Catherine gently. Both sisters turned towards her suddenly.

"Then why did you not mention it, Catherine?" Miss Catherine laid down the soft white shawl she was knitting with a little deprecating air.

"Well, I really forgot," she said. "Besides, we only knew him slightly, did we? He was really Robert's friend."

"Yes," admitted Miss Drury, looking at the card again. "I shall certainly not go," she said.

"Nor shall I," said Miss Mary. "Such an expense too."

"We are always in black. We should not have to buy," said Miss Catherine in her soft voice, "and it would show respect to his memory."

"Very well, Catherine. You go, if you feel so strongly about it. For my own part I do not consider it at all necessary."

Accordingly on the appointed day Miss Catherine set out. She returned in time for tea, her manner betraying suppressed excitement. She evidently had important news to impart to her sisters; and Sarah, the maid, had hardly retired downstairs before she began.

"Well, Ellen, it was a good thing I went The reason for the invitation is now plain enough."

"And what is it?" said Miss Drury. "Come, Catherine, do begin; your tea will be quite cold."

"He hasn't—surely he hasn't—no, he can't have!" said Miss Mary incoherently, as a thought suddenly struck her.

Miss Catherine nodded her head gently and impressively.

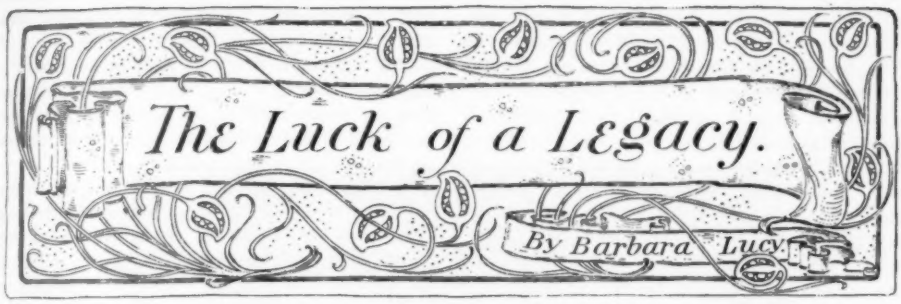
"Yes," she said, "he has left us a legacy."

"Oh!" exclaimed both sisters. "How much?" said Miss Mary.

"Two thousand pounds," said Miss Catherine.

She then related all the incidents of the afternoon, winding up by saying:

"Mr. Truefitt, the lawyer, said we should have to wait a little while, as the property was not realised. When matters are settled we shall receive an intimation."



Two thousand pounds! To these three sisters, buffeted as they had been by the world's storms, it meant a haven of peace and rest from anxiety, to say nothing of the help they would be able to give others. What avenues of charity were now thrown open to them—avenues down which they had often looked longingly through the close-barred gates of poverty! And, most important of all, now they would be able to help Richard. He was their nephew, an orphan they had brought up and cared for since his school-boy days. They had done everything for him, given him the best start in life they could afford; and now he was beginning to feel his way. But it was slow, up-hill work. His prospects could certainly not be called brilliant; and, to crown everything he was in love. Yes, Richard was in love; though he never suspected his aunts knew anything about it, for he had determined to keep the matter entirely to himself. He

two missionaries of its own, and forty-two girls in a boarding-school in China, besides assisting the Society's schools, hospitals, and churches nearly all over the world. The Young Sowers make money by their labour in every conceivable way, boys as well as girls turning their talents to use. One factory girl made £17 one year by the sweets she had made and sold.

1897. The King's Messengers of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts are instructed and examined in missionary knowledge, and after being thus first interested in mission work are then given work to do. It has nearly 700 branches, helping chiefly the women's work, the Zenana, teaching, medical and nursing work of the Society in India and other countries. It also maintains scholarships in the numerous mission schools of the Society throughout India, and in China, Japan, North Canada, the West Indies, South Africa, etc. Some of these schools train the children as teachers or members of other professions, to which by birth they belong, but from which their faith would otherwise exclude them; and they are supported throughout their school career. The King's Messengers also support cots in Indian hospitals. There is a special branch of invalid children, to whom their membership, with its blessed privilege of helping others, is a source of great interest and happiness.

The work of the children in missionary charity continues throughout the year. In each Sunday School of church and chapel as the Sundays come round, the children's pence and farthings are gathered, mounting up to a goodly sum—from £10 to £40 or £50 being a frequent annual collection from each school. The missionary branches of the Baptist, Wesleyan, and Congregational Churches, both in England and Scotland, have also, as well as their Sunday School collections, special associations of young people who collect large sums during the year. The London Missionary Society has a unique work for its children. They buy, fit out, and maintain its missionary ships; surely a wonderful "Children's Charity"!

"ALMOST unaccountable thing!" said Miss Drury, laying down an envelope on the table.

"What's the matter now?" said Miss Mary, looking up, her sharp old face expressing surprise and annoyance. She held big cutting-out scissors in her hand, and had been in the act of calculating how many shirts she could get out of so many yards of stuff, when her sister's remark sent it all out of her head.

"An invitation card for Mr. Buxton's funeral," answered Miss Drury. "I did not even know he had passed away."

"I saw it in the paper," said Miss Catherine gently. Both sisters turned towards her suddenly.

"Then why did you not mention it, Catherine?" Miss Catherine laid down the soft white shawl she was knitting with a little deprecating air.

"Well, I really forgot," she said. "Besides, we only knew him slightly, did we? He was really Robert's friend."

"Yes," admitted Miss Drury, looking at the card again. "I shall certainly not go," she said.

"Nor shall I," said Miss Mary. "Such an expense too."

"We are always in black. We should not have to buy," said Miss Catherine in her soft voice, "and it would show respect to his memory."

"Very well, Catherine. You go, if you feel so strongly about it. For my own part I do not consider it at all necessary."

Accordingly on the appointed day Miss Catherine set out. She returned in time for tea, her manner betraying suppressed excitement. She evidently had important news to impart to her sisters; and Sarah, the maid, had hardly retired downstairs before she began.

"Well, Ellen, it was a good thing I went The reason for the invitation is now plain enough."

"And what is it?" said Miss Drury. "Come, Catherine, do begin; your tea will be quite cold."

"He hasn't—surely he hasn't—no, he can't have!" said Miss Mary incoherently, as a thought suddenly struck her.

Miss Catherine nodded her head gently and impressively.

"Yes," she said, "he has left us a legacy."

"Oh!" exclaimed both sisters. "How much?" said Miss Mary.

"Two thousand pounds," said Miss Catherine.

She then related all the incidents of the afternoon, winding up by saying:

"Mr. Truefitt, the lawyer, said we should have to wait a little while, as the property was not realised. When matters are settled we shall receive an intimation."

Two thousand pounds! To these three sisters, buffeted as they had been by the world's storms, it meant a haven of peace and rest from anxiety, to say nothing of the help they would be able to give others. What avenues of charity were now thrown open to them—avenues down which they had often looked longingly through the close-barred gates of poverty! And, most important of all, now they would be able to help Richard. He was their nephew, an orphan they had brought up and cared for since his school-boy days. They had done everything for him, given him the best start in life they could afford; and now he was beginning to feel his way. But it was slow, up-hill work. His prospects could certainly not be called brilliant; and, to crown everything he was in love. Yes, Richard was in love; though he never suspected his aunts knew anything about it, for he had determined to keep the matter entirely to himself. He was not in a position to marry, would not be for many years, if ever. So he stifled the cravings of his young heart, and when he came home and found bright-faced Phyllis spending the evening with his aunts he tried to behave with a studied cool politeness, although his heart had given a great bound as soon as he heard her sweet voice in the drawing-room. Sometimes it was his duty and painful pleasure to see Phyllis home—once indeed, when it was slippery, she had been obliged to take his arm. Then, indeed, he had had hard work to control himself, but he had done it bravely. Little did he think the girl by his side was almost crying with pity for him and herself.

"There's Richard," said Miss Catherine suddenly as a step was heard in the hall, and the next moment he entered the room. He appeared to have something on his mind this evening. He sat down quietly to his tea, and when the meal was cleared away he leaned back in his chair and gazed thoughtfully at the fire.

"You're looking tired," said Miss Mary sharply. "How's business?"

"Much the same as usual. A chance came along to-day that might have been a good thing—only, of course, it wanted capital."

The sisters exchanged glances.

"How much?" said Miss Mary.

"Oh, from twelve to fourteen hundred pounds."

"But you don't know," said Miss Drury; "perhaps it was not trustworthy or reliable."

"Oh, no fear of that," replied Richard, with a short mirthless laugh, "it was a thoroughly good thing. Old Blackstone is looking out for a partner, and offered the position to me as I had been with him so long. Of course, he might as well have offered me the moon! Well, well! I'm going round to see Reid. Any letters to post?"

Up to a late hour that night the sisters sat discussing their own good fortune and the chance of the partnership.

"I have every confidence in Mr. Blackstone," said Miss Drury. "It really does seem a most providential opening for Richard, and it must be seen about at once, as Mr. Blackstone will doubtless soon find someone else."

How to keep the matter a secret was the puzzle. Richard must never know, or, needless to say, he would never accept the money.

Finally it was resolved Miss Drury should call the next day at Mr. Blackstone's private house, explain the matter fully to him, secure the partnership, saying at the same time that they did not want their names to appear at all in the transaction.

The interview passed off most successfully. Mr. Blackstone, who had a warm regard for Richard, was exceedingly pleased at the turn of affairs, and promised to observe the utmost secrecy.

A week later Richard came home in a great state of jubilation—informed his aunts that the most extraordinary thing had occurred. The money difficulties had all been settled by an unknown benefactor, and Mr. Blackstone had accepted him as partner.

If his aunts failed to be as surprised as they ought to have been, Richard did not notice it. He had drawn his own conclusions, and when Miss Mary said:

"And have you no idea who this unknown benefactor is, Richard?" he replied:

"Oh, I think there's little doubt it's old Blackstone himself—it's just like him. Besides, there is no one else."

He went upstairs to his room after tea, and came down looking remarkably spruce.

"Don't wait up for me," he told his aunts. "I may be late."

"He's going to the Martins'," said Miss Catherine as the front door closed. "He's going to tell Phyllis."

And Phyllis was told that—and other things besides. For she, too, was offered a partnership, though hers was sealed with a kiss; and Richard came home that evening, walking on air, an engaged man at last.

Time passed quickly, Christmas was fast approaching, when one day a note came from Mr. Truefitt saying Mr. Buxton's affairs were now settled, and he would be glad if Miss Drury would call on the following Wednesday.

Miss Catherine was selected to go, as it was she who had seen him on the first occasion. She took her way to Lincoln's Inn Fields a little tremulously, feeling somewhat as if she were going to visit the dentist, although, as she kept repeating to herself, her business was entirely pleasant. Still, it was business, and as she sat in the outer room reading the names of the deed-boxes round the walls, while disinterested clerks wrote at their high desks beside her, she wished the interview well over.

Presently she was ushered into Mr. Truefitt's presence. The little lawyer was extremely affable, prayed Miss Catherine to be seated, wished all his business was of so pleasant a nature, and made other remarks of a like sort.

He had a copy of Mr. Buxton's will before him, and began glancing through it. Suddenly he looked up, saying :

"Of course, your father's Christian names were Robert James ?"

"No," faltered Miss Catherine, seized with an awful dread. "He was named Richard Newton."

"Richard Newton ?" repeated Mr. Truefitt, his eyebrows raised.

Then he turned his attention to the will again, and presently laid it down and said :

"In that case, my dear lady, I am extremely sorry, but I fear you cannot claim the money."

"Not claim the money !" said poor Miss Catherine, her lips so dry she could hardly frame the words.

"I am afraid not. You see, the wording of the will is 'To the three daughters of my dear old friend, Robert James Drury.'"

"Oh, of course he means 'sisters.' Why, he was far more my brother's friend than my father's."

"'Not claim the money!'" said poor Miss Catherine."

"Yes, but your brother now ?" the little lawyer eyed her keenly.

Miss Catherine drew herself up.

"My brother has been dead six years. He was a missionary, who died abroad unmarried."

"I understand—a missionary you say. Well, Miss Drury, I think it most probable the money was intended for you. However, owing to the wording of the will——" He shrugged his shoulders.

"Then can nothing be done ?"

"Oh, certainly, if you wish to litigate."

"Thank you; I will talk the matter over with my sisters."

Miss Catherine almost thought it was someone else who spoke. She hardly recognised her own voice. How she got out of Mr. Truefitt's office she never knew. She was dazed, bewildered, the shock was so great, the sense of disappointment so bitter. She hurried on through the wintry gloom, not heeding where she was going, till at last she took an omnibus home.

It was a sad little trio that sat round the tea table that evening. Richard was fortunately absent.

"He must not know," said Miss Drury firmly.

"But Mr. Blackstone must be paid," said Miss Mary. "We must sell out some of our little investments."

"Yes, of course. Well, it will mean about forty pounds a year less for us, but we must manage somehow."

"How can we possibly spare the money? Christmas time too, Ellen!" Miss Catherine's lip quivered pitifully.

"Don't be weak, Catherine. I know it will mean a few sacrifices; we must put up with that. There are many ways in which we could retrench."

A knock at the front door, and Sarah announced Mr. King. Mr. King was a cheery, rubicund old bachelor. He was supposed to be the nearest approach Miss Drury had ever had to a lover.

Miss Drury rose to greet him with an air of cheerfulness that was too assumed to deceive an old friend.

"Why, what's the matter, Ellen; anything happened to Richard?"

"Oh, Richard is all right. If you must know, Tom, we really are in trouble on our own account."

"Wonders will never cease," said the visitor, settling himself cosily in an arm-chair. "Well now, let me hear all about it."

It was a relief to pour out their troubles to a sympathetic listener. Mr. King was soon in possession of the facts of the case. That is, he was told the ladies had been disappointed about a legacy, a hitch having occurred by the wording of a clause in the will. The affair of Richard's partnership, however, was carefully concealed.

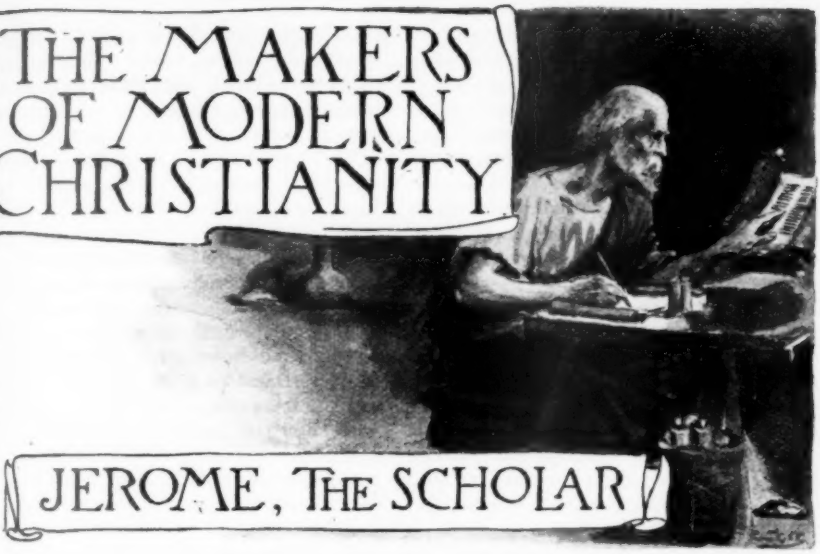
As he walked home that night Mr. King pondered the matter seriously in his own mind, and resolved to put his own lawyers on the job. They would, at any rate, make a try for this unfortunate money; and if the case failed, well, he would see them through it somehow.

The months that followed were a time of trial and anxiety for the sisters. Christmas came and went. Never had there been so many calls on their generosity. Never had there been so little money to satisfy them. Petty economies were obliged to be practised, till the sisters fancied they were becoming quite mean and stingy. Richard, for whom all these sacrifices and self-denials were made, was so wrapt up in his lady-love that he noticed nothing particular amiss, save to wonder occasionally at an especially frugal meal or to speculate why the drawing-room fire was never lit now except on Sundays. And he certainly could not make out why his aunts did not have the Christmas-tree for the poor children this year. A suspicion crossed his mind that they were getting "near" in their old age. At length winter gave way to spring, spring softened into summer, and Richard began talking about his wedding. He and Phyllis were sitting with the Misses Drury on their little balcony one warm June night, planning the great event.

"Now, Aunt Ellen," he said playfully, "you three must be thinking of the wedding present, you know. We shall expect something handsome, eh, Phyllis?"

"Oh, there's time enough for that," said Miss Drury almost snappishly. "I think people make an unnecessary fuss over weddings nowadays." And the talk turned to other subjects.

Presently the door of the room behind opened, manly footsteps were heard, and a jubilant voice said: "Are you there, Ellen? Are you all sitting there in the dark? Such news! Glorious news! We've won the case—I tell you, we've won the case! You'll have your money right enough, now!"



"Tom, Tom! Is it possible?" cried Miss Drury joyfully.

"A case? Why, it's a lawsuit, I do believe. Whatever is it all about?" said Richard, as the bewildered young couple came forward into the lamplight.

"Yes," said Miss Catherine, the happy tears standing in her eyes. "It's a lawsuit, and we have won. You shall hear all about it by-and-by."

"And to-morrow," said Miss Drury, laying her hand affectionately on Phyllis's shoulder, "to-morrow, dear, we will choose the wedding present."

THE MAKERS OF MODERN CHRISTIANITY

JEROME, THE SCHOLAR

By the Very Rev. H. Donald M. Spence, D.D., Dean of Gloucester.

I.

THE hundred years that followed the acceptance of Christianity by the Emperor of Rome and his Court, and the peace of the Church which was the immediate consequence of the imperial acceptance, were big with events which moulded the religion of Jesus of Nazareth into the form which it has generally assumed since among men. In that strange, wonderful age, with varying results, much was introduced into Christianity with "very slight authority from the precepts, and none from the practice, of the Author and first teachers of the faith"—the vast and far-reaching system of Monasticism, for instance, which has so largely influenced the story of Christianity.

A group of men arose in that golden age—gold, alas! mingled with much alloy—the like to whom have never arisen since, perhaps will never arise again—men splendidly gifted, devoted, and earnest, who for industry and learning, for eloquence and enthusiasm, are matchless, simply unsurpassed. These men are justly esteemed in their several departments as the early makers of Christianity in the form in which Christianity has been generally accepted by the great Churches of the world.

The principal names of this group of "makers of Christianity" are Athanasius, Basil of Cæsarea, the two Gregorys (of Nazianzus and Nyssa), Epiphanius of Salamis, Ephrem the Syrian, Ambrose of Milan, Chrysostom of Constantinople, and lastly, the two Latin Fathers, as they are termed—perhaps the greatest of the great group, though very different in their gifts—Jerome and Augustin.

Of this famous company the influence of the subject of this present study, Jerome, has been, for reasons we are about to detail, the most far-reaching.

Very briefly we will sketch the life-story of this Jerome. The little sketch will help us to understand the more striking pictures of the career we propose to paint.

He was born somewhere about the year of grace 340–45 at Stridon, a town of Pannonia, near the famous city of Aquileia.* His parents were Christians who occupied a good position in provincial society, and who, although by no means wealthy, were possessed of fairly good means. The young Jerome was carefully educated, and his training for the work of life was carried on after the early years of his boyhood, mostly at Rome. There he listened to the lectures of the famous Donatus and other celebrated masters, and followed the usual course of legal studies. We know but little of these earlier years, save that he was ever an ardent and enthusiastic student. Something evidently happened in this period which determined the young scholar to give up the pleasures and dissipations of the great city to which at first he was attracted, and to devote himself to a higher and a nobler life. He tells us himself what a deep and solemn impression certain repeated visits to that city of the dead —afterwards known as the Catacombs—made upon his impressionable heart. "When I was a youth," he wrote in after days, "receiving my education at Rome, I and some of my fellow students used on Sundays to make the circuit of the sepulchres of the apostles and martyrs. Many a time did we go down into these Catacombs. They are excavated deep in the earth, and contain on either hand as you enter the bodies of the dead buried in the wall. It is all dark there. Only occasionally is light let in to mitigate the horror of the gloom. You take each step with caution, surrounded by deep night." These repeated visits to this strange city of the dead, these memorials of the martyrs and saints who had so lately lived and suffered for the faith, evidently made a great and lasting impression on the young student. The lives led by these martyrs and confessors, whose resting places he loved to visit, were the ideals he set before him to strive after.

* Aquileia was the ancient capital of Venetia, and is situated at the head of the Adriatic, near Trieste. It is now a small fishing town, containing many remains of its ancient splendour.

From Rome he seems to have gone to Southern Gaul, where he especially made a study of the writings and teaching of the famous Gallic master, Hilary of Poitiers, the ardent and devoted follower of Athanasius and his doctrine. Then we find him again in his native province, the centre of an earnest band of ascetic students at Aquileia. His first Oriental pilgrimage, in company with a few devoted friends, is dated about A.D. 377–78. In Syria he once more sought out the more celebrated teachers of theology, and with that restless desire for knowledge which was ever a prominent feature in his character, he kept on piling up great masses of learning, thus laying the foundation storey of that vast accumulation of Christian and classical lore which enabled him in middle and late life to carry out the great work which will ever be his chief title to honour. But all this while he was dissatisfied with himself, and sought to find peace in the practice of terrible austerities among the solitaries of the desert of Chalcis.* This strange phase of the wandering student's life lasted four or five years. More than once a dangerous illness, the result of his ceaseless study and his strange life of paroxysms of terrible austerity brought him very near death.

In the years 380–81 he had wandered to Constantinople, when he became for a time the friend and disciple of the famous theologian and preacher, Gregory of Nazianzus, then at the height of his reputation as Archbishop of the great Eastern See, and generally esteemed the greatest Christian teacher of the age. Jerome now far and wide was famous as a profound scholar, and from Constantinople was invited by Pope Damasus to Rome. For several years —A.D. 382-85—he acted as secretary to Damasus who admitted him to an intimate friendship. Damasus was a scholar and theologian of great reputation, his portrait occupies no mean place in the long gallery of Roman pontiffs, and he employed Jerome's magnificent acquirements and restless love of toil in an urgently needed work—viz., in the revision of the old Italian version of the Gospels and other books of the New Testament. There were extant in the last quarter of the fourth century in Italy and the West many different Latin translations of the Greek originals, and Jerome's task here was carefully to revise both the text and translation. Damasus also entrusted him with a similar work in connection with the Psalter, which the great scholar re-translated from the Septuagint (the Greek version of the Old Testament).

During this residence in Rome under the immediate patronage of the powerful Bishop, Jerome incurred the bitter enmity and jealousy of many, especially of the Roman clergy, whose ease-loving manner of life and vices of sloth and greed he lashed with an unsparing and not improbably with an exaggerated condemnation. On the death of his friend Pope Damasus, Jerome, whose influence among the highest class of devout Christians was enormous, and whose fame as an erudite scholar reached far beyond the boundaries of Rome and Italy, evidently expected and perhaps hoped to be chosen by the Church of Rome as the Bishop of the mighty Metropolitan See; but the enmities and jealousies he had stirred up made this out of the question. Siricius was chosen to succeed Damasus. Even the high official position which Jerome had been holding in the Roman Church was taken from him, and the famous scholar, vexed and humilitated, left Rome for ever, and once more turned his face to the East. Never did a disappointment turn out more fortunately, for had Jerome been chosen Bishop of Rome, the noblest and grandest work wrought for Christianity perhaps in any of its many-coloured ages, would have been left undone, and the name of Jerome, which has been honoured and revered in all the Western Churches of Christendom now for some fifteen centuries, would probably have been lost and quite forgotten in the long and somewhat shadowy line of Roman bishops.

* The desert of Chalcis is situate on the east of Syria, south-east of the city of Antioch.

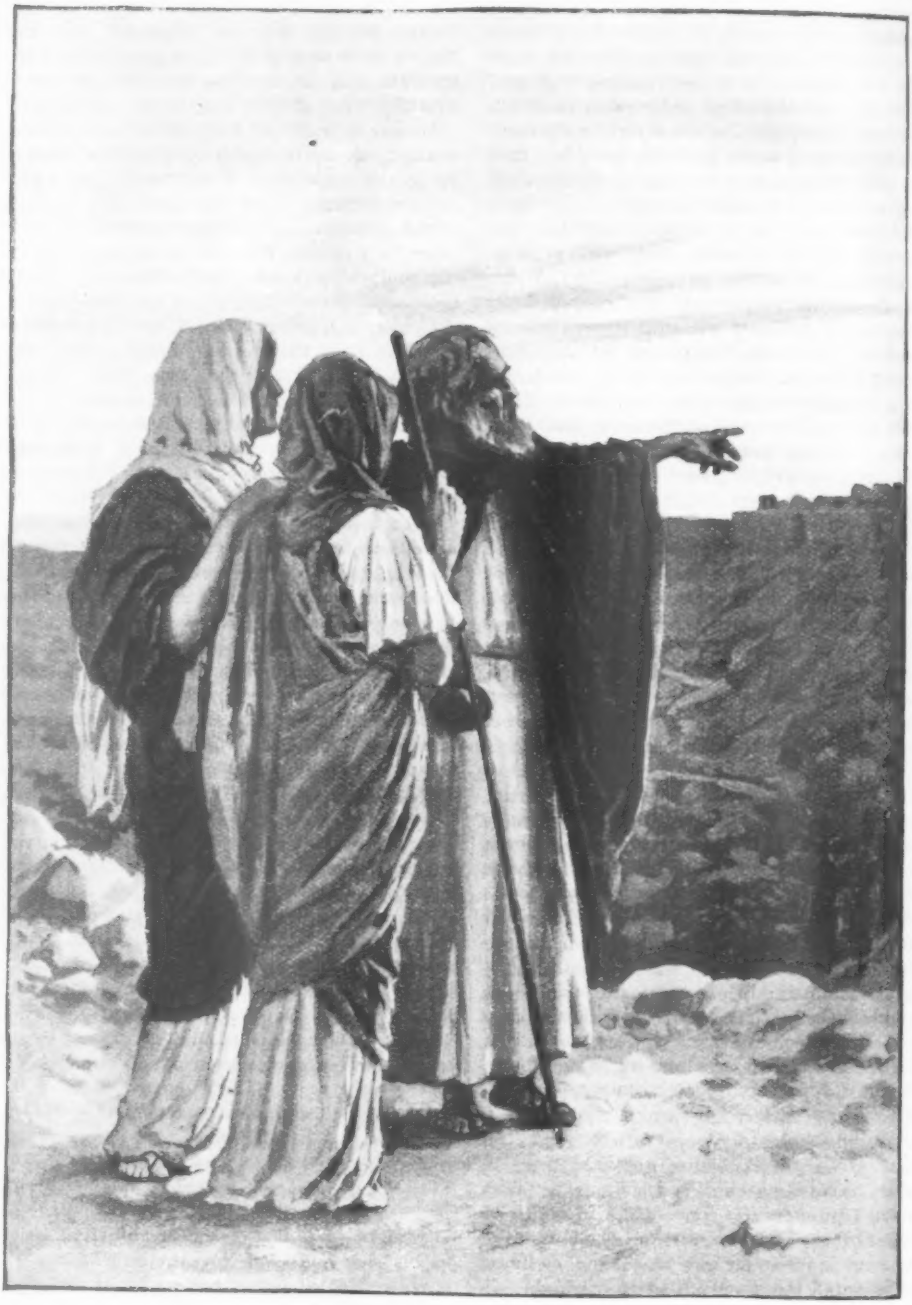
But the great work of that busy life, the one with which Jerome's name will be ever associated, was not to be taken in hand just yet; a further preparation was needed.

Several of Jerome's powerful Roman friends —notably the noble Paula and her daughter Eustochium—soon joined the great scholar in his self-imposed exile from the Queen City. Paula belonged to one of the most illustrious of the patrician houses, and was possessed of very great wealth. Under the guidance of Jerome, Paula and her daughter made a lengthy pilgrimage through the Holy Land and Egypt, visiting all the celebrated historic shrines and places of interest in that charmed land of promise and blasted hopes, as well as the chief settlements of the unnumbered solitaries and monks in the deserts which fringe the Egyptian Nile. To Paula and Eustochium it was a pilgrimage of devotion. To Jerome it was more than a pilgrimage; it was a journey of the most careful and elaborate research.

In the year 386 the long travel time came to an end, and the pilgrims settled at Bethlehem, where elaborate and costly monastic buildings were forthwith erected, mainly at the expense of the wealthy and devoted Paula. Of the convent of women she undertook the superintendence, of the monastery for monks which was erected hard by Jerome was the guiding spirit.



Then commenced, largely at the suggestion and under the inspiration of Paula, that mighty work with which the name of Jerome will be for ever associated—the writing of the Latin Vulgate, the first, indeed the solitary, translation of the Hebrew Scriptures into Latin. Before the scholar, a portion of whose eventful life-story we are sketching, took the work in hand, Christendom had been content, as far as the Old Testament was concerned, with the Greek version of the Seventy, with all its faults and errors, with its imperfect and often confused renderings of the stately Eastern original.

The Latin-speaking world of the West, including Italy, Gaul, Spain, the broad lands watered by the Danube and the Rhine, and Britain, read the wondrous story of the Old Testament, the Hebrew prophets, and the Psalms in a somewhat rough and perhaps inaccurate translation of this old Greek version, a doubtful translation of a doubtful translation.

Jerome changed all this, and gave to a great world made up of many peoples, first waking up to the knowledge of the truth, a new and direct translation of the old books of the Word of Life, throwing new light and vigour into words and records which so many eager, thirsting souls were longing to read and to make their own.

His noble work is yet with us very largely, far more than the majority of us guess. The Vulgate, the translation from the original Hebrew by Jerome, has influenced all our modern versions of the Old Testament. It is the basis, not only of our English Bible, but of all the countless versions or translations of the Western world.

In his cell in the Bethlehem monastery, rejoicing in no earthly rank, possessing little that he could call his own, living virtually upon the generous alms of Paula and his Roman friends, the work-worn scholar, ever bearing about the sad burden of a weak and ailing body, toiled on for more than fourteen long years. He was nigh sixty years old when he took in hand his mighty task; he had passed his seventy-fifth year when he laid down his pen and wrote the word "Finis" on the parchment page. His equipment, though, for the enormous work—on every page of which the glory of the God he loved so well and served so truly, shone with a divine radiance—was such as no man before Jerome ever possessed, such as no man since this great saint of God passed, has ever had again. Poor, even sickly, feeble as men count feebleness, he was thoroughly versed in all the learning of the old Pagan world. So profound a classicist was Jerome, so steeped in all the lore of past Pagan centuries, so ardent a lover of the masterpieces of the great writers and thought-leaders of the ages when Christianity was not, that at one period of his life he came to look upon this passionate, absorbing love for and admiration of writings along whose eloquent and stirring pages his Christ lived not, as his besetting sin. One night—was it a dream or an actual vision of his sick and over-wrought imagination?—it seemed to him that life was over and done with, and that in the spirit world he stood before the Judge's awful throne, and as he waited there came to him a voice saying to him, "Who art thou?" "I am a Christian," he humbly answered. "Not so," said the voice; "thou art no Christian, but a Ciceronian, for, remember, where the treasure is, there ever is the heart." And then Jerome tells us that he was beaten with many stripes. Very grievous was the punishment, more grievous still the crushing remorse for his fatal fault; but in the midst of his anguish other pitiful ones hard by the Judge's throne made intercession for him and asked that he might have another trial-time on earth. "Lord," cried the respited sinner, "if in my renewed earth-life I again betake myself to these works of the Pagan masters, then simply look on me as one who denies Thee!"

JEROME AND HIS COMPANIONS REACH BETHLEHEM.—p. 155.

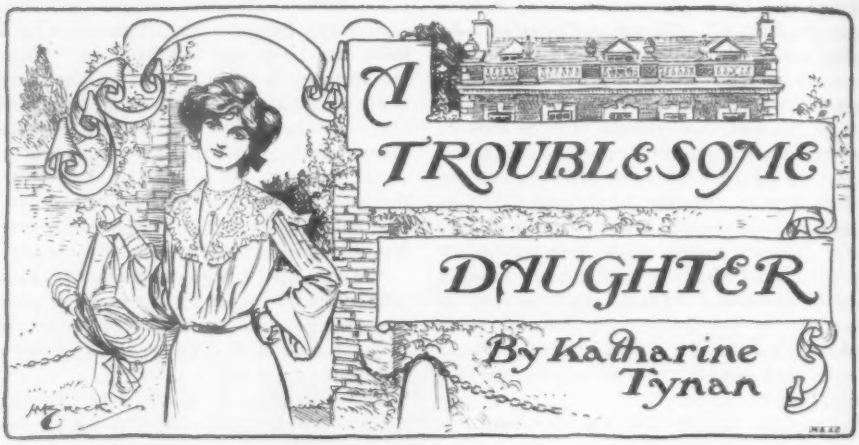
The strange dream-vow was certainly not kept, and the great scholar, happily for his life-work, still remained a devoted student of the famous masterpieces of Pagan literature. He tells the story of the dream somewhat anxiously himself, and others, too, reproached him with breaking his solemn dream-vow. But Jerome persisted in looking at the strange incident as a mere dream. But it tells us how deeply versed, how profoundly trained, he was in all that was great and important in classic letters.

To this exhaustive knowledge of classical letters, however, he added a thorough and complete acquaintance with Hebrew, the result of the industry of long years, and an intimate knowledge of the history and topography of all the scenes of Old Testament history.

For a lengthened period he studied the intricacies of the Hebrew language with learned Jewish teachers of the most famous schools of Palestine. It was a rare combination—an enthusiastic and trained classical scholar and at the same time a profound Hebraist. These great linguistic acquirements formed, of course, the foundation storey of his vast work we call "The Vulgate." But these things by no means made up the sum of his rare and peculiar fitness for the almost superhuman task he had set himself, and which, with the help of the Divine Spirit, he carried through with such unwearied perseverance and success. Gifted with a wonderful memory, which never seems to have failed him, endued with a singular power of working by night as by day, the possessor of a skill in composition not often given to men, he was now pathetic, now sarcastic, now brilliantly descriptive. With his charmed pen, by turns he could touch men, rouse men, convince men. Few like Jerome held the key of so many hearts. The language of his Latin Bible has been well described as "singularly picturesque, the orientalism of the Scripture being blended with curious felicity with the idiom of the Latin, that though it is far removed from either the colloquial ease of the comic poets or the purity of Cicero, it both delights the ear and fills the mind; it is an original and somewhat foreign, but nevertheless an expressive and harmonious dialect."*

We sum up. "A great scholar was raised up who probably alone for 1,500 years possessed the qualifications necessary for producing an original version of the Scriptures for the use of the Latin Churches."

It was, indeed, a precious gift to the vast group of Western Churches at such a moment, when the Roman Empire was fast falling to pieces, and the old world all rapidly changing—indeed, a priceless gift. The Bible† in its entirety, no longer confused with various and conflicting texts, no longer only available in a rough and often provincial translation, but with a carefully corrected text, and in a translation at once accurate and harmonious, eloquent, even picturesque—a very noble and faithful representation of the original.



* * * * * *

The Latin language had sadly deteriorated since the age of Augustus. The enormous influx of strangers into the imperial city, and in a lesser degree into all the principal provincial cities; the presence in the vast and all-powerful army of so many soldiers belonging to barbaric peoples, who spoke foreign dialects, had gradually brought about the decomposition of the old Roman tongue. Grammar was strangely neglected in the popular speech. The rules of prosody were hopelessly violated in the popular poems. By a curious fatality it came to pass that the once-despised Christianity revived the famous language which in the fourth century seemed to be dying, and the principal instrument in the formation of the new Latin—which was destined to be the learned tongue of the Western nations—was the Vulgate, the Latin Bible of Jerome.

* Dean Milman: "History of Christianity," book iv., chap. iii.

† We speak generally of the whole Bible when we dwell on Jerome's work—for although the principal labour of Jerome's life was his translation into Latin of the Hebrew Old Testament, it must not be forgotten that previously, at the suggestion of Pope Damasus, the great scholar had carefully revised the text and the translation of the Greek New Testament.

XUM

A SERIAL STORY.

SYNOPSIS OF CHAPTERS I.—IV.

Judy Evelyn is misunderstood by her mother, and, after she has come home from a French finishing school, is sent back to the schoolroom and her old governess. Lady Flora Lindley comes to the rescue, and takes the girl with her, first to London, and then to Cornwall, after they have met Lady Flora's soldier son, Major Lindley, who has been invalided from the War, with a V.C.

CHAPTER V.

THE OLD LOVE.

AS the days passed, Major Lindley did not seem to weary of Judy's company, nor to desire any other. He grew stronger, and their excursions extended themselves quite a distance round about into the neighbouring country. Sometimes they took a carriage, and Lady Flora went with them. More often she pleaded something or other that must prevent her, and they went alone.

It was a year when the spring was in full flower by mid-April. There was a riot of blossoms in the crannies, on the cliffs and over the downs. When they came on cottages or farmsteads they were wrapped about with a glory of blossom, rosy as a bride's face seen through a bridal veil. It was the sweet o' the year before ever May came, and the villages were bowered in roses a full month before their usual time of blossom.

"One does not know how beautiful it all is," said Major Lindley one day, "until one has lost it."

"Ah! but you have found it again," said Judy brightly.

He looked at her where she sat on a step cut in the chalk above a scatter of gorse bushes, the honey odours of which she was sniffing delicately.

"If I have only found it to lose it!" he said significantly.

Judy's heart sank. What could he mean? She had been enjoying the happiest weeks of her life since Major Lindley had come. It was so delightful, this friendship on an equal basis with a serious, distinguished soldier like Major Lindley. Not that he was always serious with Judy. There were moments when he was as gay, as irresponsible as Jack Winstanley himself—nay, more so, for the consciousness of his adolescence had made Jack this last year or so oppressively serious at times.

"Do you mean—anything?" Judy asked, looking at him with frightened eyes.

"Dear child, you care?" he said; and then, as though by an irresistible impulse, he stooped and kissed Judy. At the moment he had no more feeling about the kiss than if Judy were five years old.

A moment later he was furious with himself. Judy had blushed rosy red. Why had he done it? he asked himself. Why had he forgotten that childhood and womanhood come so perilously close? Why had he disturbed the pleasant, unconscious relationship between them? His thoughts of women were honest, tender thoughts. Now a sudden dark red surged in his own bronze cheeks, as though he had been guilty of something he must be ashamed of. And if it had been anybody but Judy!—little Judy, almost his little sister!

He turned his head away, ill at ease. That stupidity of his must be forgotten, put out of sight as quickly as possible.

"Judy dear," he said, and his voice was very gentle, "I want you to help me about a difficult matter, as my own little sister might help me. I want you to break it to the Mater. She has seemed so happy in having me that I have not been able to tell her. I am going out again, Judy, in about six weeks' time. I shall be quite well enough by that time."

"Oh!" said Judy, in a whisper almost. "Then all her anxieties will begin over again. I know now how she suffered all that time when any day might bring word that you were wounded or dead. We never guessed it. She lived through it alone. Must you go?"

"I must go, Judy, while there is fighting to be done."

She looked up at the immovable face.

"Then I will help you," she said quietly. "And do not be afraid; she will take it well. She has great spirit. When you think you ought to go I do not think she would keep you if she could."

He breathed a little sigh of relief.

"Thank you, Judy," he said. "I do not believe she really would. I am proud of my mother, and perhaps in some measure I owe it to you that things have been different between us this time. I believe she thinks always of my happiness, though she opposed me once in a matter which affected my happiness vitally. I have thought a good deal about that of late, and I have come to the conclusion that I was an unready fellow, or I would not have let even her own word—the word of . . . of that lady—stand between us. In some ways the old barbarous, primitive ways are best. When a man loves a woman and she loves him he ought to carry her off, by force if need be, and not let other people stand between them. Don't you think so?"

"I suppose so," said Judy, looking up at his shining eyes and eager face. "If it is only other people who have raised the barrier."

Was he going to carry off Miss Rosamund by main force, she wondered? Needless to say, she was fascinated by his threat of force, as most little feminine, imaginative persons like her would have been.

"I shall not let slip a chance of happiness again," he said. "Wish me luck, little Judy."

"I do, indeed, wish you luck!" repeated Judy fervently, letting both her hands rest in his, where he had drawn them and held them.

It was their last walk together for some days. That evening Major Lindley was going to town. Two days later was to be his great day when the King was to decorate him with the Victoria Cross at Windsor. The next day he was to return, and in the evening Lady Waldersee's reception was to take place.

"Supposing I showed someone the decoration, Judy!" he went on, as though he asked reassurance. "Women think a lot of such things. Do you suppose she would be kinder to me?"

"I don't suppose she would be kinder if she were kind already," said Judy wisely; "but I think no woman could be anything but kind to a man who had won the Victoria Cross."

"Thank you, Judy," he said; "you have given me courage."

They went home to lunch more quietly than usual. Judy did not romp with the dogs, nor chase butterflies and little blue and silver moths over the beds of flowers that the Downs now were. Some new gravity had come to her.

That evening it seemed most solitary to sit in the great, splendid, unhomely drawing-room with Lady Flora, watching the other visitors at the hotel reading, or knitting, and talking now and again in low voices. Last night she had gone to the pier-end with Major Lindley, and had stood there watching the broken reflections of the moon and stars in the water.

She was restless to-night; she picked up things and put them down, began a story in a magazine, and relinquished it with a yawn. Lady Flora watched her furtively from behind her newspaper. You never found Lady Flora engaged in any of the exclusively feminine occupations; but she read her Times every day, and subscribed for the big reviews, and took a most gentlemanly interest in politics. She had known some noted politicians in her day, and was apt to bemoan the fact that in Stannington she was outside the sphere of influence; although other people maintained that she would not have been happy anywhere except in a village that was so entirely ruled by her as Stannington allowed itself to be.

Presently Judy stood up. The warm room, the deep velvety chairs, the subdued murmur of conversation stifled her. She went out to the balcony and stood there, her arms leaning on the iron rail, her eyes staring over the lights of the harbour out to sea.

She had the young girl's wistful wonder as to what might be coming to her. Was there any ship on any sea for her, out beyond the lines of light in the shimmering gloom? Miss Rosamund Lindley's ship was coming home to her after all these years, and she did not know it was coming. Judy thought, with a sympathetic throb, of the sweet, tender face of Miss Rosamund, which she had always known wearing its quiet air of sadness. She knew the room in which Miss Prim and Miss Rosamund sat when they were alone, a little blue and gold room, the groined roof full of stars, the walls decorated with peacocks' feathers, bronze and gold.

She could see Miss Rosamund reading her poetry book or novel while Miss Prim sewed. She had seen Miss Rosamund—she, a little observant child, whom no one suspected of noticing—hold a book apparently close to her short-sighted eyes, while in reality those eyes gazed over the book into some distance of memory and regret.

Now that would all be changed. There was no doubt that Major Lindley would break down the barriers—whatever they were—that separated him from the woman he had so long been faithful to. He would overcome Miss Prim's unjust prejudice against him. Judy did not know what it was all about, but she was sure it was unjust. Lady Flora would become reconciled, and the great Lindley feud would be at an end for ever. Oh, he would accomplish it! There was no doubt in Judy's mind that he could accomplish whatever he undertook. The wonder was why he had not done it long ago.

Judy's mind passed on naturally to Mr. Neville, the mild, scholarly parson, who had so long been supposed to be in love with Miss Rosamund Lindley that the affair had become almost as uninteresting as a marriage to Stannington folk, and a subject of as little conjecture.

Poor Mr. Neville would finally have his hopes shattered. Judy was vaguely sorry for him; but somehow he was not a romantic figure like Major Lindley. Then suddenly Judy blushed, remembering how Major Lindley had kissed her.

She had no illusions at all about that kiss. Of course, he was fond of her, almost like a little sister, he had said. Indeed, was there not a kind of spiritual tie since his mother was her godmother? Judy was delighted—yes, delighted that he was going to be happy. Still, she was vaguely sorry for herself. She had been the hero's friend these last few weeks. Now she was going to be pushed out. In the fruition of his long, painfully-delayed love affair was it likely that he would have a thought to spare for Judy?

There was a hand on her shoulder, and looking round, she saw Lady Flora.

"Yours is a wise choice, Judy," she said, sinking into one of the many chairs with which the balcony was provided. "Tell me what you were thinking of so intently, child. No; I shan't take cold, not I. How should I in this covered place? You know I'm not afraid of the wind and the weather. I am glad we are alone, Judy. Have you anything to tell me about my son?"

Judy started. So Lady Flora suspected. Then, after all, the task of preparation which she had so dreaded was half done.

She turned round her face, and there was a sparkle of tears in her eyes. Judy wept as easily as she blushed.

"You will not mind very much?" she said.

Lady Flora drew her to her gently.

"I shall not be jealous," she said, "if that is what you mean. Mothers must expect to be pushed out."

"We thought you would bear it, as becomes his mother," said Judy agitatedly. "It is hard to lose him so soon again, but—but—God will take care of him. He feels that he is in honour bound to go."

Lady Flora stood up then, and catching Judy by both hands, looked into her face, which the moonlight illumined.

"What do you mean, child?" she asked, trembling. "I don't understand. It is not so we regard such things. You are telling me that——"

"That Major Lindley will rejoin his regiment as soon as he is able. Surely that is what you guessed?"

Lady Flora sat down again in a dazed way.

"I thought," she said, "that he would stay six months, and perhaps by that time the war would be over. It is dragging on unconscionably. Some people say it is but beginning. I shall have it all over again—the long torture of suspense and fear. I am an old woman, Judy, and I have only one son."

"God will take care of him," said Judy tremulously.

"God has not taken care of other women's sons, in that way. How can He see things as we see them, since this life is only a moment to Him? Yet it is the only life there is for many of us, God help us!"

"He does not mean it to be the only life," said Judy, frightened of her task of consolation, yet gaining courage.

"I have always been a good Church and State woman," said Lady Flora, as though she did not hear her. "I was quite satisfied with my own Christianity up to this moment. But I suppose I have never really been a religious woman, and when I want comfort I find none. I have lived as though there were no other world but this, although I went to church every Sunday. Now that I want assurance of the other world it slips from me."

"He will be terribly troubled," said Judy helplessly, "at your taking it like this."

"Do you suppose he will know?" said Lady Flora. The gesture with which she folded her lace shawl about her suggested to Judy the scene in which Cæsar fell, stabbed by Brutus at the foot of Pompey's statue. "Do you suppose my son will know? There, child, forgive me. You took me unawares. Do you know what I expected to hear?"

"I thought it was that," faltered Judy.

"I never thought that he would feel compelled to return to that deadly place. I thought—Judy, I thought you were going to tell me that you would keep him at home. A man with a young, loving, and beloved wife lays up his sword and takes the ploughshare. He has won enough glory. He is my only child."

"He got up restlessly and walked about the room."—p. 166.

"Oh!" said Judy. "How could you think it, godmamma? A grand person like Major Lindley! He would never think of me in that way. You know he is in love with Miss Rosamund Lindley, and has been all these years."

"He told you so?"

Lady Flora's face in the shadow of the awning was hidden from Judy. But the steel and ice in her voice turned Judy cold.

"He hinted it."

"You are sure you made no mistake? If he only spoke in hints and suggestions, you might easily be mistaken. Is it likely he should care for her after all those years? Why, she has grey hairs in her head. She is no longer a young woman."

"I am sure I made no mistake," said Judy steadily. "I think he means to set things straight before he goes out again. Godmamma, I think Miss Rosamund is lovely. Why should they not be happy at last?"

"Hush, child!" said Lady Flora sternly. "What does a child like you know about it? I am going to bed, Judy, and you'd better go too. You have given me food for—pleasant dreams!"

She never looked towards Judy, who had shrunk before the harsh manner as though she had been struck; but went in, leaving her there in the moonlit balcony.

CHAPTER VI.

LADY FLORA WRITES A LETTER.

THE lights burned late in Lady Flora's bedroom—in fact, she sat absorbed in her thoughts until the chill of the hour before daylight forced itself upon her consciousness.

Then she stood up and went to the window: Sea and sky were all one greyness, distinguishable from each other only by the faint rosy streaks that were coming in the sky. It was going to be a wild dawn. As she lifted the blind the rain pattered against the window-pane.

She began to undress somewhat stiffly, and had removed her dress, when a sudden illumination came into her face. She stood for a few seconds motionless; then she hastily put on a dressing-gown, and, going to the table on which were writing materials, she sat down and began to write a letter.

When she had written the date she sat with the pen in her hand, thinking.

"Yes," she said aloud; "I can depend on Prim. Prim will help me. It is the one thing she will never forgive, and I believe I can trust Prim not to betray me. It is time we changed places—Humphrey's girls and I. Little Judy will be mistress in the Manor House in name; I shall be the real mistress. Let Humphrey's girls go to the Cottage! Let them see how they like it! After all those years I shall have room to move about, air to breathe. Let them stifle at the Cottage as I have stifled!"

She began to write steadily then, in her old-fashioned, punctilious handwriting.

"To Miss Primula Lindley:

"Madam,—The time has come, in view of my son's approaching marriage, when I think it right to inform you that you and your sister have for many years been occupying the Manor House under a misunderstanding of the position. You imagine that my son is receiving from you the sum of £2,000 annually as lessees for life of the Manor House. On the contrary, he receives nothing. More, I believe he has supplemented your income at times from his own private purse. This quixotic arrangement could only have been possible because of your and your sister's ignorance of business matters, and because of Messrs. Lumsden, Sons, and Stevenson's connivance in what they no doubt regard as a pious deceit. Your father, the late Mr. Humphrey Lindley, speculated disastrously—he himself did not know at the time of his death how disastrously. But for my son's generosity you would not have been able to keep up the Manor House, much less to pay the rent you suppose you are paying. Since he will now require the Manor House for his own use, I think it right that the matter should be explained to you, relying on your sense of justice to set things straight once more. I will ask that my name be not mentioned in connection with this business. I interfere only because it is quite possible that my son, with his quixotic generosity, might still refuse to dispossess you.—Believe me, Madam, yours very sincerely,

"Flora Arbuthnot Mandeville Lindley."

She read it over before closing and sealing the envelope.

"Yes," she said again; "Prim will help me. She will never forgive Philip's wild generosity. I think I have got equal with Prim. With her on the one side and myself on the other, and pretty Judy to set against that poor, faded, pretty thing who hadn't even courage to fight for her lover, it will be strange if we do not break down Philip's faithfulness. If he knew, he would never forgive me; but then, he need never know, and the end will justify the means."

She added "Private and confidential" to the head of the letter before folding it, and felt as she did so that she was placing another barrier between her and discovery.

The next day was wet, and Judy kept indoors during the morning. In the afternoon it cleared a little, and putting on a serviceable dress of homespun and thick boots, Judy went out for a walk over the downs.

As she went down the stairs on her way to Lady Flora's bedroom, where she expected to find her, she met the old lady coming up, wearing her outdoor things. She looked rather damp, and her white hair was disordered by the wind; but it struck Judy how very handsome she was looking. She had a bright colour in her cheeks, and a light in her eyes. Judy admired her spirit more than ever. Who could have believed she had heard only a few hours ago that her son was going back to the war?

"Ah!" Lady Flora said, "you are off for your beauty walk, and I have been having mine."

"We might have taken it together, godmamma. I had no idea that you were out, and I was just coming to tell you that I was going out."

"Thank you, child," said Lady Flora, passing on; "but I wanted to be alone to-day. I had things to think about."

Major Lindley was expected back about five o'clock. Judy had had a wistful hope that Lady Flora might suggest their going to meet him together; but, instead, Lady Flora called her back.

"Remember, we dine at eight," she said, "and we have to make our grand toilets beforehand. Don't prolong your walk indefinitely."

Judy, with quick sensitiveness, took the speech to imply that she was to keep out of the way.

"I shall be in in good time," she said brightly; "but I have ever so many things to do in my own room before I dress, so we shall not meet again till dinner-time."

So it was that when Major Lindley arrived his mother was waiting for him alone on the platform. He was conscious of a little sense of disappointment. Judy had been so keen to look upon the cross, to hear about the King and Queen. And now there was no bronze head and bright eyes. Where was Judy?

Lady Flora interpreted his look, and her heart leaped up.

"She was cooped in the house all day," she said, "so I sent her out for her beauty walk over the downs. You don't mind having me alone to-day, Philip?"

"When did I mind that, mother?" he asked, with a tender and absent-minded gallantry. He was looking after the man who was collecting his hat-box and portmanteau.

"You shall give it all to us to-night," she said. Already her eyes had caught sight of the little brown, insignificant cross that hung from his watch-chain, and they were suddenly dimmed. To think her Philip, her little boy, her man, had done such a great thing!

"I asked them to set tea in my room, as Judy was out," she said, as they entered the hotel. "Will you join me, Philip? I have brought my own tea from home with me, and I make it so much nicer than the hotel people."

"I don't seem to have had you to myself enough," he responded, looking at her affectionately. "I shall be very glad of a cup of your tea."

She made it as he liked it—strong, with plenty of cream and sugar in it—and handed him the thin brown-bread watercress sandwiches, the ethereal slices of bread and butter, the hot buttered toast—things which he had seemed to appreciate since his home-coming.

"No, no," he said at last, refusing the toast. "If I am to dine in two hours' time! It has been a banquet, mother. I remembered your tea on the veldt."

She came close to him then, and taking up the cross, she laid it against her lips.

"Tell me everything," she said, going back to her seat. "Of course, it was in the newspapers; but it was meagre. Judy will want to hear it all later. But now, tell me first, everything, everything. You must leave nothing out."

"I shall become a horrible egoist," he said, laughing; then, with a modesty that became him, he set about the narrative, telling it with a painstaking thoroughness that was the measure of his desire to please her.

When he had finished she looked up at him with wet eyes.

"And you are going back?" she said quietly.

"I must go, mother."

"I know, my son," she said. She would not trouble him with any revelation of what his going would mean to her.

"You are the bravest mother alive," he said.

"I own a brave son," she replied.

He looked at her steadfastly for a moment or two. Then he burst out with a haste foreign to his usual collected manner:

"I am going to clear up the old trouble with Rosamund," he said. "I used to lie and think of it in those wonderful nights of starlight. I was foolish to take her word that she did not love me. She always loved me, though she was wax in her sister's hands; and your opposition made it very hard, mother."

Lady Flora's face twitched sharply, and her had a momentary illusion that a light, red as firelight, came into her eyes. Then her face was smooth again, although her lips were set.

"My boy," she said gently, "Rosamund Lindley is engaged to Mr. Neville. They would have been married before this only that Rosamund will not leave Prim, and Prim will not live under a brother-in-law's roof."

His face grew pale beneath its tan. Something so forlorn came into his eyes that for a second Lady Flora was shaken. That she, who would have died for him, should have brought that look there!

"You are sure, mother?" he said.

"Everyone knows it, my son; everyone but you. Lady Mary Winstanley referred to it in a letter yesterday."

Lady Mary Winstanley had mentioned that she had heard from Stannington that Rosamund Lindley and Mr. Neville had been seen walking together, and had wondered if at last Rosamund was going to reward her old lover's fidelity.

Doubtless she would, Lady Flora had said to herself. Lady Mary's letter had been opportune to give her courage. Doubtless before Philip could know on what slender foundation she had made her statement the thing would be an accomplished fact Her letter to Prim would help. When the sisters left the Manor House where would they go to, except to the beautiful old rectory? They would be poor, and Mr. Neville was rich, as squire-parson. In this moment of forlornness would not Rosamund yield to her patient lover?

Yet if it were not to be, Lady Flora said to herself, she would still have deceived her son for his ultimate good. What was Rosamund Lindley—poor, faded, no longer young—compared with Judy, who was ripe as a peach, and would have a comfortable fortune? The fortune—ah, that was desirable. Without it how was Philip going to keep up the Manor House?

"I thought it was little Judy," Lady Flora said presently. She did not like the cold and stormy eyes with which her son was looking out on the rain-swept sea.

"I never thought of the child in that way," he said, bringing his glance slowly back to his mother's face.

"Are you sure she has never thought of you in that way?" Lady Flora asked quietly.

If she had desired to create a diversion in her son's thoughts, she ought to have been satisfied. A sudden colour sprang up in his face. For an instant he looked almost scared. He had remembered that unfortunate episode of the kiss.

"Why do you ask me?" he said.

"Because—because I believe little Judy cares. Oh, Philip, isn't she sweet enough for you to love?"

"Sweet enough," he answered in a dazed way, "for any man. Too young and sweet for a fogey like me."

"You are not a fogey, Philip; least of all to her. You cannot think it, seeing how she looks at you. Even I have seen how she looks."

He turned away his head uneasily.

"It is a child's romantic feeling for a soldier whom she has made a hero of," he said. "It is not me; it is just the imaginary hero. If there were anything behind it, she would not look like that."

"Judy has not learnt dissimulation. She has no consciousness, or very little, about her feelings for you. That is a lovely thing in her. She is as unconscious as a child. It seems almost a pity that even you should break that unconsciousness."

She saw the change in her son's face. He had thought suddenly that he had broken through that childish veil on the day he had kissed Judy.

True, it had fallen again, and Judy had been the frank comrade of old; but there had been the moment when he had seen the woman's heart in the child.

"She has a genius for comradeship," he said, still uneasily. "And, after all, mother, fond as I am of little Judy, I have not the feeling for her I should have for my wife. She is just a kind and charming and interesting child. I am in love with a woman, and I have lost her, and I do not suppose I shall ever be in love with anyone else."

Lady Flora said no more. She was a clever woman, and she knew how a thought violently rejected at first will come back again and again, till in some unguarded hour it slips in. She even murmured something to the effect that she was probably mistaken about Judy. The child was too young to have taken serious harm.

Philip Lindley sat a little longer, gazing with a somewhat dreary and hopeless gaze out to sea. His mother watched him, although her eyes seemed to be elsewhere. She felt almost angrily hurt that in this hour of trouble she was shut out of his heart. Why couldn't he have come and put his face in her lap as she had heard of other sons doing with other mothers? She remembered when he had not been cold, before he had been in love with Rosamund Lindley and she had opposed him. She remembered him a chivalrous, silent, devoted small boy; and gnashed her teeth at the thought of the woman who had taken him from her.

"He looked up suddenly . . . and saw Judy."—p. 166.

Presently he got up restlessly and walked about the room, stopping to lift an article from the mantel-shelf and to replace it.

How she hated to have hurt him—to-day of all days! But it was for his ultimate good. In a little while Rosamund would be elderly and faded. Lady Flora was one of the old-fashioned persons who believe that a woman ages ever so much more quickly than a man.

Philip had turned about now and was looking at her. A little humorous smile played at the corners of her mouth. He wondered what she was smiling about.

"I am thinking of Helen Evelyn," she said, "Helen, who brings up her girls as though the Red House were a convent, which is the last thing Helen would like to see it. How uncomfortable she would be if she knew how you and Judy have been together all day long! And the child will tell her. I had a letter from Helen this morning with uneasiness between every line of it. She wants Judy in the safe, warm prison of under her wing again. Poor little Judy, how will she like to return?"

Major Lindley did not smile. He looked down, fingering the cross absent-mindedly; and an additional shade of harassment fell on his face, in which, during this interview, many lines and wrinkles hitherto unsuspected had revealed themselves, so that he looked every one of his more than forty years.

CHAPTER VII.

THE RECEPTION AT THE CASTLE.

MAJOR LINDLEY was first in his place at one of fifty or more little dining-tables with which the great dining-room was filled. At any other moment he would have been shyly and somewhat resentfully conscious of the curious and admiring glances of his fellow-guests at the hotel. There had been a little pause and then a buzz of talk as he had walked down the long room, tall and soldierly in his full-dress uniform, his breast a blaze of decorations, with the little cross showing modestly dark and simple among them.

But for the moment he had forgotten his fellow-creatures, other than those two or three who were insistently in his mind. He sat absently looking at the menu, not seeing a single word of the printed page. The stormy day had broken up in a glorious golden evening. Even yet the reflection of the sunset lingered on all the little clouds above the sea, turning them into masses of gold and rose petals and plumage floating delicately on a sky of turquoise. The blinds had not been drawn, although all the electric lights were on; and some of the cool radiance of the sky entered the long windows and lit the upper spaces of the walls.

He looked up suddenly from the page he had not been reading, and saw Judy coming down the room. Her eyes were shyly lowered; but she could not help looking radiant in the consciousness of her first really beautiful evening frock, and the remembrance of the vision she had seen in the long pier-glass before she had come down stairs. Something leaped into the flat dulness which had been Major Lindley's frame of mind before she appeared. He had been saying to himself that, only for the mater, the best thing that could happen to him would be to die decently instead of some fellow who had happiness to live for. As for Stannington, Stannington would be impossible now, now that Rosamund was going to marry the parson. Why, what a failure life had been for him all round! He had called at his solicitor's before he went to the war, and had signed a will leaving all he was possessed of to his mother, with a reversionary interest to Rosamund Lindley. Now, even his money would be of no use to her; Neville had plenty of money.

But his grey thoughts were suddenly illumined. Why, the child was positively beautiful! Her bronze hair seemed to glow about her head. Her lips, without smiling, had the sweetness of a smile. Over her milky young shoulders she had drawn a scarf, an exquisite filmy thing through which the warm whiteness showed faintly rose. Her arms were half hidden, half revealed, by the long wing-like sleeves. Her modesty appealed to the fastidious soldier almost as much as her beauty. The shy eyes, the demure scarf, the whole air as of a yet folded bud of womanhood delighted him.

She glided into the chair which was by the window-curtain, where there was a little obscurity, and sat silent an instant, looking down before she lifted her eyes to his. At last she did lift them by a visible effort. There was something in the frank, innocent eyes which had not been there before, something which at once asked for admiration and deprecated it.

"It is charming, Miss Judy," said the Major gravely.

It was the first time since they had been friends that he had prefixed "Miss" to her name, and it was a subtle note of the change which had come to Judy with her first party frock. The woman in her eyes struggled with the child.

"Papa would say I was a peacock," she said, the child coming uppermost for a second; "and Jack Winstanley would be in despair. Am I a peacock?"

"Not the least bit in the world," he answered. "Rather a dove with a particularly brilliant iris and crest."

In their corner they were out of range of the eyes which now were fixed upon many plates. For an instant her eyes dropped again, then lifted themselves.

"I want to see the cross," she said; and then, with something like a groan of impatience, answered the waiter at her elbow that she would take clear soup.

When the functionary had removed himself till the fish came, she leant across the table and took the cross in her fingers, holding it a second with the prettiest air of reverence. At the moment he noticed that her head was like a bird's, and that the soft masses of bronze were dense as a bird's plumage. Then she restored the cross to him.

"You will let me see it again," she said, with a little sigh, "when all these people are not about. Ah, and here's godmamma!"

Lady Flora came sailing down the room, magnificent in pearl-grey brocade and Honiton, and flashed a quick glance at the two while she made her apologies for being late. Something of moisture had come into Judy's eyes in beholding the symbol of heroism.

"I will let him be," she said to herself. "Let him tell Judy alone about his great event. I see she is longing to hear. And if Judy in that hour doesn't manage to creep into that poor thing Rosamund's place, then I'm no judge of male human nature."

She talked a great deal at dinner, getting them over a tense hour with bright, indifferent chatter. She had an idea that Philip would not tell Judy his story with a crowd of people about; so she left them in the lounge after dinner over their coffee, and rested for an hour, with the assurance that her policy would be justified in the end.

At ten o'clock they were ascending the great staircase of the Castle amid a mass of magnificent uniforms and jewels and exquisite chiffons. Like a person in a dream, Judy found herself being presented to the Commander-in-Chief, and heard his gallant speeches. She saw as in a haze Lady Waldersee's diamonds and order, and the kind, motherly brown eyes that looked at herself with great softness.

"There never was so kind and patient a person as Philip," she said in her own mind. He had found a seat on the daïs for his mother. Presently the introductions would be over, and Lady Waldersee would be free for a while to devote herself to her old friend. Meanwhile, there were ladies on all sides of her whom she seemed to remember, and she begged Philip to see that Judy enjoyed herself while she took up the thread of many old acquaintances.

Judy did enjoy herself. She would not be Judy, with Judy's immense capacity for hero-worship, if she did not. She saw so many people who had formerly been glittering names to her, and was spoken to by them. What if they were sometimes red-faced and white-whiskered old gentlemen under the Field-Marshal's plumes, no more impressive, apart from their trappings, than many other old gentlemen Judy had known. There was that in her eyes which transformed them to her imagination. Judy had her quiet mother's passion for courage, and could put a good many brilliant deeds to the names Major Lindley recited in her ear like a long rosary of glory.

At last even Judy's eyes grew a little weary of the blaze of colour and the million lights. She could never be weary of seeing great people, nor of listening to the compliments they paid Major Lindley. But two or three hours had passed, and Lady Flora showed no sign of being tired, but when they returned to her bade them be off and enjoy themselves and forget her. At last, lifting a blind in the refreshment-room where they were drinking tea, Judy saw the gardens flooded with moonlight stretching down to the cliff's edge, and heaved a little sigh.

"I will fetch your cloak," Major Lindley said quickly; "and we can get some air.

These rooms, big as they are, are getting heated."

"Not that I should ever be tired," said Judy, as he went.

He wrapped her tenderly in the white velvet cloak, even while she protested that she did not need it, the night was so mild; and they passed out through a long lit corridor into the garden, where Japanese lanterns were making a bizarre effect in the moonlight.

"Say 'Yes,' papa," Judy whispered.—p. 171.

Many couples were strolling about in the gardens. They went away from the crowd, and opening a little gate in the sea-wall which Major Lindley knew of old, they went a little way down the cliff path. Presently, amid great blocks and boulders of limestone, they were in a little world to themselves, with the great field of the sea stretching away into illimitable distance at their feet.

He found her a flat stone to sit down upon, spreading his handkerchief so that her finery should not come in contact with the stone.

Then he began to tell her how he had received the Victoria Cross. Judy listened with breathless interest. Her delight in the narrative was so overwhelming that it swept away his shy English dislike of talking about himself. He let her hold the cross in her hands while he repeated what the King had said, and how the Queen had come in and smiled and said a few gracious words. And Judy could never be tired hearing of the Queen and her beauty and grace. Judy had quite forgotten the new shyness which had been born since yesterday. Philip had forgotten that his dream of many a year had fallen to pieces about him. He stood looking down at Judy, gravely indulgent, gravely smiling, answering her torrent of questions as though he spoke of another man and not of himself.

"Oh, how proud she will be!" Judy sighed at last. "How beautiful that you can bring the cross to her when you go! What woman could resist it? Much less Miss Rosamund, who has always cared."

He turned his face away. She had brought him back sharply to remembrances. He did not speak for a few seconds, and she watched his averted face with consternation. What had her impulsiveness led her into saying? Was he angry with her? What had she done?

Then he turned to her, and seeing the alarm in her face, his own became very soft.

"Little Judy," he said, "that is all over and done with. Miss Lindley has chosen another man. And now, little friend, if you please, we will never speak of this again."

"I am so sorry, so sorry," stammered Judy; and suddenly her too-ready tears filled her eyes and overflowed on her cheeks. Judy had never been able to read a sorrowful tale, much less come face to face with one in real life. Her thoughts were in a tumult. Had he gone to Miss Rosamund straight from his investiture and been refused? And, "How could she? How could she? How could she?" she asked herself in passionate and generous resentment.

"Dear child"—Major Philip was overwhelmed—"how sweet you are to care so much. I don't deserve it. I am a hard fellow, accustomed to hard knocks all my life."

Then—he never could tell how it happened—Judy was in his arms, and he was kissing away her tears. A speech of his mother's came back to him. She had suggested that little Judy cared for him—this beautiful, bewitching child! Could it be possible? And if it was true could he let her suffer? For a moment the gentle ghost of Miss Rosamund Lindley faded out of the place it had kept so long in his heart. For a moment the blood raced madly through his veins.

"Little Judy," he said, "make the world over again for me! You can, if you will."

"Oh, not that, not that," said Judy, vaguely frightened, even while she yielded to his caresses.

"Why, Judy," he replied, "it must be that. You should not have let me kiss you if you meant it should not be that. You knew it, dear, didn't you, when you gave yourself up to me?"

For the hour—nay, for many hours—Judy was dazzled by the thought that this great, strong, distinguished soldier had stooped to her, the unsatisfactory ugly duckling of the Red House. Of course she loved him; she had always loved him, though she had been ready to give him up to Miss Rosamund for his own happiness. How pleased Lady Flora would be! And what would papa think about it? And oh, mother! For once in her life mother would approve of Judy. When Judy's tired eyes closed at last in the golden morning the last thought that was coherent before all melted off into mistiness was that mother would be pleased.

CHAPTER VIII.

"SAY 'YES,' PAPA."

THE morning after the great event brought Judy's recall. Despite her awe of Lady Flora, Mrs. Evelyn's maternal anxiety had at last broken bounds. Judy had been too long away from them. They all missed her. Lady Flora had her son now for company. If Judy would say what day, arrangements would be made for her being met in town.

Judy, with a shyness that hung about her like an exquisite veil, handed the letter to Lady Flora, who was looking this morning as though the world could hold nothing more for her in the way of happiness.

"We shall all travel back together," she said. "You are quite ready, Philip? Stannington is waiting to receive its conquering hero."

A shadow fell upon his face, which had been radiant.

"I want no receptions from Stannington," he said shortly. "It is not the time. Wait till the thing is over and done with. There are too many new graves."

Lady Flora fell in with his mood adroitly.

"Very well, Philip," she said soberly; "then we shall just take Judy home, you and I, and slip into the Cottage. I will let them know that you do not want a fuss made."

"I shall take you and Judy back, mother. Afterwards, I shall have much to do in town before I leave. Is there no way by which you and Judy could be in town, too?"

A sudden eagerness flashed into Lady Flora's face, then was sternly repressed.

"My dear Philip," she said, "a London hotel in the season! It is impossible. But I shall come up later. As for Judy, there is Lady Mary Winstanley. She grudges me Judy. You must go to Lady Mary, Judy, while Philip is in town. Your mother will not object."

Two days later they travelled back to Stannington. The Red House barouche awaited them at the station. Mrs. Evelyn had begged to be allowed to fetch Lady Flora and Major Lindley as well; all the same, it was somewhat to her surprise that Lady Flora's little governess cart and pony were not in attendance.

"The cart will take all the luggage," Mrs. Evelyn said, with a certain alarm at her own tenacity. Lady Flora was apt to be a little stubborn about accepting favours.

"So it shall, Helen, thank you," the old lady said, with the most friendly of smiles; "so it shall. And how do you think we have been treating Judy?"

Mrs. Evelyn looked at Judy in a puzzled way. They were rolling by this time along the well-kept road, under arches of exquisite green. The long avenues of the woods opened on the road, and dwindled away in perspectives of bewildering beauty.

"Judy seems to have grown up," she said, after a moment of the puzzled scrutiny.

Judy shrank back a little into her corner. Something of half-fearful, half-joyful anticipation came into her mother's quiet eyes, and then was hidden from sight. For the rest of the short drive she did not again make the conversation personal to Judy.

Where the road turns round by the Green Dragon, and the village green opens, a thing of beauty framed in great trees, the hill looking benignantly upon it, Mr. Evelyn, Judy's sisters, Miss Meredith, and the dogs were waiting. They had Judy out of the carriage, which drove along slowly to the Cottage, Mr. Evelyn walking beside it talking to Lady Flora and the Major so long as their roads went together.

When the carriage had taken the little road across the green he came back and gathered Judy's hand in his own and patted it and drew it through his arm. Judy had enough to do to acknowledge the greetings and curtseys that met her all the way.

"I've asked Lindley and Lady Flora to dine, Helen," he said to his wife. "Lindley accepted. The old lady was too tired I think she was pleased She must find Lindley somewhat too big for the Cottage and its resources."

"If we dared offer him a room!" said Mrs. Evelyn.

"It is only a day or two," Judy put in hurriedly. "He has to be in town making preparations. He goes out again on the 24th."

"So he does," said Mr. Evelyn seriously. "It's hard on Lady Flora. Still, it's the right thing; and her pride in him will keep her up."

Then, with a change of tone, he rallied his daughter.

"To think of our little Ju starting out from the schoolroom to stay at great seaside hotels, and go to big military receptions, and to be squired by a hero. I can tell you we're furiously jealous, Judy. Aren't we, girls? We think Judy has been stealing a march upon us, hey?"

His two elder daughters, thus appealed to, protested that they were both very glad Judy had been having such a pleasant time. Only during the little walk Mrs. Evelyn remained strangely silent.

When they had reached the house she herself went up with Judy to take off her hat and cloak, and dismissed her other daughters more summarily than she was used.

When she and Judy were alone she turned to her and held out her arms.

"Is it true, Judy?" she said.

She herself might have been the girl in the first shy radiance of love. Waves of colour were flowing over her fair face, her eyes were dewy, her lips smiling with a grave sweetness.

"It is true, mother," said Judy, coming into the arms and letting them close about her.

"I felt it," Mrs. Evelyn said prophetically. "That was why I was so anxious for your return. I should like my girls' wooing to take place under their father's roof with all the sanctities and safeguards of home about them. But, Judy dear, I am very glad."

Judy had one of her odd vagrant thoughts that perhaps the wooing never would have taken place if her mother had been there to hem them in and circumscribe them.

"We were so much together," she said, with an impulse to confession. "We were always together, Major Lindley and I. We made such expeditions over the downs."

"With Lady Flora?"

A shade of anxiety fell over the pleasure of Mrs. Evelyn's face.

"Nearly always without Lady Flora."

"Ah, well, of course Major Lindley has known you from the time you were a baby. His mother thought of that, I suppose. Now Judy, dear, I hear your boxes coming. Come and have some tea, and afterwards you will see how things have grown in the garden. It is not like when you came home long ago and had to take a stable lantern to see how your old garden was doing. I am very happy about you, dear child."

Mrs. Evelyn laughed in an exhilarated way. She had forgotten that she had not approved of Judy's pilgrimage with the stable lantern that autumn evening long ago, which had prolonged itself somewhat indefinitely and had ended in a visit to the stable-yard, where Juno's puppies, and Suky, the Kerry cow's calf, and a litter of black pigs, and the new foal had all come in for Judy's passionate sympathy and admiration.

She left Judy at her tea, with her sisters waiting on her in a manner which, for them, was enthusiastic. After all, how fond they all were of her! Judy, yet warm from the clasp of her mother's arms, began to wonder, in her headlong way, how so very undeserving a person as herself could have won all the goodwill with which her world regarded her.

XUM

Mrs. Evelyn, meanwhile, had gone down to her husband's den.

"Well?" he said. "Has Ju come downstairs? And is she ready to come out about the place with me? Why, what is the matter, Helen?"

Mrs. Evelyn had come close to him and put a hand on his shoulder. "Marmaduke, have you no idea of what has been happening to Judy? Don't you see it in her face? Didn't you suspect why Major Lindley was anxious to come to us the very first evening?"

"Good gracious, no!"

Mr. Evelyn pushed back his chair and stared at his wife.

"It is very sudden," she said, smiling, "and I must confess I am bewildered as his having chosen Judy, a mere unformed child. Of course, it is wonderful for her. The very person whom I would have chosen out of all the world for my little wild, impulsive Judy."

"Tut, Helen!" said Mr. Evelyn, with a frown.

He was so invariably lover-like in his manner to his wife that the very mild exclamation sounded in her ears like strong language. She fell back a little from him, her pretty colour fading.

"The man's too old for Judy," he went on, without noticing her perturbation. "Why, bless my soul! he must be well on in the forties. Then, hasn't he been in love with his cousin all his life? And there is Maurice. It doesn't seem right that Maurice should find Judy appropriated."

A shade of impatience came into Mrs. Evelyn's sweet expression.

"You don't really mean, Marmaduke," she said, "that the girls ought to wait till Maurice Evelyn has had his choice."

"Why, bless me! no, I suppose not," her husband answered irritably. "Still, he's a young fellow. We were much of an age when we married, Helen; at least, I had only four years advantage of you. That was as it should be. But Lindley—why, Lindley must be more than twenty years older than Judy—old enough to be her father. She is misled, poor child, by the glamour of his doings. She is too young to know her own mind. Besides, a man going out to the war! I don't want my girl to be a sort of widow. I'll refuse my consent till after the war is over. That will give the child time."

"You'd better consult Judy," Mrs. Evelyn said in a startled way. "Judy has grown up, Marmaduke; and she has had time to learn her own mind. She seems to have been constantly alone with Major Lindley. I feared something of the sort, knowing Lady Flora's curious ideas."

"No one would think anything about it," Mr. Evelyn said. "A man of his age! Pooh, no one could object to a child like Judy being in Philip Lindley's company; but if it means anything, it may mean that, as you say, Judy knows her own mind, and is not merely dazzled by the soldier."

"You must talk to Judy," Mrs. Evelyn said eagerly. "You will find that she does not look at it at all in a childish way. Indeed, I have an idea that if we were to interfere with Judy, Judy might possibly give us trouble. I must say, Marmaduke, that I am delighted with the progress Judy has made. I saw it at the first glance. She is so—so matured."

"Yes, poor Ju; I wish she wasn't. I did not grudge Ju her childhood. What does Lindley mean by taking our little girl from us while she is still a child, or ought to be?"

"Oh, it was quite time that Judy's hoydenish ways were given up," said Mrs. Evelyn, with a little frown. "Still, of course, I agree with you to a certain extent. It was my idea in keeping Judy in the schoolroom. I can't bear a girl to be a tom-boy. It is different with a boy."

"Oh, I know, I know," said her husband, with tender raillery. "It is such women as you that spoil the boys. Why, here comes Ju herself."

Judy had come into the room with her hat on, and stood now just a little beyond the door, as though she found it quite impossible to proceed further. She had bent her head till the roses and pink tulle of her hat were all that were visible, except the faintest line of chin.

Her father went to meet her, and drew her to him with a sigh.

"Well, little Judy," he said. "So you have been growing up, like a mushroom, in a single night. What am I to say to Lindley? My own inclination is to send him about his business, and say he shan't have my Ju, but your mother says differently. What shall I say, sweetheart?"

"Say 'Yes,' Papa," Judy whispered in so low a voice that he could hardly hear it.

[END OF CHAPTER EIGHT.]

"WOMEN AND CHILDREN FIRST!"

(From the Drawing by S. W. Hunter.)

A CHRISTMAS DAY MEDITATION.

By the Rev. Alexander McLaren, D.D.

"The Word became flesh."—JOHN i. 14 (R.V.).

THIS Gospel has no record of the birth of Jesus. It looks back far beyond Bethlehem, even to the "goings forth from everlasting" of the Word who "was in the beginning with God, and was God." Matthew and Luke look at the Nativity from the earthward side, John gazes on it from the heavenward; they begin with the cradle, he begins with the bosom of the Father; they tell of the birth of the son of Mary, he of the Incarnation of the Son of God. It is the same fact that is declared when we read, "The Word became flesh," and when we read, "She brought forth her first-born son," but the point of view is changed.

And we must take John's point of view if we would do full justice to Luke's. The worth of the birth of Jesus depends on its being the Incarnation of the Eternal Word. It is either the most stupendous fact in history or it is next to nothing to us. The joy of Christmastide is unreasonable if all that evokes it is but the birth of a Jewish peasant woman's child, however great he became; but if in that birth the Word became flesh, then, and only then, do the songs of angels and the wondering adoration of men rightly circle round the manger in Bethlehem. The brief but inexhaustible words in which John tells the stupendous fact open out, as we gaze, like the midnight sky, into violet depths sown with far-off suns, whose mass and lustre we can but partially perceive.

But the dimmest vision of these starry truths does more to light us on our way than the clearest sight of earth's petty and passing candles.

We shall best grasp the greatness of this saying if we try, first, to apprehend its teaching as to the Incarnation, and next to recall some of the purposes for which that mighty miracle came to pass.

In regard to the former, it is to be noted that the statement in the text comes as the climax of the teaching in the prologue of the Gospel as to the Eternal Word. The first eighteen verses of the chapter are as a majestic bridge between Eternity and Time, the further side of which touches "the beginning" ere creatures were, and the nearer touches the manger. These profound verses declare in stately sequence the eternal Being of the personal Word, His union with God before time was, and His true Divinity. Passing from the secrets of the Divine nature into the universe of created beings, the evangelist declares that the Word is the agent of creation, the source of life, and the fountain of light. There were created beings before there was life, and there were living creatures before there was light, which is the prerogative of man alone. The Word is the medium of all revelation, and has been in the world all through its history, enlightening all men everywhere and always. But the very apex of all this energy of self-manifestation is reached and declared in the words, tremendous in their simplicity and brevity, "The Word became flesh."

Now it is very clear, from the word "became," that the Word is conceived of as active in the Incarnation. Both pre-existence and voluntary action are necessarily implied in the expression; and both are also plainly involved in our Lord's own habitual way of speaking about His own appearance in the world. For it is no accident that He only once speaks of Himself as being born, and that the occasion on which He does so explains why He then used the unfamiliar expression. It was to Pilate that He said, "To this end was I born"; but even then He was, as if constrained to do justice to His own consciousness, careful to add, however little His hearer could understand, or even perceive the significance of the addition, "and for this cause came I into the world." Everywhere else His language is, "I came," "I am come." And the assertion of personal volition and action in regard to the two ends of earthly life, where men are most purely passive, reached its climax when He said, with the calm tone of one stating a perfectly natural and familiar fact, "I came forth from the Father, and am come into the world; again I leave the world and go unto the Father." In either fact a double movement is discerned—in the one a coming forth from and a coming into; in the other, a departing from and a rejoining. There is one Man who was born because He willed to come, and who died because He willed to depart. There is one Man to whom it was humiliation to be born, and the most signal token of loving self-abnegation to die. He "was made in the likeness of men," and He "became obedient unto death," because He would, and He would because He loved. There is no adequate construing or celebration of the birth of Jesus which does not recognise that in it we see Him laying aside His vesture of glory and girding Himself with the slave's garment, and that for the love of us and to wash us from our sins.

That "becoming" is more than merely assuming or being invested with, after the fashion of the transitory appearances in human guise of the gods of the nations, who "came down in the likeness of men," but dropped the mantle of flesh as they soared again. That becoming, then, is permanent. What He became He is for evermore. On the throne, as in the manger, through eternity, as in the fleeting years of His earthly life, He bears our nature.

But what is the "flesh" which He became? We must not narrow that word so as to make it include only the bodily element in manhood. It means complete humanity, considered indeed as weak, sense-bound, and perishable, but distinctly including soul and spirit as well as body. Jesus likewise "partook of all" that makes manhood. He hungered and was weary, He thirsted and was pained, He slept and groaned and died. And He had a true human heart and mind and will. He loved and sorrowed; He grew in wisdom; He struggled and obeyed, trusted, and adored. He did not so "become flesh" as to cease to be the Eternal Word, but, remaining the same, He "emptied Himself," and by His own act took on Him "the form of a servant, and being rich, became poor."

Christianity is in its very root supernatural. The Incarnation is the greatest miracle of all. Jesus is not the product of natural evolution, and cannot be explained by environment. He is a completely new beginning, a new stream of unsullied clearness poured into the foul lake of humanity. If His birth is the Incarnation of God manifest in the flesh, then we need not try to pare down the miraculous element in a life so begun, nor wonder at its appearance there. The miracles wrought by His hand are less wonderful than, and naturally result from, the fact that He had a hand to work them. If the Incarnation is struck out of Christianity, the power is stolen out of it. The Magi followed but an earth-born exhalation, and the Shepherds only heard their own dreams singing in their ears, unless He who was born in Bethlehem was the Word who from the beginning was with God and was God.

We turn to consider now the purposes served by the Incarnation. Jesus has given us many sayings which set the aims of His "coming" in a rich variety of lights, but we may gather them together under two or three heads. And, first, He came to show us God. The context speaks of the Word as "tabernacling among us," and of our consequent beholding of His glory. No doubt the reference is to the tabernacle in which the Divine presence dwelt and to the Glory, the bright cloud which shone above the mercy seat. It is a point of view peculiar to this Gospel that Christ's earthly life is regarded not so much as humiliation, but rather as the manifestation of supreme lustre and loveliness; and that the Cross, which was in one aspect the lowest depth of His condescension, is set forth as the very apex of His elevation, wherein He is "lifted up" and "glorified." Words are poor for revealing God, but the Word declares Him by deeds, which are the only means of revealing persons. "He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father," said Jesus; and when we look at His gentle goodness, His tears and tenderness, the pity which filled His heart and softened His voice, the self-sacrificing love that impelled Him ever, we see not only the glory of stainless manhood, but the "eradiation of the Father's glory." There is a wholly new conception of Divinity. The vulgar attributes of omnipotence, omniscience, and the like, fall into the background, and love is the glowing heart of the brightness. There is what gives definiteness and substance to vague surmisings and doubtful hopes as to the Unknown Somewhat behind creation. A bare Theism has little power, and soon evaporates or freezes. If men are to have a "living God," they must find Him in the Incarnate Word. Does not the trend of thought to-day show that we must either look on Christ as God manifest in the flesh, or do without a God altogether? As Richter long ago saw, a dead Christ means a universe like an empty eye-socket from which the eye has been torn.

The Word became flesh that He might show us the ideal human life; and how remarkable it is that these four short outline biographies, covering but a few years, fragmentary as they are, and narrating a mere segment of a life from which many relations and circumstances that fill much of our usual lives were conspicuously absent, should leave on all readers the impression of perfection, and should be felt, even by the most unbelieving, to afford a complete pattern and absolute standard! And how blessed it is that we may have a loving Person instead of a cold ideal, and a living, breathing example instead of a cold law. "If any man serve Me, let him follow Me" is the emancipating, inspiring word of Christian ethics, which makes Christ's yoke easy, though it grips the neck tightly, and His burden light, though its contents far exceed the prescriptions of the most rigid moralists. The Word was incarnate that He might experience human conditions, and so bring sympathy and help. Who can tell what cheer and sense of companionship the old well-worn thought brings, that He has felt all the weariness and pain that we feel? Ploughing through the snow-fields of the north, or toiling across the parched, sandy deserts of the south, how the lonely pilgrim would take fresh heart if he came across a foot-print, and how much more glad he would be if he knew by its marks that it was his brother's foot that had left its print! We have no road to go that is not hallowed by His feet, and we have no tears to weep, nor sighs to sigh, which He has not wept and sighed in the days of His flesh, and which He does not now compassionate, not only with the pity of a God, but with the sympathy of a man.

The Word became flesh that He might die. "The Son of Man came . . . to give His life a ransom for many." We are not to set forth His death as the sole purpose of incarnation, nor as the sole sacrifice which redeems. All His life was sacrifice. Throughout it all He was "bearing the sins of many," and carried our sorrows long before Calvary. But the element of sacrifice reached its highest power in His death. And we shall not understand the Incarnation in its most melting aspect unless we couple the cradle with the Cross, and fully recognise that while there are other great ends to be attained by the Word's becoming flesh, the deepest meaning of the Incarnation is, "God loved us and sent His Son to be the propitiation for our sins." The shadow of the cross stretched athwart the cradle. Christmas points onward to Good Friday. We hear sometimes that the Incarnation is the true centre of Christianity; but we may rather say that, like an ellipse, it has two foci, the Incarnation and the Crucifixion. Neither is understood in its depths unless it is kept in intimate connection with the other. "What God hath joined together, let not man put asunder."

The Word became flesh that He might lift manhood to the Throne in His own person, and so open up for us all the glorious possibilities of likeness to Himself. The new thing in His ascension is that He bore a human nature into the glory which He had with the Father before the foundation of the world. Thereby He repealed the greatness of that nature which in its perfection is capable of such entrance, unconsumed, into the central light of God. The Word has stooped that we might be lifted to the height from which He came down. He has laid aside His glory that we might be clothed with it, after He had resumed it. He has become flesh that we might become spirit. He has become like us that we might become like Him. "We see not yet all things put under man," and the lofty hopes that have lit earth's darkness may seem but idle dreams when we regard humanity as it is to-day; but our faith should not falter, for "we see Jesus, crowned with glory and honour," and where He is, and what He is, there and that shall also His servant be. Therefore no hopes are too radiant, no courage too high, if we have taken for our Christ the Christ of Bethlehem, the Christ of Calvary, the Christ of Olivet, the Christ of the Throne.

MAURICE'S LITTLE BIRD.

By G. E. Farrow, Author of "The Wallypug of Why," "The New Panjandrum," Etc.

DON'T know exactly what kind of a bird it was. It may have been a robin, or a thrush, or a blackbird. No, I don't think it could have been a blackbird, because he described it to me as being a little bird when he told me all about the wonderful adventure which he had with it; but, at any rate, it was a bird of some sort.

He used to scatter crumbs on the lawn outside the breakfast-room window; and after having done this for some days he noticed that one of the many birds who came to the feast appeared tamer than the rest, and did not seem frightened when he went quite close to him

Besides, this particular one came every morning, and used to perch on a tree a little way from the window, twittering impatiently if Maurice happened to be a little later than usual.

So gradually they got to be quite friends, and the little bird used to fly about in the garden all day watching for Maurice, and whenever the boy came out on to the lawn the little bird would fly from one tree to another just above his head, twittering and chirping as though he was quite pleased to see him.

One afternoon in the holidays, when Maurice had nothing particular to do, he was walking in the garden a long way from the house, and the bird as usual was following him overhead; he stopped and had a good look at his little friend.

"I do wish you could talk," he said aloud; "that would be jolly, and then we——"

The little bird peeped cautiously about, and to Maurice's intense astonishment interrupted him with:

"I can talk, of course. All birds can, if they like, only it doesn't pay to do it."

"Oh!" exclaimed Maurice, too delighted to feel very much astonished. "Can you really? How ripping! But—but why don't you always do so?"

"Ough! Life is hard enough, as it is, for birds, what with cats, and boys, and guns, and traps, and one thing and another; and if people knew that we could talk, why, they'd be more anxious than ever to catch us and shut us up in cages. Look at parrots. They are the only birds who don't belong to the Union, and what is the result? They're caught, and put in cages, and their lives are made miserable, all because they haven't the sense to hold their tongues."

"What do you mean by 'belonging to the Union'?" asked Maurice, who was greatly interested.

"The Non-Talking Feathered Fowls' Association," explained the bird. "The Queen of the Fairies is at the head of it. We all belong to it, as I said, except the parrots, and here and there a magpie, or a jackdaw, or a starling; but these are very rare exceptions. The rules about talking before humans are very strict, and I should get into a terrible row if I was caught talking to you; but you seem a decent little chap, and very thoughtful, and all that, about the crumbs, so that I don't mind breaking the rules for once—only—look out! Here comes a feathered fowl!" And the little bird, with a twitter and a flirt of his tail, hopped from one twig to another, and then flew quickly away.

Maurice looked about for the other bird, which he fully expected to see, but nothing of the sort was in sight.

Presently a loud "Quack!" came from the ground near his feet, and a fat duck waddled through the hedge at the end of the garden.

Maurice thought there was a suspicious look in her eye as she remarked "Quack!" again in a loud tone of voice.

"I suppose this is a feathered fowl," thought Maurice. "I wonder if it belongs to the Union?"

"I say!" he called out, "can you talk? because——"

But the duck only said "Quack! Quack! Qu-a-a-ck!!" and disappeared through the hedge again.

Maurice hunted about, but could find no trace of his little friend all the afternoon, nor did he see him again till the following morning, when he appeared, as usual, amongst the other birds for the feast of crumbs.

He took no notice of Maurice, though, and only after a long while followed him down the garden.

"I say," he said, when at last there were no

IN TIME OF TROUBLE.

FROM THE PAINTING
BY EDWARD S. HARPER

UNIV. OF MICH.

XUM

other birds within hearing, "we shall have to be very careful. That duck yesterday suspected something. I heard her telling an old hen that she should keep her eye on me, as she had an idea that I was holding some sort of communication with a human; so, as I said before, we shall have to be very careful. I'm going to a party," he added inconsequently.

"A party?" said Maurice. "What sort of a party?"

"Oh, very select," remarked the bird consequentially. "It's an annual affair, given by the Queen of the Fairies. About thirty or forty birds are invited, some of the best families of frogs—from the gold fish pond—and several distinguished insects, including a foreign beetle,

Maurice laughed. "I don't think," he said, "that I could ever be as small as you are—why, even Tom Thumb was ever and ever so much bigger, and——"

"You might," said the bird reflectively, "if you could only find a four-leaved clover plant."

"What good would that be?"

"If you find a four-leaved clover, you can have any wish granted. I thought everybody knew that."

"I didn't," said Maurice. "I wish I could find one, though."

"Well, the party isn't till next week," said the bird. "Suppose you hunt for one, and, if you can reduce yourself to a reasonable size, I'll do what I can to help you to go to the party,"

"'I suppose this is a feathered fowl.'" who came over from abroad in a case of fruit and escaped into the greenhouse while they were unpacking it. He lives by himself in a snug little place by the hot-water pipes, and declares that he finds England suits him admirably."

"Oh, I do wish I was going," said Maurice enviously. "Will there be real fairies there?"

"Of course," said the bird; "and elves, and gnomes, and all sorts of people."

"Oh dear, I suppose there's no way you could manage for me even to see the party, is there?"

"Good gracious, no!" said the bird. "You're much too big. There's no possible way of hiding a person of your size. If you were only as small as me now, I might possibly manage it."

and off he flew, leaving Maurice to think the matter over.

"I should like to go, you know," he considered. "I wonder if four-leaved clovers are such very difficult things to find?" and he spent all the rest of the day looking about on the lawn and in the meadow next to the garden for one. Quite unsuccessfully, though, and neither could he discover any the next day, nor the next after that.

The time for the party was getting close at hand, and all of Maurice's time was spent in eagerly hunting about for four-leaved clovers, and he was so very intent upon this quest that he was quite cross when his mother suggested one afternoon that he should gather a large bunch of flowers to pack in a box and send to his aunt, who lived in town, and who would therefore value them very much.

XUM

"Do you want them gathered to-day, mother?" he asked rather petulantly.

"Yes, dearie, because I'm writing to Aunt May by this post."

"I'm very busy about something," said Maurice.

"Well, dearie, don't you think you could put it aside just for a time, and do something which would give pleasure to somebody else?"

Maurice thought for a moment, and then his better nature came to the fore, and he smiled and ran off to gather the flowers.

Such a big bunch, and made up of all the flowers he knew his aunt loved best, and all with fine long stalks, so that they would go into the vases nicely, and keep for a long time; and then, just when he was gathering the last flower of all, right down near the root he saw —what do you think? A clover plant which the gardener had overlooked—and on one of the stems were four leaves!

Hastily gathering his prize, he put it inside the lining of his straw hat to keep it safely, and ran indoors with the flowers for his mother.

"Why, dearie, how bright and happy you look," was the remark which greeted him on his return to the house. "I expect that's because you've been giving up your own pleasure to perform a kindness for someone else; that's sure to bring it's own reward, you know."

Maurice smiled brightly, and peeped into his hat. He was half inclined to tell his mother all about the four-leaved clover; but, fearing that perhaps she might think it foolish of him to set so much store by it, he only just held up his face to be kissed, and ran off to try and find his little bird friend. He couldn't see him all that day, though, and neither was he on the lawn at breakfast time the next day, so Maurice was beginning to feel in despair.

What was the use of the clover leaf, if he didn't know what to wish for? However, late in the afternoon of the next day, while he was walking in the garden, he heard the well-known twitter, and there sat his little friend.

"Couldn't come this morning," said the bird fussily. "I had to attend to my plumage; and, besides, the party's to-night, and I never eat anything all day before I go to a fairy party. One enjoys the good things all the more."

"I've found a four-leaved clover," said Maurice triumphantly.

"Not really!" said the bird, incredulously.

"Yes," said Maurice; "so perhaps I shall be able to go to the party, after all—if you will help me. Will you?"

"Why, yes, of course," said the bird. "Let's look at the leaf."

Maurice took it out of his hat and held it in his hand.

"Yes, that's all right," said the bird, looking at it critically. "Hold it in your left hand, and wish to be as small as me."

Maurice did as he was directed, and instantly the clover leaf disappeared, and he found himself down amongst the grass on the lawn and scarcely taller than it was high.

"How funny!" he laughed. "But I'm tiny enough now, surely, to be able to go to the party with you."

"Not quite so fast," said the bird. "You haven't been invited, you know; but, fortunately for you, one of the birds who was going to the party is not very well—he's moulting—and so, if we manage it properly, you might come in his place. Let's see! I'd better go and find you some feathers."

"Whatever for?" asked Maurice.

"To wear, of course," said the bird. "You couldn't possibly pass for a bird as you are," and he flew off, returning almost directly with two or three feathers in his beak. Off again and back with some more, and this repeated over and over again till quite a pile of feathers of all shapes and sizes lay on the ground beside Maurice.

The last time the bird returned he came hopping along the ground, bringing with him a most respectable and amiable-looking old spider, wearing glasses and a top hat.

"This is my friend," said the bird, waving one claw towards Maurice. "I wish you'd be kind enough to fasten these feathers on for him, will you?"

The spider bowed, and raised his hat.

"Delighted, I'm sure, to oblige any friend of yours, sir," he said, and immediately began running round and round Maurice, unravelling some web as he did so.

Then he picked some of the feathers up and deftly wove them into a kind of coat, which he threw over Maurice, adding one or two longer feathers here and there, till in a very few moments he really did begin to look something like a bird.

"There!" said his little friend after a time and the spider had done his best, "I think you'll do, and if you sit pretty high up in a bush with a lot of leaves, no one will know but that you are a bird. Come on, or we shall be late!" and, after thanking the spider and wishing him good evening, the bird led the way, hopping on the ground a little way in front of Maurice.

"If we get there before anyone else," said the bird, "we shall not attract so much attention, and shall be less likely to be discovered."

So they hurried along in silence for some distance till at last they came to a little hollow under some trees at the further end of the meadow.

Here they found a number of toadstools and mushrooms, set out with all kinds of fairy delicacies—dew in acorn cups, honey and ripe fruits, seeds and nuts, and a number of other such things as the invited guests would enjoy.

"Get up here," whispered the bird, pointing to a small bush near by, and keep quite still, and you will see and hear everything without being seen yourself."

Maurice did as he was told, and very soon the guests began to arrive.

The frogs came in their best green clothes, and the next arrivals were the insects—several grasshoppers, two cockchafers, three crickets, and an elderly May-bug, who was assisted on either side by an earwig.

The birds came next, flying in from all directions and settling themselves on the branches of the trees.

Maurice's friend seemed to know them all, and flew about, conversing amiably with one and another.

Presently there was a stir, and someone shouted, "The Queen! the Queen!" and almost immediately afterwards a coach made of a crumpled leaf and drawn by four well-matched butterflies came skimming along.

Within it sat the Queen of the Fairies, and beside her the guest of the evening—the foreign beetle, in a kind of armour of bright green and gold and wearing a broad blue ribbon, with a number of stars and decorations pinned to it.

With the coach came a whole troop of fairies, gnomes, elves, and pixies, till the whole place seemed alive with company.

Then followed dances, with music from the insect orchestra, and feastings—Maurice got a little fruit and some seeds, which his friend managed very skilfully to bring to him without attracting anyone's attention—everything going off very well, till suddenly everyone was startled by a loud "Quack!" and the fat duck which Maurice had seen when he had held his first conversation with the little bird, came waddling into the midst of the party, scattering the mushroom tables and causing the utmost confusion amongst the guests, particularly the young insects and frogs.

The Fairy Queen was furious.

"What does this intrusion mean?" she demanded.

"I have come to lodge a complaint, your Majesty," said the duck, looking greedily at the fruit still upon some of the tables.

"This is not the time to do so," said the Queen angrily. "Go away, Duck."

"But it's very important," said the duck. "I've come to denounce that bird," she said, nodding towards Maurice's friend, "for talking to humans! I heard him myself."

The Fairy Queen gave a little gasp, and everyone turned and looked towards the little bird, with indignation and horror expressed on their faces.

The little bird looked very confused, and I expect he would have blushed if he could have done so; but I'm told it's a very difficult matter for birds to do this. However, he must have looked very guilty, for the Queen at once said:

"I needn't ask you if this terrible accusation is true. I can see by your manner and appearance that it is."

"If you please, your Majesty——" began the little bird.

"Not a word!" interrupted the Queen. "Go from my presence," she said sternly. "I shall instruct all birds to avoid you in future. You will never be able to find a mate, you will never again be invited to a fairy party, you shall be hunted from the neighbourhood by hawks, and during your next moult you will lose your voice and never be able to sing again. Now go! Thus shall be punished all those who disobey the rules of the Fairy Queen President of the Non-Talking Feathered Fowls' Association. Go!"

The poor little bird was preparing to obey the Queen's stern commands, and with drooping pinions and bowed head was about to depart, when Maurice, who had heard all that had taken place, jumped from the bough on which he had been sitting and stumbled to where the Queen was standing.

"Oh, please!" he said, "don't punish him so severely. It was partly my fault, and please let me be punished instead of him. I——"

"Who—or, rather, what is this?" exclaimed the Queen, raising her glasses and looking at Maurice through them.

"With the coach came a whole troop of fairies."

"I think, your Majesty," said the foreign beetle, "that it's some sort of a bird—er—probably a lark."

"Nonsense!" said the Queen; "It's certainly not a bird. What are you—creature?"

"I'm a little boy," said Maurice.

"A boy?" exclaimed the Queen.

"Yes," said Maurice; and then he explained everything that had happened. "It's all my fault for wanting to come," he said, "and I hope you'll punish me instead of the little bird. He doesn't deserve to be punished, really, and——"

"You must allow me to be the best judge of that," said the Fairy Queen, smiling; "but you are a good, generous little boy to wish to take all of the blame on yourself; so I will remit part of the sentence, and only banish him from this neighbourhood. The hawks shall not molest him, and other birds shall overlook his fault, on condition that he never talks to a human being again, since it is against the rules. And for you, your punishment shall be——"

"If you please, your Majesty," interrupted one of the fairies, "the duck has gobbled up all the refreshments."

"Then your punishment shall be," said the Fairy Queen, smiling at Maurice, "that you return to your proper size and drive the duck back to the farmyard."

In an instant the fairies had vanished, the frogs had hopped away, the insects had all disappeared, and the birds had flown off, leaving Maurice, who had suddenly returned to his usual height, with the duck at his feet.

XUM

BASED ON THE INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

DECEMBER 20TH.—The Birth of Christ.

Passage for reading—St. Matthew ii. 1—12.

POINTS.—THE WISE MEN FROM THE EAST.

1. Sought Christ with pains and perseverance.
2. Worshipped Christ as God and King.
3. Gave Christ gifts—typical of His kingdom, priesthood, and humanity.

ILLUSTRATIONS. The Way of the Cross. An old legend tells how a man in a vision saw a procession of angels, each bearing a cross. And there appeared on the scene a poor countryman wandering in the field; and an angel asked him what he sought, and the man said, "I seek a treasure which a man, finding in a field, sold all that he had and bought it." Then the angel pointed to the cross and said, "This is the treasure which enriches the soul and leads to eternal life." Then there appeared a poor, godly woman seeking something. Another angel said, "What seekest thou?" And she said, "I seek the beauty of holiness and a plain way to God." The angel pointed to the cross and said, "This is the way of holiness and the plain way to God." And a nobleman coming by said, "I seek rest and peace to my soul," and he, too, was told that the way of the cross—that is, the way of Christ—alone brings true peace and security to a man's soul.

The Worship of God. Worship is giving God His due. We may worship Him with heart and soul and voice; but we may worship Him also in school or at work by being upright and downright honest, true, and faithful. We can also worship God by serving others. If we visit the sick, and feed the hungry, and comfort the sad, we are offering incense to and worshipping God. Part of our mission in life is to worship God by helping our fellow-men, and our gifts should be sweet ones. All should try to make home life sweet by showing sweet temper, giving sweet answers and looks and manners. That is the incense we can give to God, and it will be accepted by Him.

The Gift of Myrrh. This was the first and last gift to Christ. It was given at His birth and at His death. This teaches that all through this life we must meet bitterness. "Man is born to trouble." There was myrrh for Jesus, and there is myrrh for us. Like Him, we shall have to taste sorrow. He went about giving sweetness, but was Himself the "Man of Sorrows." He brightened many homes, but what home was there for Him? He fed the multitude, but Himself hungered and thirsted. His hands were stretched out to bless, and those hands were pierced with nails. But it was for the joy set before Him that He endured the cross of suffering, and so will it be for us. If we endure patiently, happy are we.

> "The path of sorrow, and that path alone, > Leads to the land where sorrow is unknown."

DECEMBER 27TH.—The Old and New Year.

Passage for reading—Psalm ciii. 13—22.

POINTS. 1. God's fatherly pity for His children.
2. Man's short and fleeting life.
3. God's everlasting mercy.

ILLUSTRATIONS. A Father's Love. "It will give a notion of my father's tenderness if I set down just one tiniest instance of his attention to me. The forenoon was oppressive. I was sitting under a tree, trying to read, when he came up to me. There was a wooden gate near, with open bars. He went and set it wide open, saying, 'There, my love, you will fancy yourself cooler if I leave the gate open.' Will you laugh at me for mentioning such a trifle? I think not, for it went deep to my heart, and I seemed to know God as a Father better for it ever after. A father is a great and marvellous truth, and one you can never get at the depth of, try how you may." (George Macdonald.)

Shortness of Life. The old Hebrews, among their many traditions, tell us a story of Methuselah. They say that his great length of life was early made known to him. His friends advised him to build a substantial house for himself. He refused, saying that it was not worth while building a house at all for such a short time. He realised the shortness of life, not its length; and he looked for "the city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God."

God Rich in Mercy. I asked, when in the United States of America, how much it took to make a farmer rich, and was told that a man was thought rich who possessed £1,000. Going further to a flourishing manufacturing city, I found the idea of riches was quite different. A man there was not considered rich till he was worth at least £50,000. Going still further, I found that none but millionaires were considered to be really rich. Now, if such is the idea of riches in material things, what must riches be when you rise above the highest men to angels, and above angels to God? What must be the circuit which makes riches when it reaches Him?

JANUARY 3RD, 1904.—The Boyhood of Christ.

Passage for Reading.—St. Luke ii. 40—52.

POINTS. 1. A happy home at Nazareth.
2. A child seeking instruction.
3. A boy growing in grace and favour.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Sight of Home. In the history of the memorable retreat of the 10,000 Greeks under Xenophon, it is said that when they reached the summit of the mountain whence they descried in the distance the tremulously bright blue of the waters that were to bear them home, in raptures of joy they instantly shouted out, "The sea, the sea!" There was one enthusiastic rush, one simultaneous cry. They embraced each other and wept, and in a moment the pang of discomfiture and the toilsome march of five or six hundred leagues were forgotten and repaid as they neared Home."

Knowledge of God. An aged negress once asked a friend, "Do you know God?" "I hope I know something of Him," was the reply. "How, then," she asked, "may we know God?" "We may learn something," he said, "about His goodness and handiwork from what we see in yonder garden and in these beautiful trees." "You are right, sir; but is there no other way of knowing Him?" "Yes," he replied, "we may also learn something of Him from His dealings with the sons of men, the history of nations, and the lives of individuals." "Is there no other way?" again she asked. "Yes, from the Bible we gain more knowledge of God than all the other sources put together, for in that blessed book God has revealed Himself."

Early Training. As letters cut in the body of a tree grow up with the tree, and the fruit of the tree grows up with the tree, and therefore the twigs break not under the great weight, because they grow up together, so plant good things in those that are young, teach them to know good things, and to hate all evil things, plant in them good desires, and train them in doing their duty to God and man. Then will they grow up in the right way, and when they are old will not depart from it.

JANUARY 10TH.—The Preaching of John the Baptist.

Passage for Reading.—St. Matthew iii. 1—12.

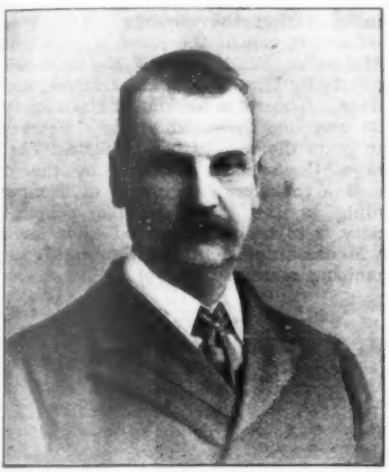
POINTS. TRUE REPENTANCE INCLUDES—
1. Contrition of sin before God.
2. Belief in Christ as the Saviour.
3. Change of life by the power of the Holy Spirit.

ILLUSTRATIONS. A Present Resolve. There was once a wise and loving teacher. He had many pupils, who satisfied him with their progress in learning, but grieved him by their sinful lives. He often warned them, but his words made little impression. One day he said to them in a voice full of sadness, "Live as you please and enjoy the pleasures and follies of life as long as you can; but I pray you to promise me one thing. Do not deny me this one favour; you owe it to the love I have always shown you, and it is for your good." The young men eagerly asked what it was, and promised to do it. "It is simply this," replied the wise man, "that you will repent and begin a new life one day before your death. Promise it faithfully and solemnly." At first they could not understand what their teacher meant, but then it dawned upon them. Then one of them, deeply touched in his conscience, replied, "Dear master, we cannot know whether we shall live till to-morrow. The only thing we can safely promise is to repent this very day. We will do so."

Christ Confessed at Last. During the religious revival in Ireland in 1853 a poor man, aged 104, walked ten miles to make a public profession of his faith at a confirmation held by the Protestant Bishop of Tuam. When questioned, he said, "I lived more than 103 years in total darkness, knowing nothing of the way to heaven; I was blind and ignorant." "And now what is your hope?" "My hope is in the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world. Oh! to think that I lived 103 years not caring for my soul, and that then this blessed truth should have burst upon me! How can I praise Him enough for His wondrous love?"

Man's Weakness, God's Strength. There once lived in a poor room, in a miserable part of Glasgow, an aged woman, a slave to the habit of incessant drinking. At last, by God's grace, she sought a better life; but she had a fierce struggle in the painful efforts to break off the bad habit. The terrible thirst, which none but drunkards know, again and again seized her and seemed by its force to hurry her to the whisky store. Her only refuge was to seek aid from on high. She would bury her grey hairs in the coverlet as she knelt by the bedside, and with streaming eyes and clasped hands would cry out, "Keep me, oh! keep me, my God, for I canna keep myself."



XUM

TEMPERANCE NOTES AND NEWS.

By a Leading Temperance Advocate.

A NOTABLE WORKER.

ONE of the most encouraging signs of progress in the Temperance movement is the attraction which it undoubtedly has for all who are concerned with the reclamation of the vicious and criminal classes. Some of the most ardent

(Photo: Army and Navy Auxiliary C.S., Limited, Westminster.)

MAJOR KNOX, GOVERNOR OF H.M. PRISON, WANDSWORTH.

Temperance enthusiasts have, like Canon Horsley and Major Knox, gained their experience from dealing at first hand with prisons and prisoners. Major Knox, for example, has been for many years the Governor of Wandsworth Prison, one of the largest institutions of the kind in the world. One would have thought that the daily routine of duty among those "who have gone wrong" would have been more than sufficient to exhaust the sympathy of the most sympathetic man, and so drive him to take his recreation in something of a decidedly different character. Not so with Major Knox. His evening hours are devoted to good works, mainly connected with the promotion of Temperance. He is the honorary treasurer of the Rochester Diocesan Branch of the Church of England Temperance Society, and night after night may be found addressing parochial meetings, particularly in South London, although his effective services are by no means restricted to the area south of the Thames. Major Knox's unique experience provides him with an unending store of illustrations, and as a speaker to men he has few equals. The deep spirituality of his addresses, and the pathos of his personal appeals, are irresistible. Well indeed would it be for the public advocacy of the Temperance cause if it had the support of more men of the stamp of Major Knox.

A MUCH NEGLECTED DUTY.

It is greatly to be regretted that the visitation of the homes of the people is so much neglected by Temperance workers. In the early days of the movement visitation was considered an essential part of the propaganda. If a man or a woman signed the pledge, the name and address was handed over to some member of the committee, whose duty it was to visit the home, to speak the word of encouragement to the new recruit, and thus help him to feel that sympathy and brotherly love were a part of the work of Temperance folk. One continually hears of the falling off of the attendance at Temperance meetings. Possibly a revival of house-to-house visitation would do something to stir up an interest in the movement generally.

FACTS FOR WORKING MEN.

Those who address Temperance meetings will do well to look up the economic argument. Since the death of William Hoyle one has missed the statement of the case against the liquor traffic from its financial and commerical aspect. Mr. T. P. Whittaker, M.P., devoted his "Lees and Raper Memorial Lecture" to this subject, and his brilliant and masterly handling of a great array of figures cannot fail to compel the admiration of hard-headed business men. In these days, when the newspapers and public meetings are giving so much attention to trade matters in their financial aspect, Temperance speakers will find that working men are willing to listen to a plain statement as to the cost of the liquor traffic to the country, and to its bearing upon the financial burthens imposed upon ratepayers and taxpayers.

TEMPERANCE IN THE SCHOOLS.

The working of the new Education Act makes it necessary for Temperance people to keep a watchful eye on the doings of the new educational authorities. In the old days the National Temperance League and United Kingdom Band of Hope Union had, by much tact and wise action, obtained an entrance for qualified Temperance lecturers to visit the elementary schools at stated intervals to instruct the children in Temperance principles. In one or two instances an attempt is now being made to curtail these facilities, and there can be no doubt that unless the action of the new authorities be kept under observation there will be a danger of losing a valuable opportunity for reaching the rising generation.

A NEW TEMPERANCE HALL.

The city of Lincoln has a Temperance society which was established so far back as 1837. A short time ago the venerable society, which has a splendid record of successful work, determined to signalise itself by the erection of a new hall. The old hall had done good service for twenty-eight years, but it was felt that a new building more in keeping with the modern requirements of the work was essential. It will be seen by our illustration that the new building is a handsome structure. The architects were Messrs. W. Mortimer and Son, and the builders Messrs. S. and R. Horton. The front is of local red brick dressings of concrete masonry. The total cost of the structure was £9,000, of which £5,000 has been raised. The large hall is an elegant apartment, with a platform to accommodate 400 persons, and an orchestra capable of seating forty performers. There is a small hall suitable for conferences and lectures, and the building is fitted with electricity throughout. The hall was opened by the Lady Cecilia Roberts, and the Lawson Institute by Mrs. W. W. Richardson. The Mayor and the City Sheriff attended, supported by many well-known ladies and gentlemen. The president of the society is Alderman Wyatt, J.P.; the treasurer, Mr. J. T. Hodgett; the hon. secretary, Mr. E. Murfin; the assistant hon. sec., Mr. W. P. Armstrong; and the organising secretary, Mr. W. Monks. The work of the society covers a varied field of effort, including Pleasant Saturday Evenings and Pleasant Sunday Afternoons. Open-air meetings are held on the Cornhill every Sunday evening during the summer. The Women's Auxiliary is one of the most helpful adjuncts of the society, and Mothers' Meetings are held regularly by Mrs. Monks, Mrs. Harris, and Mrs. Makins. The total income of the society is a little over one thousand a year. For twenty-four years the society has published The Temperance Visitor monthly, and by this means placed a considerable amount of Temperance reading in the hands of the people. The society is to be congratulated upon having in Mr. Monks an efficient and thoroughly capable organising secretary.

(Photo: Harrison, Lincoln.)

THE TEMPERANCE HALL, LINCOLN.

WORD AND WORK IN THE MASTER'S NAME.

"A Flame of Fire."

READERS of Mr. Hocking's stirring story, which appeared in our pages so recently, will not be surprised to hear that the story has met with a phenomenal success on its publication in book form by Messrs. Cassell, and it has already reached its twenty-third thousand.

A Clerical Night Policeman.

FOR the last eighteen years a man wearing the uniform of an American policeman has been on duty at various posts. He has walked the streets from sunset to daylight. He has gone for days and nights with little or no rest when called to perform special duty, and has seen all the phases of human existence with which the American police officers become acquainted. This is one reason why Rev. Herbert Lowe has become so successful in the work which he has marked out for himself—that of an evangelist. Early in life he believed that his mission was to labour among the unfortunate, to relieve them not only in body, but to give them spiritual consolation. In looking about for a field the idea occurred to him that if he could be appointed to the police force of one of the larger cities he would be brought directly in contact with vice and crime, and be enabled to perform more effective service than if he were merely a city missionary or pastor of a church. In 1885 he was ordained, but by his own wish was not admitted to any particular denomination. Clergymen representing several denominations formed what was termed an Independent Council, and by their act he was given authority not only to preach the Gospel, but to perform other religious rites. Meanwhile, however, he had donned the badge of the police officer, and had received authority to act as such an official. He was assigned to a position in the worst quarters of the city of Brooklyn at his own request, in order that he might observe the life in the slums. Consequently, he obtained a fund of information, and has acquired an experience which is really invaluable in the career he has mapped out. Many times has he been called to make an arrest, but at the same time has been enabled to speak words of comfort to the drunkard or other unfortunate who was his prisoner. Night after night he has gone from cell to cell in the police station, sometimes praying with the inmates, sometimes giving them food; and more than once has appeared before police magistrates and requested that a prisoner be sent to some place where he would have an opportunity to reform, or be paroled on his promise to "go and sin no more." Truly it is an eventful life which Mr. Lowe has lived, but he has the satisfaction of knowing that he has done a great work. Probably hundreds have been induced to lead better lives by his persuasion who otherwise would have kept on the downward path. He bids fair to continue his evangelistic work for many years, as he is only forty-six years of age, and in the prime of life. In addition to his ordinary duties, Mr. Lowe has frequent calls to address missionary and other meetings, and sometimes in a single week will deliver from six to eight sermons. Many a night when he is supposed to be off duty and resting, he devotes to this labour.

(Photo: Oxford and Dilthaff, Brooklyn, N.Y.)

THE REV. HERBERT LOWE.

(Photo: J. W. Thomas, Colwyn Bay.)

COLOURED STUDENTS AT WORK

Something Seasonable.

THERE are homes not a few in which the Christmas season would lose a good deal of its enjoyment if "Father Tuck's Annual" did not put in an appearance. This year the welcome book is sure to be just as great a favourite with its little patrons as any of its predecessors, for it is varied in its contents, and clever and bright in its production. The publishers of this splendid gift-book for children are Messrs. Raphael Tuck and Sons, the well-known publishers of Christmas cards and other seasonable works, and the specimens which they send of this season's designs show that they have in no way fallen behind the high record of previous years.

Congo at Colwyn.

AT his African Institute, situated upon the wooded heights above Colwyn Bay, we had an interesting talk, one afternoon last summer, with the Rev. W. Hughes, the founder and superintendent. As we walked from department to department of the adequately, but not extravagantly, appointed house and grounds, and watched the twenty black students at their various mental and manual occupations, Mr. Hughes told us how, nearly a quarter of a century ago, he began what he hoped and believed would be his life's work, as a Baptist missionary upon the pestilential banks of the Congo. He found his life happy and successful enough, save for attack after attack of West African fever; but these, after a few years, warned him that he must certainly die if he stayed. It was in one of his fits of semi-delirium, he said—for though his temperature was once as high as 107, he never quite lost his senses—that the scheme seemed to present itself to his mind which has turned out to have been anything but mad. Convinced that only exceptional Europeans could exist long in such a climate, much less toil hard with body and brain, the surest and speediest means for the evangelisation of West Africa appeared to him to be the thorough and systematic intellectual and spiritual training of young West Africans in England. Mr. Hughes came home, found a few friends to trust him and to sympathise with his plan, and thus, from the idea originated upon a bed of fever, the Institute took its rise. Eighteen years or so ago, the founder managed to purchase in his own name a tract of ground at Colwyn Bay. This proved to be worth a thousand pounds more than he gave for it when the Institute was made an Incorporated Association in 1902, and Mr. Hughes gladly contributed the large profit for the furtherance of the enterprise so near his heart. The black students, during our peregrination, looked extremely cheerful, and were all busy in various ways. In the class-room, a party were tasting the dubious delights of Cæsar on a drowsy afternoon. In the tailor's shop a couple of youths, with their white instructor, were executing orders received. The neat printing establishment, which we also visited, turns out really admirable work, and, judging by the number of bills, etc., in the district, beneath which we saw its name, it must get plenty of custom. There is, indeed, method in that fever dream of the devoted Baptist missionary, twenty years since, by the banks of the Congo, that Africa will eventually be evangelised by her own sons.

A Lamb in Harness.

Nita had a little lamb, deserted by its mother. Whether, like Mary's lamb of nursery fame, its fleece was white as snow, remains unrecorded. Probably not, seeing that it belonged, and still belongs, to the noble army of toilers, and has experienced more of the life of town. Like many another poor innocent, the lamb obtained compensation for the misfortunes of infancy. Its unworthy mother's master gave it to his little girl, Nita, and her little sister. The affection between the lamb and its foster parents drew many a laugh and many a good-natured contribution. A few days after the trio visited a flower show at Coleshill. This charming old-world town, which smiles from its hill-top on surrounding green pastures, smiled also on them. After this expedition, Nita and her lamb in harness drew up at Maxstoke Vicarage to deliver up the spoils. The collecting boxes contained £2 13s. 1½d.

Some New Books.

In a handy form, and printed on thin, but strong paper, Messrs. Cassell are now publishing a pocket edition of Bishop Ellicott's Commentaries, and several volumes have already been issued. The price is so moderate that it ought to bring this useful Commentary within the reach of every Bible student. "The Intriguer's Way" (Religious Tract Society) is a stirring story by Mr. J. Bloundelle-Burton of the days of the Pretender and the first of

GIRL WITH PET LAMB

grew with their growth. The children educated their pet and taught it to draw a light cart. In the hay-time it carried its own small load to the rick, to the great amusement of the men. But ambition to still higher service possessed the little girls. Their father took them to Coventry. The lamb followed them, drawing its carriage, in which their doll presided over some papers and collecting boxes for waifs and strays. The spectacle of a little girl leading this small equipage round the Market Hall the Georges. The scene is laid principally in and near Paris, but hero and heroine are both English, and suffer for the honest Jacobite faith of the former. The period is a picturesque one, and our author has well contrived the escapes of his hero and heroine from the toils of the intriguer, who is fitly punished in the end. Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton send us a copy of Mrs. L. T. Meade's pretty story, "That Brilliant Peggy," which needs no recommendation to readers of The QUIVER, who have known Mrs. Meade's work for so many years. From the same publishers we have received Miss Amy Le Feuvre's shorter and less ambitious story, "Two Tramps," which will doubtless be acceptable in its present form to those who made its acquaintance as a serial story. Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton also send us a new edition of "Our Bluejackets," a record of Miss Weston's life and work among sailors, by Sophie G. Wintz. Messrs. Longman send us a gift book, which would be very acceptable to any boy, in "The Sea Shore," by Mr. Furneaux, which is freely illustrated, largely in colour. From the same publishers, too, comes "In Search of Home," a story with a good deal of point, by Phyllis O. Dent. "Tychiades," which is published by Mr. Fisher Unwin, is called upon the title-page "A Tale of the Ptolemies," and is put before us as a translation from a story written in the third century before the Christian era and translated by Mr. Alfred Dickeson. The period is not one which is altogether familiar to story readers, but may prove none the less interesting on that account. Messrs. Passmore and Alabaster send us a commentary on portions of Bunyan's immortal allegory, from the pen of the late C. H. Spurgeon, and entitled "Pictures from 'Pilgrim's Progress.'" We have also to acknowledge from the same publishers C. H. Spurgeon's "Faith: What it is, and What it Leads To"; and we have also received "Drawing," by Robert R. Howie (Hodder and Stoughton); "The Divine Rule of Faith and Practice," by William Goode, D.D., F.S.A. (Nisbet); "Methods of Bible Study," by W. H. Griffith Thomas, and "A Vagrant's Revenge," by Constancia Serjeant (Marshall Brothers); "Home Nursing," by Bernard Myers (Baillière, Tindall and Cox); "The Conquests of the Bible" (British and Foreign Bible Society); "Sunday" and "Short Prayers," by Lucy H. M. Soulsby (Longmans); "Preaching and Healing," and "Strange Faces from Many Places" (Church Missionary Society); "Christ's Strait and Narrow Way," by Arthur T. Pierson, D.D. (China Inland Mission).

"THE QUIVER" FUNDS.

THE following is a list of contributions received from September 25th, 1903, up to and including October 29th, 1903. Subscriptions received after this date will be acknowledged next month:—

For "The Quiver" Waifs' Fund: L. R., Newcastle, 5s.; Mrs. L., Brighton, 5s.; M. A. L., Hounslow, 5s.; "A Constant Reader" (J. C.), 2s. 6d.; E. Parsons, 2s.; E. M. H., 1s. 6d.

For Dr. Barnardo's Homes: "Bradford," £1, 2s. 6d., 5s.; "Yeovil," 10s. The following amounts have been sent direct:—A. S. D., 10s.; M. O. B., 10s.

THE QUIVER BIBLE CLASS.

BASED ON THE INTERNATIONAL SERIES OF LESSONS.

QUESTIONS.

13. By what other name is Bethlehem in Judah known?

14. Why was Herod the king so troubled when the wise men asked him, "Where is He that is born King of the Jews?"

15. What is meant by the words, "Art not the least among the princes of Judah"?

16. In what words does the Psalmist set forth the pity of God for sinful man?

17. Why is it that God has such compassion for sinful man?

18. What simile does the Psalmist use to express the fulness of God's mercy to mankind?

19. What words give us the picture of the perfectness of the child Jesus?

20. What proof is given us of the wisdom of Jesus in His boyhood?

21. In what does our Lord set forth an example to all young men?

22. Why was John, the son of Zacharias, called "the Baptist"?

23. What was the message which John the Baptist was commissioned to deliver to the Jews?

24. What would the Jews understand by the words, "The Kingdom of Heaven is at hand"?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 96.

1. Psalm xxiii. 1, 2.

2. Psalm xxiii. 4.

3. To the custom of pouring perfumed oil upon the head of distinguished guests at a feast. (Psalm xxiii. 5; St. Luke vii. 46.)

4. Prov. xxiii. 21, 32.

5. When in his old age David desired to inform his people of the duty of building the Temple and presented Solomon to them as their future king. (1 Chron. xxviii. 1–5.)

6. The plans, elevations, etc., of the Temple, and the design for the mercy seat, which God had by inspiration given to David. (1 Chron. xxviii. 11, 12, 19.)

7. To Gibeon, where the Tabernacle was, and where he offered up sacrifices to God as a public thanksgiving at the commencement of his reign. (1 Kings iii. 4; 2 Chron. i. 1–6.)

8. 1 Kings iii. 9.

9. It is stated he was wiser than the four most noted wise men of that period: Ethan, Heman, Chalcol, and Darda. (1 Kings iv. 31–34.)

10. King Solomon and the elders of the people brought up the ark of the Lord to the Temple, containing the two tables of stone which Moses had placed there. (1 Kings viii. 2–4, 9.)

11. 1 Kings viii. 10, 11.

12. The praying with their faces towards Jerusalem when in the land of their captivity. (1 Kings viii. 47, 48; Dan. vi. 10.)

XUM

The Hill of Difficulty

A CHRISTMAS NOVEL.

By C. E. C. Weigall, Author of "The Temptation of Dulce Carruthers."

I.

"Life is probation, and this Earth no goal;
But starting point of man."

"'UP the hill of difficulty many people climb with tired feet and lagging steps, but few people ever survive to see the sun rise from the topmost peak.' What does that mean, Miss Vernon?"

Molly Darrel was sitting in the schoolroom at Westhayes, with her chin propped upon her two hands, her face bent seriously over the old brown leather volume that she had unearthed from the shelf by the door that was seldom disturbed by inquiring hands.

"What have you got hold of, Molly?"

Averil Vernon was correcting a French exercise in the window by the failing October light, and when she lifted her head the shadow on her face made it difficult to distinguish the outline of her features; but Molly knew that she was beautiful, and that now, with this thrilling fire of enthusiasm in her voice, her cheeks had taken on the flush of delicate colour that was all they needed to make her loveliness decisive.

"This book? I only found it yesterday, and it is hard to read sometimes."

Averil laid down her copy-book, and came round to her pupil with a puzzled face. Molly was only nine years old; but sometimes her inordinate love of reading led her to trespass into undesirable channels for information, and her governess had been already blamed once or twice for that reason. She smoothed back the yellow tangle of hair that fell over the book, and was relieved to read the name: "Crumbs of Comfort for Weary Wayfarers," with a date on the title-page that carried one back to the seventeenth century. It was extraordinary literature to find in the house of Sir Alwyn and Lady Darrel; but Averil tried to account for it by remembering that some of the family ancestors had suffered for their faith in old Covenanting days, before the name of MacDrail was dropped and the family came into favour with the last of the Stuart kings.

"What a quaint old book, Molly," she said, turning over the battered leaves reverently. "I like your verse. It would be a help, I think; for everyone has a hill of difficulty in their life, haven't they, darling?"

She had forgotten that Molly was a little child in years, as she was often tempted to do, and she began to talk as her pupil loved her to talk.

"You and I, Molly, have our hills. I am sure I don't know about yours; but I know what mine is—a step to climb every day, and so often a step backwards instead of forwards, and the sunrise from the topmost peak seems so very far away."

Her voice broke with the yearning pain of it all, as she remembered her life, and Molly's soft arms went round her like a flash.

"Oh, my darling Miss Vernon, if I had my way, you would be happy always. You would never know what it is to be sorry or sad; but when you say you don't know what my hill is you have forgotten my back."

And for the moment, indeed, Averil had forgotten that this only daughter of rich parents was not straight and lissom of limb like other girls of her age, but that there was within her a germ of disease that not even the best doctors in London could defy.

"My darling," she said tenderly, "I had forgotten it; but sometimes it seems to me that it is not a hill of difficulty at all, for it helps you to be very full of sympathy for other people who are not strong. So, you see, Molly, your hill is turned into a winding path all glittering with diamonds, and your steps are guided up the track so easily that you seem to float in the air."

Molly listened breathlessly.

"But do I help other people with their steps, Miss Vernon?"

Averil nodded.

"I expect we shall find a verse for you, Molly, on another page of the book, and the one about the hill of difficulty is meant for me."

Molly turned eagerly to her volume, and Averil glanced down each musty page, as anxious as the child to make the discovery. She was not long in finding the sentence she needed, for it leaped to meet her eye on the second page:—

"There are some who in this world seem sent to be the salt of it; for they help the weary with courage, and with them the sad never look down into hell, but straight up to heaven, for, in truth, these folk are pillars of strength."

Molly was so delighted with her verse that she was determined to find others for the rest of her family, and the clock struck five before Averil was aware how swiftly time was passing.

"I must go at once, dear," she said. "Miss Smith will be waiting for me."

Outside, the gathering darkness lay like a shroud upon Westhayes park and pleasure gardens; and inside the pleasant oak-panelled schoolroom, with its oriel window and its well-chosen landscape paintings on the wall, the lamplight made a cosy, homelike room, with the leaping wood fire on the great open hearth. Tea had just been brought in, with the variety of dainty cakes that always supplemented the meal at Westhayes; and for a moment Averil thought it would be far pleasanter to spend the evening with Molly than to toil up the village street to the unattractive home of Miss Smith, whom she helped twice a week in writing her letters and doing her sewing. Molly looked up at her quaintly.

"I know, Miss Vernon," she said, shaking her yellow curls, "that verse was meant for you. Miss Smith is one of the sad ones, who have to be taught to look up into heaven; but I wish she was not so ugly."

Averil laughed, for to Molly's supersensitive nature ugliness was so repulsive that it was like physical suffering to endure. She was so daintily pretty herself, with her slight figure and her wealth of pale yellow curls, that hung far upon her shoulders, disguising a slight suggestion of crookedness, that Averil often paused to look at her with pleasure. Her mother kept her daintily dressed in muslin and lace, but no one save Averil in that busy household had time to notice the unchildlike pathos of her thin face and wistful blue eyes.

"I will help you to tie up your books," she said; "you must not keep Miss Smith waiting, and perhaps they will let me have Nigel for tea to-night here."

There was a quick step in the passage outside and a rustle of silk skirts, as the door opened hastily behind them and Lady Darrel came in. Her eyes glanced from one to the other, and from the book on the table to the lessons pushed aside.

"At this rate, my good child, you will never set the Thames on fire," she said, in her clear, scornful tones. "Your uncle said the other day you knew less of English grammar than any child he had ever met, and I should think that even Miss Vernon would agree with me that you are an indifferent pupil."

Lady Darrel was annoyed with her world just then, and found it agreeable to vent her displeasure on someone. She was a beautiful woman, whose one passionate annoyance with life was that she should ever grow old, and she had fancied that she had seen a wrinkle that morning. Her pale, gold hair, crisped and curled fashionably at the back of her head, was like Molly's. Not so her magnificent figure, straight and well-developed in every curve and line; and she, alas! had small sympathy with the child who would never grow up to be a beauty. Her face, brilliant in colouring, her small scornful mouth like a thin ribbon of scarlet, her eyes frosty blue as a Dresden vase, made up one of the handsomest women in the county, and it was for her looks that Sir Alwyn had married her. She was dressed in a marvellous confection that held the scale between a tea gown and a Grecian dress, and seemed to be a glittering sheath of ivory crêpe, that wrapped her from head to foot, and was touched here and there by vivid blue. Everyone had told her that she was most fortunate to have secured Averil Vernon as daily governess for Molly; but she felt bitterly annoyed with her now, for it seemed to Lady Darrel, who was leaving the sunny side of five-and-thirty behind her, that Averil had never looked so beautiful as she did at that moment, in all the freshness of her one-and-twenty years of life. Tall and slender, in her shabby blue serge gown, she stood there, with Molly's arm about her waist, her deep violet eyes under their black lashes full of light, the warm ivory of her oval cheek setting off the crimson of her tender mouth. Her hair was the rich, ruddy brown that looks as though the sun had kissed it to auburn, and had left threads of glittering gold in every tress. She was always timid before Lady Darrel, and liked Westhayes much better when Molly was alone and her mother queening it in London or on the Riviera, but she met the light scorn of her glance steadily now.

"I think that you will be pleased to hear that Molly has done a very good afternoon's work," she said, with a faint tremor in her voice that she strove to disguise. "Show your mother your French exercise, darling."

Something in the tone, something, too, in the attitude of the little girl clinging to her, roused a deeper sense of antagonism in Lady Darrel, whose quarrel with life seemed to be more pronounced that afternoon, since Royalty had just declined to visit Westhayes that autumn. Perhaps there may have been, too, some touch of regret in her for what she had missed in Molly's love.

"Do not stand crooked, Molly," she said, with shrill insistence. "Good gracious! was ever a woman afflicted as I am in my daughter?"

It was done now; the irritable temper had had its way, and even Lady Darrel would have given a great deal to have those words unsaid.

Averil's lips hardened a little as she bent down to kiss the silent child.

"Molly, my sweet, run and ask nurse if you may have Nigel to tea down here, for I must go."

The door shut after the pathetic little figure, and Lady Darrel sank into a chair and bewailed her fate with tears of pettish annoyance, while Averil stood like a stone to listen to her, as she had so often done before.

"Everything is wrong, Miss Vernon. It is a disgusting life—not worth living, I think. I quite expected the Princess would come, or at least let the Prince come alone, and Major Horton has just wired to say he is detained, and the whole of the table for to-night is thrown out. I suppose I shall have to get in the curate or the postman, or someone impossible of that sort; and Célise has made a fatal misfit with my apricot satin, and the trimming is loathsome; and Molly seems to get worse instead of better—there is never a Darrel or a Vavasour that is not straight-backed and handsome."

And all the time Averil in her heart was crying out passionately: "How could you, how could you? You are not fit to be a mother!"

"I know you are vexed with me. People constantly are; they cannot understand my sensitive organisation. Little things annoy me much more than they do other people," said Lady Darrel apologetically; "and you may imagine what it is to me to contemplate Molly's future—I who was the toast of half London at seventeen."

"Molly will live her own life, and be happy with her quiet thoughts," said the girl gravely, "if she ever lives to grow up."

"Oh, she will live," said Lady Darrel lightly. "Sir Edmond Veitel said she was perfectly strong."

Death was another subject forbidden in Lady Darrel's code of life, and her serenity was ruffled for the moment.

"You are not really going, Miss Vernon?" she continued, trying to repair the ravages that annoyance had wrought in her complexion by the aid of the small mirror over the chimney piece. "I want you for half a dozen things, and really am beginning to think that you are like Shylock in demanding your pound of flesh. I want you to help Collins with the flowers, and to give a glance at my gown."

"I am so sorry," said Averil steadily; "but I must go to Miss Smith to-night, and I am late already."

"I cannot imagine what makes you take such an interest in that eccentric creature," cried Lady Darrel. "She is as poor as a church mouse and as ugly as sin; so you can have no expectations from her, and she certainly pays you nothing."

"I hope that I help her to find life less intolerable," said Averil quietly. "It is very hard for a woman to be both poor and friendless."

Lady Darrel stared at her coldly.

"Extraordinary taste on your part. Why, you and your mother and sister only came to the village five years ago, so you have not even the excuse of old friendship."

"Does charity want any excuse?" cried Averil, goaded to speech at last. "Charity suffers long, and is kind."

"And you suffer me and are kind to Miss Smith," cried Lady Darrel, with light contempt. "We ought both to feel honoured."

"Sometimes, Lady Darrel," said Averil tremulously, "you make my life very difficult."

Lady Darrel looked at her child's governess with the same astonished expression that she might have assumed had an inferior animal attempted to expostulate with her, but at that moment, fortunately perhaps for Averil, the door opened to admit Molly, leading her little brother by the hand. With the delightful insouciance of childhood she had forgotten her mother's words, and was absorbed in her interest at the idea of having tea alone with Nigel, without the intervention of nurse or grown-up of any description.

At the sight of her son Lady Darrel's contemptuous face underwent a swift change; for Nigel was, perhaps, the only thing in the world whom Lady Darrel loved with a passionate devotion that rose above a selfish thought. He had been born four years before, to the inexpressible delight of both his father and mother; for the idea that there might be no heir to the old title except their nephew, Captain Hugh Darrel, was one of the most bitter burdens for husband and wife to endure. But when Nigel came, strong and beautiful, the heart of his mother went out to him, and it was a well-known truth in the household that Master Nigel could do no wrong. He was like a sunbeam now when he came in, with his fair, close-cropped head and his sturdy little figure in the sailor suit. His round, rosy face and eyes as blue as a scrap of the Mediterranean with the sun upon it, turned straight to Averil, and in another moment he had precipitated himself upon her with a cry.

"Darling Vernie," he said, "how nice of you to stop and have tea with us! And I've been such a good boy, and am learning my A B C; and I'll soon be able to come and have lessons with Molly, shan't I, nice Vernie?"

Averil caught the look on Lady Darrel's face, which was not a pleasant one to see, and disengaged herself hastily from his clinging arms.

"Of course you shall, Nigel; but there is mother—you should have spoken to her first."

"You have everything," said Lady Darrel slowly, in a voice that was hardly her own. "You have youth, and you have the love of my children"; and before Averil could answer she had swept out of the room, and Miss Vernon heard the door of communication shut sharply behind her.

"Is mother cross?" said Nigel; but Molly answered him with the keenness of perception that was the unchildlike part of her.

"Oh, no, Nigel—only what nurse calls nervous. Sometimes things go wrong, and it makes her feel queer about everything; and, besides, you ought to have kissed her first."

"But I didn't want to," said Nigel sturdily, "and I always does what I wants."

And, hastily bidding the children good-night, Averil hurried away, with her heart full to overflowing.

Westhayes was full of guests for the pheasant shooting; and when Averil skirted the front by the side door and came out into the coach road, to her annoyance she found that she was face to face with one of the young men to whom she had been introduced a few days earlier, when she had come in after dinner one evening to play accompaniments. Sir Philip Lascelles had annoyed her then with his outspoken admiration of her talents, and he had managed through a long conversation with her, from which there had been no escape, to insinuate that he thought her very beautiful indeed, and quite wasted as a governess at

"'You have the love of my children.'"

Westhayes. He was a good-looking man of about five-and-thirty, with a first-rate tailor and valet to enhance his appearance; and as he lounged to meet her, flinging away his cigar as he did so, Averil felt the blood flame to her face with the angry conviction that he had been waiting for her.

It was a clear, crisp evening, and Westhayes, on its hill overlooking the wooded valley of its park lands, glittered with light; but outside, where the air was fragrant with the clean scent of fir cones and hardy chrysanthemums, it did not seem dark, though the hollows under the trees were growing mysterious. In the pale opal of the frosty sky the crescent moon rocked like a silver boat to her setting, and the disconsolate murmur of the rooks overhead made the air restless. The clear call of the river came up to her as her feet faltered on the road, and gave her courage.

"Why, what an age you have been coming out to-night, Miss Vernon. Was your pupil very troublesome? Really, it seems quite too ridiculous that a girl with a face like yours should be cramming ignorant children with morsels of knowledge like a hen wife."

Averil set her teeth and ignored the hand held out to her. She hated the satisfied drawl of the society man, who, seeing that she was a governess, considered her fair game, but not at all as an equal.

"Good-evening, Sir Philip Lascelles," she said icily. "I am, perhaps, later than usual in leaving Westhayes, but Lady Darrel detained me."

He was blocking her path—she hoped unconsciously, but she could see the mocking smile upon his lips.

"Lady Darrel and you—night and morning, I should say—with Molly as a make-weight."

"Let me pass, please. I am in a hurry."

"What, more work to do? More pennies to be earned? Why, I call that black slavery, Miss Vernon. At least, let me see you safely home."

Averil turned upon him, her lovely face flushed with anger.

"I will not have you for a companion, Sir Philip Lascelles. This is the second time you have insulted me in addressing me as though I were not your equal by birth. Let me pass, sir, at once, and I wish you to know that I am the daughter of Anthony Vernon of Kilraith."

Her anger had driven her to speech; but she regretted the words before they were out of her mouth, for it was the turn of Lascelles to fall back in undisguised surprise.

"Of Anthony Vernon of Kilraith? By Jove! I had no idea. Why, times out of mind I have ridden behind him to hounds."

"And you insult his daughter!"

Averil could say no more, for her sobs were choking her, and she would not for the world have allowed him to see her cry; but she pushed by him with a haughty inclination of her head, and hurried up the avenue out of sight.

Sir Philip Lascelles stood and looked after her with a frown, for he felt that he had not come well out of the encounter with the daughter of his old acquaintance.

"Vernon of Kilraith? He went bankrupt, and died. And there was something queer about young Vernon, I think. I dimly remember some story, but I must rack my brains for the truth of it. That's a beautiful girl, but a proud one, like all the Vernons. I should like to be even with her, and perhaps I shall be some day."

With which uncharitable reflection Lascelles strolled back into the house, and strove to forget, in the charm of Lady Darrel's society, that her governess had shown him that he lacked the essential breeding of a gentleman.

II.

"All I could never be,
All men ignored in me,
This I was worth to God, Whose wheel the pitcher shaped."

THE village of Wyndquest was set high upon the cliff side of the Loamshire Downs, overlooking the English Channel. Far and wide the level breast of the sea rocked a clear grey between the far-reaching cliffs that sheltered it on either side, until it became a land-locked bay where the great ships of the English Navy rode at anchor. The loneliness of the upland country was broken by woods and steep hills, heather-clad in summer, that rambled on to the confines of the New Forest and lost themselves in the maze of straight fir and slim beech that is the germ of the royal wood. Below on the shore, many miles away, lay the watering place of Monks Regis, which Lady Darrel seldom visited save to turn up her nose at the indifferent shops, and at the poverty of the inhabitants, who were principally composed of officers of the Army and Navy living on retired pay. Wyndquest had its own small single line to keep it in touch with the world, and its tiny, small station, where everything hinged on the wishes of Sir Alwyn at the great house, and where the smart London guests who alighted for their shooting visits were the objects of open-mouthed interest.

For four months in the year Lady Darrel kept the ball rolling at Westhayes with dances and dinners and revels, the echo of which floated down to the little village on the quiet air; and then, like a bird of brilliant plumage, she flitted off again on her round of pleasure-seeking, very often leaving behind her Sir Alwyn, a lonely man in a lonely house, who, as she constantly vowed, had no soul above his turnips and stubble fields.

Averil was thinking of that ill-assorted couple as she hurried up the village street that night. Sir Alwyn Darrel was a man of great wealth, but of unobtrusive habits and simple tastes; and he had married his wife with more reckless haste than he had ever been known to apply to any other undertaking in life. She had known how to play her fish and how to land him. She was a penniless beauty, and she thought herself in love with domesticity after racketing through five London seasons; and she told herself even now, after eleven years of married life, that Sir Alwyn made a most admirable husband.

Averil reached her goal at last, and stood for a moment to regain her composure at the wicket gate. Miss Smith's house was set back from the village, and far enough from the cottages on either side to be absolutely private, though it was little more imposing than a cottage itself. She had come to Wyndquest quietly some years before, and the people there had accepted her as quietly. She was the daughter of a doctor, long dead they fancied, and must of necessity be ill-endowed with this world's goods. She lived very poorly, and few people save Averil were on terms of intimacy with her. The girl had come across her one day shortly after their arrival at Wyndquest. Miss Smith had been blackberrying on the Downs, and had fallen and broken her ankle; and Averil had rescued her from the side of the road, where she lay helpless, and had taken her home, and looked after her until she was strong again. Thus their friendship had been cemented, and it had increased until Averil felt warm affection for the lonely woman, whose heart, for want of keeping warm, had withered almost away.

Averil looked now out across the stretch of sea, seen dimly through the haze of trees. The ridge of bare cliff land on the opposite side of the bay, where the convict prison stood, glittered with light from its frowning cliff-brow and grey fortifications to the foot of the precipitous slope where the little railway ran. Black against the clear opal of the sky it stood, a grim abode of fettered crime; and Averil, seeing it, drew a quick breath of pain, for Hartborough Prison meant more to her than it might have done to a mere stranger looking across the bay with faint interest and fainter compassion.

"Poor Gerald!" she said to herself.

And even as the name crossed her mind Rosanna Smith opened the front door, and stood there, peering into the twilight, with a lamp above her head.

"I thought I heard you, Averil," she said. "I believe Marco would know your hand on the latch and your step a mile off."

Miss Smith would never see sixty again; but her withered face and bony figure, in its shabby black bombazine gown, might have belonged to a woman much older, and there was nothing young about her but her eyes, and they were homes of indomitable energy. She wore a black lace cap tied under her chin with lavender ribbons, and her collar of old Duchesse point was pinned with a brooch of brilliants in the form of a cross. She wore a mourning ring on her thin, claw-like left hand, and under her arm was tucked a round bundle of fur that resolved itself into Marco, the black toy Pomeranian, without whom she never moved very far, and who was agitating himself frantically to lick Averil's face in a warm welcome.

"What's the matter, child? You have been crying," said Rosanna Smith, in her harsh, dry tones as she drew the girl inside the sitting-room door and took off her coat. "People would not have so many troubles in their life if they took things philosophically, as I do. Happy are they who expect nothing, for they shall not be disappointed."

"I call your philosophy unchristian," said Averil wearily. "If I took my troubles stoically, like that, I should not expect to find any blessing upon my life; and, after all, Miss Smith, if everything was happiness on earth, I think we should never want to struggle up the hill of difficulty to heaven."

Rosanna Smith sniffed in silence, and poked the fire noisily till it threw a glow of warmth upon the walls, distempered in red brick, and upon the few choice engravings hanging upon them and the rare service of Crown Derby that flanked the black oak dresser. Then she said savagely:

"I suppose it is Lady Darrel again. I have no patience with the woman Jealousy of your youth and looks is at the bottom of her hastiness. She does not remember me, but I have seen her often enough years ago, when she was Angela Temple—Angela Temper she should have been called. If I were you, Averil, I'd blazon those words of Browning that you are so mighty fond of, and send them to her as a Christmas present."

"Grow old along with me: the best is yet to be,
The last of life for which the first was made.
Our times are in His hand, Who saith: 'A whole I planned.'
Youth shows but half: trust God: see all, nor be afraid," quoted Averil reverently, as her friend paused. "I am afraid that Lady Darrel would not appreciate them; but I know you do, though you will not confess it."

Rosanna Smith shook her head vigorously. "You are the only person whose religion has been practical, and not half lip service, who has been brought much into contact with me, Averil, and you must not mind if I sometimes forget myself and sneer. Sometimes I believe I am growing religious myself. I feel different somehow from what I did when you came into my life—not so hard and vengeful—and if you ever failed me I should go to pieces utterly, I believe, for my faith begins and ends with you. Some day I will tell you my story, and then you will believe that I have not had an easy time of it."

"I know," said Averil gently, for the old, harsh look was changing the softening lines of the thin face into sourness, and she hastened to turn Rosanna Smith's thoughts into a channel far removed from her own wrongs.

"First it was Lady Darrel," she said mournfully. "She doesn't like me, and I am always afraid that she will send me away from the children."

"Not she," interrupted Miss Smith. "She can't get another girl like you for thirty pounds a year, and she knows it. You do a deal of her dirty work, and a precious sight more than you need. If I know anything of the world, Sir Alwyn will find himself in Queer Street some of these days, with a wife whose back cannot be covered under fifty guineas for a simple morning frock. I knew her sort well in old days, and when she finds a wrinkle, or fancies a thread of grey, she will take her a smarter gown or buy a new necklace—for all the world like a monkey at a fair."

Averil laid her soft hand upon the hard lips, for Lady Darrel's iniquities were a constant source of irritation to Miss Smith.

"Hush, hush!" she said playfully. "I have more to tell you, dear. I did not cry because of Lady Darrel; but when I was coming home one of her guests staying in the house was insolent to me—Sir Philip Lascelles—and I flashed out at him all in a moment: How dare he speak to me as if I were a housemaid, when I was a Vernon of Kilraith? And he said he had often followed my dear father to hounds. And it was so wrong of me to mention his name, for Sir Philip was angry with me, and there was something in his eyes that told me, if he guessed about Gerald, he would not spare me to Lady Darrel."

"H'm!" said Rosanna Smith meditatively. "If there is a fault about you, Averil, it is that you are too impetuous. What call was there for you to be out with Kilraith all in a minute, like the Dart in flood? Sir Philip Lascelles—I remember his grandfather; and they've a name in the Devon County for vengefulness. 'A Lascelles never forgets,' they say, 'and when Dart gives up her dead one may forgive.' But when you told me all your story that night last year, Averil, I blamed your mother for her secrecy then, you may remember. It's ill washing your dirty linen in public; but it's worse not washing it at all, and though your father died in his bed of a stroke, there were plenty to say it was by his own hand, and a whole county to point at your brother, though you've put far enough between Northumberland and Loamshire."

"My mother forbade me to speak. She said, after the crash came and we were bankrupt, that we could begin life again upon better terms as insignificant Vernons, for happy is the man who has no history."

"Your mother is a fool, and always will be one," snapped Miss Smith decisively, and sat thinking. "What are you going to do if Lady Darrel dismisses you?" she said at last.

"I am not going to meet trouble half way," said Averil stoutly. "Where are your letters, Miss Smith, and that fine damask I was darning last week?"

Rosanna Smith paced the floor while Averil wrote—up and down the poorly-lighted room, her gaunt figure casting a distorted outline upon the walls, and Marco slumbered fitfully on the sofa, chasing rabbits in his sleep with a sharp yap now and again. The girl wrote on patiently with tired fingers, listening to the strident, dictating voice that wished such sharp things to be said to the unknown correspondents. Averil never saw the letters that she had to answer, nor the addresses to which she was writing; but she had small curiosity on the subject, and, indeed, she had grown to imagine that most of the correspondents existed only in Miss Smith's vivid imagination, for she had heard that the postman only called there once a week, and then with only a bulky packet that was directed in a clerky hand.

"Dear Sir," dictated the monotonous voice, "when you apply to me for money, you apply to a sponge already squeezed dry. My estimate of human nature has never been a high one, and it has proved correct where my own case is concerned. While a woman has money she may be as ugly as sin or as sharp-tongued as a guinea-fowl in a hen roost, and it is only counted with her for righteousness. I am only a poor old woman whose investment has failed, and whose draft on the bank of life has been overdrawn, and therefore you and I have no longer anything in common."

"What an odd thing it seems that people should still bother you for money," said Averil, when she had completed her last answer to the present series of begging letters.

Miss Smith cast one keen glance at her, laden with suspicion; but Averil's lovely face, bent low over the paper, the lamplight touching her crown of glittering hair, was disarming.

"There are lots of queer things in this world, child. Once I had money—lots of it—but, thank God, I learned in time that the man whom I adored only loved me for my money. I lost it all, and him too, and sometimes I think that a bit of my mental balance went overboard at the same time. Anyhow, I ceased to believe in anyone till—well, till I met you, Averil Vernon, as poor as myself and ten times as charitable."

It had sometimes crossed Averil's mind that Miss Smith was inclined to be miserly over her income, and that she might have afforded to keep more than the one gaping country girl who did the housework, and to have been less penuriously inclined over the scones and the butter; but Miss Smith should certainly know her own affairs better than anyone else, and Averil knew to her cost what a little way £150 a year could go towards meeting any expenses beyond the barest necessaries. Something of her doubt was perhaps written on her face; for Rosanna Smith, scanning her narrowly, broke in on her thoughts.

"I lost it all," she said slowly, "and I am worth as little now as when I came into the world. And now I can hear Georgina with the tea things, and I ordered girdle cakes."

The small country maid, in her black skirt and white blouse and the neat holland apron, brought in the tea-tray and set it down before her mistress. The firelight danced on the exquisite Jacobean urn and the round tray that had been wrought when Queen Anne sat in the sun. Averil did not know the value of the twisted gold spoons with the jewelled handles, or the cups of delicate faïence that no one but Miss Smith was ever allowed to wash. She had never given more than a passing thought of admiration to the miniatures on the red velvet shield upon the wall or the inlaid bureau that was full of Dresden patch boxes and Battersea enamel snuff-boxes set in diamonds. Miss Smith had hinted at the fact that her grandfather had squandered his substance in collecting this old trash, that would not fetch sixpence at a jumble sale; and if Averil thought once or twice that a little enamel box or a string of seed pearls would have made a nice Christmas present, she never allowed the thought to form on her lips, for she would never have it said that she helped Miss Smith for what she could get out of her. The drawers in the bureau and in the great Chinese lacquer press in the wall were all locked, and the girl had never seen them opened; but she thought such care an excellent thing in this lonely household.

She nibbled at the crisp delicious cakes, and drank her tea with the drop of cream in it that was her own special treat on the days that she worked for Miss Smith; and when she had finished she went into the kitchen to Georgina and showed her how to cook a sweetbread for her mistress's supper, and hoped she was a good girl and doing her duty and not forgetting her Sunday-school lessons. Then she came back to the parlour, and put on her coat.

"Miss Smith," she said suddenly; "how curious that I have never noticed that miniature before. Why, there is one like it at Westhayes."

It was the centre medallion on the shield—the miniature of a beautiful woman with a coronet on her head, dressed in the French fashion of a century ago, and under it was engraved, "Madame la Duchesse de Saint Martelle."

"Well, and why on earth should there not be?" cried Rosanna Smith, with her mouth set like a steel trap. "I suppose other people besides my grandfather were collectors, and because you see a peacock's feather in a hen roost it does not follow that it must belong to the barn-door fowl."

Averil had received a snub once before when she had ventured to make some remark as to Miss Smith's family, who must, according to the miniatures on the wall, have been remarkably beautiful, and she was sorry that she had annoyed her old friend again. She kissed her good-night, and Rosanna lighted her down the garden path again, between the rows of dahlias and hollyhocks, standing like a gaunt spectre with the young moon above her.

"Averil," she called after her suddenly, "there is trouble not far from you, I'll warrant, for I saw it in your face to-night. If it comes, ask me to help you, my dear, for maybe I can."

"I will ask you, certainly," cried Averil cheerily, and, gathering her skirt about her, she ran up the road to her mother's straight-fronted, red-brick house, that was so roomy and old-fashioned and bowered in creepers that it looked worth treble the yearly rent they paid for it.

Her sister heard her feet upon the paved path, and opened the door to her.

"What a long time you have been, Ril. Mother has been so poorly, and I could do nothing with her, and she will call for Gerald."

"I will go to her, Louise, at once. I am sorry, but there was so much to do."

Louise Vernon was her mother's favourite—a dark, gipsy-looking girl of nineteen, with a full, mutinous mouth and handsome eyes and a distinct disinclination to do anything but take life easily; and she followed her sister very slowly into the house again.

The old furniture that filled the house had all been bought at second-hand shops in Wyndquest, and had at least the merit of being solid and good; but it was of a depressing Victorian era, and Mrs. Vernon, who was among the tearful spirits of this world, had never felt herself equal to beautifying the house, or considered it worth while to make it attractive. Indeed, any attempt in that direction, dictated by Averil's energy, was considered a direct slight upon her father's memory.

Since the Vernons had come there from their lovely Northumberland home, broken by disgrace and sorrow, Mrs. Vernon had given up the struggle to turn her griefs to the light and see if they held a silver lining. She had always gone through life wearily, even when she had lived in a castle, and her present circumstances were not qualified to change her manner of regarding life at all. Fate was her natural enemy, and it was absolutely certain that all things conspired against her for evil. She was sitting over the fire when Averil entered, her face swollen with weeping, her cap crooked, and her shabby black gown spotted and untidy; but the girl's heart went out to her in profound pity, and she knelt down at her mother's side and drew the aching head on her shoulder.

"What is it, mammy darling?" she said, giving the tender nursery name with a loving intonation. "Has anything happened while I have been gone?"

"I can't bear it, Averil. Oh, I can't bear it. I must see my boy, my boy Gerald again, or I shall die. What was the use of coming to live so near Hartborough if we have never been to see him?"

"But we are not allowed to visit him," said Averil gently.

"But people can see them working in the quarries. I could see him, if it was only for a few moments. I must see him, Averil, or I shall die," cried Mrs. Vernon wildly. "You do not know what it is to have a child—and he was such a darling, with his winning ways and his lovely head of curls—and then not to see him for five years."

"Mother, he had only seven years' sentence. He will soon be out now. Have patience, my poor darling."

"I have had it for five years. I am tired of patience. I must see my boy. He may have forged his employer's name, Averil; but I know he never injured the man who came to arrest him. He was so gentle, was Gerald—so tender and loving; and if your father had not invested all his money in Carson's Building Society, he would never have had to leave Christ Church and work in a horrible office, where, of course, he felt the want of money. I must see Gerald again, or I shall die, Averil."

And Mrs. Vernon, whose heart was weak, broke into a paroxysm of hysterical crying that terrified Averil into a reluctant consent to the expedition.

She came out of her mother's room later, and faced Louise in the dining-room, sitting gloomily over the fire with a novel.

"Well," she said laconically, "what have you done with her?"

"She has made me promise to take her to Hartborough, Louise. She is wild to see poor Gerald."

Louise flung the book away from her impatiently.

"Poor Gerald, indeed! I have no patience with him. How dare he injure our future as well as his own. Why did he make a murderous assault upon the constable who arrested him and lame him for life, and get shut up for years in that horrible gloomy place, to be stared at in the quarries by every tripper who visits Hartborough? Forgery is a more gentlemanly vice, but the other is——"

"Louise," said Averil shortly, "you must not talk like that. How can you judge Gerald when you know nothing about his sin or his temptation. We used to be so fond of him, and he is only a boy yet—only six-and-twenty, Louise; and oh! how sorry he must be, how sorry for his madness."

"I shall never speak to him again," said Louise sullenly. "You can do as you like, but don't ask me to take mother to Hartborough."

"I will go myself," returned Averil. "I will ask Lady Darrel for a holiday to-morrow, and we can go on Friday."

Louise picked up her book again with a shrug.

"You choose your company strangely, Averil—eccentric women and convicts," she said, with a sneer.

And if Averil remembered that there was One who companioned with the sorrowful and the outcast of the world she kept silence.

When Averil requested an audience with Lady Darrel next morning, she was shown by her maid into her boudoir; for, although it was ten o'clock, the mistress of Westhayes had only just breakfasted, as was her custom, in her own room.

On her way through the long tapestried corridors she met Sir Alwyn, who stopped to speak to her, as he always did. He had just come in from cubbing, and was still in his hunting things; and his face looked fresh and healthy after his race through the dewy meadows and the frosty valley.

"Good morning, Miss Vernon," he said breezily. "How are the little kids? Not stuffing themselves with too much education, I hope. Smart little chap, Nigel—and Molly, too. Can't think where they got their brains from. Not from me, I'll warrant; for I never was anything but bottom of every form at Eton. Do you think Molly is looking well, Miss Vernon?"

He lowered his voice anxiously.

"I hope she goes out in the donkey carriage. Beevor is choosing her a nice little Shetland pony for driving. It's a pity she mustn't ride—it's a thousand pities, and it vexes her mother so."

Averil looked at his honest, good-humoured face, and realised the depth of his love for his afflicted child.

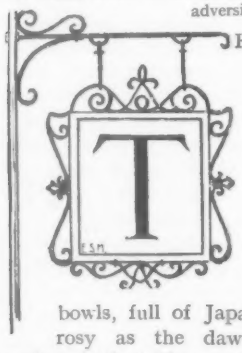
"I am sorry for her and for you," she said gently; "but I think Molly is as well as usual, Sir Alwyn."

"When my lady goes to Cannes next month I can see more of the child—there will be more time," he said; then, conscious that he was encroaching on delicate ground, he blundered into a further pitfall.

"You're not looking well, Miss Vernon—too pale by far. I'll tell you what: I'll send you down a nice hamper of game. I'll warrant it'll do you far more good than any doctors' tonics, and I'm sure you can't afford such comforts—at least, I mean no doubt you want your money for other purposes. I hope I have not offended you, Miss Vernon; but I am a blunt fellow, and you know what I mean."

Averil put out her hand and shook his warmly, and there were tears in her eyes as she looked at the ruddy, distressed face and the boyish eyes.

"Thank you so much, Sir Alwyn; indeed, I accept your offer gratefully, and I quite understand you."



"You are so good to the children," he said impulsively, stammering in his earnestness. "I have cause to be grateful to you for that. You are a good girl, Miss Vernon; and you are teaching Molly the good old truths that my mother taught me at her knee, and that the present generation seem to have no time for."

He nodded to her and was gone, and Averil knocked at Lady Darrel's door and was admitted.

III.

"A friend loveth at all times, and a brother is born for adversity."

THE walls of Lady Darrel's boudoir were hung with pale blue silk to set off her fair beauty; and the furniture was white and gold, with touches of pale pink here and there; and green bowls, full of Japanese peach blossoms, rosy as the dawn, stood upon the various little tables scattered about the room. In a pale blue lounge chair Lady Darrel herself was sitting, dressed in an exquisite negligée of white and silver, with a silver arrow stuck carelessly through the loose masses of her hair.

She was reading a French novel in the interval of discussing a new ball dress with her French maid, the material of which, like billowy clouds of opal gauze, overflowed the sofa. She looked up as Averil entered, with a touch of disdain.

"Good-morning, Miss Vernon," she said frostily. "You wanted to see me, I think?"

The slim, tall figure of the girl in the shabby blue serge coat and skirt seemed an incongruous element in that abode of heavy perfume and delicate colouring, and Célise made no attempt to disguise her contempt for a costume that had been made at home, in an antiquated fashion of quite two years earlier. But Averil bore herself with the composed dignity that always irritated Lady Darrel.

"I have come to ask you if I may have a whole holiday to-morrow instead of on Saturday, Lady Darrel, for my mother wishes me to go with her into Monks Regis."

"It's hardly convenient," said Lady Darrel languidly; "but still, as it is the first time that you have made such a request, I will grant it, Miss Vernon. Célise, leave the room."

The colour faded from Averil's cheek as she tightened her grasp on the exercise book that she held; for she was afraid of what Lady Darrel was going to say to her, with the shadow of the prison in her thoughts.

"My boudoir overlooks the carriage drive," said Lady Darrel frostily, when they were alone; "and I warn you, Miss Vernon, that I do not allow any attempt at flirtation between my governess and my guests. That is all; you may go."

"Lady Darrel," said Averil passionately, looking straight into the cold, cruel eyes, "I had no wish to speak to Sir Philip Lascelles. He insulted me by his attentions, and I told him what I thought of his conduct."

"I have told you that you may go, Miss Vernon," returned the other. "I have accused you of nothing."

"In what have I displeased you?" cried the girl, with a rush of tears. "I try so hard to please you, Lady Darrel, with such small success."

"On the contrary; you are an excellent governess," said Lady Darrel hastily. "Pray do not cry, Miss Vernon. I felt it my duty to warn you—that is all."

And Averil stumbled out of her presence with a sense of despair in her heart, for she knew that in some way she had incurred Lady Darrel's displeasure. She feared it was through Sir Philip Lascelles, and in that case she was an innocent victim.

Nigel was waiting for her in the schoolroom when she came in, as fresh as a round rosy apple in his sailor suit.

"What a long time, Vernie. Why, I heard you come before I had finished dressing, and I've learned my hymn and A B C since then. Oh darling, have you been naughty? Your eyes are pink round, like my rabbits'."

"Nigel, you naughty boy," said Molly severely. "It's only indigestion, which people often have when they get grown up."

But at intervals through the morning a pair of tender arms would slip round Averil's neck, and Molly's silent kisses showed her sympathy and her love, as only the wonderful discretion of a child can do. They lunched together, and drove in the donkey cart, and talked of the thousand and one beautiful things that would happen when Nigel and Molly grew up; and all the time there was a dull burden upon Averil's heart, that never lifted through the long hours of the day. It might seem an easy thing to her mother, and a desirable one, to see her eldest born; but to Averil it was the revival of the most terrible time in all her life, when peaceful, sheltered girlhood ended in tragedy and shame. She remembered her father when he lay dead, and the gossip of evil tongues, in spite of the doctor's verdict that the shock of his complete ruin had been too much for his weak health. She had loved him so dearly—the grey-haired father of her childhood, full of refinement, a cultivated scholar to his finger-tips, and yet the best Master that the Lennet Pack had ever known. He was that rara avis, a thoroughly sympathetic man with the heart of a little child and the courage of a giant, and when he looked despair in the face for the first time, through no fault of his own, it broke his honest, trusting heart that had done no man any wrong, and had never been wronged till then.

"'There is trouble not far from you.'"—p. 198.

All the childish questions seemed aimed innocently to hurt her with little, poisoned shafts. There was the interest of a policeman outside the lodge gates, and of a boy arrested for stealing apples, and a long laboured argument upon the painful consequences of evil doing. There was a discussion upon Hartborough itself, and finally, in the history lesson, the escape of Lord Nithsdale from his prison. And when evening came, and Averil went home, she was glad for the first time to escape from the innocent, searching questions of childhood.

The next day dawned with a grey sea and a grey sky, and a north-easter that lashed the waters of the sea into white-topped waves. There was a flick of rain and spray on the window when Averil looked out. She could see a fishing-boat struggling under full canvas before the wind, with red sails etched against the leaden sky, and a great gull blown like a feather across the waste of waters. She was thankful for the stormy weather, since now she need not dread other visitors to Hartborough; for the tourist season at Wyndquest was over, and people wishing to visit their friends in the town upon the cliff would certainly choose a better day.

Mrs. Vernon came down to breakfast in her heavy mourning; and, much later, Louise lounged downstairs with sullen, sleepy eyes, and refused to discuss the expedition at all.

"Whatever happens, mother, I shall blame you," she said, as they parted. "You are doing a very mad trick to go off to Hartborough like this when we have lived here for five years, and no one has guessed anything. Don't ask me for my sympathy if everything goes wrong after this."

Averil looked from her sister to her mother's white, worn face. It had never struck her so forcibly as it did now how thin Mrs. Vernon had grown, and the hollows of her haggard face made her deep-set eyes more full of tragedy than ever. She looked a woman beaten down by the storm of life and unable to lift up herself from the mire where she lay; and the heart of the girl ached for her with the pain that is worse to bear than physical agony, for it is the pain of seeing those we love in trouble, and ourselves helpless to help them.

"Whatever happens, Louise," she said sternly, "you have no right to question our mother's wishes."

"I still maintain," said Louise sulkily, "that, considering he is only in prison for seven years, it is ridiculous going to see him when he has been in Hartborough five years next month."

And so, with the knowledge of the disapproval of Louise, Averil and her mother got into the little train and started away on the hour and a half journey to Hartborough. Mrs. Vernon leaned back in the carriage with her eyes closed, and once Averil leaned forward and touched her hand.

"Give it up, mother darling, and let us go back," she said tenderly. "You are not strong enough to bear it."

"I will not!" cried Mrs. Vernon hysterically. "Night and day I have thought of Gerald for all these years, till his name is engraved on my heart. You cannot understand that a mother loves her child through good and evil, for he is still the baby that lay on her breast, and it must be some fault in her training that has made him fall so low. The most wonderful moment in my life will be when I am telling Gerald that I love him in spite of all, and that, whatever the world may say, his mother will be faithful to him."

Averil kissed her gently. She would not tell her what a hopeless quest theirs seemed to be in her eyes; for they were absolutely ignorant as to what Gerald's work might be, or whether it might not in some way aggravate his punishment if they made any attempt to communicate with him.

They alighted at Hartborough Station and drove up the hill, Averil making all the arrangements, for her mother was speechless with grief. The little waggonette crawled up the steep side of the cliff, and the girl looked down on the white road that wound away through Monks Regis up to Wyndquest, among the Downs where the Westhayes Woods could be faintly seen rimming the sky line on a clear day. The mist was rolling away now, and through the grey sky the sun shot an arrow of light upon the stormy bay and touched the brilliant scarlet and green paint of an automobile that was tearing its way towards Hartborough at the rate of twenty miles an hour.

"That is the Westhayes motor, I believe," said Averil suddenly; "I hope none of the house party are coming here to-day."

"You are always ready to imagine evil," said her mother irritably. "Do keep your mind on poor Gerald for a change," and the girl was silent.

The grey rock ridges, the bold outlines of the fortifications above them, the great cranes for carrying the stone, all filled her with a sense of the grimness of the place, and when they jolted up a narrow road across a truck line the ruddy-faced driver pointed with his whip to a great wall in front of them.

"Yon's the convict quarry," he said; "you can see the sentry at the corner."

It was then that Averil realised the full horror of the thing that her mother had done in visiting Hartborough, and one glance at Mrs. Vernon's face showed her that she must exert all her own courage to avert a breakdown.

They alighted at the little inn where the brakes drew up to deposit passengers, and went upstairs in silence to the room to which the neat little maid-servant led them, and where she took Averil's order for tea to be served later in the afternoon. To Mary Jane they were only two more of the tourist variety who came every day through the summer to stare at the convicts, and she felt no interest in them at all, save for the fact that they were later in the year than usual. When they were alone in the room together, Averil took her mother's hand.

"You must be brave now, my dear," she said; "for we must have no scene here."

Then she drew her into one of the bow windows and drew the lace curtains across so that they were hidden from anyone who might enter the room. The window faced the road, and when Averil had mastered the sick shivering that shook her like a reed, she saw that they could see over the wall into the quarry. There were men in motley dress working there in gangs, pushing the heavy stone up the incline in trucks, carrying it out in great blocks from the pit, and breaking it into heaps for the roads, or slinging it in the cranes for delivery at the railway station. Their dress was so grotesque, with their blue and red jackets and their khaki breeches and caps, marked everywhere with the broad arrow, that she did not wonder to see her mother cover her eyes with her hand, and then suddenly, as if gaining courage, from the thought that she might be so near her child, sit up erect in her chair, straining forward as though she must not lose one instant in recognising him It was a tragic scene, and Averil cried out in her heart upon the heartlessness of those who could treat those outcasts of society as an amusing sight. She felt the tears rush to her eyes; but she drove them back sternly, and as the gang immediately below them turned to drag the truck back again, she scanned every face with the eagerness of a shipwrecked sailor for a sight of the face she sought. But of the lowering dozen faces turned up towards the window none of them was Gerald's. They were the typical scum of the earth, so far as she could see—men who fulfilled every horrible dream of evil and corrupt feature, into whose lives had come the time

> "When the insensate brute within the man,
> Weary with wallowing in the mire, leaps forth
> Devouring—and the soul sinks
> And leaves the man—a Devil."

She drew a quick breath of relief, and saw her mother close her eyes and fold her hands with a sigh of bitter disappointment.

"Gerald is not there."

Then, after long silence, she reached out impulsively, and took up the binoculars that lay on Averil's knee.

"There are some more of them coming away from gardening work," she said. "Perhaps he is among them. Gerald was always fond of the garden, even when he was a little child."

The mournful party, under the charge of two warders, tramped up the quarry path, and through the glasses Mrs. Vernon scanned every face as it turned drearily towards the window of the little inn. Gerald was among them. She saw his face clearly, with the afternoon sun upon it, but he was too far away to distinguish more than a blur of figures behind the glass.

"God help me! It is my boy, my little boy," she cried distractedly. "Oh, Averil, Averil, that I should ever live to see him in those hideous things. His face is so changed, so old and grave; and they have cut his hair so short. In all his sheltered life he had never known about sin and wickedness, and now he is hand and glove with it. Why, he may be walking next to a murderer!"

"Hush, mother, hush!" said Averil in great alarm, striving to calm her; for she had heard the door open behind them, and knew that there were other people in the room.

"He is innocent! I know it is all a mistake! Gerald! Gerald!" and her strength failing her, she fell suddenly sideways from her chair, and Averil caught her in her arms in a dead faint.

"Can I help you?" said a strange voice from behind her, and before she could reply Mrs. Vernon was lifted in a pair of strong arms and laid on the sofa, where she slowly recovered consciousness.

When Averil had time to think of anything but her mother, she glanced up into the face of the young man who stood holding the medicine glass and helping her quietly and unobtrusively to restore the fainting woman, with evident sympathy on his face. He was a tall, good-looking man of about thirty years of age, with kindly dark eyes, and a mouth that looked very firm under his brown moustache. He had the distinctive line of sunburn on his forehead that is the hall-mark of the soldier, and somehow, seeing him, Averil felt that she had found a friend.

"How good of you," she said tremulously. "My mother has had a shock."

"I heard her say the name of 'Gerald,'" said the young man with some hesitation. "Do tell me whether I am right in supposing that—that you are some relation to Gerald Vernon, with whom I was at Eton."

His delicate reserve touched Averil, and she bent her head.

"He is my brother."

"Then I may tell you that it is on his account that I am here to-day. I am Captain Hugh Darrel, the nephew of Sir Alwyn, and I was always fond of Gerald; and, may I say to you in all kindness, I know that his one fault was his weakness of character."

"Yes, I know it," said the girl gently. "We never let him think for himself until it was too late for him to decide between right and wrong."

"We cannot talk much here; but since I know you live at Wyndquest, perhaps you will allow me to come and see you. I was on my way to see the Governor and to lay before him the fact that poor Gerald's evil angel has died, and in dying confessed that he was the greater sinner, though the boy got the punishment. He told him what to do and how to do it, and when he was arrested this man had kept him drunk for days, so that he was not himself when he struck the detective. Nothing can be done now, I fear; but much can be done afterwards, and it is of that that I wish to speak to you later."

"Thank you a thousand times," cried Averil, with great agitation. "It was the old story—drink and bad companions and gambling."

"You need dread nothing," said Darrel earnestly. "He will have good friends. I am just coming, Lascelles. Wait for me, there's a good fellow; there is a lady ill here."

But Sir Philip Lascelles had forced himself into the room, and now stood facing the trio, with a dawning expression of malevolence upon his lips as his eyes rested on Averil's miserable face.

"I am extremely sorry, my good fellow, to intrude; but isn't it a little overwhelming to find a public room turned into a hospital? Miss Vernon at Hartborough! And, dear me, an invalid—a shock perhaps. I am extremely grieved; but as Captain Darrel has been so useful, perhaps I may be allowed to help?"

"No, thank you," said Averil, with a sudden thrill of passion. "We are going home now, for my mother is better; and you may as well know, as, no doubt, everyone soon must do, that my brother is a convict."

"Dear me, how shocking!" murmured Lascelles; but Hugh Darrel, looking at the noble figure and shining eyes of the girl, realised that here was one of the heroines of the world—a woman whom any man should be proud to know, and still prouder to be able to befriend, and all unconsciously he moved a pace nearer to her side.

IV.

"There's a divinity that shapes our ends, Rough hew them how we will."

IN Saturday morning Averil was met at the door of Westhayes by a supercilious footman, who acquainted her with the fact that Lady Darrel wished to speak to her at once. She had slept but little that night; and, indeed, her mother, who was in a pitiable condition from hysteria, had demanded every moment of her attention. Louise had been sullenly satisfied as to the success of her prophecy, and had been useless with Mrs. Vernon, since she could not resist the temptation of telling her that she had known what the result of her visit to Hartborough would be, from the beginning; and, therefore, when Averil found herself outside the door of Lady Darrel's morning-room she felt ill prepared for the avalanche that she felt certain was about to descend upon her. Lady Darrel was a very severe figure that morning, in a short blue coat and skirt, with a scarlet tie, and her hair coiled away in a workmanlike fashion under a blue shooting-cap. She was engaged in answering notes, and when her eyes fell upon the girl's slight figure, Averil noted the insolent triumph in them before she veiled them by her lashes.

"Good-morning, Miss Vernon. I am really pained to have to speak to you on such a matter; but since Sir Philip Lascelles has brought it to my notice I cannot keep silence."

Her attitude was a judicial one, but her manner was scarcely impartial, and Averil flushed hotly.

"I know what you are going to say, Lady Darrel, and I had intended to speak to you on the same subject to-day."

Lady Darrel waved an imperious hand.

"Pray be silent, Miss Vernon. I have very little to say; but you must allow me to say it without interruption, for I have to join Sir Alwyn in the coverts before lunch. I consider that you came to Wyndquest and took my situation under false pretences. Did you ever imagine that had I known that your brother was actually a convict at Hartborough now, I should ever have allowed you to enter my house or teach my innocent children? Tell me, is it or is it not true?"

"Perfectly true," said Averil, with as much calmness as she could summon. "I have made a mistake, and I deeply regret it; but till now I thought that the sorrow and shame concerned only ourselves in all the world."

"Then you made a big mistake. Do you imagine that I should ever engage a housemaid whose brother was a convicted criminal? I am sorry for you, Miss Vernon; but Sir Alwyn and I both feel, after thoroughly discussing the subject with Sir Philip Lascelles and Captain Darrel last night, that there is nothing for it but for you to leave us. I have written out a cheque in lieu of a quarter's notice, and I hope you will find another situation where the parents are not so particular."

Averil bent her head, feeling acutely the shame of her position, which was unbearable.

"I cannot accept your cheque, Lady Darrel, after your words; but I hope you will allow me to say good-bye to the children. God knows the innocent have to suffer with the guilty; but I cannot see how my brother's sin contaminates me, so far as your children are concerned."

"You can say good-bye to them," said Lady Darrel calmly. "I have told them why you are leaving, and explained it all to them."

"You have told them! Oh, Lady Darrel!"

It was more than she could bear, and, choking down her tears, Averil escaped from the room, leaving her accuser silent with a disagreeable sense that she had gone too far and had sinned against every feeling of womanhood. Lady Darrel made some attempt at amends by ordering her pony carriage at once and driving away without interfering with Averil's last interview with her little pupils; for, woman though she was of inordinate vanity and jealous temper, yet the haunting look of the girl's young face, as she had smitten her with cruel words, penetrated even to the apology for a heart that was within her breast.

Averil hurried along the corridors into the schoolroom passage, and stood for a few moments to regain her composure by the window that looked out over the park. The sun was glittering on the dewy grass; and the yew trees, copper and brown with the touch of autumn in the air, looked like brilliant shadows of their former selves. The rooks were drifting in the south wind above the tree tops like sparks of sunlight, cawing leisurely as they circled above the bare sticks that were their nests; and the long grass below seemed to be alive with restless motion, as a flock of fallow deer fed timorously within earshot of the house. Far away in the heart of the wood was the enclosure where the red deer were shut in, and on the stillness the trumpeting of one of the great stags seemed to break the edge of the silence. Averil wiped her tears, and turned to prepare for her interview with Molly and Nigel, and for her sad return home to face Mrs. Vernon and Louise, when she came face to face with Captain Darrel coming down the passage towards her.

"Forgive me, Miss Vernon," he said humbly. "You must not think me impertinent; but I want to tell you how deeply sorry I am for you, and how much I blame my aunt for her conduct. I tried last night to convince her that she was wrong; but, Miss Vernon, what have you done to make Sir Philip Lascelles your implacable enemy?"

Her flush and conscious silence told him the truth, and he hurried on.

"I must go now; but I am coming down to see you to-morrow, if Mrs. Vernon will allow me, to talk about Gerald"

He shook her hand warmly and departed, finding it very difficult to be civil to his uncle's wife for the remainder of the day, when he recalled Averil's wet eyes.

The girl went into the schoolroom comforted a little, and when she opened the door both children ran to meet her with open arms.

"Oh, then, it isn't true; and you are not going to leave us! Molly and me have been crying quite a long time, and then we tried to do our lessons so as we should please you; but Molly's map was all wrong, and my pothooks and hangers is just crazy, as nurse would say," cried Nigel.

Molly said nothing; but her eyes were on Averil's face, and the girl felt the intensity of her sympathy and slipped her arm round the child's waist.

"Yes, I have come to say good-bye for the present, dears; but I hope it will be a very short good-bye, and that you will have someone very nice to teach you in my place."

She spoke cheerfully, and Nigel looked at her curiously.

"Muvver says that your brother is a bad man, and he wears yellow stockings and broad arrows, and perhaps you'll wear them soon too. But Molly and I doesn't think you will; but if you was took to prison, Molly and I would come and see you, and bring you cake and sweets every day."

Averil kissed the troubled face with a pang of real sorrow; for she had loved him since he was born, and now for the first time she had been the one to bring him face to face with shame and sin.

"Thank you, darling," she said softly. "Would you and Molly like to hear about my brother?"

Molly laid her head on Miss Vernon's shoulder, but Nigel sat on her knees staring up open-mouthed into her face.

"There were three of us," said Averil, "and dear father and mother; and once we were rich and lived in a castle—a prettier place even than this—and one day we woke up and all our money was gone, and dear father died, and we had to go out into the world to earn money. My brother wanted money—oh, so badly, because he had never known what it was to be poor—and because he was weak he was led away by bad companions and—and took someone else's money."

Averil's voice faltered.

"Muvver said he killed someone, too, just like Oldgood did the snake the other day with the hatchet."

"Oh, no. He never killed anyone. Thank God, he never did that."

She could not explain the scene that was ever with her—Gerald, caught like a rat in a trap, mad with drink, striking down the man who had come to take him, with the frenzied folly of a madman.

"We thought he could not have done that," said Nigel cheerfully; "and Molly and I shall come to tea with you every day at the nice little house where you live; and we like those cakes with the currants on the top that your sister makes."

All this time Molly had not spoken; but Averil could feel the long-drawn sobs that shook her frail body, and knew what she was enduring.

"Whenever your mother says that you may, you shall come," she said; "but I think, Nigel, that we are going away from Wyndquest. Perhaps some day your mother will let you come and stay with me."

This idea filled the boy's mind with such dreams of unknown rapture that he forgot his grief in planning out a programme for each day they were to spend with Averil.

"Miss Vernon," said Molly in an odd, strained voice, as they parted, "you remember about the hill of difficulty. Am I climbing up it now?"

"Yes, Molly darling; and if you persevere you will see the sun rise out of the night. Only, go straight on and do what you know is right."

Averil said good-bye to the two little forlorn figures with a great semblance of cheerfulness which she was far from feeling; but when she reached Rosanna Smith's gate she had realised to the full that her dismissal from Westhayes meant means too narrow for them to exist upon, and that her renunciation of the money that was due to her meant that they would not be able to meet the quarter's rent at Christmas. Something of her despair was written on her face when she crossed Miss

Smith's threshold and found her old friend sitting by the fire with Marco on her knee. A slight chill had made Rosanna Smith rather more silent than usual, and she was wrapped up in a white woollen shawl, out of which her sallow, pinched face and restless eyes peered curiously at the new-comer.

"Goodness, Averil!" she said, "Not at lessons? What has happened?"

But the girl's quivering face and sobbing breath enlightened her, and she sprang to her feet, forgetting that she was an invalid. Marco, who had been drowsing on her knee, gave an indignant yap, and she caught him up at once to comfort him.

"Oh, my darling, my darling Marco, did I hurt you? Now then, Averil, I must have the whole story, please, at once. I have been feeling so ill, and though I was galvanised for a moment by the shock of your face, I feel as weak as a kitten and quite unfit for any nonsense."

"It is only—that Lady Darrel has dismissed me. Sir Philip Lascelles told her about my brother Gerald, and—and she said I was not a fit person to be with her children."

Rosanna Smith sat down forcibly in her chair with a decision that made the wood creak ominously.

"Very well," she said; "oh, very well, Lady Darrel! You will be sorry for this some day. Sit down, Averil; I have a story to tell you, and though I have lived here ten years come Christmas in silence, I suppose it had to come at last. I might have been Sir Alwyn Darrel's mother."

Averil looked in blank astonishment at Miss Smith's figure, upright and gaunt in her high-backed chair, her thin hand gripping the arm until her knuckles were white with the strain. She felt a wild desire to laugh hysterically at the thought of big, good-tempered Sir Alwyn, with his ruddy, honest face.

"I don't understand you," she said faintly.

"You soon will do, and then you will realise what small cause I have to love the Darrel family. Why, I came down here to watch them and be near them, because I knew they would do me an injury if they could, for they are a bad lot, root and stock—a bad lot."

Averil stared at her silently, for she was under the impression that Miss Smith had suddenly gone out of her mind.

"No, I am not in the least mad," cried the other irritably, "not in the least. But I am going to tell you a great secret. My name is not Smith at all, but Bosanquet; but when I dropped my money, I dropped my name for safety's sake. Before Sir Alwyn was born, and when I was a poor girl, his father was engaged to me; but he jilted me for Lady Anne Hemming, who was Sir Alwyn's mother. They are both dead now, and these two Darrels have never heard the name of Bosanquet very likely, although we are blood relations; for, as you see, Madame la Duchesse de Saint Martelle was my great grandmother, and the same relation to Sir Alwyn's father. Then my money came to me, and Sir Anthony was sorry—oh, very sorry, I think—but I went away and lived in Scotland, far off from them, and my name died out of his memory. Then, fifteen years ago, Lady Darrel's father—Mr. Temple, a fashionable lawyer, and a scoundrel if ever there was one—had control over a great part of my fortune, and he had the audacity to risk it in a speculation of his own, and to lose it, and then to have the impertinence to make me an offer of marriage. Therefore, I have no reason to love Lady Darrel either, though I never saw her till I came to Wyndquest. That decided me, Averil; for I had been simply disgusted with the world since I had become an heiress, for on an average, though I was never beautiful, I had five offers of marriage a year, all for love of my golden sovereigns. So, when I came to look into my affairs, I found that my money had disposed of itself for me, and I was left with a tiny income, as you know. So I changed my name, lived about at one place and another till people fancied I was dead, and then I came down here to watch the Darrels, and now I have found them out again."

She ended with a burst of coughing, and Averil said, with a bewildered sense of unreality:

"But what are you going to do? This is like a fairy story, but it will not help me."

"Yes, it does indirectly; for I have been prepared for this emergency all along, knowing the Darrels as I do. And now that it has come, I will tell you my plans, that I have been weaving when you were asleep."

She rose from her chair again, and moved feebly over to the bureau, and sat down before it with the key in her hand.

"Of course, you cannot stay at Wyndquest now," she said. "That would have been impossible for much longer—as soon, at least, as your brother came out of Hartborough."

"Of course, we cannot stay here; we shall

"Averil felt that she had found a friend."—p. 204.

have to leave Wyndquest," said Averil mournfully. "Louise will be very glad, for she hates the place, and only I shall be sorry."

"We will go to London," said Miss Smith calmly, "and I shall go with you. You will get work there, and so will Gerald and that lazy cat, Louise; and I shall pay you a hundred pounds a year for the privilege of living with you."

"Oh, Miss Smith," gasped Averil, "that would help us out of all our difficulties. I am sure my mother will be grateful to you, but—can you afford it?"

"I can and will; and not only that, but I am going to provide you with a sum of ready money for your present expenses, for I know that you are not going to take that harridan's money—a nagging, scolding Xantippe, as I call her."

"Please don't, Miss Smith. I did not understand her, perhaps, and she has her good points."

"And not anyone—not even her poor, wretched husband—has been able to find them out," cried Rosanna triumphantly. "But see here."

She fitted the key into the lock, then turned back again.

"Every word I have told you is private, remember. You are not to repeat anything. I have trusted you as I have never trusted anyone before."

"I quite understand."

"Then see here!"

One turn of the key released the lock, and she began to open the drawers one after another.

"These are what were given me and what I bought when I was going to be Lady Darrel, though some of them I have inherited later."

Averil stood staring over her shoulder in silent amazement, as she displayed a perfectly marvellous collection of jewellery, that lay glittering under layers of cotton-wool.

"I meant to have left most of them to the Darrels if they had behaved as they ought to have done; but now they are for you, Averil—willed to you after my death in proper form. But we may as well realise a little ready money by selling this diamond brooch that is not of a good design."

Under Averil's eyes the firelight caught the jewels, and glistened on a string of diamonds, each stone round and perfect, that lay in a velvet case under Miss Smith's hand. There were sapphires such as she had never dreamed of, blue as violets in a hedgerow. There were pearls set in dull gold, and rings of ruby and emerald. And all the time, with this fortune under her hand, Miss Smith had starved herself and had lived as though she had not a penny piece in the world.

"I think that they are worth ten thousand pounds, but I made up my mind long ago that they were never to be sold until I was dead," said Miss Smith with a sigh, folding the brilliant jewels away in the cotton-wool again and locking them up, "for often when I have been very miserable I have taken them out and been comforted and warmed by their beauty."

"It is like a Christmas pantomime," said Averil, with a little sigh of wonder, "and you are the good fairy."

Miss Smith nodded her head sagely.

"Now, be off, my dear, and keep a still tongue about all this, and ask your mother if she will have me as a boarder in London, and tell her I will pay for the moving. I can't ask you to lunch, because I have only a poached egg. Georgina's appetite is so large that she demolishes a pound of meat at a sitting."

And lost in wonder at the strangeness of this woman who could starve herself when she had a fortune shut up in her bureau, Averil put on her coat and departed.

V.

"Out of the darkness, day is born."

AVERIL VERNON was greeted at home by tears and distress first of all, and then by incredulous surprise. That out of this maze of difficulty a good angel should appear in the shape of a woman whom Mrs. Vernon and Louise had always made a point of despising, was extraordinary, and the girl was at once accredited with a character for extraordinary shrewdness in the eyes of her younger sister. The plan was at once discussed and approved, and Mrs. Vernon was beginning to think that life might, after all, have its occasional bright side, when there came a ring at the bell, and the small maid of all work dragged with difficulty into the drawing-room a hamper addressed to Miss Vernon.

Averil opened it, and found that it contained a brace of pheasants and a leash of partridges, with a dozen other luxuries, and on the top of the straw lay a message, written in Sir Alwyn's boyish handwriting, "From the children, and please don't say anything about it," which delicate admission of the supreme authority of Lady Darrel made Averil laugh and then cry without knowing the reason of her tears.

"Averil," said Louise carelessly that evening, "what is the name of that handsome man staying at Westhayes?"

"Captain Hugh Darrel," said Averil, with a faint flush of colour.

"Goodness, no! I don't admire Hugh Darrel. This man has a dark, waxed moustache and beautiful dark eyes, and such small hands and feet, and he is so well dressed, and his voice is so agreeable. I call Captain Darrel a very ordinary-looking young man."

"It sounds like Sir Philip Lascelles," said Averil cautiously, "but I hope you will never have anything to say to him. I do not like him at all."

"My dear Averil, you have yet to learn that your friends and mine are chosen from an absolutely different class of individual," returned Louise contemptuously, and Averil was left wondering miserably whether Louise had managed to scrape an acquaintance with Lascelles or no. She certainly had not the requisite strength of mind to ask her, but she determined to keep a sharp look-out while Louise remained at Wyndquest.

"I hope that you will not consider my visit an intrusion," said Captain Darrel pleasantly, as he stood inside Mrs. Vernon's little drawing-room, looking about him with quick, kindly eyes; "but Gerald must be my excuse, and my real desire to help him."

"You are very good," faltered Mrs. Vernon, "and I did not expect a Darrel to be so considerate."

"You have a right to say that," he returned gravely, "and I cannot tell you how grieved both I and my uncle are for what has happened. It has hurt him very much, but Lady Darrel was very determined."

"It was very unfortunate," murmured Mrs. Vernon, with a sniff; "but, then, life is generally so."

Captain Darrel had walked into the little house at Wyndquest as he had promised, on the following day; but his arrival was so unexpected that he found Averil engaged in the kitchen, making a cake, and her mother full of apologies for the fact that they had not expected him so early. He had wondered very much as to the sort of home that would enshrine Averil Vernon. Frankly, he had never seen anyone more beautiful than this girl, who was the sister of his unfortunate friend. He had seen her several times in Wyndquest village, had come across her unseen leaving Westhayes and her little pupils, but always her face had been the unvaryingly lovely one of his dreams—the face of his ideal woman. She was like some lovely Greuze, some delicate maiden of the mist; but all the grosser element seemed to have been eliminated from her loveliness, leaving only the spiritual behind. He loved to see her hair, golden brown as the heart of a chestnut, clustering in tendrils and curls about her forehead. He wondered at the beauty of her deep eyes and the curve of her delicate lips; and, more than all, he wondered that she had been allowed to live Averil Vernon until she was one and twenty.

Hugh Darrel was the son of Sir Alwyn's younger brother, who, with a younger brother's portion, had married a penniless wife and reared a large family, of whom Hugh was the eldest. And as for many years it seemed probable that he would eventually be heir to Westhayes and the baronetcy, Sir Alwyn had sent him to Eton and Sandhurst, and now that he was a captain in the Loamshire Fusiliers, he was making him a moderate allowance. Of course, with the birth of Nigel, his claim to Westhayes fell to the background; but Sir Alwyn was a just man, and while he lived he declared that Hugh should not lose the hundred a year he allowed him. His life had been a simply happy one always, in spite of its poverty, and he was hardly at his ease in the atmosphere of Westhayes, for between himself and Lady Darrel there existed a dislike that the lady herself made no attempt to conceal; but to good-hearted Sir Alwyn it was a real pleasure to have his nephew on a rare visit, and he said in his honest heart that he hoped Nigel would be as good a chap as Hugh at his age.

When Averil came in shyly to greet their visitor, she found him talking away pleasantly to her mother, but she could not tell that he had been waiting for the sound of her step with an eagerness that seemed to his calmer mind to be ridiculous. She seemed to make the room beautiful as she entered, and to bring with her an atmosphere of light and perfume that started with the October roses in her belt, and the very touch of her soft hand filled him with a sense of profound pity at the thought of her young life so shadowed at its outset.

"I am so anxious to know what your plans are," he said, and it seemed to the two women to be perfectly natural to be talking of Gerald to this man who a few days ago had been an absolute stranger to them.

"I know that in a very few weeks Gerald will be out of Hartborough; for I have interested myself in learning every detail of his past and future, and, as is the custom with exemplary characters, a portion of his sentence has been remitted. A friend of mine, who has a big business in the City, and who knows his history from beginning to end, has promised to take him on as his private secretary at a very small salary; but he is really creating the post, just to while away the time that he is under police supervision, and to see if he is suited for better things. The salary will be only fifty pounds a year."

"But the idea of his being able to work, of his being able to restore his self-respect. Oh, Captain Darrel, what can we say to you?" cried Averil, with parted lips and eyes dewy with tears. "Mother, how good Captain Darrel is. How can we thank him?"

"My poor boy," said Mrs. Vernon, with a heavy sigh. "Yes, indeed, it is very good of you, Captain Darrel. I suppose every man's hand will be against him and us. What makes you so good to him?"

"I will tell you the reason," said Hugh Darrel simply, "and no one has ever known it till now. Years ago, Mrs. Vernon, when Gerald and I were boys at school, your husband came to see him. I had got into big trouble, and only Gerald knew it, for he was my chum. Some seniors had tempted me to break bounds and visit a shooting gallery that was in the neighbourhood, and I had run up a huge bill with the proprietor which I was totally unable to pay. Exposure would have meant disgrace, and I shall never forget Mr. Vernon, for he gave me the gravest and kindest lecture on my delinquencies, went straight off to the saloon, and paid every penny to the proprietor, threatening him with the severity of the law if he ever allowed a boy to run up scores again in that fashion. I shall never forget the frantic relief that it was to me to be saved from the burden of that debt, and I vowed then that I would repay his goodness some day, whenever the chance came to me; and it came with my knowledge of Gerald's sin and punishment."

"We have just made up our minds to leave here and to live in London, so that we shall be near my poor boy," murmured Mrs. Vernon. "I wish my poor husband had been as careful of his own affairs as he was of yours."

Averil reached out a hand to him, indignant a little that any thought of their own affairs could enter into her mother's mind just then.

"Thank you—oh, thank you," she said. "I love that story of my father, it was so like him—so true and honest in all his dealings that he could not imagine anyone being anything else to him, and when he woke to his hard lesson, it killed him."

"I wish he had woke a little earlier," lamented Mrs. Vernon. "It has been a hard life for us all, and I plainly see that there is a much harder one ahead; and I am too old to enjoy changes, as my daughters seem to do."

Averil's eyes met Darrel's with a faint quiver on her long lashes, for the taunt was too obvious to be resented, and he felt a dim wonder that any woman could see unmoved the pathos of the girl's face and think she was happy.

VI.

"Who love would seek, let him love evermore."

HUGH DARREL and the Vernons had discussed their plans in every aspect before the end of the young man's visit, and he suggested a neighbourhood that would be within reach of Lombard Street, and approved of Miss Smith taking up her abode with them, and announced that he was going to meet Gerald when he came out of Hartborough, and bring him to their house. Then he rose to go, and his eyes fell on a photograph of Louise standing on the mantelpiece.

"Who is this?" he said. "I met her the other day with—I mean, I saw her the other day, and wondered who she could be."

"She is my sister," said Averil quietly, with her eyes on his.

Mrs. Vernon launched out at once into the iniquity of the fact that a beautiful girl like Louise should be compelled to be shut up in a hole like Wyndquest, when she might make quite a stir in society.

Contrary to her custom, Averil took her visitor to the door, and stood there a moment, with a hand on the latch.

"Tell me," she said abruptly, "when you saw my sister, was she with Sir Philip Lascelles?"

He was forced to the truth by the command of her eyes.

"Yes," he said reluctantly.

"Were they apparently on intimate terms. Oh, forgive me for asking you; but I distrust the man, and I did not know till yesterday that Louise knew him."

"They seemed on friendly terms," he replied; "but pray do not be alarmed, the acquaintance is simply a very natural one."

"You know it is not," said Averil in a low voice. "You know that we are not on visiting terms with Westhayes; and I think that Sir Philip is no friend to me, and would be glad to do me an injury through Louise. He might try and win her love, and then laugh at her."

"Indeed, Miss Vernon, you are mistaken. "I have never heard him mention your name since I entered the house, save with respect, and though I know very little of him, he seems always to be——"

"I have made up my mind," said Averil, shaking her head, "and I know directly I see anyone whether they are worth liking."

It had been such a tragic afternoon that it may be forgiven to Hugh Darrel if he attempted to lighten it a little.

"Then I must say, Miss Vernon," he answered with mock gravity, "that I am only thankful you did not take an instant aversion to me. Perhaps you have done so, and are concealing it successfully?"

The sun was on her hair, turning it to glittering gold, and in her eyes and on the sweet oval of her cheek, as she stood among the rosemary and thyme of the little garden. His eyes noticed the shabbiness of her gown and the country make of the shoe that could not disguise the shape of the little foot within it, and there suddenly came upon Hugh Darrel a very storm of feeling that almost swept him from his balance. He would like to have taken this girl into his arms and to promise her that he would shield her for ever and ever against the rough storms of the world that had blown upon her for so long. But he was only a poor soldier himself, struggling with all the difficulty of supporting his position adequately in a crack regiment upon nothing, and he went his way, contenting himself with touching her hand.

"You must let me come again and help you arrange your plans," he said awkwardly enough; "and as I have to go up to town for a few days at the end of the week, I will bring you down a list of suitable houses for you to look at. It will be no trouble, I can assure you."

He went back to Westhayes in a brown study, and Averil went indoors to prepare for the great event of a visit from Miss Smith, who, having resolutely refused to be on terms of intimacy with her mother for so long, had now sent a message that she was coming to take tea with Mrs. Vernon, and that she hoped the whole family would be at home. If Mrs. Vernon had not realised that the hundred a year that was to be her contribution to the household expenses was a necessity, and if she had not received the impression firmly in her mind that Rosanna Smith was a miser, she would not have contemplated her addition to the family circle with such equanimity.

"Since I have known her, my dear," she said complacently to her eldest daughter, "I have always been convinced that she had money, and that some day you would wake up to find yourself the possessor of three or four hundred a year of your own. Don't tell me that I am not always trying to do the best for my children."

"I am sure you tell us that often enough," said Louise from her far corner, with a little scornful laugh; "but so far as I can see we have all found our way through the world without any reference to you."

Averil turned to look at her sister, who had just come downstairs. There was something so new and sparkling about her beauty that Averil was suddenly alarmed. She had woke from the sullen-featured girl, whose beauty had been eclipsed by her heavy expression of discontent, till the girl who sat now in her corner in her white gown might have sat for a quivering, breathing image of Carmen herself, brilliant as a Southern night. But she had no time to do more than feel a pang of terror, when the door opened to admit her old friend in all the glory of her best cap and lace collar. She had donned for the first time a wonderful diamond brooch, that flashed with sullen fires in her laces, and on which the eyes of Mrs. Vernon settled at once with great complacency.

"Good evening to you all," she said, sitting down in the armchair by the fire that Averil pushed out for her, and looking round the room with sharp eyes. "This is the first time I have been out to tea for a great many years, and I feel as if a sort of moral earthquake was taking place within me."

Mrs. Vernon expressed her pleasure at the society of her guest, and begged to introduce her daughter Louise. The keen eyes of the old woman lighted upon the younger Miss Vernon with an expression of malign surprise.

"Pleased to make your acquaintance, Miss Louise," she said coldly. "Not very like the rest of the family, Mrs. Vernon. I should say she must have thrown back to a past generation. You have French blood away back in the early part of the century, I believe?"

Mrs. Vernon admitted the fact, with surprise that Miss Smith should know so much, and Rosanna continued:

"I know a great deal more than most people about north country families, and I believe Miss Louise resembles an old Señora Cabena, who hangs in the west gallery at Kilraith Castle, and who was an ancestress of yours?"

Mrs. Vernon admitted the fact with surprise, and Rosanna continued again:

"She ran away from school with her husband, and introduced an undesirable element into the Vernon family"

And a timely remark from Averil as to the weather alone saved the situation, for Louise was on the point of a retort that would have ruined the harmony of the evening.

Mrs. Vernon sought by every means in her power to discover the connection that her new acquaintance had with the north, but with indifferent success; for Miss Smith was an adept at skirting round all undesirable attempts at extracting information, and by the end of the evening Mrs. Vernon was in the same situation of bewildered perplexity as she had been at the beginning.

"There is one thing that I must say before we take up our abode together," said Rosanna, with unabated cheerfulness, as she sat at the dining-room table, discussing the varied meal that is dignified by the name of high tea. "I am not hard to suit, but I like cheerful faces and busy lives about me. What work do you intend to take up, Miss Louise?"

"I never have been accustomed to do any," said that young lady with unnecessary vigour. "I was brought up like a lady, and I certainly do not intend to spoil my eyesight and my youth in slaving for disagreeable people who treat you as Lady Darrel treated Averil."

Miss Smith looked at her, and her eyes narrowed a little.

"You are a very obstinate young lady, I can see," she said softly. "Pray, why is Averil to support the family alone? I have yet to learn that she was brought up in a different fashion from yourself."

"Louise does not mean anything wrong," said Mrs. Vernon hastily. "She is a good girl, and helps me in the house."

"I was going to have made an offer," continued Miss Smith imperturbably, "to the effect that I should be glad, in return for the use of a private sitting-room, to have increased my payment to £150 a year, but if it is to keep Miss Louise Vernon in luxury I shall decline to do so. No, you must not think I am rich; but my small income is elastic, and with my savings I can manage this in return for a perfectly comfortable home."

Louise rose from the table.

"I do not intend to work," she said unsteadily in her anger. "I have quite another future before me," and, as if fearful of saying more, she swept like a whirlwind from the room.

"I thought so; I was aiming at that," said Rosanna Smith, with a smile. "Do you know, Mrs. Vernon, that your youngest daughter is on the point of becoming the talk of the village from the way she is going on with Sir Philip Lascelles?"

Averil gave a faint cry, and Mrs. Vernon burst into tears.

"Why shouldn't she talk to him?" she said feebly. "I know that she is a very pretty girl, and in old days she would have met that sort of man every day. I don't know who he is. I never heard his name, but it is hard that a girl like her can have no opportunity of making a good marriage."

"A good marriage! My good woman, do you imagine that Sir Philip Lascelles would look in this cottage for his wife? No; he would amuse himself with Louise, and leave her broken-hearted, and then laugh at her. It has not gone so far as I have said. I have only heard a few times that they have been seen together—an occasional meeting, a walk from the village—but she is the sort of girl to be careful of, and I know what that man Lascelles is."

Mrs. Vernon still cried miserably, and repeated that it was very hard that her daughter could not have the same chances as other people, and with a gesture of despair, Miss Smith turned to Averil:

"You are sensible, you will understand," she said. "When I have gone you can explain to your mother the absurdity of the whole affair. Meanwhile, the sooner we go to London the better."

"You are quite right," said Averil. "Only Louise did not know his name three days ago."

"Is that necessary?" said Rosanna scornfully. "He would not give her his name while he could help it; he would say that a few talks and walks with a handsome girl mean nothing."

"I will do what I can," said Averil miserably; "but Louise is not a girl you can drive, or even a girl who will take advice."

"A woman's name," said Rosanna Smith, "is so delicate a thing that one breath upon it seems to spoil it. I think that a true woman should be one of whom it should be impossible to speak lightly."

"Louise will be very angry if you speak to her," broke in Mrs. Vernon nervously. "It will make the house so disagreeable."

Miss Smith rose, and took the thin, cold hand in her own.

"Believe me, Mrs. Vernon," she said kindly, I want nothing but your happiness. I am so fond of Averil that I could do a great deal for her relations."

And Mrs. Vernon, comforting herself with the idea that at any rate Miss Smith's £200 a year must come to her eldest daughter eventually, made up her mind privately to encourage Louise in every way in her power to bring about a successful marriage with Sir Philip Lascelles.

When their visitor had departed, Averil went out into the garden to cool her throbbing pulses. It was a quiet evening, with the restless moan of the sea in the air, and the scudding clouds hid the moon in a grey mist. The trees in the Westhayes avenue were tossing their boughs to and fro to the south wind. There would be rain before the morning, and the scent of it was heavy in the air. She could see the dim outline of the tall church tower, and the unearthly chime of the clock as it struck echoed and throbbed on the still night till the echo died away upon the cliff. She moved nearer to the gate that gave upon the road, and leaned her hot cheek upon the cool bar. Her thoughts were one unconscious prayer for help and comfort, and she prayed that their way might be guided into the paths of peace once more, when Gerald came back to them. But the quiet of her thoughts was sharply broken in upon by voices coming up the lane, and before she was aware of them it was too late to retreat, and she heard Sir Philip Lascelles say in his dilettante tones that seemed to have a mocking ring in them, underlying his whole nature:

"We have had a charming meeting, Miss Louise. Good-night, and good luck to the next time you feel inclined to stroll as far as Westhayes gates after dinner."

Averil lifted herself up, and the moonlight shone upon her white, indignant face.

"Louise," she said. She flung the gate open, and drew her sister's arm into hers. "Sir Philip Lascelles," she said in a voice that rang clear and distinct in her indignation, "you have no business to be here. If you want to make my sister's acquaintance, it must be through our mother, and in our own house."

"It is made already," he answered with a low bow, "though it was not under the ægis of Lady Darrel's wing and in the intervals of playing accompaniments."

"And if," said Averil again, "you cannot remember that my sister and I are ladies, I shall have to ask Lady Darrel to remind you."

"I recognise a threat," said Sir Philip lightly, "and I am afraid that I shall have to give in, Miss Louise, before the fury of your elder sister. So good-night and good-bye."

The two girls stood there until the sound of his feet had died away upon the hard road, and then Averil drew Louise inside the gate.

"How could you do such a thing?" she cried, and suddenly broke down into bitter sobbing.

"Don't cry like that—oh, Averil, don't cry," said Louise, suddenly moved to sorrow and shame at her conduct. "I will never do it again—never, never, if you will forgive me this time and will not tell mother."

"You will never have anything more to do with that man?"

"No—no. Forgive me, Averil."

And, recognising the ring of truth in her frightened tones, Averil forgave her. But all that night she lay in broken slumber, wondering how Louise could sleep with the quiet of a little child, when she herself woke from her dreaming with tears of fear and pity on her face for the girl who had so far forgotten her womanhood as to tamper with the most beautiful side of life that men call love.

VII.

"Oh! fear not in a world like this,
For thou sha't know ere long—
Know how sublime a thing it is To suffer and be strong."

"MOTHER dear, I do think the house looks quite nice," said Averil enthusiastically, as she surveyed her last piece of handiwork in the shape of a most effective drawing-room carpet, made out of two remnants pieced together and decorated fancifully in a quaint Oriental pattern of scarlet and blue braid.

"Really, if you did not know that the ottoman was made out of two orange boxes and the sofa was covered with your old tea gown, you might imagine that they were chef d'œuvres bought in the Edgware Road."

"So it pleases you to imagine, my dear," said Mrs. Vernon dismally. "For myself, I always see the makeshifts under the covers, and I feel quite convinced that no one could ever think for a moment that the tea table was anything but painted deal."

Averil's bright face fell for an instant. Her mother was sitting squarely and miserably on the most comfortable chair in the room; and she herself, flushed and tired with a fortnight's continual labour, in which she had been spasmodically assisted by her family, was standing contented and pleased with the results of her work, in the centre of the little drawing-room that her hands had made so pretty. Then she pulled herself together with a smile that was a little forced, kissed her mother, and ran off to get her some tea—the woman's panacea for every ill.

The house to which the Vernons had moved was No. 40, Lempriere Street, and though it was within easy reach of the great thoroughfares of the city, yet it was more or less secluded and old-fashioned in its appearance; and although to Mrs. Vernon's eyes it was a very sordid neighbourhood, yet Averil saw it through roseate spectacles as a far more attractive home than they might otherwise have hoped for. The girl had had a hard task to accomplish during the last three weeks, and yet her bright spirits had never quailed under any circumstances. She had indomitably lifted the burden of her family with unfailing courage, and had compelled them to see the brightest side of life, though Mrs. Vernon, Louise, and Rosanna Smith seemed to have conspired together to make her task more difficult than she had ever expected. Averil had not supposed that leaving Wyndquest would be to anyone of the trio a great misfortune, but Mrs. Vernon cried herself ill because she was leaving the shadow of Hartborough Prison behind her, and Louise was so irritable and moody that her sister could only imagine that her affaire with Sir Philip Lascelles had been very successfully broken off. Even Miss Smith made a great trouble of her move at the last, and to Averil's lot it fell to break up her home, as well as their own, and pack the furniture for transportation to London. She had so many complaints to combat, so many troubles to smoothe away, that it seemed to her afterwards that she must have been buoyed up by some stronger spirit than her own and helped miraculously through a period of great difficulty. She had not seen the little Darrels since the day she had bid them farewell, but she had received one letter from Molly that was very characteristically signed by a great flourish of kisses from Nigel. It told her that they had a new governess whom they did not like, and that they missed her more every day. The quaint missive ended, "I read in my 'Hill of Difficulty' book, and try to make the best of things, like you do, Miss Vernon, darling."

And perhaps it had been the child's thought that had helped to carry Averil through her days of hard work.

Lempriere Street that afternoon in November did not look its best, for a grey mist had dulled the windows and damped the dirty street with oily slush. The houses were mainly of the lodging type, with dingy white lace curtains in the windows, and frowsy women who now and again opened paintless doors to take in the milk, or to stand to gossip with arms folded at the top of the area steps. But it was an eminently respectable neighbourhood, and even the costers who turned up out of the thoroughfares with their barrows of faded greens lowered their voices in sympathy with the atmosphere of the place.

The landlord had put No. 40 in complete repair for the Vernons, probably under pressure from Captain Darrel, who had taken the house for them, and the brown paint and green window-boxes made quite a centre of attraction in the street, which was enhanced by the neat servant who opened the door, and the knowledge that she had an understudy in the kitchen. Miss Smith had two comfortable rooms, and the remainder of her furniture had gone to swell the plenishing of the rest of the house, so that No. 40 was certainly the best-appointed household in Lempriere Street. Louise had attempted to take up some definite work about the house; but whatever she undertook had to be done over again, and she presently ceased—save in Miss Smith's presence, of whom she stood in genuine fear—to make any pretence at helping Averil.

There was one room on the third storey that Mrs. Vernon had insisted on preparing for occupation with her own hands, and that apartment was already dignified by the name of "Gerald's room." In it somehow had collected all the most choice of the furniture and the freshest hangings, and the window had the most cheerful outlook in the house, for from it was caught a glimpse of the river and the gold cross of St. Paul's pointing its solemn way to heaven.

Averil hoped that some day Gerald might learn the lesson of that cross, and although she knew his character better even than did the mother who idolised him, yet she hoped great things from the awful lesson of his fall and its punishment. He was to be released very soon now, and, indeed, Mrs. Vernon hoped that they would all spend Christmas together; and Averil was happy in the knowledge that Hugh Darrel would meet him at the very gates of Hartborough, and bring him home to them.

When Averil went down to the kitchen in search of the tea that was to cheer her mother, she found Louise sitting there moodily by the fire, for the maid was busy upstairs.

"My dear girl," cried Averil, as she ran lightly in, "what are you doing here? I thought you had gone to see about those typewriting lessons that you thought would be so useful to you."

"No," said Louise, with a sudden flash of anger; "I am not going to work, and that horrid old cat upstairs shan't drive me to it. Do you think it is fitting for a Vernon to learn to be a typist in an office, and rub elbows with quite common people? I had far rather go to the workhouse."

The dim underground kitchen was lighted by a flaring jet of gas, and under it Averil paused, with the light glittering on the crown of her bright hair, surveying her sister gravely. Louise wore her black serge gown in a slovenly fashion, and her dark hair was ruffled and untidy; but, in spite of it all, she looked a splendidly handsome woman, even to her sister's impartial eyes, with all the southern warmth of colour and passion smouldering in her being. Her dark eyes had a sombre fire in them that half startled Averil, for it was a suggestion of the strong will and feeling only lightly buried beneath the surface.

"My dear Louise, you would have to associate with far more vulgar people in the workhouse," she said, with an attempt at lightness that disguised her real feelings. "Now help me with mother's tea, and you shall do work at home, if you like, instead of going out to earn money. There are lots of things to be done, and poor Charlotte is not very capable, after all."

Louise shrugged her shoulders, and, rising reluctantly, began to toast some bread at the gas stove.

"The fact is, Ril," she burst out at last passionately, "that I was cut out for quite a different life. I am only fit for luxury and a lady's refined existence. Now, you are so different."

Averil dropped the loaf from which she was cutting, and laughed gaily.

"I can assure you, Louise, that work comes as hardly to me as it does to you; but, at the same time, I must go out in search of some to-morrow, now that the house is furnished, or we shall soon feel the want of money. I had thought of getting a few pupils here for classes, but mother does not like the idea of it."

"No, indeed!" cried Louise. "Why, I should be driven to the kitchen every day of my life when I wanted to be alone, instead of sometimes being able to take refuge in the dining-room. I am terrified of falling over that old cat more often than I need."

Averil sighed a little, and, picking up the tray, went upstairs. She was passing Miss Smith's room when that lady's imperative voice called her from within, and, summoning Charlotte to wait upon Mrs. Vernon, she entered the old lady's room. Miss Smith was certainly more comfortable in her present home than she had been at Wyndquest. All her prettiest possessions were crowded about her, and a bright wood fire leaped upon the hearth; while the silver tea service, beautifully cleaned, was drawn up under the lamp, with a dainty little meal prepared upon it by Charlotte's willing hands. Miss Smith herself looked brighter and younger than she had done at

"'Sir Philip Lascelles . . . you have no business to be here.'"—p. 214.

Wyndquest, and, although she would not have for worlds confessed such a thing, yet the bustle of the great city was far more sympathetic to her than the sob of the sea under the cliffs.

"Sit down, child; you look like an embodied ghost," she said sharply. "Here is some tea for you; for I suppose, as usual, that you have been doing all the work, and that lazy toad, Louise, has been sitting idle. I have no patience with her."

"We are not all made the same way, dear Miss Smith," said the girl imploringly; "and Louise has had her own trouble, you know; and perhaps it went deeper than we think, but I believe she is thoroughly cut adrift from Sir Philip Lascelles now."

"I should hope so, indeed! And pray tell me when the young lady is intending to get any work to do?"

"She is going to help in the house—there is so much to do—and to-morrow I am going out to try and get some children to teach."

"Slaving your very brains away for a pittance," snorted Miss Smith, with a watchful eye upon the girl.

Throughout their intimate association during the move to London she had never known Averil falter once in her bright cheerfulness, even under the heaviest provocation, but now she fancied that she had detected a faint suggestion of weariness about her.

"That may be the case," said Averil bravely; "but that seems to me to be the only profession for which I am suited."

"It will end in this, Averil Vernon," answered Miss Smith severely, "that on your shoulders will rest the burden of the support of your whole family, Gerald included; and if your mother is under the impression that——"

She paused, for it had been on her lips to accuse Mrs. Vernon of assuming her to be a rich woman, and trying to compel her to contribute more generously to the family exchequer. But before Averil's innocent eyes she contented herself with concluding:

"Sometimes I fancy that your mother thinks you were born to be the drudge of the Vernon family."

"Only the horse that is to drag them up the hill of difficulty," cried Averil gaily. "And now listen to my plans for to-morrow's voyage of discovery."

She made so light of their difficulties that before long Miss Smith was laughing as pleasantly as though she had never prophesied evil for the Vernon family, and was being thoroughly amused over Averil's account of her battle with the milkman who had given Charlotte short measure that morning.

But Averil Vernon found that to seek employment in London with few accomplishments and no recommendation is about as easy a task as looking for a needle in a haystack, and after a whole day spent in visiting one registry office after another she turned her face sadly homewards, in a state of depression that was very foreign to her buoyant nature. She had grown tired of hearing the same answer to her question, "Crowded with applicants—no vacancy," and the ill-concealed contempt of one or two of the manageresses of those establishments on hearing that she had no certificate, and could only teach little children, hurt her sensitive nature. She was looking as she felt, thoroughly depressed, when she turned her face eastwards from Piccadilly, with a poor attempt at keeping a brave front to the world. Several passers-by turned to look at her as she walked along; for her beauty made her remarkable wherever she went, although her quiet dignity kept her from any attempt at impertinence on the part of the loungers who thronged the street at that hour. Her head, with its coronal of bright hair, held high, the disdain of her lifted chin and firm mouth, were belied by the trouble in her clear eyes.

"Averil! Good gracious, I believe it is really Averil Vernon," said a charming voice at her side, with an accent of surprise and delight, and Averil started, flushed, and looked down into the face of her old school friend, Victoria Churton.

"Vic, my dear, how you frightened me! Where did you come from? How delightful!"

The two girls stood hand in hand in the crowded thoroughfare, each for a moment oblivious of time and place; each back again for the moment at the dear old school where they had been inseparable allies from the moment that Averil, fresh from home, had crept to the bedside of the sympathetic elder girl and cried herself to sleep in Miss Churton's arms. Their paths in life had divided since those days; but the affection was there unchanged, and Averil saw it in her friend's sparkling eyes and lips that were longing to bubble over with the joy they felt at the meeting.

"Not Vic Churton now, my dear, but Mrs.

Christian—otherwise Mme. Chrétien, Court Milliner in Stracey Street, and quite the rage just now."

"My dear Vic!" cried Averil, bewildered.

"Yes, and thereby hangs a tale; and if you will come in to tea with me here at Noble's, instead of standing outside creating a furore by your lovely face, I will unfold it to you."

Averil followed her friend into the shop, where the neat waitress brought them a steaming cup of tea and some sugar cakes, and left them alone.

"And now, Vic, I am longing for your story."

Mrs. Christian was certainly a woman who looked as though the world had prospered with her. She was about five-and-twenty, vivacious, and sparklingly pretty, with dark wavy hair, a brilliant complexion, and brown eyes that were alert and full of energy. She was beautifully dressed in grey cloth trimmed with blue fox, and a black velvet hat shaded by long ostrich plumes, and every angle of her plump petite figure seemed fragrant with violets, and rustling with silken prosperity. Averil felt the difference of her own black gown and straw hat, and sipped her tea meditatively.

"Well, my dear, I married Tom Christian five years ago, and you know the saying, 'If you change your name and not your letter, you change for the worse and not for the better,' chattered Mrs. Christian; "but I must not say that, bless him! as he could not help going to South Africa and returning a permanent invalid, with an income of two hundred pounds a year and lots of honour and glory. But, of course, somebody had to work, and I conceived the bright idea of investing all my little patrimony in my shop, and in making my influential friends of some use; and here I am, clearing a thousand pounds a year, and busy as I could hope to be, and one of the most fashionable modistes in London. And now what have you been doing?"

She paused for breath, and Averil expressed her interest and sympathy; and in a few words outlined her own little tragic history, and saw the quick tears flash into the sympathetic eyes in an instant.

"My dear, I somehow guessed you were down in the world by your face," Mrs. Christian said, reaching out her pearl grey gloved hand and pressing Averil's warmly; "and now, my dear, I have an offer to make to you. Come to me; I want a smart, tall girl to help show off my things, and be manageress with me, and your lovely face would attract hosts of people. Say, is it a bargain? And will you begin to-morrow? You shall have a pound a week to start with, and as much as you like afterwards. Say, is it yes?"

"Oh, yes, yes, Victoria!" cried Averil. "Oh, what a godsend you are to me! I was almost beginning to lose heart."

"Never do that," said Victoria brightly; "and now here is my card, and come right away to me to-morrow to start work. You can do the dignity of the business, and I the—I was going to say impudence, but we will term it the partner with business principles, if you like. Now I am going to see a customer who has to be bullied into liking a new hat that I have just sent home to her, and which is quite the dernier cri."

"Good-bye, Victoria," said Averil tremulously. "If I had words to thank you, I would."

"Don't do that, my dear. You will thank me by attracting people to my shop by your lovely face. Good-bye; I should like to kiss you, but it would not be proper here."

And she was gone, leaving Averil to return home as happy as though she was walking on air. As she ran up the steps into the house she saw that a cab was just driving away from the door, and that in the hall were signs of an arrival. A new portmanteau and a man's overcoat lay on the chair, and in an instant her thoughts flashed to Gerald.

"He has come," she said to herself, and leaned against the banisters to steady herself for a moment, for she felt faint with the shock of the idea. Then, her habitual self-control coming to her rescue, she moved slowly up the stairs and opened the drawing-room door.

She was conscious that Louise, with mutinous shoulders, stood with her back to her; that Hugh Darrel was warming his hands a little awkwardly at the fire; and that her mother was sobbing bitterly, with her arms round the neck of a man whom she recognised, with a fresh feeling of shock, to be a far older, sullen-faced edition of her brother Gerald.

"My darling—my son—oh! my Gerald—my baby boy!" sobbed Mrs. Vernon, with the same agony of tone that has rung down the ages, from the moment when the pages of the Old Testament are stirred by that splendid agony that must surely bring tears to every eye—"Oh Absalom—my son—my son Absalom!"

VIII.

"There are in this loud, stunning tide of human care and crime,
With whom the melodies abide of the everlasting chime,
Who carry music in their heart, thro' dusty lane and wrangling mart, Plying their task with busier feet, because their secret tones a holy strain repeat."

"I HOPE you have got a more cheering welcome for me, Averil," was Gerald's greeting to her. "Louise only just condescends to shake hands, and mother can do nothing but weep; and when we arrived there was an old lady in here who went off with a shriek at the mere sight of me, and vanished as though I were an infectious disease."

His flippant tone covered so much tragedy in the lined face that Averil controlled her own tears with difficulty, and took his hand.

"Dear Gerald, how glad we are to see you back again," she said tremulously, and then turned to Hugh Darrel. "You must not think that we are ungrateful to you," she said gently, "because we have not thanked you for your care of him."

Hugh turned and looked down into her shining eyes, and thought once again that he had never seen a woman truer or more tender than Averil Vernon. Her beauty shone out like a star wherever she might be; and now, with the pathos of her tired face and the black lines under her eyes that told of her fatigue, she was far more dear to him, because he longed to comfort and shield her against all the world. Why was she to bear the burden of so difficult a family upon her shoulders—she whose very face suggested all that was young and happy in life?

"I want no thanks," he said brusquely. "I told you before that I owe a debt to Gerald that I shall not forget in a hurry. A child's trouble is a hundred times more overwhelming than that of a grown-up being's, for the child sees no way out of the maze, but black darkness, and there is always some way out for a man."

"Darrel lays great store on what my father did for him," Gerald said, with a faint laugh. "It has been lucky for me, for he has been very kind. He met me at—at the prison gate, and I have been staying with him for a few days to get accustomed to civilisation again."

Louise moved impatiently, and something like anger flashed into her dark face.

"Don't mention the word," she said. "Can't you try and forget that you brought us all so low?" And with a passionate gesture she turned and rushed out of the room, and Gerald looked after her curiously.

"Louise was always a little spitfire," he said; "but she and I were great pals. She will soon come round again. I say, mother, your rooms are very nice, though they are not quite like Kilraith."

Mrs. Vernon shivered a little.

"We never speak of Kilraith," she said. "We have learned to forget that we ever owned a stake in the country."

Gerald sat down at her side on the sofa, and, seeing his mother's evident sorrow, began to talk more naturally, and Hugh Darrel lingered by Averil, wishing that he could put back the hands of the clock that imperatively bade him depart.

"May I bring my mother to see you in a day or two, Miss Vernon?" he said. "She knows all about you, and is so anxious to make your acquaintance, and she is in town for a few days this week."

"We shall be delighted," said the girl, with a quick flash of sympathy. "It will be delightful for you to have Mrs. Darrel. I know what you two are to one another."

For he had confided in her all his family history—his delightful Irish mother, with her charm and her love for her sons; his father, whom poverty and circumstances had soured, and whose ambition, smothered on his own account, seemed to blaze with fiercer light where his children were concerned, ; his five brothers and sisters, whom Averil knew by name and character, and felt that some day she must know personally.

"Well, good-bye, Gerald," said Darrel at last. "I shall think of you beginning your work to-morrow, and feel sure you will like old Vavasour. He is a good chap."

"I expect he will look at me askance, as all your good fellows do," interrupted Gerald bitterly. "People who have never had any temptation are always the sternest judges."

"If you resolutely go about the world looking out for slights, you will be sure to come upon them," said Captain Darrel gravely. "My advice to you is to go straight on, looking neither to the right nor to the left."

Gerald shrugged his shoulders, and Averil broke in:

"Oh, by-the-bye, that reminds me. I, too, am going to work to-morrow, mother," and in a brilliant, amusing fashion she sketched out her meeting with Victoria Christian and its far-reaching result.

She was not, however, prepared for Mrs. Vernon's cry of dismay.

"A shop girl! Oh, Averil, you will just be a shop girl, and nothing else."

And it was Darrel who came to her help again in answer to her unspoken appeal.

"My dear Mrs. Vernon, it seems to me to be an entirely excellent idea. Why, surely you remember that our very nobility think nothing of setting up shop for themselves. So it is quite an ultra-fashionable thing to do," and after a brief enumeration of celebrated names well known to be connected closely with mercantile enterprise Mrs. Vernon gave way.

"I am sure that, for the future, I shall not be in the least surprised if one of the children takes to sweeping the roads," she said, with an air of resignation; while Hugh Darrel laughingly assured Averil that he should compel his female relations to throng the shop of Madame Chrétien from morning till night to make vast purchases.

Averil accompanied him to the door in obedience to an unspoken wish on his part, and when they were alone he turned to her quickly.

"Miss Vernon," he said, "I want you to be very patient with Gerald. He has changed, and now sees the world through a very black haze, and it will take all the love and all the gentleness of his friends to restore his mental balance. Think of the associations that have been his, day and night, and you may well wonder that he has any semblance of his old self left in him."

He did not warn her of one trouble that seemed to loom ahead, or tell her that he had found Gerald the first night after his release dead drunk in his room; for he hoped that the stimulant had only been taken to drown inevitable remorse, and he had little fear that it would occur again, for he had spoken to him very strongly on the subject. There was so much trouble in her face now that he could only bid her good-bye as cheerfully as possible, begging her to remember that he was her friend and Gerald's, and that in case of trouble he would come to them from the ends of the earth, if possible.

"I think," said Averil gravely, "that your idea of a debt to be paid is connected with a great deal of extortionate interest. Do you really mean that your gratitude to my father and Gerald has led you to all this?"

He looked into her eyes, and what she read in his own made her lower her lashes swiftly, so that he might not read the glad love-light that flashed into their violet depths.

"No," he said slowly; "it is not entirely gratitude. Some day I will tell you what it is, but not yet."

He broke off abruptly, and Averil hastened to say good-bye, and ran off upstairs again, hoping that her flushed face would cool before she met the rest of her family again. She was passing Miss Smith's door when she found herself imperatively called from within, and on entering she found the old lady in some agitation, pacing up and down the room.

"So you have got him back, after all," she said, "and a nice kettle of fish with him, no doubt. I am sorry for you all, for your brother Gerald's face is hardly one to inspire confidence."

"He will do better now, I am sure," said Averil sadly. "He has had much against him."

"Good heavens, child, and so have we all; though some learn Schopenhauer's lesson sooner than others—'Life is the finest of the fine arts; it has to be learned with lifelong patience.'"

"Gerald is very young still. He has plenty of time to learn the lesson."

"Well, well; and what did you do to-day?"

Miss Smith sank into a chair, huddling over the fire with the look of a very old and disappointed woman, and against the background of her old-fashioned furniture and the deep crimson of the wall paper she made a quaint figure in her rusty black shawl and the wonderful cobweb texture of her Limerick lace collar and cuffs. Averil gave her an outline of her afternoon, and Miss Smith listened with deep attention.

"Dear me," she said. "Victoria Churton! Why, that must be Victor Churton's daughter, and I knew him as a baby! Well, you will be happy with her, if she is like her grandmother. But what about your clothes? Are they smart enough for the position in a fashionable milliner's shop? I suppose your mother would be inclined to blame me for allowing you to go out in that sort of position, but honest work never hurt anyone's character yet."

"Why should mother blame you, Miss Smith?"

Rosanna avoided the clear transparency of Averil's eyes.

"I don't know," she said evasively; "but sometimes I think that she fancies things about me—that I am rich, for instance!"

"Oh, I don't think so, indeed. We have no reason to be anything but grateful to you," cried Averil.

"Well, well, my dear, I am tired now; but if you will come to my room in an hour's time I will give you something towards the purchase of a new frock, and you can get a ready-made one on your way to business in the morning."

And when Averil obeyed her summons she found that Miss Smith had a little envelope ready for her containing a bank-note for £5, for which she absolutely declined to be thanked.

"Good girl, to be punctual! I wanted to see you alone first, so I had you in here," cried Victoria Christian, springing up to meet Averil. She was looking very business-like, sitting in her private room surrounded by books and papers; and her gown, although it had a suggestion of frivolity about its lace fichu and trimming, was severely black. She cast a quick look at Averil as the girl took off her coat. "What a nice frock—just the thing," she said, giving a deft touch here and there to Averil's black voile gown, with its square muslin collar and cuffs. "How clever of you to get it!"

"It was a present," answered the girl, dimpling into a smile as she surveyed herself in the long glass at the end of the room, rejoicing at her first pretty gown for so long, and hardly recognising the stately, slim figure that she saw reflected as the Averil of the every-day short coat and skirt. "I got it at Digby's coming along here, and it fitted me admirably."

"That is just the beauty of you," said Victoria, triumphantly. "You are stock size, and therefore of the greatest use to me! But now, while I just go into the shop and speak to Miss Hilton, you must come and be introduced to my husband."

IX.

"Their strength is to sit still."

VICTORIA CHRISTIAN opened a door at the end of the room, and Averil found herself in the most charming snuggery imaginable. It was a room full of light and freshness and gay with flowers; and all the furniture had been chosen with an eye to lightness and colour, so that the white and gold of the paint work and the delicacy of the inlaid marqueterie chairs and tables all seemed to harmonise with one another. On an invalid couch, drawn up to the crackling wood fire, a man was lying, and all about him were the newest books and papers; while his hands were busy designing some figures upon a sheet of paper. He had the pinched, white face of an invalid, and the injury to his spine had left him powerless, save for his arms; but he looked perfectly happy, and greeted Averil with a boyish smile.

"Tom, this is Averil Vernon," said his wife brightly, and it was only Averil's quick eyes that had noted the passionate pity of Victoria's expression as she came up to her husband's sofa and laid her hand with a swift caress on his. "Now, talk to her for ten minutes, while I go and begin work for the day with Miss Hilton, and then I will come back and put her en train with the flourishing business of M. et Mdme. Chrétien."

"Isn't she wonderful?" said Captain Christian as his wife flashed out of sight like a brilliant bird. "Here am I, tied like a log for life to this sofa, and she—God bless her!—having to do all the work, and with such a willing heart, too. And, what is more, she has found out that I have a pretty taste in designing. Now what do you think of the Duchess of Amhurst's evening cloak? This is quite a private view."

Averil looked down at the coloured outlines on his paper, and appreciated the cleverness of the design and the braveness of the uncomplaining hero before her. It seemed to her the most pitiful thing she had ever imagined to see this man, whose frame had evidently been designed for all muscular interests, reduced to this employment. Before him on the wall hung his helmet and sword and his medals and decorations that he had won in his brief and glorious career, and here he must lie, his active work finished for evermore, waiting for death, but still patient to the end.

"I think," said Averil, with shining eyes, "that I am more than fortunate to have found such friends as you and Victoria. You are the most wonderful people in the world, I think!"

"Victoria is," said Tom proudly. "Just imagine how cleverly she has worked up her business to get an income like this, and people say how remarkably successful her work is, and all the time she has never grumbled once, or complained of the hardness of her fate in being linked to a log like me."

"But she loves you," said Averil softly; and suddenly her face flushed rose-pink like the dawn, and Tom Christian, looking at her, glanced away again as swiftly, for he knew that he had surprised some holy secret of her heart.

"Now then, Averil," cried Victoria's pretty staccato tones, breaking in upon their tête-à-tête, "come along and start work, and I will show you all the mysteries of the trade"; and, with a nod to her husband, she dragged Averil into the outer room again, where a morning's hard work put her into thorough comprehension of the work that she had undertaken, and Victoria pronounced her a quick pupil.

Business was rather slack that day, so that Madame Chrétien could spend more time with her new pupil; and Averil watched in wonder her fingers flying backwards and forwards over some deft draping of lace or some cunning arrangement of flowers that the ordinary milliner could not grapple with. She released Averil at an early hour, bidding her to return next morning, when she would have to take her place as saleswoman.

"I am so glad to have you, my dear," she said, kissing Averil affectionately, "and so proud and happy to show you my dear husband. Is he not the bravest man in the world, to lie there with never a grumble and always a smile?"

And Averil went home, refreshed in her heart by the association with the husband and wife, whose devotion and cheerfulness in adversity made them the most charming couple she had ever met. She hurried home, eager to relate her experiences to her family, and ran into the drawing-room to find her mother entertaining at tea Captain Darrel and a stout, middle-aged lady, who bore so strong a likeness to the young man that she immediately recognised his mother in her. They turned to the door as she came forward a little shyly, and Mrs. Darrel put down her cup and rose to meet her.

"I am sure you must be the Averil Vernon of whom I have heard so much of late," she said heartily, and the girl fell in love with her pleasant voice and friendly manner at once.

"Yes, and you are Mrs. Darrel, of course. You are so like your son," said the girl eagerly, her eyes passing Mrs. Darrel and lighting on the face of Hugh Darrel in the background.

"And so you have taken up this new work? I am so interested, and think you most brave," continued the elder woman, drawing her down into a seat beside her, while Hugh beamed upon them from his position at Mrs. Vernon's side. "I should like to feel that my daughter would be as brave as you under your circumstances."

And Averil soon found herself talking away like an old friend to the woman, whose smiling, good-tempered face and fine Irish eyes redeemed the untidiness of her dress and the unbecoming hardness of the black felt hat that was fastened by a tight elastic under her knot of grey hair. Mrs. Vernon contributed very little that was cheerful to the conversation, although she was pleased at the friendly attitude of the Darrels; but her conversation harped on the old familiar theme of old-time prosperity and present misfortunes, until Averil was silent from sheer distress, and their visitors rose to go.

"Good-bye, my dear," said Mrs. Darrel, with an impulsive kiss. "We are staying at Logan's Hotel in King Street, quite a quiet, inexpensive little hostelry; and you must come and dine with us one night. I long to be better acquainted with you. Will you come on Friday at seven, and we will do a concert afterwards, if you like?"

She was delighted with Averil's ready assent, and when they were out again in the street she clutched her son's arm delightedly.

"My dear Hugh, she is lovely, quite lovely! That colouring, and those eyes, and the grace of her figure in that pretty gown! My dear boy, I do congratulate you."

"You are going too fast, mother dear, as usual," laughed Hugh. "I don't suppose for an instant that she will have me—and even if—she will—there is my father."

Mrs. Darrel's radiant face fell. "Oh, Hugh, your father will be horrified. He wanted you to marry Lady Nesta Phillips."

And although Hugh Darrel said nothing,

"Averil looked down into the face of her old school friend."—p. 218.

yet he knew in his inmost heart that he would have a hard part to play with his father, whose precarious health made him even more difficult to please than he would otherwise have been; and he knew enough of Averil to be certain that she would never marry him without Mr. Darrel's consent.

Gerald had very little to say of his new work, and as he gradually settled down into the every-day life of the Vernons he became so silent and morose that no one liked to question him. From the light-hearted youth, who had never seemed to realise the responsibilities of life until too late, he had changed into a sullen, brooding man, who seemed to think that the hand of everyone must be against him. Averil began slowly to realise that the only way to help him for the present was to leave him alone, and to treat him with as little notice as possible, for he seemed to resent any special attention and to prefer to brood over his own affairs in secret. He was barely civil to his mother, whose open affection seemed to annoy him; while between Averil and himself there seemed to be a barrier fixed, which, to the girl's great distress, was impassable; and it was to Louise that he turned after a few days, with a strange sense of companionship that he had never felt before. Averil felt surprised at the sudden friendship that had sprung into existence between brother and sister, but she was thankful to feel that Gerald could have some outlet for family affections, and did her best not to feel a little sore when their tête-à-têtes stopped abruptly at her entrance.

Between the two sisters there was a hedge of reserve that had arisen out of the resentment that Louise felt at the summary dismissal of her admirer, Sir Philip Lascelles, and Averil's sensitive heart was deeply grieved by the want of sympathy, but at the same time most thankful that such a disastrous love affair had been put a stop to at the very beginning. She was far too busily employed at Victoria Christian's shop to have much time to spare for worrying herself over trifles; and when she came home in the evenings she was too thoroughly tired out to be able to do more than see that the routine of the house was going on satisfactorily, and that Miss Smith was as comfortable as the small establishment could make her. She often spent her evenings with the old lady, for Miss Smith's aversion to Louise and ill-concealed dislike to Gerald made her unwilling to spend more of her time than was absolutely necessary with the Vernons.

It was an unfortunate state of affairs altogether, and neither Louise nor Gerald did anything towards contributing to a more friendly feeling between them, in spite of Mrs. Vernon's reiterated assertion that Rosanna Smith was really a very rich old lady, and that it was to their advantage to be agreeable to her. Neither brother nor sister was very cordial to Averil on the subject of her work, which seemed to them, as well as to Mrs. Vernon, to be beneath the standard to which a lady should aspire; and therefore it was a relief to escape to Miss Smith's room and to be able to talk about her friends.

Hugh Darrel called in Lempriere Street two or three times before the eventful Friday. Once it was with the pretext of arranging for fetching her and taking her back again from the hotel; and once with a bouquet of flowers that had come up from the country, he said, that day; and the next time to inquire after Mrs. Vernon's headache; but each time there was a look in his eyes that made Averil's heart beat to see written there, since it was love for herself that she recognised in its fulness.

"I say, Gerald," said Louise one evening after Hugh Darrel had departed, "it strikes me that we shall not have Averil with us much longer. What do you think?"

"Don't know, I am sure," returned her brother, looking up from his cigar and the long drink that seemed to be indispensable to him after his work in the office. "I suppose you mean that Hugh Darrel wants to marry her?"

"Yes, of course. It is as plain as the nose upon your face; but what are we all going to do without her earnings? And the young man is as poor as a church mouse. If he were a rich suitor, it would be a different pair of shoes."

"It will simply mean that you will have to put your shoulder to the wheel, my lazy sister," scoffed Gerald, with a laugh, "for my pay will only keep me in clothes and necessaries."

"Nothing will induce me to do that," cried Louise passionately. "Rather than that, I would—I would——"

"Marry the first beggar in the street who had a crossing to sweep—eh, Louise? But Darrel is too much a man of the world to want a penniless wife, so take heart," and for the moment Louise assured herself that this might be the case.

X.

"I know not how others saw her:
To me she was wholly fair,
And the light of the heavens she came from Still lingered and gleamed in her hair."

MISS SMITH was much interested in the anticipation of Averil's visit to the Darrels. She had not been in good health since her arrival in London, and that week had kept her a prisoner to her own fireside; but she aroused herself to be enthusiastic over the girl's pleasure.

"Your black dress are you going to wear, Averil?" she said. "Dear me! that old grenadine is a little shabby, and I remember Charles Darrel, Sir Alwyn's brother, as a most particular man—indeed, everyone was surprised when he married pretty, untidy Bessie Danberry. But I have got a lace fichu that I will give you, my dear, to brighten it up, and a little diamond cross to hang on a black velvet ribbon round your neck; and then you will look nice enough to please Charles Darrel's fastidious eyes."

It was a very lovely Averil Vernon who walked into the sitting-room at Logan's Hotel on Friday night when the gong for dinner was sending its imperative summons through the corridors, and even Hugh Darrel had never seen her as dazzling as she appeared to the eyes of the three people assembled to meet her. Her gown of simple black stuff fell in severe folds about her graceful figure, and the bodice was nearly covered by a wonderful square of Limerick lace so fine that it would have passed through a ring, and knotted on her breast with a bunch of white violets. Her slim throat, white as a marble statue, was outlined by its band of velvet, from which the glittering cross was suspended; and her hair, parted in the middle of her shapely head, was the colour of a cleft chestnut touched with threads of gold. Her eyes, full of happy girlish satisfaction for once, shone like stars; and her parted lips, scarlet as two rosebuds, were wreathed in smiles.

Mrs. Darrel, big and handsome in a black silk gown, greeted her warmly, and presented her, with a strange nervousness as Averil thought, to a tall, dark, grey-haired man of middle age, whose face was severe in its settled gloom.

"Charles, this is Miss Vernon," she said; and Averil put her hand timidly into that of Hugh's father, and found it coldly touched and dropped at once.

He bore small likeness to his son; and, indeed, he looked more like a man whose life had been soured by some failure, which was the case, in that Charles Darrel considered nothing but wealth was worth living for, and had long ago determined that none of his family should follow his disastrous example, and marry for love alone.

"Come along, Miss Vernon. I never keep dinner waiting," he said, with an attempt at gaiety that was more chilling than his usual manner. "Dinner is one of the most important principles of life, and though we are certainly not treated in an astonishingly generous manner here in the matter of eatables, yet the dinner is invariably good."

Averil sat between the two men at the table, with Mrs. Darrel just beyond her, and Hugh exerted himself to make the evening a pleasant one; while his father silently devoted himself to his food, giving vent now and again to a sarcastic remark that seemed to take the edge off the girl's happiness for the moment.

"And how do you like selling hats to Mammon, Miss Vernon?" he inquired when they had reached the sweets, for which he had little relish. "I hear that no one but a Crœsus can afford to buy from your shop, and nowadays there are no wealthy ladies and gentlemen, for the money has all sunk into the next tier in the social scale."

"My dear Charles," said his wife plaintively, "is not that rather sweeping?"

Mr. Darrel stuck his eye-glass in his eye and glared round him at the assembled guests.

"Not in the least, Elizabeth, not in the least. I am quite prepared to welcome a daughter-in-law with open arms who has no quarterings, but whose yearly income is well into four figures."

His remark fell like a thunderbolt upon his neighbour, but Captain Darrel took up the challenge quietly.

"I suppose that applies to me, my dear father, since I am the only marriageable son just at present; but please don't expect me to marry a wife who can buy her hats at Mme. Chrétien's. Mother, I shall have to take you in some day, and see whether your classic features can be suited by Miss Vernon's clever fingers."

Averil hoped that the hot flush aroused by Mr. Darrel's pointed words was not visible, and she turned eagerly to Hugh and entered into the laughing argument on the subject of a new hat for Mrs. Darrel, until dinner was over and her host announced gloomily, with his eye upon his watch, that if they wanted to hear any concert at all they must start immediately.

Mrs. Darrel carried off Averil to put on her cloak, and hovered about her a little wistfully, for the wrap was a shabby, thin one, and she longed, yet did not dare to offer to lend her her fur cloak.

"My dear, I am glad to have you," she said with the reckless impulsiveness that had brought Bessie Darrel so many friends, and, alas! so many enemies. "You are just the prettiest creature I have seen this long while, and I know so much about you from my Hugh. Now, you must not mind what my husband says. He—he is not sympathetic—not pleased; but Hugh is his own master, after all."

"Oh, please, Mrs. Darrel, don't say any more," murmured Averil, blushing like a rose in great distress. "You must not imagine things; there is nothing between Captain Darrel and me."

Mrs. Darrel bent forward imploringly and kissed her on the cheek.

"Not yet, my dear," she said meaningly; "and I am sure that Hugh would be very angry with me if he thought that I had put my clumsy foot into the matter at all; but I feel that I really love you, and I am so anxious that you should not be depressed by my husband. He does not mean anything half so bad as his words sound, I have no doubt; but he is so fatally ambitious for his children"; and, pitying the girl's confusion, she led the way back to the sitting-room, where Hugh and his father were impatiently awaiting them.

It was very little of the concert, very little of the exquisite singing of Madame Teresina, or of the violin playing of Lorne Davies that Averil heard, for her ears were ringing with Mrs. Darrel's words to her, and the thought that Hugh must have confided his love for her to his mother made her silent with joy. For she loved him. She had known that, confessing it to her lonely heart, for a long time. He had won her first love by his unselfishness and kindness of heart, as much as by the charm of his personality; and with Averil love once given was impossible to recall. He sat at her side now, silent as herself; while Mr. and Mrs. Darrel chatted about the people in the hall, the wonderful jewels among the audience, and the performers whose voices were not beyond criticism to the elder man's fastidious ear. Hugh Darrel, with folded arms, sat with his eyes upon the platform, his mind wrapped up in the silent girl at his side, his thoughts busy with the moment that was still to come when he would tell her that he loved her, and ask her to be true to him till he had won his father's consent to their marriage. If he could not have her, he would never ask another woman to be his wife; but he felt sure that patient affection would conquer in the end, and that God would bless a marriage that had most surely been made in heaven. He stole a glance now at her downcast face, serious and troubled, and yet at the same time unutterably dear to him, from the waving hair round her tiny ears to the little foot that peeped out from under the frill of her gown. Her perfect profile, and the shadow of her lashes upon her creamy cheek, hid the wonder of her eyes from him; but he wondered whether he should find them homes of love, ready to flash with confessed joy at his words. How he longed to shelter her by his love from every rough wind that blew, and to teach her—the girl who spent her life in caring for others—how sweet it was to be looked after and shielded from every trouble by a strong man's affection! He had her alone with him for almost the first time now—away from her clamorous family—and he was resolved to make the most of the opportunity, so that when Mr. Darrel at an early hour in the evening suggested that he was bored with the music, and that they should all return to the hotel, his son made no demur.

He helped his father and mother into a hansom, and before anything could be said, announced swiftly that Averil was tired, and that he should take her home. One glance Mr. Darrel threw round the corner of the cab before he let down the glass with a crash, and that was so full of threatening anger that Hugh was at no loss to realise what was passing in his father's mind He thought it best to ignore the fact that neither father nor mother had bade good-night to Averil, but his mother's comical glance of half dismay and half delight spurred him on to action. He wrapped the girl's cloak tenderly about her, and in another moment they were walking briskly through the crisp frosty air back to Lempriere Street.

"I am afraid that I made arrangements for your departure rather peremptorily," he said after a moment's silence, "but it is so difficult to talk to you. I never see you alone."

"No," said Averil faintly, with a swift sense of powerlessness in every nerve. "I am quite ready to go home, thank you. I am tired."

He mastered with a great effort the words that were upon his lips, for he would not speak of love to her until she was under the shelter of her mother's roof; but when the little house was reached he took the latch-key from her, and, opening the door, drew her into the dining-room upon the first floor. Then he laid his hand suddenly and masterfully upon her cold, trembling fingers, and held them firmly.

"I want you to listen to me, darling. I want to tell you that I love you. You must have known it for a long time, although this is the first opportunity that I have had of telling you so. Averil, will you be my wife?"

Gone was the impassioned speech that he had been planning in the concert hall, and in its place would only come the few awkward, stammering words that were at the tip of his tongue, and even as he spoke them he felt how feeble she must think them.

"I cannot," said the girl faintly. "Your father would never give his consent."

"You are fencing with me," said Hugh, gravely. "Do you love me, Averil?"

"Yes."

She gave the answer out of her true honest heart simply and gravely, and he realised the value of her words.

"Then nothing but death can part you and me," he said joyfully, and before she could resist he had gathered her into his arms and had kissed her full on the lips. "Oh! my darling," he said. "My darling, what have I done to deserve your love!"

With wonderful joy she lay trembling in his arms, feeling for the first time the rapture that love brings in its train, but after a moment she drew herself away.

"Hugh," she said slowly, "you must remember that I cannot be anything to you until your father gives his consent."

"I shall get it to-night before I sleep," he cried, with the certainty of a man in love; "and even if I do not—why, sweetheart, we can wait. You will wait for me, Averil?"

"I would wait for all my life," she said simply.

"I have made up my mind to go to India," he continued; "for there a man can carve out his own fortune better than in England, and when I know that I am working for you I shall have double courage."

He turned her face up to his, and saw the tears glittering on her lashes.

"Take heart, my dear," he said; "take heart." And she tried to smile up bravely at him.

"India is a long way off," she said.

"Nowadays it is nothing—no distance," he protested; "and you could write to me every week. You would write, Averil?"

"Oh, yes, I would write. There could be no harm in that," she answered simply.

And they stood hand in hand in silent contentment, until there was a sound of movement upon the upper floor, and Averil heard her mother call querulously to her over the banisters.

"Is that you, Averil?"

"Don't wait now," she girl said brokenly. "I could not bear to talk about this to-night with anyone else."

"Good-bye, my dear one, for I may say that, since our hearts belong to one another," said Darrel, understanding her thoughts.

He kissed her passionately again and again, and when he left her he felt that all his hope and joy went with her, and like a young lover he did not leave the street until every light in No. 40 was out, and the windows shone black and dead into the night.

"Good-night, sweetheart. God help you!" he whispered, and went back to his hotel and the inevitably disagreeable interview with his irate father.

XI.

"Oh, well for us all some sweet hope lies, Deeply hidden from mortal eyes."

IT was well for Captain Darrel that he had no idea of what was passing at the back of the house in Lempriere Street, or he would hardly have parted from the girl he loved with such an easy heart. Averil went quietly upstairs, nerving herself for the interview with her mother upon the third floor. But as she passed Miss Smith's door the rustle of her skirt must have betrayed her, for it was quietly opened, and a grim face framed by a night-cap peeped out into the corridor.

"It's well for yourself that you've been enjoying your evening, Averil Vernon," said Miss Smith sarcastically. "I can see by your eyes that you've been foolish enough to listen to a man's soft sawder, and the man, of course, Hugh Darrel; but there's a peck of troubles waiting for you upstairs, my dear, and there's no one can help you to bear them. I was sorry for you when I heard him come in, but, as usual, your mother acted like a——Well, I had better say no more, perhaps; but good-night and good luck to your better fortune, you poor child."

Averil felt the colour ebb from her cheeks as the door shut firmly, and she leaned against the wall for an instant to steady herself, for suspicion pointed at once to Gerald, and she wondered faintly what he had been doing now. Her wonder was soon at rest, for on the next landing she came face to face with her mother, whose reddened eyelids and tear-stained cheeks showed that she had been crying.

"Oh, Averil, I am glad to see you back," she said, clutching her daughter's hand. "My poor dear Gerald is so ill. He came back in such a faint, miserable condition, and now he has fallen into a sleep that does not look at all healthy; and Louise is no use in illness. She only shrugged her shoulders when he found it so difficult to get upstairs, and went off to bed and left me."

The indignant colour flashed back to Averil's face. She knew now in what condition Gerald had come back to his mother's house, and she felt nothing but anger for such disrespect.

"Were you alone? Was he late?" she said quickly.

"Everyone had gone to bed, and it was eleven o'clock nearly, but I was sitting up for him."

There was one thing to be thankful for then, in that the servant did not know of his degradation; and, pushing her mother gently aside, Averil entered her brother's room. It was a pitiful, sordid sight that met her eyes, and she nerved herself to bear it unflinchingly. Gerald lay on his bed fully dressed, breathing heavily, and with all the degraded appearance of a man who has had too much to drink. The horrible atmosphere of the room, the flushed face and loose lips, all told their tale, and Averil faced her mother sternly.

"It is a terrible thing, mother. Gerald is drunk!" she said. "You must go to bed, and I will sit up with him till he wakes. I do not think we ought to leave him."

"What nonsense, Averil!" cried Mrs. Vernon in shrill excitement. "You are all against my poor boy. You always have misjudged him. Why, he told me himself that he had been faint and had had a drop of brandy to revive him." And she burst into hysterical crying that roused all the swift compassion of the girl's nature

"Say no more, mother darling. Go to bed, and I will put on my dressing-gown and sit up with him," the girl said; and her mother at last, exhausted and hysterical, allowed herself to be led away to her own room.

Averil laid away her pretty gown and her ornaments, and prepared for her lonely vigil. Her room communicated with that of Louise, and she went in to her for a moment on her way back.

"So you have seen our dear brother?" said Louise, pushing her heavy hair out of her eyes with a laugh. "And I suppose you are going to make a scene?"

"I shall make no scene, Louise."

"Leave the wretched boy alone, my dear, is my advice—and wink at him," said the mocking voice of Louise, as she turned back to her pillows again. "Every man gets overtaken occasionally."

"Louise!"

Averil's voice, stern and indignant, was the natural outcome of her passionately aroused feelings, fresh from the realisation of what a good man could be.

She sat down in Gerald's room, with her nerves quivering, her senses thrilling with anger against the criminal weakness of the man,on the bed, who had not the strength of mind to turn over a new leaf and blot out the past. She had tried to help him. Everyone had been so good to him on his new start in life. This should have been so helpful to him, and now he was going to throw it all away by his folly. She felt no pity for him, only stern condemnation of a vice she hated; and she turned her face to the window, away from the bed, so that she might not see the huddled figure whose weakness had brought him so low. It seemed to her as if she were at the end of her patience as she sat there. She forgot that God is all merciful, and can forgive seventy times seven, and she remembered only that Gerald had once more disappointed their hopes, and determined to tell him what she thought of him when he awoke.

She sat on in silence, and watched the stars fade above the maze of chimney pots, and the crescent moon swing to its setting in the far blue of the horizon. London roared itself into absolute silence for the one hour that precedes the arrival of the country waggons for the early markets, then woke again with an ever-increasing roar to the reality of life. And the motionless log on the bed stirred and opened his eyes at last. Over the house-tops Averil watched the grey dawn quiver into an opal sunrise, and turned her head swiftly to see the haggard eyes of her brother watching her in sullen silence.

"Gerald," she said, quivering with pent-up indignation. "Oh, Gerald, how could you?"

Then he spoke hoarsely and disagreeably, reading the passionate resentment in her eyes.

"What the dickens made you sit up like this, Averil? You might leave a fellow alone sometimes."

"What right have you," cried the girl, "to come back to our mother's house in that disgraceful state? Gerald, I was sorry for you before, but now I despise you. You are a coward!"

Her thrilling words roused only a dull anger within him, and he turned away his head.

"I shall do as I like. You have no business to preach to me," he said. "You can keep your interest for your own love affairs."

He was only conscious of anger against her, and of a longing to injure her in some way, in return for her attitude towards him, and he could only think of this unworthy sneer. Averil was exhausted and overwrought by her long vigil, or she might have remembered that oftentimes love will succeed where rebuke fails; and now she only laid the rug above him straight, and gave him a cup of hot, strong coffee in silence, listening to his complaints of his wretched headache with contempt.

"Now, since you are better," she said at last, "I will go and lie down a little, as I have a long day before me."

"Go!" cried Gerald bitterly. "Take your self-righteous self away. A poor weak man is no company for you."

"Oh! Gerald," she said more gently, "but you might turn your weakness into strength, and rise on the dead ashes of your old self to higher things."

But with a muttered desire that she should cease to preach to him he covered up his face, and after a moment she went away to her own room to cry herself into a short and unrefreshing sleep before the serious work of the day began.

Meanwhile, in serene unconsciousness of Averil's unhappiness, Hugh Darrel had faced his father in the sitting-room of the hotel, where Mr. Darrel had sat up with the evident intention of seeking an interview with his son. The interview had been firm on one side, and stormy on the other, and had concluded, as Hugh had feared, in a most unsatisfactory fashion.

"We shall not marry without your permission, sir. Averil would never do that; but if I do not marry her I will never take another woman for wife."

He had stood up against the wall, looking so handsome and firm in his resolute attitude that for a moment the heart of his father had gone out towards him. But only for a moment; the next, Mr. Darrel, with a frown, was walking towards the door.

"And my permission you shall never have. You of all men, a pauper yourself, shall never marry a pauper. When that girl who was here to-night is pronounced heiress to at least seven hundred a year, I will give you both my blessing; otherwise, if you marry her, I will cut your name out of the family Bible."

Hugh Darrel bowed with wonderful self-control. "We shall hope to win your consent," he said. "We have my mother's sympathy, at least."

"Your mother always was a romantic fool," said Mr. Darrel savagely, as he went out and shut the door behind him, leaving his son with a heavy heart at his failure to enlist his sympathy.

"My dear Averil, you look like a wretched ghost," cried Victoria Christian, with a little shriek, as the girl entered her room the next morning. "What have you been doing to yourself?"

Averil gave a quick glance at herself in the glass. It was hardly the happy face of a woman who has won a man's true love, for she was very white, and the black circles under her eyes told of her night of watching. But she was too loyal to explain her trouble, even to her friend.

"My brother was ill in the night," she said quietly, "and I sat up a little with him—that is all, and I shall be all right when I have had some work to do."

Victoria saw that she was in no mood to be questioned, and began to talk on some indifferent subjects, guessing as she did that life was not always easy for Averil in Lempriere Street. But when she had given her last direction for the day she caught the girl round the waist, and put her mischievous face very close to hers.

"Averil, dearie, I saw you last night at the Queen's Hall, and what a good-looking young man! What is his name?"

Averil's delicious blush enlightened her.

"Oh, Hugh Darrel, is it? And where is your ring, for I am sure he is deeply in love with you." And in an instant Averil's head was down upon her shoulder, and the girl was making her first confidence to her friend, and forgetting for the moment her trouble of the night before.

"Well, well, true love never does run quite smoothly, and the old father will give in in the end; and then, if you are half as happy as Tom and I, you may consider yourself a lucky woman!" cried Victoria, turning away to hide her quick tears of joy, and at the same moment the electric bell summoned Averil to the shop, and she hurried quickly out.

The show-room at Madame Chrétien's was brilliant that morning with a fresh assortment of Paris millinery and Oriental embroideries that had just been unpacked, and the December sun was shining through the windows till the whole place seemed to be glittering with gold and silver and brilliant flowers. In the middle of the Persian carpet of scarlet and blue two people were standing, examining a length of material that seemed to have all the jewels of the gorgeous East glittering in its folds. They turned as Averil entered, and for an instant her heart stood still, for she recognised Lady Darrel and Sir Philip Lascelles. Lady Darrel put up her long silver eye-glasses as though the graceful black figure moving towards them through the long room was an interesting study in natural history, and stared silently until Averil was close at her side.

"Good gracious! it is really you, Miss Vernon," she said with her accustomed insolence of manner. "I could hardly believe my eyes."

Averil made the faintest gesture of recognition, and stood silently determined to be nothing more than the ordinary saleswoman.

"What may I show you this morning?" she said. "Yes; it is I myself, Lady Darrel."

She was conscious of Sir Philip's curious glance at her; but she cast no look at him, only devoting herself to showing Lady Darrel all the newest modes in millinery, and listening to her languid comments on the price and style with resolute silence.

"I was told to come here, Miss Vernon, by so many people that really I expected to find something far better than this collection," she said at last, insolently. "However, as I have troubled you so far, I will take the straw hat with the grapes. How much? Four guineas! Good heavens! anyone must be made of money to come here. Send it to the Métropole, please. Now, Philip, are you ready?"

Her voice was a little sharp, for Sir Philip was engaged in conversation with one of the pretty girls behind the counter; but Averil was too deeply wrapped up in her own thoughts to notice that he extracted some information from Miss Price that he considered worth transferring to his note-book. He then bought an exquisite fan of frosted silver and grey gauze, for which he paid in what was evidently a Bank of England note, and when Dolly Price tendered the change he refused it with a laugh and a glance of admiration that the foolish girl seemed to think quite irresistible.

All this the sharp eyes of Lady Darrel noted; but Averil was too deeply absorbed in the one question that had risen to her lips, and that presently found hesitating utterance.

"Lady Darrel, how are the children, Molly and Nigel?"

She could not help the question. Even her dignity was not proof against it, but the affection in her lovely, pathetic eyes steeled Lady Darrel's heart against her.

"Oh, perfectly well, thanks," she returned lightly, "and admirably happy with their nice new governess. Children are very fickle beings, you know, Miss Vernon, and I fear they have quite forgotten you."

Averil felt her eyes swim with tears, and she turned her head away quickly, hoping that those malicious eyes would not notice her discomfiture. She was so glad that the children were happy, but that they had forgotten her entirely she hoped was not true; and when she looked up again Lady Darrel and her cousin were gone, and the shop seemed to be the lighter for their absence.

She did not like to ask Miss Price what Sir Philip had been saying to her, and she never suspected that it was her own address in London that he had triumphantly secured at the cost of a purchase for which he had no use

XII.

"Life needs perpetual patience."

WHEN Averil reached home that evening, tired after her long and agitating day, she found Hugh Darrel sitting in the drawing-room with her mother, and he rose to greet her with a smile.

"My dear Averil," cried Mrs. Vernon. "I am sure I am delighted to hear this dear fellow's news So nice to have an engagement at last in our family, and in the army too—so suitable. I must kiss you, my dear child, and Hugh too. Of course, his father—stupid man—will relent before long, and we can have quite a nice, smart wedding; and I am sure Miss Smith will give you your trousseau, for you are such a favourite with her. And now, my dear, I shall leave you alone to talk, while I go to tell Gerald and Louise this delightful news."

And, still talking, Mrs. Vernon went out of the room, delighted at the mere idea of a love affair in the family, and completely ignoring the one disastrous fact of the utter disapproval of Mr. Darrel, and Hugh took Averil's hand in his own strong grasp.

"Darling, it has seemed quite an age since last night," he said tenderly; "and now my little girl looks so tired and ill—what is it?" And Averil confided to him Gerald's downfall, and listened to his indignant words with a feeling of consolation that she had not known before.

"I will speak to him before I go. It is a disgrace," said Darrel sternly. "He shall promise me to sign the pledge, for otherwise I could never be happy at the thought of what might be happening here. I will tell him what I think of his conduct, and put him on his honour to retrieve his false step. And this, too, when you have all done so much for him, and suffered so terribly!"

Averil felt with relief that now the matter was out of her hands, and under stronger influence than her own, and she could turn to their own affairs with a lighter heart than she had known all day.

It was no news to her that Mr. Darrel would not sanction their engagement; but though it saddened her to realise that Hugh was to start for India in a week's time, yet she knew that his plans were all for the best, and that each succeeding month would bring them nearer to one another and make his own chances of fortune more sure. She could promise him to wait in love and faith, and she also promised to write to him by every mail; and when he left her a little turquoise hoop shone upon her finger that he had placed there as a sign that nothing could ever come between their two hearts for evermore. Then, with a tender farewell, he went downstairs to seek an interview with Gerald, which must have been a stormy one, since the traces of it were still on Gerald's lowering brow when he joined his family an hour later.

"It seems very strange to me," said Miss Smith sarcastically to Averil, as they sat by the fire in her sitting-room one night, "that you are the only person who works in this house."

"But Gerald is hard at work all day, and Louise has so much to do in the house," returned the girl, with sudden anxiety.

"Then why were they having tea with a man in Clarkson's restaurant in Piccadilly yesterday? I saw them through the window, and that is how I got my cold, for it was no day for a dog to be out."

Averil laid down her work. "What time was it that you saw them?" she faltered. "I cannot understand it."

"Four o'clock, my good girl" snorted Miss Smith; "and, if I am not mistaken, the man they were with was that good-for-nothing Lascelles fellow."

Perhaps, if Miss Smith had not been suffering from a cold and sore throat, she would not have launched her bomb-shell at Averil with such uncompromising vigour, but she felt out of patience with the whole world for the moment.

"Oh, I hope not," cried Averil, in such poignant distress that Rosanna Smith was melted at once.

"Well, really, don't take it to heart like that, Averil. After all, you are not keeper-in-chief to your family, and you must learn that Gerald and Louise have to stand alone sometimes."

"She was conscious of Sir Philip's curious glance at her."—p. 231.

But Averil had risen to her feet already. She had had so much to bear for the past week. Hugh had sailed for India, and their parting had been a bitter one; and ever since the night of Gerald's intoxication he had hardly addressed a civil word to her, and Louise had taken up the quarrel and the cudgels on his part. They had made Averil a sort of pariah in the family, and she was kept ostentatiously outside their interests, as though she was neither kith nor kin of theirs. She knew that they had amusements in which she had no share, and when she made overtures of friendship they were received with scathing contempt. It was very bitter to her in her loneliness of heart after Hugh's departure; for, although Mrs. Vernon sympathised with her, yet her words somehow grated upon Averil's sensitive nature, seeing that they had a false ring about them, and through them all ran an undercurrent of why could she not have fallen in love with a rich man who was independent of his father, as so many girls had done before her. Once she had asked Gerald the meaning of his resolute avoidance of her, but even she had shrunk back at the look in his eyes.

"Can you ask me that, Averil?" he said in a low, measured voice, full of pent-up feeling. "Who set young Darrel on me to preach like an old woman on temperance, if it was not you? A milksop like him cannot possibly know all the temptations of a man of the world. He may have been very good to me when I—when I left Hartborough; but, after all, he owed me a debt, and I prefer a man who is good company. You and he are too good for this world."

"Oh, Gerald, he is no milksop," said Averil indignantly. "I do not know what has come to you lately, you are so changed, so unkind."

"Nothing has come to me," he said, with a laugh, "only I have found new friends who will sympathise with me, and who have some sense in their heads, and don't look on me as a reprobate."

"Gerald, we do not look on you as that," she cried; but he was gone, and she was left to wonder dismally as to who those friends could be, who had evidently so evil an influence over him. But now she had discovered the truth, and with it there flashed across her the meaning of Gerald's alliance with Louise, and the cunning fashion in which Sir Philip Lascelles had wormed himself back into the family once again.

"Oh, Miss Smith," she cried, in genuine distress, "Sir Philip must have got my address at the shop the day he came there with Lady Darrel; and now he has had plenty of time to grow intimate with Gerald and Louise, and to do untold harm. I must go and ask them at once."

"My advice to you, my dear, is to leave them strictly alone," said Rosanna Smith emphatically. "They are both old enough to know their own affairs, and it strikes me that you will do no more good with that brother of yours now that he has taken to intemperate habits."

"I will not give him up," cried Averil passionately. "If I was not a wretched weak woman, I should be able to help him, and now I shall make at least one effort to win him back."

Miss Smith shook her head, and sat rocking herself backwards and forwards over the fire when Averil left her. She knew far more of the habits of the family than Averil did, who was away all day; and she could have told of Gerald's late hours in the mornings, and of the mysterious expeditions taken by Louise in the afternoon, from which she returned with a heightened colour and brilliant happy eyes, adorned so often by some new piece of jewellery or some fashionable article of dress that was put hastily away before her sister's return. The affairs of the Vernon family were not going as straight as they might, and Miss Smith was honestly sorry for the girl on whose young shoulders the burden of life fell so heavily. Her engagement, too, had not been a period of unalloyed joy, for Mr. Darrel was implacably set against his son's marriage with a portionless girl, and would have taken any means in his power to prevent any open engagement between them, and the small share of sympathetic congratulations that she had received touched the old lady with a sense of trouble. But she was obstinate enough to be convinced that the furnace of affliction is very good for every man and woman, and although she often sat by herself thinking over the difficulties of the girl she loved, yet she was determined not to put out a hand to help them until the time had elapsed that she had appointed in her own mind.

XIII.

"There is a moment in a man's life when the choice comes between good and evil, and if his heart is hardened it is the devil's opportunity."

WHEN Averil reached the dining-room, where Gerald sat and smoked every night, she heard the sound of laughing voices inside, which died away as she opened the door and entered the room. Gerald, with his cigar and his glass of brandy and water, was sitting over the fire, and Louise, on a low stool at his feet, was holding up something for him to admire that looked to Averil like a jewelled ring as it caught the light and flashed brilliantly.

"What on earth has given us the pleasure of a visit from you?" cried Louise lightly, springing to her feet and facing her sister.

And Averil, looking at her, thought that she had never imagined how beautiful Louise could be. There was something coquettish about the deep red gown she was wearing, low at the throat, with a lace fichu crossed over her full figure and fastened at the waist by a glittering clasp. And surely her dark hair was arranged in some new fashion that lent fresh beauty to her brilliant face with its dark eyes and glowing colour. Averil had not noticed before how completely her sister seemed to have emerged from the untidy school-girl into a living, palpitating woman, whose face was glowing with some fresh, absorbing interest as to which Averil dared not inquire. By the side of her young sister she looked a very pale lily indeed, for her own delicate colouring was always eclipsed by the Spanish beauty of the younger girl.

Gerald turned round to look at her with a touch of uneasy insolence, for there was something about her quiet, resolute manner that he suspected concealed some strong purpose.

"Louise," she said, standing there straight and tall, "Louise, it cannot be true that you and Gerald are friendly with Sir Philip Lascelles? That, indeed, you have been to tea with him in a restaurant? Oh, Louise, you promised me that you would give him up."

Her gentle, thrilling voice was so full of sorrow that Louise paused.

"Who told you this cock-and-bull story?" interrupted Gerald. "The Smith woman, I suppose? I thought I saw her buying cakes in the outer shop—meddlesome old creature!"

"Then it is true?"

There was no anger in Averil's face, only quiet, stricken grief; for she read in their faces that in the fortnight that had elapsed since she saw Sir Philip he had made great strides in his acquaintance with them.

"We are old enough to choose our own friends."

Louise had found her voice again, and was facing Averil defiantly.

"And he is very good to Gerald. We are both very dull without any friends of our own, and since he came into our lives again we have had some amusement."

"Oh, Louise, but why did you do it all so secretly? If he had wanted to be friends with Gerald, he could have come here to see him."

"Yes, and brought down your wrath upon all our heads," said Gerald contemptuously. "Look here, Averil, I am quite old enough to take care of my sister; and she has told me a lot about her friendship with Sir Philip and the high-handed way you put an end to it. It would be a jolly good thing for the family if she married him."

"Sir Philip Lascelles would not take a wife from here," said Averil, with a sob in her voice. "He would flirt with her and break her heart, but that is all."

"You think no one can have a lover but yourself," cried Gerald, growing bolder as the contents of his glass diminished; "and I can tell you Sir Philip is a jolly sight more amusing companion than Hugh Darrel, and far freer with his money."

"Then how can you manage to leave your work in the afternoon, and have tea in Piccadilly?" cried Averil, with a sudden pang at her heart as a new thought flashed into it.

"My work? My good girl, I left Mr. Vavasour a week ago," said Gerald carelessly. "I am going to be agent to Sir Philip Lascelles at the new property he has bought in Essex."

His assumption of mighty dignity brought the blood rushing into Averil's face.

"Gerald," she cried, "then you are earning nothing, doing nothing! God help us all! Do you not see what a worthless life yours is without definite employment?"

"I was not going to stay with old Vavasour," muttered Gerald sullenly. "He took exception to my habits, and was ruder than one gentleman should be to another."

"Your habits!"

Averil could not keep back the ringing scorn of her voice. "Gerald, surely he never saw you as I saw you that night?"

"And what if he did? All men are not plaster saints like Darrel."

"Then remember this, Gerald and Louise," said Averil, reading nothing in the two faces but unconcealed triumph and unkindness, "I shall tell our mother everything, and then, if that is no use, why, I shall——"

"Tell away!" The scornful red lips of Louise parted in a little laugh. "Mother is quite pleased about Sir Philip; she thinks I am a clever girl"

Averil looked at her sister, and read determination in her face.

"If you ever were to marry him, you would be sorry for it every day of your life, Louise. There can be nothing so terrible as life-long association with a man whose standard is a low one, and whose nature is unscrupulous."

"That is enough," said Gerald threateningly. "You had better say no more, Averil, and abuse our friend, or else I may do you a bad turn one of these days."

"That would be impossible," said Averil confidently. "You could not hurt me, Gerald, I am secure in a good man's love."

She flushed hotly at the sudden laugh that arose at her expense, and, seeing that she could do no good by further argument, she hastened from the room, restraining her tears with difficulty. Her interview with her mother was also unsatisfactory, for Mrs. Vernon acknowledged complacently that she knew all about Louise's friendship with Sir Philip, and thought it an excellent thing, which would lead to a brilliant marriage; and as to Gerald, no sane person could expect him to slave for a pittance when he could get congenial work at double the salary under Sir Philip Lascelles.

"But if Louise were to marry him she would not be happy, mother."

"My good Averil," returned Mrs. Vernon petulantly, "there is only one thing that matters in the world, and that is money, and she would have plenty of that."

And, seeing that expostulation was absolutely useless, Averil went to her lonely room and cried herself to sleep. She wondered whether it was her fault that her world looked so dark, and whether she had failed through her own weakness to win the confidence of her brother and sister. How she longed for Hugh's stronger mind to lean on and to advise her, now that the outlook seemed so despairing; and at the very thought of him she lifted the little turquoise ring to her lips in the darkness, and smiled even in the midst of her trouble.

The next day Gerald Vernon made no pretence of going to work, for now that Averil knew everything any attempt at disguise was absurd. But when he lounged down to breakfast somewhere about mid-day he found that both his mother and Louise had gone out shopping, and, according to the little maid of all work, there was a lady waiting for their return in the drawing-room.

"Who is it, Charlotte?" he said lazily, as he began to attack his fried bacon.

"A lady with a title, sir," she answered "This is her card." And she handed him a square of pasteboard on which he read the words, "Lady Darrel, Westhayes."

"Who did she ask for?" he said, with sudden curiosity, laying down his knife and fork; for he had heard the whole story of Averil's dismissal from Westhayes from Louise, and he did not think that Lady Darrel could have come to see them under the guise of friendship.

"She asked for any of the family, sir—the missus or Miss Louise."

"Then I will go to her," said Gerald, struck by a sudden thought, and, leaving his half-eaten breakfast, he pulled himself together and went up to the drawing-room.

Lady Darrel was sitting on the sofa, and at his first glance at her in the shaded light he thought that she was the most beautiful woman he had ever seen. Her brilliant gold hair, frosty blue eyes, and finely moulded figure seemed to him the beau-ideal of what a woman should be, and as his eyes travelled to her rich sable cloak and her gown of pretty coloured cloth trimmed with the same fur his admiration increased. Lady Darrel herself was amazed at the unexpected entrance of a young man whose face did not suggest to her everything that was creditable and desirable; but, as she suddenly remembered the convict brother, the thought flashed into her mind that here was material ready to her hand of a sort that could be easily moulded to her wishes, and that probably this interview might lead to far more satisfactory results than the one she had sought between either of the two ladies of the family. So she flashed a gracious smile at him, gauging his character from his weak mouth and his shifty eyes, and he sat down opposite to her, wondering whether any perfume could be more delicious than the heavy scent of heliotrope that seemed to pervade every part of her gown.

"You are Mr. Vernon, of course?" said Lady Darrel, with her most fascinating manner. "And I really am delighted to see you, instead of your mother or sister, for it is always so much easier to deal with a man. Your sex is so much more sensible, so much more broad-minded."

"Ah, yes," said Gerald, drawing himself up with a sudden sense of dignity.

"The fact is, my dear Mr. Vernon, I come on rather a painful errand," pursued Lady Darrel, pulling out the lace of her Honiton handkerchief, but with her clever eyes now and again on the weak face opposite to her. "It is better, perhaps, to go to the point at once, as you are a sensible male being; but the fact is, I come from Hugh Darrel's father—in fact, I may say from the whole family—to entreat your sister to be sensible about this ridiculous love affair and to give Hugh up. She has no money, and he is desperately poor; and, of course, he is next heir to the title after his father, and therefore must marry money."

Her quick eyes took in the changing light on Gerald's face, his shabby clothes, the well-worn furniture of the room, and the general appearance of poverty that pervaded the house.

"He could be of no use to you as a brother-in-law," she added quickly. "Now with her—her looks she might do so much better for herself than marry Hugh."

"Of course," said Gerald. "But girls are such fools, and if she marries now she would neither help us nor improve her own position," he added with the wisdom of a man who is enunciating a fresh opinion.

"I see that you are sensible, and, after all, a girl so soon gets over any trouble of that sort, and I am sure your sister would not feel it long," cried Lady Darrel enthusiastically. "And if she would give him up the family would make it worth her while; in fact, make her any present in reason, or, indeed"—she spoke more slowly—"give anyone a handsome present who would break off—the affair between them."

Gerald's slow brain took in the meaning of her words, and he looked at her with a sudden cunning in his bloodshot eyes.

"I understand. And the money would benefit the family—Averil, I mean—far more than the penniless husband."

There was no trace of confusion in her manner as she nodded at him. No one could ever know that she had come there that day entirely on her own initiative, and that Mr. Darrel would have been horrified at the thought of any such conspiracy. But to her it was impossible to imagine even a remote chance of Averil reigning at Westhayes in her stead, and she had all the unscrupulous desires of a woman who has never learned to control her own base passions.

"You understand. When it is broken off definitely a handsome cheque would come into the hands of—of——"

"Of G. Vernon, Esq., 40, Lempriere Street," said Gerald eagerly. "Oh, I understand."

"Then there is no reason to say any more; but, if you earn the undying gratitude of the Darrel family, I suppose I may depend on your silence?" said Lady Darrel, rising.

"Most certainly," returned Gerald emphatically, as he opened the door for her and bowed her out.

"A thumping cheque for fifty pounds would be the greatest help to me just now," he said to himself meditatively, as he returned to finish his breakfast. "I do not believe that Averil would ever be happy with that preaching fellow; and, after all, she has not known him long. I know that Lascelles has no cause to love either of them, and perhaps he can put me up to a wrinkle or two."

There was no touch of compassion or of honour left in him at that moment, for truly the spirit of evil had entered into Gerald Vernon and had quenched the small spark of good that lay within his heart.

XIV.

"Slight are the strings which fate control."

WINTER slipped into spring, and there seemed to be little change in the family affairs in Lempriere Street. Averil had grown accustomed to expect no sympathy from her brother and sister, and had become so entirely thrown in upon herself that it seemed difficult to her to find any outward expression for her own troubles; and they were legion just now, for no letter had been received from Hugh Darrel since he reached India. She said nothing, bearing her own sorrow bravely; for she knew that not one member of the household, save Rosanna Smith, cared whether or no she ever saw Hugh Darrel again. Three letters she had written herself to him, each line breathing warm affection and loyalty; but since that last letter in which she had implored an explanation of his silence she had written no more.

March was upon them now, and the month, though it had been ushered in wildly, had melted in its third week into soft spring weather that brought out the buds in the park and sent a ripple of blue across the heavy sky. Averil had been so busy that she had had but little time in which to indulge her grief, for with the sunlight the demand for spring millinery increased, and Mme. Chrétien and Averil could hardly cope with the orders that poured in upon them.

It was fortunate for the Vernon family that Victoria had declared Averil's help to be so valuable to her that she was worth far more than the original salary she had received, and therefore insisted on raising it to nearly double the amount, for Gerald had brought home not one penny since the first week of his return. Averil had ceased to ask him any questions as to his doings, for she felt that the barrier between them was impossible to cross, and she did not know of the increasing number of small sums borrowed from her mother and filched from the house-keeping allowance.

The Lascelles agency was still in abeyance, but apparently a well-built castle in the air; and, as Louise never referred to the man who admired her, Averil hoped against hope that the affair had died a natural death. Her own sorrow was too deep for words; and although she could not indulge it, save in nights of weeping that left her pale and heavy-eyed, she knew that her family noticed the absence of Darrel's letters, and were not ill-pleased at his silence. She did not at first imagine that the fact of his not writing to her meant that he had forgotten her, for that idea was hard to entertain, but rather that he had been sent to some place where mails were irregular, and she hoped this until she could think it no longer. If she had not been too proud to speak of her anxiety to Victoria, or even to write of it to Mrs. Darrel, the mystery might have been solved; but she bore her burden alone in proud silence, and even Rosanna Smith guessed nothing of the agony she was enduring.

The Darrels had left London immediately after the night she had dined with them, and she knew that Mrs. Darrel's silence, broken only by a Christmas card, was dictated by her husband's inflexible opposition to their engagement. Her burden of loneliness and despair grew with the dying winter, and, if her friends had not seen her every day, they must have noticed how thin she was growing, and that the proud carriage of her little head bore in it something of defiance as the days passed on. Mrs. Vernon was a woman so entirely influenced by everyone with whom she was in daily contact that, even before Hugh's ship touched at Ceylon, she was quite ready to use every means in her power to discourage an "entanglement," as she heard it contemptuously called by Louise and Gerald twenty times a day.

"You know, mother, when I am well married," Louise said, with a giggle, "I shall be able to look round and choose a rich husband for Averil. She is really a very pretty girl, and it seems ridiculous to think of her being wasted on a poverty-stricken soldier and losing her looks in a bad climate."

"My dear, you are always so sensible," said Mrs. Vernon. "It really is for Averil's good that her engagement should be discouraged, but the young man was very nice, I thought."

"Pooh! all young men are nice when they want to marry your daughter," Gerald retorted. "You wait till Louise has made the match of the season and lifted up the Vernon family out of the mud. Why, if Averil married Darrel, she would only be taking money out of the family, instead of helping us, and he would be tired of her directly her looks began to fade. It is entirely for her good that I say this, mother."

Mrs. Vernon sighed and yielded, for she had begun to realise that, unless money came in from somewhere, the family exchequer would be entirely emptied by Gerald's demands upon it. He had told his mother, with an air of authority, that he was to begin his agency work at Ladywood after Easter, and until then he must live somehow, and Mrs. Vernon believed him.

One morning, when March was blowing itself to a close in a whirl of east wind and brilliant sunshine, Averil came down to breakfast to find herself the last at the table and the others absorbed in various communications that had arrived for them by post. The girl bade them good-morning with her usual resolute cheerfulness, and took up her own share of the mail, over which she puzzled for a moment before tearing the flimsy wrapper. It was an obscure Indian paper, addressed to her in an entirely unknown hand, and she opened it with a sudden sinking at her heart. It was folded carefully, with the sheet containing the announcements of births, marriages, and deaths on the outside, and a great cross in blue pencil marking out the line. As she read it her face changed to ghastly whiteness, and for an instant she thought that she was on the verge of fainting; but she mastered her senses with an effort, to find that she was sitting in her place cold and still, with the paper grasped in her hand and the astonished eyes of her family fixed upon her face.

"Averil, what has happened?" cried Mrs. Vernon in great alarm.

Averil's heart was crying out in its loneliness and sorrow. "Oh, God, help me to bear it. Oh, Hugh, my love, my dear, you have broken my heart!"

But her lips moved stiffly in answer. "I want you to read—this," she said, rising to her feet; "and when you have read it, for pity's sake, say nothing to me. Never mention his name again. I—I will go to my room for a little, I think."

And she hurried away, knowing that one kindly word would break down all her self-control and make her helpless for the day.

"What does she mean?" cried Mrs. Vernon in great agitation. "Louise, you made me write that letter. Do you think the young man has—has made away with himself?"

"Nonsense!" said Louise, with a harsh little laugh. "More likely got married to someone else, I should think, for your letter showed him pretty plainly that it was much better for Averil that she should have nothing more to do with him."

"I wish I had left the affair alone," moaned Mrs. Vernon, always ready to accuse everyone but herself. "But I am sure I thought that, as he never condescended to answer the letter, I must have saved Averil from a husband who could never have made her happy."

Gerald had the paper in his hand, and there was something strange in his face that arrested his sister's attention.

"Here it is, mother," he said. "On the 22nd inst., Captain Hugh Beauchamp Darrel, the Loamshire Fusiliers, to Margaret, daughter of Colonel Bland, Sub-Commissioner for Blantan."

Mrs. Vernon heard it and burst into tears.

"Oh dear, oh dear!" she said. "He need not have got married so soon. Louise, I wish I had never written a word; and now I can never tell Averil what I did, for she would never speak to me again."

"No, for goodness sake, mother, say nothing of your share in the matter," said Louise hastily, and, shaking her head, Mrs. Vernon hurried out of the room and up to her daughter, suffering for the moment the bitterest remorse for her ill-advised letter that she had ever endured in her life.

When brother and sister were left alone, Gerald turned round and faced Louise sternly.

"Do you know anything of this, Louise?" he said in a voice that showed he was suffering from strong agitation.

Callous and dead to all sense of honour though he might have become through his fatal habit of intemperance, yet that morning he had seen Averil moved to the very depths of her being in agony, and had realised, with a shock that had sobered him, that his affection for her was not yet dead.

"What should I know?" said Louise defiantly. "How should I know anything about the contents of an Indian paper or the vagaries of a young man in love?"

"Nonsense, Louise. Had Lascelles anything to do with this?"

"I tell you," cried Louise defiantly, "that I know no more than you do. You told him, as a good joke, that you wanted to get rid of the 'canting humbug'—I believe those were your very words—out of the family; and you remember that he laughed and said he would give you a helping hand, if he could, for he had no cause to love him either. I tell you that is all I know."

"If he has done this, I shall tell him what I think of him. Why, it is a punishable offence, I should think."

"It is all very fine for you to talk," said Louise triumphantly, "but what about the four letters from Hugh Darrel that you burnt?"

Gerald turned round and faced the searching sunlight impatiently. He had changed in those three months beyond all comprehension, save to those who knew what sort of life he had led since he left Hartborough. He had aged by at least ten years, and there were lines upon his face that Louise noticed now for the first time as he faced her with something like contempt.

"You have no right to say anything," she repeated. "You wanted them separated—for what reason I don't know. I suppose because they were too good for you."

For what reason? A slow flush burned up into Gerald's face as he remembered Lady Darrel's visit—her beauty and fascination and her promise that had never been fulfilled. He had not burned Hugh's four letters, but had locked them away in his desk, and since then there had been no reason for him to act any further, for Darrel had never written another line after Mrs. Vernon's letter to him peremptorily forbidding the continuance of the engagement, and Gerald had profited nothing by the transaction There had been no cheque from Lady Darrel, no acknowledgment even of a brief note that he had sent to her. She, at least, had tacitly refused to be drawn into such a disgraceful affair, and had repudiated her own obligation, since Gerald had no witness to their interview. He had therefore profited nothing by his treachery. And although at this moment he felt almost thankful that such was the case, yet he remembered that there was a pile of debts slowly mounting upwards for him that he had no hope of discharging. At that moment he hated the very look of Louise, in all her rich beauty, sitting opposite to him, with that self-sufficient smile upon her lips; and his looks expressed his feelings.

"I cannot think what has come to you, Gerald," she said resentfully. "You were quite as keen as Philip to break off the match, and now that it has been done you look as if such a thing had been very far from your thoughts."

"But I did not mean a lie of this sort—a base fabrication," he answered passionately. "Why, to my mind, it bears the impress of falsehood in every word. What reason has Lascelles to dislike Averil?"

Louise shrugged her shoulders. She only dimly guessed at the admiration repulsed that had laid the foundation of Lascelle's dislike; but she knew enough to be aware that she had not come first in his affections, and her dignity was sore.

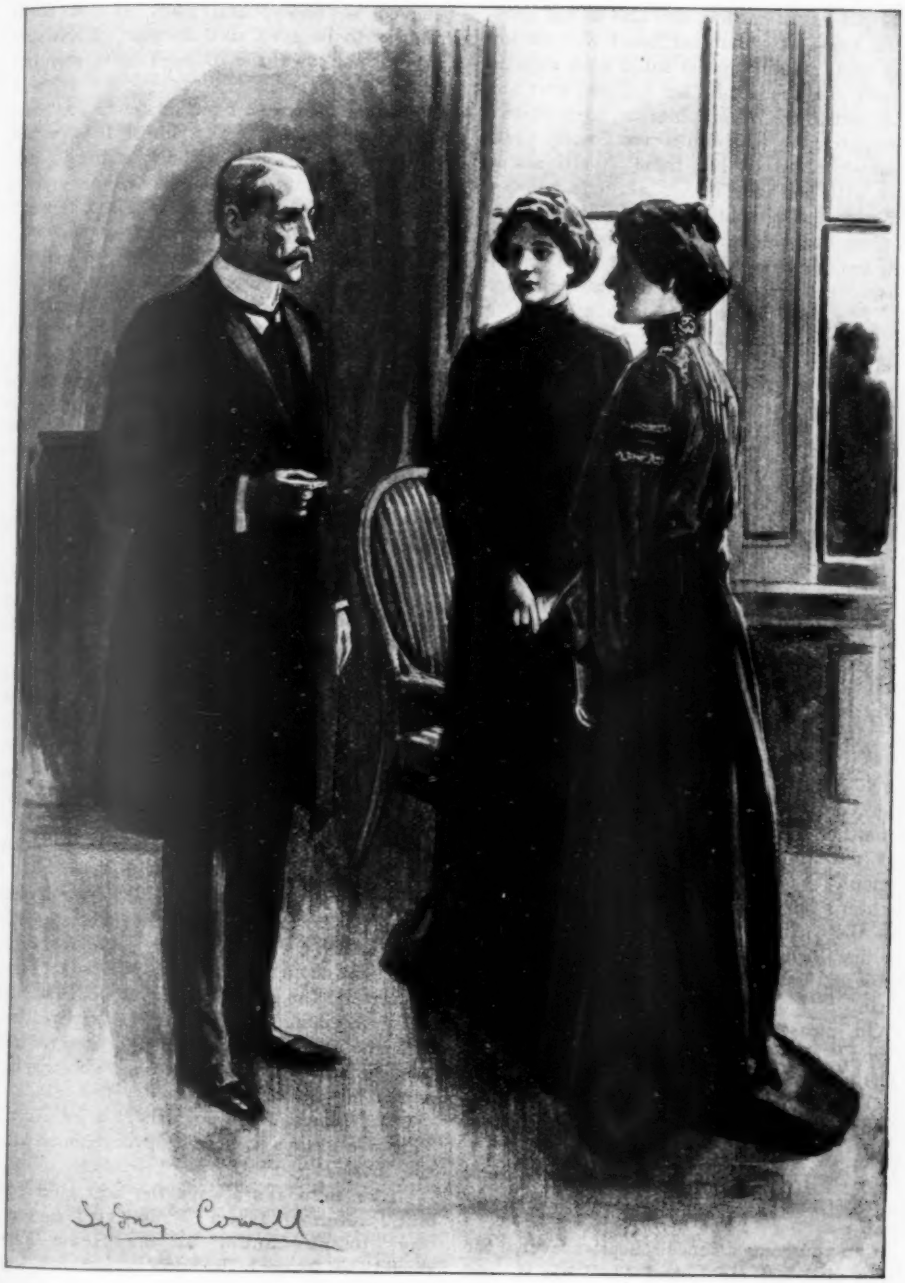
"How am I to know? He was very angry indeed because Averil wrote to him at his club after she had found out that we had met him, and, I suppose, did what she could to warn him off. He is a man who never forgives an injury or a slight."

Gerald was silent. He fancied that he could hear Averil sobbing in the room overhead, and his irresponsible, impulsive nature turned suddenly towards remorse. But, like Esau, it seemed to him that he could find no place of repentance, for he dared not tell the truth to his sister since such a tissue of lies had woven itself about the affair. He sat down dizzily and laid his head upon his hands.

"We can't go back upon it, Louise," he said at last. "We must stick to it now, I suppose."

"Gerald, you are a fool. There is no other word for you," said Louise angrily. "If you say one word, I shall let out all about your cards and billiards and the amount of money you owe to Sir Philip."

Gerald sat down, growling under his breath. Truly he was finding out now that the way of transgressors is hard, and in his heart he bitterly regretted the day when he had given way to that fatal craving for drink that had swamped every good feeling in his nature.



"You women are queer creatures," he said harshly. "I am going out, for I simply can't bear to think of it all, while you sit there and smile. I shall not be back till dinner time, but I am going to see if I can find Lascelles, and get the truth out of him somehow, and then I shall know what to do. If Hugh Darrel has really married this girl, it is all right, and Averil is well rid of him; but, if it is not true, something will have to be done."

Louise flew towards him with the sudden leap of a wild cat, and caught him by the arm.

"You are not to go to Philip, Gerald. You are not to go near him to-day. I forbid you; for, as you are now, you and he would quarrel, and that would never do."

Gerald threw her off roughly. "I shall do as I like, Louise," he said. "You and I have had some very good times with Sir Philip, but there are some things that a man must not do, and, if what I suspect is true, something must be done."

And he went out of the room, downstairs into the street. Louise stood there where he had left her, with the bright colour fading from her face. Gerald's threat was a very vague one; in fact, she hardly knew what he could do, but at any rate she had reason to believe that his suspicions were well founded, and that a friend in India was responsible for the notice of Hugh Darrel's marriage. If Gerald, in his new fit of virtue, should find this out, she would be separated from Sir Philip, and with him would go all the colour and brightness of her life, and also all the love; for she knew now that her heart was his unasked, and, making up her mind with impetuous swiftness, she put on her hat and coat and hurried out to the telegraph office, from whence she despatched a telegram to the County Club.

"'Nothing on earth shall part us but death.'"—p. 246.

Meanwhile, up in her room, Averil sat in silence with her hand in her mother's, soothed a little by the sympathy that had been withheld from her so long. Mrs. Vernon was very silent, for she knew that she had been an unacknowledged traitor to her daughter's happiness. She knew nothing of Gerald's behaviour with regard to Hugh's letters, or of Lady Darrel's visit; but the letter that she herself had written to Darrel lay heavy on her mind. But she had not the strength for confession, and looked in hopeless misery at the white face and stricken eyes of her eldest child.

"I did not know that you would take it like this, Averil," she murmured at last confusedly. "Oh, my dear, I am so sorry for you; but if he was so fickle you could not have been happy with him, and, after all, he was a wretched match for you in the way of poverty, and his people would never have allowed it."

"Don't say any more, mother," pleaded Averil passionately. "I had just given him all my heart, and all my happiness dies with him But I cannot understand it. I cannot indeed. There—there might be another Hugh Darrel."

Her voice faltered over the dear name, but her mother shook her head.

"I am afraid not—at least, in the same regiment," she said, and fell to stroking her daughter's hand again in silence.

As they sat there a hurried knock at the door heralded Charlotte's entrance, and she advanced, holding out a telegram towards Averil.

"Oh, please, miss, I am sorry, but this is for you," she said breathlessly.

The girl tore open the flimsy envelope.

"Oh, mother!" she cried. "It is from Westhayes. Nigel is very ill, and wants me. I must go to him."

Mrs. Vernon, in blank bewilderment, took the message from her hand and read it slowly aloud.

"Can you come at once? Scarlet fever. Sir Alwyn died last night, and Nigel has it, and is asking for you."

"It must be a virulent type," said Mrs. Vernon, in distress. "My dear, you ought not to go. And just when Hugh Darrel has behaved so badly, and Lady Darrel never troubled to be even civil to you. I am sure you do not owe the Darrels anything but dislike."

"Mother dear, don't forbid me to go," said the girl hurriedly. "You know I have had the fever, and am not in the least afraid, and little Nigel wants me. Don't tell me not to go, for I believe some active work like this will help me more than anything to forget."

And Mrs. Vernon gave her reluctant consent, and ended in helping her daughter to pack and in making all arrangements for communication with Victoria Christian.

But it was not until Averil was steaming westward as fast as the express could carry her that she realised what it would cost her to face Lady Darrel again.

XV.

"The Master hath need of this little child
To play in His garden above."

THE carriage that met Averil at Wyndquest station late in the afternoon was driven by the old coachman who had been in the Darrel family for a generation, and his face expressed the sorrow that had hardly had time to be realised.

"Aye, he's gone, miss," he said to Averil, who had always been a favourite in the servants' hall.

He bent down from the box to speak to her, touched by the grief in her eyes, and scornful of the footman, who was a new importation, and who was holding open the door of the brougham with the air of a man who was impressed by the occasion.

"Oh, James, I am so sorry," cried Averil. "He was always so good to everyone, so kind and lovable."

"Aye, miss, it's always the best that goes first," returned James; "and if I had my way, Joseph Cantley at the Home Farm should be hung high upon a gallows tree. Caught the infection from the milk, the doctors said—a dirty, lolloping lot of farmers as don't know a drill from a harrow are all the Cantley family, and now it seems they had the fever in the house and never said a word to no one."

"Who caught it first?" said Averil eagerly, longing for and yet dreading the answer.

"Miss Molly, and she got over it all right, though she was bad for a bit; but Sir Alwyn was mowed down by it like the poppies in the orchard. He'd been ailin' for a bit, and he would sit up of nights with Miss Molly; and when the London doctor sees him, he says as it was the worst type of the fever, and now—little Sir Nigel——"

He choked and broke off short, giving the off-chestnut horse a cut with his whip, for the child was the delight of the household.

And Averil got into the carriage, with the tears that she had been unable to shed for her own sorrows streaming down her face. It was pitiful to hear the child's new title—so sadly assumed, so soon, alas! to be laid aside again; but the girl, knowing that she must be brave, controlled herself with an effort as the great white front of Westhayes came into sight with every blind drawn blank against the pane.

"My lady will see you at once," said the housekeeper, who had come forward at the sound of wheels upon the drive. "She was very thankful to get your telegram, miss, and the poor child calls your name in his delirium so often that it makes one's heart ache to hear it. Most of the servants have gone, miss, and my lady's French maid was the first to leave when the fever took a bad form. But at such a time my lady has found, I make no doubt, that old friends are the best, after all."

Mrs. Parsons spoke with a faint sniff, for Lady Darrel had not kept up the traditions of her husband's family in preferring the old servants who had been connected for generations with the estate, and the French maid had been a case in point, for Mrs. Parsons' own niece had been deposed for her sake. But she left Averil at the end of the passage that led to Lady Darrel's boudoir, and the girl went on alone with a beating heart.

"Come in," said a voice, in answer to her knock, that she had some difficulty in recognising as belonging to the mistress of Westhayes; and when she entered the room, into which the afternoon sun was streaming, she could not keep back an exclamation of surprise. For the woman who came forward hurriedly to meet her was a new Lady Darrel, with swollen, haggard eyes, and a face from which all beauty had been swept away as a sponge blurs the outline of a crayon drawing. Her hair was knotted in an untidy mass upon her neck, and her gown was hurriedly arranged; and it seemed to Averil that she had never realised before how much of her good looks Angela Darrel owed to the art of her maid

"Thank God, you have come, Miss Vernon," she said harshly. "I did not think you would. I did not think that you were Christian enough for that."

Her eyes were so wild and tearless, her manner so bereft of its charm, that Averil could only look at her in pitiful sympathy.

"Lady Darrel, I cannot tell you what I feel for you. How could you think I would not come to you, when Nigel wanted me?"

Angela Darrel quivered at her child's name.

"He is dying. It is only a question of hours," she said in the same strained voice. "What have I done that God should punish me like this? First my husband, and then my child—the one I was so proud of—the only being in the world I passionately loved."

Averil laid her hand on the cold, twitching fingers, and held them firmly.

"It is not a punishment. Oh, Lady Darrel! But God wanted them. They are taken from the evil to come," she said, very softly.

"Pray that Nigel may be spared. I have prayed till I am weary," the other said, hoarsely.

Very simply Averil drew Angela Darrel to her knees, and laid her face in her hands silently, while the hungry eyes of the mother watched her with something of fierceness in their haggard depths.

"What have you prayed for?" she said, when Averil rose to her feet again, still silent.

"That God will do what seems best unto His all wisdom," said the girl reverently. "He knows best what is right for us all."

Lady Darrel dropped her despairing hands. "You do not know what it is to see a little child die. One that has lain on your breast, close to your heart, to go out alone into the dark unknown," she said.

"Not that, but rather to the light of heaven. And not alone, but with Christ. Oh, Lady Darrel, remember that," cried the girl passionately. "He gathers the tired lambs in His arms. He is far tenderer to the children than any earthly mother can be."

"I cannot believe like you do; I cannot. My heart seems dead. I seem even to have no feeling; and when they drew this blind down this morning, I tore it up, though I saw Alwyn die," cried the tortured woman. "I was not a good wife to him. I did not study his tastes or his interests."

Oh, saddest of sad sorrows—the useless grieving over love that might have been given to a dead heart in its lifetime! Oh, foolish souls that will not love when they may! And even Averil had no words to comfort her here.

"Now come with me, Miss Vernon," said Lady Darrel at last. "Take off your things here first."

There was something so defiant in her tired face that Averil could only look at her in wonder and in pity, and when she felt the touch of her cold hands the girl followed at once. Down the long corridor they went, that had once been redolent of roses and lilies and full of heavy Oriental perfumes, but which now was only full of the smell of carbolic and disinfectants.

Lady Darrel opened a door to the right, and Averil followed her blindly. They were standing in the middle of a room heaped with flowers, and through the light blind drawn against the window a steady ray of sunlight danced in and set the bed aflame with its solemn burden.

"I want you to see him, Averil," said the harsh voice again. "I want to tell you something that I have been making up my mind to tell you, and it will be easier here."

She turned the sheet back for a moment, so that Averil, through her tears, could see the solemn dignity of the face at rest on the pillow that had once been the hearty, bluff squire she had known so well. She knelt down and said her reverent prayer, while from the other side of the bed Lady Darrel looked at her in silence.

"He is with God," she said at last, wishing that tears would soften the eyes that were so unnaturally bright. "I ought not to cry for him, Lady Darrel, but he was so invariably kind to me."

"And I so invariably unkind," said the measured voice again; "but if I make a confession to you over my husband's dead body, I have hopes that you will forgive me, and perhaps he will, too; and I cannot let you go to Nigel without knowing what I am."

Averil tried to soothe her, for she imagined that her brain was overwrought to snapping point.

"No, I will speak, for I want you to know what a jealous woman can be, and you must know that now, after Nigel and his own father, Hugh Darrel is the heir, and I never liked him or you——"

At the name Averil put her hand to her heart to still its swift throb of pain.

"And so I went to your house before Christmas," pursued Angela Darrel, "and found your brother there; and I told him that if he found means to break off your engagement to Hugh, I would give him a large sum of money, and he wrote to me some time ago and said it had been done, but I never sent the money in return, for I was frightened."

Averil felt so overpowered for the moment that she feared she was going to faint.

"I do not understand," she said. "I had an Indian paper this morning to say that he was married to someone else."

"It is not true," said Lady Darrel harshly. "I do not believe it for a moment. He would never do that. But what can I do to show you I am sorry?"

"Telegraph to him," said Averil breathlessly, the slow colour creeping once again into her face, though she dared not allow herself to think for an instant over the treachery that had been woven about her in her own home.

"I will, and then, will you forgive me?"

For one imperceptible instant Averil faltered, but she glanced down at the silent figure between them—the man who had led such an upright life and had clung to the straight path with such unswerving loyalty, and the thought of him gave her strength.

"I have forgiven you," she said simply, and held out her hand.

She would not allow herself to think of all that the confession entailed, as she stood there with Lady Darrel's hand in hers, but she only saw the amazed wonder of the woman who had to learn what Christian forgiveness can be.

"Now come to Nigel. I am not so frightened now."

Averil never paused to think of the selfishness that dragged her into the presence of such illness without any precaution as to infection; but the nurse who met them at the door of the sick room insisted on having her own way and in not admitting Averil until she was rested and refreshed, and the girl was too stunned and bewildered to refuse.

"The child is no worse, Lady Darrel," said the nurse, in answer to the sullen question in her face, "and we cannot do with another patient on our hands just now."

Lady Darrel took the girl to her room and left her there.

"Miss Vernon, I am going to send a maid to you to look after you for a bit, and I am going to telegraph to Hugh. My message will be that he is to return at once, for there has been a terrible mistake between you and him. I shall not spare myself, you may be sure. I shall need Hugh here, too, for his father will be of no use. You know he has a most dangerous disease of the heart, which prevents him from being able to bear any agitation, and which has affected his very nature, as you know."

Averil lent a quick thought to the sour, irritable man, and wished that she had been more gentle in her estimation of him, then closed her eyes for a few moments' rest—too weary, even, for consecutive thought.

It was early in the evening when she was roused from a sound sleep by a touch upon her shoulder, and, looking up, she saw the nurse standing over her.

"I think you had better come now," she said quietly. "The child is sensible, and is asking for you."

She helped Averil into her gown, and looked sorrowfully at the slim, young figure.

"You will not be afraid?" she said. "We do not think that he will live through the night. He has wanted you so much, and the sight of his mother seems not to satisfy him."

Lady Darrel was sitting by the child's bed when Averil entered, but she made room for the girl at once.

"I am glad you have come," she said. "You will know better what to say to him."

Averil's eyes passed beyond her to the little face upon the pillow where the shadow of death rested so visibly.

"Nigel," she cried. "My little boy, I have come."

The look that swept over his face was so beautiful in its happiness that his mother, who had never won such a glance, shivered and looked away from him.

"Oh, Vernie, now you will say 'The Lord is my Shepherd,' for I cannot 'member it all," he said, with a fleeting smile; and Averil steadied her voice to comfort him with those words that have smoothed so many a dying path.

With his hand in hers he lay watching her face with his dim eyes till the sunset, red and gold, flamed in the sky outside, and the last rays of the dying day stole up the white quilt to his whiter face, and rested above it like a halo. He had to shut his eyes to the dazzling light, for the faces about him were growing dim, and he was very tired. And so it happened that when the light faded Averil gave a little cry, and the nurse, bending down, covered the tiny face with the sheet.

"He has gone," she said simply. "It was very peaceful."

Lady Darrel rose to her feet, and tottered forward a few steps, till she stood face to face with the girl to whom her child had given his last look, and for one instant Averil was afraid that her reason was leaving her. But suddenly she gave a great cry and fell upon her knees by the bed.

"My darling, my darling! God has punished me," she said, and she broke into weeping that threatened to shatter the very foundation of her being. The nurse gave a swift glance towards Averil, and lifting Lady Darrel to her feet, they helped her from the room and laid her on her own bed to weep and weep until the cold ice about her heart melted away.

XVI.

"Led by a little child."

AVERIL found that it was impossible for her to leave Westhayes for the present, since Lady Darrel did not seem to be happy away from her; and poor little pale-faced Molly, slowly convalescent from the fever, clung to her in all the newness of her grief for father and brother, as though she recognised in her her only comfort.

The new baronet came down for the funeral and for the reading of the will, and Lady Darrel received him with Averil at her side. He came in nervously, looking thin and ill, with the irritable manner that Averil remembered so well.

"I came, of course, Angela," he said; "but I could not bring my wife, and pray do not ask me to stay the night. I have taken rooms at Wyndquest. How terrible all this is! Believe me, I would help you in every way; but, with my unfortunate health, you must understand how I dread any infection."

Lady Darrel, straight and tall in her heavy mourning, stood up with her hand in Averil's.

"I understand, Charles," she said quietly. "You and Alwyn were never much to one another, I think."

"Oh, it is not that," he began uneasily; "but really, with my wretched health——"

Then he broke off, with his eyes on Averil.

"Miss Vernon," he said. "Surely it is Miss Vernon?"

Lady Darrel kept her silent by a pressure on her hand.

"Yes, it is Miss Vernon. She has helped me to realise what a good woman may be. She came to me because Nigel wanted her, though she knew that I had—separated her from Hugh, and that even you had never been kind to her; and she—was with my child—when he died."

Her voice broke in a sob, and Mr. Darrel's complaining tones took up the theme.

"I am at a loss to know what you mean, Angela, by saying that you broke off the injudicious affair between Miss Vernon and my son. Perhaps that will explain the mad letters we have had from him of late."

"I telegraphed to him yesterday to come," cried Lady Darrel. "He was always fond of Alwyn."

"He is on leave," said Sir Charles Darrel. "He was going tiger-shooting when we last heard from him."

"Then that is why there has been no answer," Averil said, with a quick sigh of relief that he noticed at once, and turned to her.

"If my family has caused you any trouble of which I am not cognisant, Miss Vernon," he said pompously, "pray allow me to tender my apologies, as the head of the family."

Lady Darrel gave a shudder, for the remark was not in the best taste, and cut her to the heart.

"Sir Charles," said Averil very gravely, "I loved your son and he loved me, and you knew it. You might have been kinder to us; but I quite understand your feelings, and I never resented them. But if it pleases God to bring Hugh and me together again, nothing on earth shall part us but death."

He bowed to her, not ill-pleased at her spirit, and in another moment was talking to his sister-in-law on various questions connected with the estate. He had never expected to find her a disconsolate widow, and it gratified his sense of personal judgment to discover that she speedily assumed her usual self-control, and conversed for the short time that he remained with her like a sensible woman of business.

"My dear Elizabeth," he said to his wife, when he reached home again, "Angela was just what I expected—a woman with no heart."

But it was only Averil who knew the agony of her self-contempt and her suffering when they were alone again.

"How can I care for what he thinks?" she cried. "I only wanted to make him think that I was heartless, and I have succeeded. I don't want anyone but you, Averil, to know what I really feel now."

That night, as they sat talking sadly enough over the fire, two cablegrams were brought in by the housekeeper, and Lady Darrel tore hers open.

"Oh, Averil, he can't come. He says, 'Have volunteered for North-West Frontier—am writing.'"

But Averil slid to the ground, rosy as the day, and hid her face in the heavy black crepe gown.

"You may—read mine," she said. "Oh, what have I done to be so happy?"

For the words on her flimsy sheet of paper were as follow:

"Thank God—write explanation—cannot understand. Courage, darling."

"Averil, the day that Nigel died I wrote a full explanation and confession to Hugh," said Lady Darrel quickly. "Tell me that I have done what I could."

"Oh, you have, you have; but if he dies out there what shall I do?" cried Averil, smitten by a new fear; and though Lady Darrel soothed her, yet that terror took up its abode in her heart and rested there like a black shadow.

Their bereavement brought Molly and her mother together in some strange fashion that could never have been otherwise accomplished; and Averil came into the child's room one afternoon to find her eagerly explaining to her mother the history of her beloved book, "Crumbs of Comfort," that lay open on her knee. Lady Darrel was trying to follow the eager flow of words; and Averil watched her face, pathetic with the new struggling light of motherhood dawning in her eyes, and saw that death had been the shock necessary to wake her heart from its sleep. It was most touching to see how patiently she tried to win the love that she had so carelessly thrown aside, and how Molly responded to her mother's touch, like the sensitive strings of a piano to the hand of a good musician. The pathos of the little figure with its fair tangle of hair over the blue dressing-gown struck Averil very forcibly as she stood contemplating the mother and child. Lady Darrel's colouring had faded, and her hair looked dull and dead; but the child, newly recovered from her illness, was pretty as a flower, with little to forcibly remind the observer of her pitiful malady.

"Mother, there is something for everybody in my book," she was saying in her shrill, childish tones; "for you and for me, and for everyone. I read you the one about the 'Hill of Difficulty,' and told you which Miss Vernon said was mine, and now we must find yours."

"I see mine, Molly. It is here on this page," and Lady Darrel bent over her daughter's shoulder. "Every sorrow is a step up the hill of difficulty. Not always as punishments do such visitations come to us, but as finger-posts to warn us on the road of life that we are pilgrims here and our goal is heaven."

"That is about father and Nigel. We ought to think of our sorrow like that," said the reverent child voice, "and it won't be so lonely when you and I come to die, mother, because they will be waiting for us. Nigel and father have both climbed their hill of difficulty."

"And if it was not for you, Molly, I could wish, too, that I had climbed it with them."

Molly looked up into the white face above her.

"All this time, mother dear, I never knew you properly," she said earnestly. "I believe you loved me always, though you had no time for me—that was all."

"Yes, that was all," said Lady Darrel softly. "I think one half of me was asleep."

"But it will always be awake now, mother, always, for ever?"

"I hope so, Molly. Oh! I hope so."

"I can't make up for Nigel, I know," pursued the child gravely; "but I can love you, mother, and you will forget about my back?"

"Oh, my darling, I never think of it. I am thankful to have you. Without you I should have been a very miserable woman indeed." And the kiss that Angela Darrel laid on her child's hair was passionate in its earnestness.

"Mother, Miss Vernon had a verse she once read to me," pursued Molly. "She and I were talking about people who didn't like to go to church and never thought about God at all, like Miss Willesden and Lady Barton; because I was saying what would they do when they were ill and had to die and go to God, when they had not really tried to believe in Him or to be His servants; and Miss Vernon said that perhaps the verse was what they would say to themselves when they came—to die."

"Tell me, darling."

Lady Darrel hid her face in Molly's curls, thankful that the child could not see the look in her eyes; for the women whose conversation and behaviour had so deeply impressed Molly had been among her most intimate friends. She thanked God that Molly herself did not seem to realise that her mother had been a leader among her careless, irreligious set, and that her regular Sunday morning attendance at the village church had counted for something after all, though it had been kept up more as a salve to her own conscience than as anything else. Molly paused for the words for a moment, and then continued reverently:

"But I have caught the contagion of a world that I never loved,
Pleased myself with approval of those that I ne'er approved,
Dreamed of pleasures that pleased not, and fame where no fame could be,
And how shall I look, do you think dear, when the angels are looking on me?"

Lady Darrel moved her face a little further into the shadow. She could not imagine Betty Willesden or Lady Barton ever being placed in a position to use those words, and yet she knew that some day the realisation of their wasted life must come upon them with the shock of an earthquake, as it had done to her in these past weeks.

Just then, to her relief, Averil came forward into the room, and she sent the child to the nursery, reading in the girl's troubled face that she had something to say to her that had better be said in private.

Ever since the day of that most wonderful telegram that had perfected her life once again, Averil's beauty had seemed to increase every day. The worn look had gone from her face, and the haunting sorrow from her eyes, to give place to a marvellous content and peace. She had not dared to trust herself to think how far her own family were responsible for her trouble. She had not allowed herself to reflect on the very painful explanation that Lady Darrel's confession made inevitable between herself and her brother. She could only reproach herself for the want of sympathy that had arisen between them, and with bountiful forgiveness vow that on her return she would be the one to turn over a new leaf and to ignore what had passed, so that together they might begin a fresh life free from misunderstandings. In her great happiness she was ready to condone their treachery, for she felt sure that there had been another and a stronger mind at work against her in the person of Sir Philip Lascelles, who prided himself on never forgiving an injury or forgetting slights.

"She bent down with a sudden passionate gesture."—p. 253.

"Well, Averil, what is it?" said Lady Darrel, and the girl pushed a letter into her hand with a troubled:

"Read this; and it will show you that I must go home at once, Lady Darrel, though I am so sorry to leave you."

"Oh, must you go? I shall be lost without you," said the other in dismay; but a glance at the letter in her hand assured her that she ought not to keep the girl against her wish.

"40, Lempriere Street.

"My Dear Averil,—If your new friends are not more to you than your family, you will come home at once, for we are all at sixes and sevens, and I really do not know which way to turn. First of all, there are Charlotte and Miss Smith down with influenza, and wanting waiting on every hour, and Victoria Christian sending to me to know when you are coming back and worrying me out of my life. Then you may think that Louise is a help to me, but she is not; and I am really alarmed about her, for she goes out a great deal, and won't tell me where she is going. And your brother Gerald goes with her most days, and there are very queer-looking men—for I can't call them gentlemen—who come to the door asking for him.

"I assure you, my dear child, that I am so worried with all this that I hardly know which way to turn. And before you come back I want you to know how very sorry I am that I ever wrote to Captain Darrel and told him that he was too poor for you to marry him, for I am afraid we brought a great deal of trouble upon you. And now that he is heir to Westhayes, of course, it is all very different, though I am sure, if you knew what hard things Miss Smith had said to me when she got to hear about it, you would be sorry for me. So now I hope soon to see you, my dear Averil; and believe me to be your affectionate mother,

"E. A. Vernon."

"It is all a little involved," said Lady Darrel, bewildered, "but what is your sister doing?"

"There lies the greatest anxiety in life just at present," uttered Averil; then growing bolder: "Oh, dear Lady Darrel, if you have any influence with Sir Philip Lascelles, use it now; for Louise seems to me to be completely under his influence, and Gerald too. And think what a mistake a marriage with him would be for my sister."

"When you told me of all this at the first I wrote to him," said Lady Darrel quickly. "I used to have some influence with him; but just before my husband's illness we quarrelled. He had treated a girl I knew very, very badly, and there seemed to be no excuse for him and no palliation of his action. He has not answered my letter. No doubt I made him angry, for I represented to him the injustice he was doing to your sister and her family by raising hopes that could never be fulfilled."

"Thank you," said Averil gratefully. "That was good of you, and perhaps now I shall be able to free Louise in some way when I get home again."

"I hope you will, Averil. I hope you will," cried the other passionately; "for the woman who marries Sir Philip Lascelles will be one whom every good woman will have a right to pity."

And, though she said no more, Averil had learned enough to make her more miserably certain of the unworthiness of the man whom she disliked and feared.

She left Westhayes early next morning, knowing that Lady Darrel was genuinely sorry to lose her; but comforted not a little by the fact that Molly had turned to her mother, and was lavishing upon her the wealth of affection stored up in her nature that had hitherto had so little outlet. And Averil's last sight of them was very comforting, as the carriage turned the last corner in the Westhayes drive; for Lady Darrel, in her heavy mourning, was standing on the white marble steps, with the brilliant sunlight upon her, and Molly clinging to her hand.

As they left the woods and pleasure grounds behind them that made up the beauty of the great estate of Westhayes, there flashed into her mind that before long, in all human probability, she would be reigning there as mistress, since the life that stood between Hugh and the title had such a precarious hold on existence. The thought filled her with dismay, for she felt that she was not fitted for a high estate; but she prayed that she might have the strength to help her husband, and that together they might keep up the tradition of the Darrels, as Sir Alwyn had always striven to do.

XUM

XVII.

"Life is a tangled thread which the finger of God unravels."

THE journey home seemed to be a longer one than usual, for each moment was fraught with gloomy anxiety; and when her cab drove up to the door in Lempriere Street she sprang out and rang the bell impatiently. The door was opened by a charwoman with a frightened face, who gave vague answers to her eager questions, and, passing her, she ran upstairs. Her mother met her on the top landing, her face swollen with crying, and with an air of utter despair about her whole figure that struck Averil with a complete sense of catastrophe.

"Oh, my dear, what has happened now?" she cried in dismay.

"You may well say that," sobbed Mrs. Vernon, throwing herself into her daughter's arms, "for I really don't know which way to turn, with Miss Smith so ill still, and last night Gerald was brought home after being run over by a cab in the City, and the doctor says that he is badly hurt, and the worst of it is that he had been—oh! Averil dear—drinking at the time; and Louise never came home all night, and just now I have had a letter from her to say that she and Sir Philip Lascelles were married yesterday, and she encloses the certificate. And I think it is so heartless of her not to be married from her own home, and to have kept it all so secret from her family till now, when she knew how I should have enjoyed a wedding."

Averil felt her heart stand still. One calamity after another seemed to be heaped upon the family, and she felt that even her brave heart quailed before these two blows of fate.

"Oh, mother!" she said faintly, "I can hardly believe it. Louise gone!"

"And her letter so heartless too, saying we can keep all her old clothes and rubbish, as she calls her treasures; for that her husband will give her everything new now that she is Lady Lascelles."

Averil put her hand to her head bewildered. Sir Philip must have married Louise out of sheer obstinate pique, in return for Lady Darrel's letter of advice, and she could only guess at the deceit and folly that had led up to such a disaster, and of the awful awakening that awaited her sister when she should realise what it was to be the wife of an unprincipled man.

"We can do nothing for Louise now," she said at last; "but there is Gerald, mother. Where is he?"

"In his room, my dear," said Mrs. Vernon, subsiding into a chair; "and now that you have come home again I shall take a rest, for really, Averil, I am half out of my mind with worry."

"Who is with him, and what is his injury?"

"Who should be with him?" returned Mrs. Vernon irritably. "The charwoman and I sat up with him all night. There's something wrong with his side, and his leg is broken; but now you have come I daresay he will be better"

Averil saw that her mother was overwrought and exhausted, and took her to her room and made her lie down on the bed, while she took off her coat and hat and prepared to go to her brother.

"You will be very kind to my poor boy?" said Mrs. Vernon suddenly. "He is in a dreadful state, and somehow you and he never got on well together of late, and he turned quite queer when I said that you were coming home to nurse him."

"Oh, mother, I will be very gentle," said Averil, with quivering lips. "I blame myself for a great deal—indeed, I do."

Gerald's pitiful silent figure, with sunken, haggard face, lay facing her on the bed as she opened the door of his room and went quietly in. His eyes were closed, and the bandage upon his head, with its stain of blood, made his appearance more ghastly. Averil went up to the bed and knelt down by him, laying one gentle hand upon his twitching fingers.

"Gerald!" she whispered. "Poor boy, I have come back to nurse you, and you will soon be well again."

He opened his eyes with a start, and, when he saw her, shrunk away and hid his face in his uninjured hand.

"You can't mean what you say," he said hoarsely. "You can't have come back to nurse me. I can't let you, Averil, till you know what I did to you. It has been on my mind for so long, and I think it drove me to drink more, so that I might not remember what I had done."

"I know all about it, Gerald," she answered simply. "Lady Darrel told me; but now that Hugh understands that I loved him always what you did does not matter. I daresay I was often hard and unkind to you, and you were angry with me."

The humble simplicity of her words broke down the barrier between them with a rush.

"You can forgive me?" he cried wonderingly. "Oh, God! I can hardly believe it. But if you can, then it makes me realise how good God can be; but I must tell you everything, Averil, for fear you should not have really understood."

His hot, fevered hand was gripping hers, and he was looking into her face with an intentness that was full of agony.

"I thought I was done for, Averil, yesterday when that cab knocked me down, and I may not get better even now; for I know what the doctor's looks meant, and what life I have been living lately. But I was with Louise and Lascelles yesterday—you know they were married, and I was the witness—and afterwards we had some champagne, and he laughed and said that, through a friend, he had put that advertisement about Darrel's marriage in the Indian papers, just 'to spite the pretty Puritan Averil.' And it seemed all to come before me—what I had done by drinking—and I got mad and drank more to drown my thoughts; for I kept back four of Hugh Darrel's letters, and—and I burnt two of yours that you left for Louise to post. You know why I did it? Because I was a villain, and because Lady Darrel offered me a large sum to break off your engagement; and we got mother to write to Hugh, because he was poor and could not help the family. And now that you know everything, Averil, you had better go away and leave me to die, for you cannot forgive me. No one could."

He turned his head away, for her answer did not come directly, for she was fighting with her tears, and he was afraid of what her next words would be.

Then she said very quietly, "Dear Gerald, I do forgive you. Will you let me be more of a sister to you in the future? I want to help you and to love you."

His weak mouth quivered, and she saw the tears rolling down his cheeks, and with a gesture of supreme compassion she leaned down and kissed him.

"Ril," he whispered, "the letters are in my desk. You will like to have them. I am sorry, old girl." And from that moment onward Averil resolutely closed the subject between them for ever, and, with the loving words of Hugh's letters fresh in her heart, freely forgave Gerald everything.

When he was asleep and lying comfortable and refreshed in his bed, with the room about him made daintily neat and clean, Averil remembered Miss Smith, and crept away to her room. She found the old lady looking gaunt and shrunken, sitting by the fire writing, wrapped in a great shawl, and looking as if her illness had aged her by many years.

"Averil Vernon! Goodness, child!" she said, laying down her pen as the girl entered. "I never thought I should be so pleased to see anyone in my life. Without you this house is unbearable, and I want to know all your news, and the truth of all these mysterious happenings of which I have caught tantalising whispers."

Averil kissed her gently and sat down at her side.

"What shall I tell you, Miss Smith?" she said a little apprehensively. "What do you want to know?"

"Just everything, my good girl—from the day that Hugh Darrel left here up to this minute. And I want the truth, mind—the unvarnished truth, or else I shall get it out of someone else."

And, without allowing herself time for reflection, Averil told her the whole history of the past three months without any reservation or undue blame to anyone concerned.

"I guessed it," said Rosanna Smith triumphantly, "and the only thing that causes me real pleasure out of all this entanglement is that Louise—the cat!—has caught herself the biggest Tartar in the shape of a husband that any woman possessed on this earth. I know the Lascelles family, my dear—I know them well. And now, Averil, I want you to post this letter to my lawyer, Mr. Snow. It ought to have been done long ago, but I was watching you—and waiting—like the suspicious old woman I am. But I want you to know now, my dear, that there will be no poverty for you in the future any more; and that you are to write and tell Hugh Darrel that you are an heiress, and that he is to come back at once to marry you, for his father will go on his knees now to entreat you to be his wife. You thought I was a poor old woman, Averil, I know; but you had no idea that you were entertaining an angel unawares."

Averil looked at Miss Smith for a moment in blank amazement, then with a swift gesture flung herself, weeping for joy, into her arms.

XVIII.

THE CHIME OF MARRIAGE BELLS.

"O, Averil, don't leave the room. I want you to hear it all. Mr. Snow, pray induce her to remain," said Rosanna Smith, with feverish eagerness.

The firelight was shining gaily upon the walls of the little sitting-room into which Averil had just entered in obedience to an imperative summons from the old lady. Ever after that night the girl connected the leaping, fitful flash of a wood fire with the scene that then met her eyes, and what she saw never passed away from her in all the years that she came to live. Rosanna Smith was seated in an arm-chair at the round table in the centre of the room, facing the lawyer—an elderly man in an immaculate dark suit, with a subdued air, as though he bore upon his shoulders the burden of the secrets of many a great family. The table was littered with papers and legal documents of every description, and Mr. Snow himself was busily writing from dictation The Sheraton bureau that stood in a recess to the left of the window was open, and Averil's amazed eyes could see the cases that contained the jewellery exposed to view as though their value had been appraised before the business of the moment began. Mr. Snow rose with a stiff little bow, and it seemed to Averil that his keen, kindly eyes took in every detail of her figure and face as she stood hesitating in the doorway.

"Pray come in, Miss Vernon," he said. "I should think that you have every right to be here, and Miss Bosanquet wishes it."

It was so strange to hear that name from the lips of the lawyer that Averil started a little, then came in quietly, and sat down with her face in the shadow away from the lamp.

"Mr. Snow's firm has done business for three generations with the Bosanquets," said Miss Smith's harsh voice in explanation. "He has no sympathy with my wish to remain incognito, and he has never used my assumed name."

"I must confess that I thought the whole affair rather romantic folly," said the lawyer quietly; "but I hope I always respected your wishes, Miss Bosanquet?"

"You were always considerate, except in one thing—that you never seemed to understand what a woman, hurt in her most tender feelings, may suffer, even after many years have elapsed," snapped Miss Bosanquet sharply.

Averil, looking at her, saw that a new, firm light seemed to have swept much of the morose bitterness from her eyes, and that a fresh spark of electric energy seemed to have awakened a new zest for life within her.

"Go on," she said again. "I am waiting; but first, between us, I want to explain to Miss Vernon exactly what we are proposing to do."

Mr. Snow cleared his throat and settled his spectacles, then cast a swift glance at the slight, girlish figure in the armchair. He had not in the least expected to find Averil Vernon the beautiful woman that she so surely was, and he told himself that he had seldom seen anyone who realised his idea of feminine charm so completely as did the girl before him. She was sitting with her hands folded on her lap, her sweet, serious eyes bent upon him, the shadow of her cloud of bright hair framing her face like an aureole. Her simple gown only served to set off her fresh beauty, and he was acute enough to read in the innocent wonder of her eyes that she had not the least idea of what awaited her.

"You men are so slow," said Miss Bosanquet impatiently. "Averil, here is the gist of the whole thing in a nutshell; and perhaps it will come better from me, because I have known you for so long, and this is Mr Snow's first introduction to you. Child, you know the whole story, for I told it you at Wyndquest just after our first troubles were at their height. You know I was to have married poor Sir Alwyn's father; but you did not know, perhaps, that I loved Anthony Darrel with an affection that has never changed, worthless scamp though he may have been.

I never turned my mind to anyone else, nor ever dreamed of marrying elsewhere; and when he died I came to Wyndquest to be near Westhayes, and to watch the Darrel family, for I am a lonely old woman, with no near relations, and it was in my mind always that my money should some day benefit the Darrel family, if they seemed to be deserving of it. You know they were not, for Sir Alwyn was a worthy soul, under his wife's thumb, and the child's character was unformed. And then, Averil, I met you; but I could not believe in you at first. I thought you were helping me for what you could get out of me, and that you had guessed I was not the poor old woman I feigned to be. It has taken me five years to know you—I am ashamed to say it—but in all that time you have not failed me, Averil; and I believe I love you as I had never thought to love a human being again; for you have made me see the beauty of goodness and the nobility of a high ideal of life."

"Oh, please, Miss Smith, say no more," cried Averil in great distress, her face burning with a hot blush. "I did nothing. I do not like to hear you talk like this."

"I shall say no more." Miss Bosanquet made an imperative gesture to the lawyer. "You can go on, Mr. Snow. I will only add this, that my resolution has been completely cemented by the fact that you are to marry Hugh Darrel, and that my money will eventually benefit the Darrels of Westhayes, as I originally intended."

She leaned back in her chair and shut her mouth with the firmness of a steel trap, and the girl in all her blushing distress had time to think how tired she looked, and to wonder whether Rosanna had ever loved Anthony Darrel as she loved Hugh. But she had to rouse herself to force her brain to understand the sentences that were falling so glibly from Mr. Snow's lips; and perhaps he saw how bewildered she was, for he paused to say emphatically:

"I hope you are attending, Miss Vernon." And she put her hand to her head with a gesture of bewilderment, and forced her mind back to the subject in hand.

She must be mad. She must surely be at least dreaming, and would awake to reality before very long, and find out that Rosanna Bosanquet was only the owner of the modest fortune that Mrs. Vernon had always prophesied she was possessed of. But at last she sat still, with pale cheeks and dilated eyes, striving to realise that it was all true, and that the stocks and shares and property that were being enumerated so glibly were not the imagination of a mind diseased.

"The whole personal estate amounts now to about half a million of money, with all the varied accumulations of so many years, and I may congratulate you, Miss Vernon, upon your fine prospects. There will, of course, be the jewels and the estates of Farnwell and Murdow besides; but Miss Bosanquet wishes you to understand that you are left in undisputed possession of everything of which she dies possessed."

He paused, and Miss Bosanquet's shriller tones took up the next words:

"And, child, you may send for Hugh Darrel to come back immediately; for till I die I shall allow you ten thousand a year, and I think that will buy you bread and butter."

Averil rose feebly to her feet, for the shock had been unexpected, and she felt that she was on the verge of tears.

"I can't thank you, Miss Bosanquet. I can't pretend to thank you; but I will try to show what I feel, and Hugh will tell you when he comes back."

She bent down with a sudden passionate gesture and kissed Rosanna's withered hand, then hurried from the room.

Miss Bosanquet sat silent for a moment, then glanced oddly at the place Averil's fresh lips had touched. A tear glistened there, brilliant as a diamond, and even as she gazed another fell beside it and lay glittering there—a tear from the depths of a heart embittered by disappointment and loneliness, and thawed at last into quick life by the touch of a loving, noble-hearted woman.

"I suppose you think I am an old fool," she said harshly to the lawyer.

"On the contrary, my dear madam," he returned, "I hardly know whom to envy the more—yourself or Captain Hugh Darrel. And now let us finish the business, for I have another engagement at six o'clock."

For the first time since her father's death Averil Vernon knew what it was to be perfectly happy during the four weeks that followed the announcement of Miss Bosanquet's intention towards her. She was fêted and made much of by her mother, to whom she seemed a very different person indeed under the desirable circumstances in which the world now viewed her.

"You really have pleased me very much," sighed Mrs. Vernon, as she sat one day with a long list of requisites before her for Averil's trousseau that was quietly in progress. There was to be no sparing of expense now, for Miss Bosanquet had given a generous cheque, and had expressed a desire that the girl should be provided for as a future Lady Darrel of Westhayes, and Mrs. Vernon was in the seventh heaven of happiness.

One blissful letter from Hugh, written in the intervals of a long march, had set every pulse in the girl's body throbbing with new life. He had received her letter and Lady Darrel's confession, he said, and he prayed God that he might some day forgive those who had come between them; but he would make the man suffer who had sent the false report of his marriage to the Indian paper, for that, he fancied, was a legal offence. Nothing could come between him and his darling now, and when the little campaign was over he should come straight home to her and marry her in spite of everyone. And, seeing that this was so, Averil kept the secret of her inheritance in her own heart, preferring to be loved for herself alone.

"I really am delighted," continued Mrs. Vernon. "Everything is going on well now. Here is Gerald on the sofa again, and really quite a different fellow, with his signing the pledge and asking Mr. Vavasour to take him back and all that, and you with the finest of lace and muslin for your trousseau and such a big order for Victoria Christian, and she not a bit annoyed about your not coming back to her. Really, Averil, I believe our luck is on the turn at last, if it wasn't that I am not quite sure about—about Louise."

Averil looked up with a clouded face from the pile of lace she was examining.

"I am quite sure about her, mother. If she was happy she would have come to see us, since she has been in London for the past fortnight; but, save for that scribbled letter the other day, she has taken no notice of us at all."

"But, dearie me, do you suppose that a Lady Lascelles can have much sympathy with Lempriere Street?" said Mrs. Vernon, with some complacency. "Really, it is quite pleasant to think that both my girls will have a handle to their names."

Averil sighed a little, for she was convinced that her sister already regretted her marriage, and after a moment or two she rose and went back to her brother's room with the sensation that silence was the only possible attitude to adopt towards Louise.

Gerald's sofa was drawn up to the window, and he was lying there with the April sunlight upon him, busily engaged in studying a legal book concerned with some abstruse problem of commercial law.

"Hulloa, Ril," he said brightly, as his sister entered. "I really think I am getting the thing well into my head; and old Vavasour was so kind yesterday that I am simply longing to please him. He and I had a grand talk, and I really think that, after all, there is a future ahead for me."

"Why, Gerald, I am sure of it," said Averil, looking down at her brother with lips that smiled a little with the new love and tenderness that was born in her towards him.

He had changed greatly in that short month; and now it seemed both to his mother and sister that the Gerald of old days had returned—the bright-natured, impulsive boy, who had been so easily swayed through his affection. But it was a Gerald made of finer, firmer stuff than in the old days; a Gerald whose limp would always remind him of the furnace through which he had passed, but whose eyes were now striving to fix themselves upon the goal of higher things that lay almost within his grasp.

Averil sat down at his side, and asked him to explain his work to her, following his words with deep interest, because under them she could read the reality of his purpose.

"And Mr. Vavasour says, Ril, that in time I shall be put into the office and learn my work thoroughly," he said, with the old boyish enthusiasm she knew so well. "And then——"

"Averil, my dear, are you there?" broke in Mrs. Vernon's voice upon the opening door. "Oh, yes, and Gerald too. Come in, Louise. Why, we were only talking about her this morning, Averil, and now here she is—my Lady Lascelles—looking so handsome and well dressed, too."

"Louise!"

Averil started to her feet, with her hand still in her brother's.

"Hulloa, Averil! And Gerald, too. All right again, I see. So sorry to hear of your smash up," said Lady Lascelles, as she rustled in with a jingle of bracelets and necklets and a shimmer of pink and silver draperies that seemed somehow too smart for the afternoon. "I have only a moment to spare, as I have to meet Phil at his club. He thinks I am shopping, but I wanted to come and see you all, so I braved his wrath."

Louise was looking her old dark, handsome self, but there was a new forced ring in her laugh and an artificial tone in her affected voice that grated on Averil.

"Dear me! how small and gloomy this room looks," she continued, when her brother and sister had greeted her quietly; "and really, Averil, I should have thought you could have afforded a new gown with all this mighty wealth of which mother has been telling me. Dear me! I suppose you will be a great swell some day, and Phil will be wild when he hears it. He hates anyone to be richer than himself, I believe, and his investments have not been doing well just lately. However, we are off to South Africa for a trip to retrench, and to leave all our creditors mourning behind us."

She laughed a little unnaturally, and Averil murmured some confused reply.

"I suppose you were all just mad when I went off and got married, but I told Philip it was either then or never, and he was frightfully in love with me. But mark my words, Averil. Make hay while your sun shines, for a man gets tired of a woman in five weeks."

She sat chatting a few moments, then rose and bade them good-bye lightly.

"I don't know when I shall see you again, I am sure," she said. "Perhaps never."

Averil followed her to the door, struck by something indefinable in her manner.

"Oh, Louise," she said, "you are not going like this? Tell me, are you happy, dear? Has your marriage been a success?"

Louise bit her lips under her spangled veil and freed herself from her sister's clinging embrace.

"My dear," she cried hardly, "is matrimony ever a success? I suppose I am as happy as most women, for Phil doesn't beat me. But, to tell the truth, Averil, his affairs are so horribly involved that I believe we shall end by having about twopence a year to live on, unless we can get clean out of the country. I may be coming to you to beg for bread before I die, only I suppose that you would not give it to me because of the way I behaved to you and Hugh; but Philip hated you so, Ril. What did you do to make him hate you so?"

Averil murmured something in distress, and Louise stood silent for a moment, with a light dawning upon her hard face.

"I suppose you would have nothing to say to him. Perhaps you were right. But I am sorry for what I did. I am not completely bad-hearted, Averil, and to prove it I brought some papers for Gerald. Here they are."

She picked up a bundle of newspapers from under her sable cloak, and, carelessly kissing her sister, she hurried away out to her carriage.

Averil stood still for a moment where Louise had left her; then went slowly back to her brother's room, and laid the papers on his knee.

"Mother, she is not happy," she said quietly. "I am troubled for her."

"Happy!" cried Mrs. Vernon indignantly. "My dear, what else could she be, with her skirts all lined with silk, and such diamonds! You always were so fanciful, Averil; and just because she talks of poverty I suppose you get alarmed. But, good gracious, child, your poor, dear father always complained about his tenants who would not pay their rent, and often told me we were on the verge of the workhouse, and many a time I have wondered who was going to bring the tea and sugar there, out of all our grand friends."

"Oh, Averil!" cried Gerald, suddenly, his voice breaking across the even monotone of his mother's remarks like a sharp note of pain.

He had the evening paper in his hand, and even as the girl turned her head he tried to shuffle it under the others. But Averil was too quick for him, and had caught the flimsy pink sheet from his hand. She steadied her nerves with an effort, for the words seemed to strike at her, aiming full at her heart:

"There was a brisk skirmish on Thursday in the Nylgharie Pass, the details of which have been delayed in transmission. There were seven casualties among the advancing force—Captain H. Darell killed."

She read no more. What did it matter to her how many other hearts were widowed and mourning, since she was bereft? She heard Gerald's quick sob, and felt her mother's arms about her, and knew in her inmost heart that she was praying for unconsciousness or for death. But the pain was too sharp for any alleviation, and presently she begged that she might go and be alone with her grief for a little—that she might creep away like a wounded thing, to hide even from the eyes of those who loved her. She knew that her weeping mother, whose tears could fall so blessedly and so easily, took her into the drawing-room and left her alone among the flowers and the sunlight, and presently she rose and drew the blind across the window to shut out the happy day. Then she returned to her seat and sat stunned and silent, with her hands folded upon her knee.

So she was not to be happy, after all! Wifehood and love were not for her, but they lay shut away for ever in the still heart in the hill country of India. She knew he had died bravely—she needed no newspaper paragraph to tell her that; but it seemed so pitiful a thing to her that the good fortune of her inheritance had come all too late for her, and that now she would far sooner be Averil Vernon the penniless than a woman who would never any more have to work for her bread.

The slow hands of the clock crept on round its face, and the dusk fell. She would have to face the long hours of the night very soon. God help her! for there would be no bright, hopeful morrow to wake up to, no daily portion of Indian letter to write, remembering whose dear eyes would read and love her words.

There was a sudden commotion in the house below. She could hear it through the closed door, and drearily wondered if Louise had come back, perhaps to condole with her. She hoped not. She shivered a little as a coal fell out of the fire with a chink, then hid her face in her hands that she might not catch even a brief sight of the photograph of Hugh Darrel on the chimney-piece, in all the bravery of his uniform. The door opened quickly and shut, and she rose half impatiently with a sense that she had perhaps been selfish in claiming these hours of lonely grief.

"I am—coming, mother," she said. "Do you want me?"

"Averil!"

Her voice died on her lips, for the voice was Hugh Darrel's. Ah! perhaps her wild sorrow had brought him back from the very verge of the grave. She could not bear the thought. Her imagination was running riot with her, perhaps, and she was going mad; but there were warm arms about her, and there were tears and kisses raining down on her cold, pale face.

"Averil! Averil! It was all a mistake. It was another Darell—poor chap. I was invalided home before that, with a stupid bullet in my side that they could not extract, and fever too. Averil, darling of my heart! Oh, what is it—have I killed her?"

For she knew the truth now with the first touch of his lips, and in the sudden revulsion of joy she had fainted in his arms.

* * * * *

"Averil, why do you keep your eyes to your needle like that? I want to see them. Don't you realise that I am a convalescent, just pronounced sound by the doctors and dismissed from the nursing home? Averil, don't you know it is June weather, and that June is the month for weddings?"

Hugh Darrel was lying on the sofa in the drawing-room in Lempriere Street, a most contented-looking invalid, although his pale cheeks still showed the severity of the operation through which he had so successfully passed. And Averil was sitting by him, with her embroidery in her hands, and the new, happy look upon her face that his kisses had left there.

"Well, sir," she said, rosily blushing, "and who wants to get married?"

"I do," he returned sturdily; "and Miss Bosanquet vowed to me this morning that she would cut us off with a shilling if we were not married before June was out, and my father wrote to ask why we were delaying the wedding only yesterday. Averil, what do you say?"

Averil dropped her eyes on to her work again.

"I—I don't want to be cut off with a shilling," she said in a demure, small voice.

And Hugh Darrel kissed the words from her lips.

UNIV. OF MICH.

GIFT HOUSE BRETHREN.

(From a Painting by W. B. Fortescue.)

A PLEASANT SATURDAY EVENING.

By Harry Davies.

IT is Saturday night. The brightly-lit windows of the hall shine out upon the squalid street with a friendly gleam of welcome. "Come in! Come in!" they seem to say. And who can wonder that their invitation is largely and eagerly accepted? For outside the damp, raw breath of a December fog is hanging over the scene, rendering dingier still the dingy courts, making slimier still the slimy pavements; while within there is a cheery glow of light and warmth that seems to pooh-pooh the drooping spirits of the evening. Outside there is naught to be seen but a drab, mean street of tenement houses, narrowing at one end into a ramshackle court, fading away at the other into a gloomy blackness of mist; while within the pink-coloured walls, tastefully decorated with texts and inscriptions, the long rows of comfortable backed benches, the roomy platform, with its piano and music stands, and its red curtains behind, all seem to hold forth mysterious promise of delights to come.

I emerge at the side door, after an inspection of the interior, and mingle with the crowd who are waiting for admission at the main entrance. Like true Cockneys, they are boisterously jolly.

"'Ello, Sararann! Where d'yer git that saucy 'at? It looks like a tea-pot turned upside dahn. Look at the spout!" pointing to a stiff, slanting erection of red velvet in front.

"Never you mind, impidence! Where d'yer git yours? You've got a coal-scuttle on, you 'ave."

"Talkin' abaht 'ats," says a third girl, looking sideways at me, with a mischievous smile, "there's a rare smell of 'igh 'ats abaht to-night."

"Garn!" puts in a boy's shrill voice to my right. "It ain't a 'igh 'at. It's the funnel of a boat in the river as you're lookin' at."

I quickly move to another side of the crowd.

"Nah, then, 'oo's feet yer treadin' on?"

I humbly apologise.

"All right, guv'nor," says a short, stumpy man beside me. "But I only got one pair o' feet, an' they've bin runnin' abaht the Borough Market nearly all dye."

I am about to reply when there is a sudden rattling of bolts, and a flood of light bursts out upon us. The crowd cheers and whistles; there is a mighty surge; a short period of swaying and tussling; and before I know what has happened I have been carried willy-nilly into the hall.

THE RUSH FOR THE DOOR.

The seats rapidly fill up. I secure one facing sideways, near the platform, so that I can look partly at the performers, partly at the audience. In an incredibly short space of time the building is filled, and a small sea of faces is swaying underneath the gas-lights. I look at those around me. They are mostly pale and toil-worn, and it is apparent that their owners are among the very poorest of London's denizens. Sitting next me is a thin, under-sized, near-sighted man, with a cravat tied loosely around his neck. His features are familiar, and after some mental probing I succeed in locating him. He is the jobbing cobbler who may be seen all day and every day, save Sundays, in the dark little window of his dark little room at the corner of the tenement buildings, his nose almost touching the boots on which he is putting "two-penny patches" or "sixpenny heels." He is always working at his hardest, yet always in poverty, for he has a drunken wife. He sits forward now, with his cap between his knees, and peers at the platform with the greatest eagerness.

At the end of the seat in front of me is a wizen-faced woman, with grey hair, a faded shawl about her shoulders, an ancient bonnet, trimmed with rusty crape, on her head. She, too, has eyes for nothing but the platform, and although she frequently makes remarks to a woman sitting next her (a cherubic-faced dame who looks fifty-five and might be thirty), she always gazes straight in front of her. I hear scraps of their conversation.

"There's picters ag'in to-night. See the sheet for 'em? They've got the lantern fixed up be'ind us. I seed it as I come in."

"Mr. B——'s a-goin' to read, too."

"No! Is 'e reely? 'E's a funny un, ain't 'e? I like to 'ear 'im read. 'E makes me laugh fit to split."

"'Ow do they make them picters move?"

"I don' know. I s'pose people stands be'ind 'em and makes all the motions. I ast my ole man, but, bless yer, 'e don' know anythink! 'E wouldn' know where 'is 'ed was if I didn' look arter 'im!"

"Consider yerself lucky to 'ave an' ole man, Mrs. Dobbs. I wish mine was livin'. I often think of the dyes when 'e used to sye to me, ses 'e, 'There's no one can myke toad in the 'ole like you, Mary.' An' I ses to 'im, ses I——"

The rest is drowned in a shrill outburst from my left.

"Oo! I seed Mr. B—— be'ind the curtain! Oo! 'E's a-comin' on the platform!"

Thereupon the speaker springs to her feet excitedly, and begins to clap her hands with such gusto that the feathers in her hat dance again. The cue is taken up by the whole audience, who greet the advent of Mr. B—— with a perfect furore of clapping, stamping, and whistling. He acknowledges the compliment with a smile and a nod, and holds up his hand for silence.

I am fortunate enough to have the friendship of this gentleman, but it is no mere partisanship that makes me say that if ever I am impelled to take my hat off to any man it is to such as he. He is cheery-voiced, cheery-faced, broad-shouldered. I have never met a breezier optimist. I have never known a kinder, warmer, more outspoken and sympathetic nature. Whether sitting by the sick bed, or fetching Bob Craggs by the coat-collar out of the public-house, he is equally at home. He is the life and soul of the mission. It is a marvel to me how, in the face of such depressing and squalid surroundings as those in which he works, he can maintain such a genial, happy outlook on the world in general. I can only put it down to his love for his Saviour, and his delight in serving Him. He is hail-fellow-well-met with every man, woman, and child in the district. He is a highly-educated, refined man, but there is not a scrap of "ikeyness" or affectation about him. As I watch him moving about among the people, saying a merry word here, a comforting one there, a reproving one in another place, I often mentally take him by the hand and say: "God bless you for a simple, manly, Christian gentleman!"

This is the man who comes forward amidst a storm of applause. He wants to tell them a little about the selection which the band is going to play. In a few terse, simple sentences, punctuated by a running fire of humorous asides, he gives them a lucid account of the composer, of his career, of the work in which the selection appears; and then the players come on and the music strikes up. It is a voluntary band, composed of amateurs, who have mostly been brought together through the efforts of the missioner. Its execution would not be considered highly finished from a technical point of view. Perhaps the hypercritical would turn up their noses and pronounce it bad. But, my dear sir, if you are that way inclined, you had far better go out. What matters it that the fiddle is just a wee bit out of tune, that the flute is weak in the quick movements, that the time gets mixed up once or twice? It vastly delights the audience, and that is the main thing. The selection is a spirited march, with a swing and a lilt, and the stamping of feet on the floor tells how thoroughly they are enjoying it. During the softer passages I catch interjectory remarks from my excited friend on the left.

"Oo! They've got a great big fiddle to-night! Oo! Ain't it a big 'un? Oo! What if it fell on 'is toes?"

"Oo! Don't she look nice a-playin' of the vi'lin. She've got a gold brooch on. Oo! Look 'ow quick 'is arm is a-workin' playin' the big fiddle! I shouldn' like 'is elbow to come up agin' my nose!"

The march concluded, and the clapping at last over, the missioner comes on with a book in his hand. Signal for another storm of applause. He smiles, sits down easily in a chair, crosses one leg over the other, and rests the book on his knee. He tells them about Charles Dickens, of how he wrote about this very part of London, of the "Pickwick Papers," of Mr. Winkle, who figures therein; and then he proceeds to read to them of that gentleman's vagaries. I have never seen an audience more appreciative. Whether it was Mr. Winkle with his gun; Mr. Winkle on the ice; Mr. Winkle shut out of the house at Bath in his night attire; they are equally delighted, and equally hilarious. It seems, once or twice, as though the cherubic-faced little woman in front of me must inevitably choke with laughter. As she wipes away the tears from her eyes, she says:

"EYES FOR NOTHING BUT THE PLATFORM."

"Well, 'e was a funny cove, that there Wintle, an' no mistake!"

The next performer is an excellent baritone, who gives a sea-song, the swinging chorus of which finds the greatest favour. They all join in it—the under-sized little cobbler to my right, the cherubic-faced dame, the wizened, toil-worn widow at her side, and the young lady of the many "Oo's" to my left; while from the back of the hall comes a perfect gust of voices. Of course there is an encore, and in response the baritone gives that charming little song, "The Garden of Sleep." Don't tell me that the poor people cannot appreciate what is best in music. They listen with the most evident pleasure, and the applause is as generous as ever.

I cannot go into all the items of the liberal programme, but suffice it to say that they are well and carefully selected. There are songs that make the people tap their feet on the floor, songs that hold them in silence, a recitation that makes them laugh, another recitation (admirably given, this!) that makes them disposed to cry; and then the missioner comes on again. Without the slightest preparatory announcement, he proceeds to tell a story which from the very beginning gets the ear of the whole audience. A true story; a story of a man in their own walk of life; a man who worked at the riverside wharf hard by. He went out in the morning, after having had a violent quarrel with his wife. He was brought back an hour later, dead. He had fallen down the hold of the ship which he was helping to unload. The speaker pauses, and looks round the room. There is a dead silence. No smiles on the faces now! The speaker shakes his head sadly.

"She has never ceased to wish that she hadn't quarrelled with him that morning," he says quietly.

He pauses again.

"It might happen to any of us," he goes on. "Whenever we say a bitter word one to another, we can never be sure but that it will be the last word that will ever be spoken between us."

Again he pauses, and one might almost hear the proverbial pin drop in the hall.

"If, each time a nasty or unkind thing springs to the tongue, people would always count twenty, instead of giving utterance to it, what a lot of misery would be saved!" he says. And then, before we are aware of it, he is in the midst of an earnest, impressive little address on happiness in the home. He has a wonderful way of holding the attention of these people. He draws all his illustrations and allusions from their own daily lives. He knows them through and through; knows all their habits, troubles, difficulties, failings, and he makes use of his knowledge in an able, tactful way. He has the gift, too, of pungent, racy expression, so that each argument tells. A powerful little address, which gains in earnestness and intensity at each sentence, until it leads up to its crowning point, that panacea for all the human failings and woes of the world, the Love of Christ.

"IT IS A VOLUNTARY BAND.

"I HAVE NEVER SEEN AN AUDIENCE MORE APPRECIATIVE."

"Oh, if you would only believe it," he says; "if you would only try it and act upon it, if you would only let Him do it, He could come into every wretched home in this street and make it one of the sweetest and happiest spots on the face of the earth. If you think that because a home is poor it must also be miserable, you are terribly mistaken. The happiest home I have ever known was a poor home; but Christ was in it, and that made all the difference. If you would only let Him do it, He could come to the wickedest, darkest life in this street, and touch it with His finger, and make it pure and whole again. He could cure the drunkard, soften the bitterest tongue, make the most wretched heart happy again. There is no foulness and no sin but He could cure it and make it clean. Think what a difference it would make if you would only let Him enter the home. No quarrels; no bitterness; no money spent in drink and gambling; plenty of food for the little ones; plenty of means to take a happy little holiday now and again. Can't you see what a difference it would make?"

And so on to a strong appeal to those present to attend the mission services on the following Sunday.

I cannot but believe that those burning words will bear fruit. I cannot but believe that they have found their way straight into the hearts of some present, and are causing them to think, which is, after all, the first step.

The audience is in a subdued mood, and the next item—a reading—is excellently calculated to clinch the effect of the address. It is an exquisite little story of the way in which a child's love unites a bickering husband and wife; and even the aggressive, stumpy little man who resented my intrusion on his feet, and who is sitting not far away, hastily brushes the corner of his eye in a suspiciously covert manner.

For the second part of the programme comes the great event of the "movin' picters," and there is a hum of expectation in the room as the lights are lowered and the preparations are quickly made. The missioner comes from behind the platform and pulls up a chair at my side.

"Is this a sample of your usual audience?" I ask.

"Very fair," he answers. "There are sometimes a few more, sometimes a few less; but, as a rule, the hall is filled"

"I must say you give them a liberal programme."

"So we ought to do. If we of the churches don't give these poor toilers an evening's recreation occasionally, how can we wonder at their taking refuge in the music-hall or the public-house? My experience is that if you go about it in the right way, you can get hold of them, and, having got hold of them, you can do some good amongst them. Is it to be wondered at that they want recreation? Do you see that wan-faced woman with the dingy crape bonnet?"

"Yes; I have been watching her."

"Now, what do you think her life is like? She is a mantle finisher, earning fifteen shillings a week. She has to be away at work from eight in the morning till nine at night. She has four young children, one of whom she leaves at our crèche. Two she leaves at home all day. The fourth is consumptive, and she has to pay 4s. 6d. weekly for its keep. The rental of her one room is 3s. 6d. She has to pay her landlady 5s. weekly for the food of the children at home. This leaves only 2s. for her own support. After paying her debts on Saturday she has frequently to borrow money with which to commence the week. She scarcely ever goes to work with more than a piece of bread and a pennyworth of cheese for her lunch. Can you wonder that she wants a little recreation when Saturday night comes round?"

THE READING.

I look at her again. She is leaning forward and laughing until the tears are coursing down her cheeks at the picture thrown on the screen. It is certainly a most amusing picture. Two youngsters, mere babies, are shown in a back yard. One is rocking himself on a low toy horse, and broadly beaming as he looks towards the audience; the other baby suddenly catches hold of him behind, and, pulling him off the horse, mounts it himself. The first baby, utterly surprised and nonplussed, turns towards the people and stands a moment in indecision, and then his countenance suddenly puckers up in a dozen wrinkles, the corners of his mouth droop.

"Oh, poor little dear!" says the woman in the crape bonnet. "Diddums, then! Oh, I should like to see 'im be'ind the screen! There must be a byby a-doin' of it. Oh, I should like to 'ug 'im!"

"That girl with the feathers, to our left——"

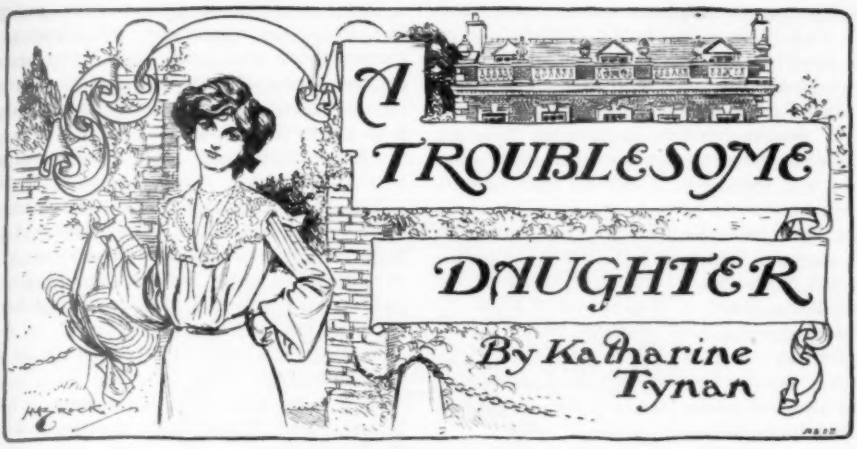
"The young lady who says 'Oo!'"

"I see you have been observant. Well, what do you think her life is like? She does artificial flower-making, at which she has to toil early and late to make ten shillings weekly. On that she helps to support a bed-ridden mother."

At this point, as if by design, the girl jumps to her feet, and yells ecstatically, the while she claps her hands:

"Oo! There's Lord Roberts! Good ole Bobs! 'Ooray for Bobs!"

We look at each other and smile.



"I am with you entirely in all you say," I remark. "This is the best tonic I have had for many a day."

It is indeed a tonic, and the raw, murky streets, when we come out into them, seem all the colder and more depressing by the very contrast.

As we surge towards the door I hear a conversation behind me.

"There can 'ardly be somebody be'ind them movin' picters, a-doin' of 'em, Mrs. Dobbs, 'cos, you see, they 'ad Lord Roberts an' las' week they 'ad the King. Well, they wouldn' be 'ere a-doin' of it!"

"Well, I don' know," says Mrs. Dobbs, rather hazily. "I s'pose they wouldn'. I s'pose they mus' 'ave somebody dressed up to look like 'em. But I'm sure that byby was there. 'E done it so nat'ral, bless 'is little 'art!"

A SERIAL STORY.

SYNOPSIS OF CHAPTERS I.—VIII.

The first chapter introduces us to the village of Stannington, where Judy Evelyn, third and youngest daughter of Mrs. Evelyn, of the Red House, is visiting all her friends round the village green in company with Jack Winstanley, her great ally, the thirteen-year-old son of Major and Lady Mary Winstanley, of the Court. Judy is just home from her French school, and on this, her very first evening, she offends her mother, who does not altogether approve of Judy's ways of being late at dinner. Judy is not at all emancipated, however. By her mother's wish she is put back into the schoolroom with her old governess, Miss Meredith, and is restricted to a hard and fast schoolroom course, which frets the high-spirited girl. In the second chapter, Lady Flora Lindley, Judy's god-mother and the autocrat of Stannington, carries her off from her lessons to a seaside village near a great port, where presently Lady Flora's son, Major Lindley, is to arrive, invalided home from the South African war, with the Victoria Cross. Lady Flora has succeeded in dividing her son and his cousin, Miss Rosamund Lindley, at the Manor House, to whom he has been devoted all his life, for reasons of her own. In the third chapter, Lady Flora and Judy go to town for shopping purposes, and visit the Duchess of Glastonbury, who is the head of an East End settlement. In the fourth chapter Major Lindley arrives, and it is decided that they all stay on a while at the big seaside hotel, so that the hero may pick up after his wounds. Judy and Major Lindley are constantly together, and Judy, who is a hero worshipper, is dazzled by the friendship and affection shown to her by the distinguished soldier. He confides to her that he is going back to Rosamund, his old love, to clear up the misunderstanding between them, before he returns to the front. When he has gone to receive the Victoria Cross from the King, Judy tells Lady Flora that he loves only his cousin, and is going to seek her out and ask her to take him back again. Lady Flora is furiously angry, and writes a letter to Miss Rosamund's strong-minded elder sister, Miss Primula, which is bound to widen the breach between the two branches of the family, and when her son returns she tells him that Miss Rosamund is engaged to marry the Rector of Stannington. She also suggests to him that he has made Judy care for him. At the great military reception at Lord Waldersee's, he asks Judy to marry him, believing that she cares for him and that the woman he loves is out of his reach, and Judy says yes. Everyone smiles on the engagement except Judy's father, who has other views for her. There is a certain Maurice Evelyn, a distant cousin, who loses a portion of his inheritance if he does not marry one of his three cousins. Mr. Evelyn thinks that Judy should have been free till Maurice Evelyn came. The girls knew nothing about this provision in old Mr. Peter Evelyn's will, and have never met Maurice Evelyn. Mrs. Evelyn for once is delighted with her troublesome daughter.

CHAPTER IX.

SHADOWS.

BERTHA and Mabel thought that Judy had very little fun out of her engagement. It was not their idea of how things should be. If they had had a lover, especially so distinguished a one as Major Lindley, they would have liked to show him off a little—to call with him at the neighbouring houses, to ride with him, to drive with him, to walk with him.

As a matter of fact, Judy's lover seemed to shrink from publicity. He would accept no invitations, not even from Mrs. Parkinson, the great rich lady of the neighbourhood, who came driving over, with her nephew Teddy in tow, especially to ask the hero to dinner.

Mrs. Parkinson was comparatively a newcomer to the neighbourhood, and had been accepted, not altogether because of her fabulous wealth, but to some extent because of her real good qualities.

People as yet had not quite placed Teddy. He was a subaltern in a crack regiment, which had its headquarters in London, so that he was often able to run down to be with his aunt for a day or two. He seemed extremely amiable; but as he said nothing, only sucked the gold-headed crutch of his cane when he paid a visit in his aunt's company, some people were rash enough to put him down as a fool.

On one occasion Sylvia Hunter had expressed this opinion in decided tones, and had been picked up sharply by Mabel Evelyn —at least, as sharply as it was in Mabel's nature to pick up anyone.

"Mrs. Parkinson has plenty of sense," she said. "She wouldn't be so devoted to Teddy if he were a fool; and he must be a good fellow, too, for her to lavish all that love on him."

Mrs. Evelyn, who was present, flashed a little glance of approval at Mabel; but all she said was, "My dear, I wouldn't speak of Mr. Parkinson as Teddy if I were you."

"But, mamma, everyone does," said Mabel, turning red.

Sylvia Hunter laughed a little maliciously. "We all know whom Teddy stares at when he sits and sucks his cane," she said.

And then Mrs. Evelyn had thought it time to change the conversation very decidedly.

But Mrs. Parkinson's invitation was all in vain. Major Lindley's curiosity was not stirred by the description of Battlements, Mrs. Parkinson's new old house, as an Arabian Nights' tale. The splendour and luxury did not interest him. He was an austere, unworldly soldier, who could have done with very little of this world's gear.

For the time he spent in Stannington he was content to stay most of his time in the gardens of the Red House, unless when he and Judy escaped over a stile into the woods, and buried themselves for hours among the tender wonder of green, where all the world was vocal and madly happy because the time of wedding was over and the time of birth come.

Once when they had taken to the high road —if you can call it the high road—which runs between open woodlands, where a stray cyclist or a farm-cart are the only things to be met with the length of a summer day, they suddenly came upon Miss Rosamund Lindley, with a basket on her arm, evidently returning from some charitable expedition.

Major Lindley lifted his hat, and Miss Rosamund glided by in a scared way, looking more ethereal than of old in her white gown. She had not known them till they were face to face, as the startled fluttering of her brown eyes told.

After she had passed Judy lifted her gaze to her fiancé's face. It wore a stern and cold expression, such as it had never worn for her; and for the rest of the walk Major Lindley spoke scarcely at all.

The incident made Judy vaguely unhappy. She found an opportunity to speak to her mother about Miss Rosamund, with a pretence at carelessness which was a woeful failure.

"Is it true," she said, "that Miss Rosamund is to marry Mr. Neville?"

"I have not heard. I suppose it will come to that one day. They are great friends."

Mrs. Evelyn wondered what was perturbing Judy. Was it possible that she could be a little bit jealous of her lover's old love? The mother hoped not. It was a far-away vulgar passion, as much out of her personal ken as, for instance, drunkenness.

"Lady Flora said so," Judy went on, with averted face.

"Oh well, then, I suppose it must be settled at last. Lady Flora would not say it without knowing. Perhaps they will not take this moment for announcing it."

"But why?" Judy asked herself afterwards, while Mrs. Evelyn was troubled at her own indiscretion. Why not, indeed? Except that it was the moment in which Miss Rosamund's old lover had announced his final renunciation of the dead past.

Judy was pitiful over the idyll that was done with, as though she had no personal concern with it. After the first moment's uneasiness she relinquished any doubt as to the truth of the story of Miss Rosamund's engagement. She thought over all the years during which she had woven a veil of romance about Rosamund Lindley, and felt lonely because it must be done with.

At the very last she met Miss Rosamund face to face, and alone, as it chanced. She was going up to stay with Lady Mary Winstanley till the House should rise. Before that Major Lindley would be back at the front with his regiment. She would return to make acquaintance with the unseen cousin, the buzz of whose coming was already in the air. Judy had noticed and wondered a little at her mother's unwonted excitement about the coming of Mr. Maurice Evelyn.

She was returning from seeing a sick girl, a friend of the old days whom she could not expect to find on her return; and the grief of the parting was apparent in Judy's expressive face as she and Miss Rosamund met in the little green lane, the end of which ran between the Court and the Red House.

Miss Rosamund recognised her, with a startled air; then looked around her furtively, and saw no one in sight except Goody

Wilkins feeding her great crowd of hens at the cottage door. She took Judy's hands in a trembling way.

"Dear child," she said, "dear child, I have heard about you, and I hope you will be very happy. I have been hoping to meet you alone. I have a little gift for you, which I have been carrying about."

She fumbled in her pocket, and produced a little box, which she placed in Judy's hand.

Then she kissed her in a nervous way, and glided off up the green avenue. At the gate which led into the demesne beyond she stood and waved her hand in Judy's direction, though Judy was almost certain she could not see whether she still stood there.

It was only when she was gone that Judy remembered how she had not wished Miss Rosamund joy.

In the box was a little oval brooch, with an amethyst in the centre surrounded by a ring of diamonds, and then a ring of seed-pearls. An old-fashioned thing of no great intrinsic value. When she had looked at it with delight Judy raised the little trinket to her lips. She had always loved Miss Rosamund. And now she felt the impassioned throb of grief that the love of years had not ended differently. Mr. Neville was everything admirable, but to Judy's young eyes he seemed very old. She had never thought of Miss Rosamund as anything but a girl, oddly enough.

"'I hope you will be very happy.'"

She found Major and Lady Mary Winstanley in a delightful house on the river's banks. The ivy had quite covered the original white stucco of its outside walls, and there were great roomy balconies that looked across the enclosing wall over a narrow tow-path on to the broad, beautiful river, at the sight of which Judy fell to reciting Spenser half under her breath.

Judy had a room all hung in green chintz, with a suggestion of rose-colour to keep it warm, high up, overhanging the river. It was an old-fashioned house which had been modernised, with spacious gardens, and Judy found the current of air along the river delightfully fresh and invigorating; while the spring foliage with which the river was overhung these late May days, interspersed with pink chestnut, and pink and white May, lilac, and laburnum, and the beginnings of syringa, made a vision of beauty.

Judy was a little bit disappointed in Lady Mary. She was content to lie all day in her balcony, and her manner was languid. There were rings about her fine eyes, and though she roused herself to talk to Judy, it was something of a palpable effort, and after a time she seemed glad to relapse into silence and thoughts which did not appear to be altogether happy ones.

Yet there was so much to make her happy. The great world had endorsed the opinion of little Stannington concerning Major Winstanley.

He had become a man of mark among his own party, and it was said everywhere that he would find himself in the Ministry some day.

Naturally, he was much sought after; but his new life did not seem at all to have diverted him from his invalid wife, to whom he was as tenderly and chivalrously devoted as ever.

Yet Judy was not long an inmate of the house before she discovered that there was something wrong with Lady Mary. Major Winstanley himself drew Judy's attention to it, urging her in a half-playful way to make Lady Mary rouse herself and act the hostess as she ought. It seemed that at first, after coming to London, she had made a strong effort to break the habit of years, and had allowed herself to be helped to her carriage for drives, and once or twice had gone on the river and had been glad to receive people and entertain them. But now she seemed to have relapsed into the invalid's ways, and, when she got used to Judy's presence, would often forget it and look tragically melancholy, although when Major Winstanley appeared there was always a palpable effort to be bright and cheerful.

The second or third day after Judy had come to town she found a visitor at the luncheon table, and was surprised to recognise one of the Duchess's helpers and friends, whose height and beauty and distinguished bearing had struck her the day she and Lady Flora were in the East. She remembered that the Duchess had introduced her as Margaret Greville; and now, for the first time, country-mouse Judy learnt that she was the niece of a Cabinet minister, and quite a notable figure in fine society.

Major Winstanley happened to be at home for lunch that day, and Philip Lindley also was of the party. Judy was delighted with the conversation between Miss Greville and her host, to which they all listened perforce. She was fascinated by Miss Greville's face, which was of an unusual type—wide, calm brows, with the brown hair rippling off them like the water of mountain streams, eyes that darkened and lightened by turns, and were of a beautiful grey hazel; a mouth perhaps a little over-large, if one had time to notice that for watching its sweetness and mobility.

"She ought to be a statesman's Egeria," said Major Lindley afterwards to Judy.

Judy repeated the remark later to Lady Mary, who smiled, and there was something in the smile Judy did not quite understand.

"She could be the Egeria of half a dozen—I mean of one of them, if report speaks truly," she said. "Even Mr. Mountford is supposed to have fallen a victim to her bow and arrow, if one can ever imagine her to have let fly a shaft."

"She and Major Winstanley seem to understand each other so perfectly," said Judy; "but the thing I like her best for is her devotion to you."

"Ah yes, that is very sweet of her; and it is quite genuine. She has missed very big political events in order to stay with me when I have been ill. That is real devotion, Judy."

"I can't imagine anyone not preferring you to a political event," said Judy, with the honest, tender flattery she used to those she loved.

"Ah, but you can't imagine what it means to Margaret," Lady Mary said. "She has a passion for politics—for power too, I believe, and it would be safe enough in her hands. I wonder she doesn't marry Mr. Mountford and become the great lady of the administration. Hugo says she would be the ideal lady of a salon. She has such tact, with her big brain and great heart."

After that Miss Greville and Judy met constantly. She was always running in with flowers or a new book or some other offering for Lady Mary, and she was very often at lunch or at dinner.

She dressed beautifully. Perhaps it was the contrast that made Judy discover with a shock of surprise that Lady Mary was allowing herself to become dowdy. Despite years spent on a sofa, Lady Mary had hitherto always been well dressed.

It was something Judy could not touch upon, however remotely. It gave her an odd, painful feeling to see Lady Mary lying there on her sofa with those dark circles under her eyes, and a tired look about her, with an air of finality as though she had returned from the battle of life worsted, and there was nothing to do but to lie still.

Judy had imagined Lady Mary entering into all her husband's plans and ambitions and successes. Now she sat by as though she were outside them all. It was only when Miss Greville was there that they had those brilliant occasions which made Judy's heart beat and her eyes brighter, feeling great things in the air.

"Next month Jack will be here, and he will rouse her," Judy said to herself.

Despite her engrossment with her lover, and his coming departure, Judy had time and thought to feel that all was not well with Lady Mary, and to be in trouble for her sake.

CHAPTER X.

THE STREET OF THIEVES.

MAJOR LINDLEY was gone, and Judy was very lonely. Lady Flora had come up to town for the last few days of his stay, and had postponed her return to Stannington.

"No, no," she said, "let us be lost in the crowd, Judy, for a few days. Don't let us go back to where everyone will stare at us as the mother and the sweetheart of a man just returned to the front. Let Philip's going be an old thing before we go back."

Judy understood, and was glad to remove herself from under Lady Mary's wing to keep Lady Flora company at the very quiet hotel in South Kensington, where she was going to be free from all the pity of her intimates.

Judy understood. She had winced at the avoidance of the topics that were in everyone's mind at River Lawn, as the Winstanleys' house was called. It made the danger Philip was returning to twice as near and palpable a thing, because no one would speak of disaster nor of danger and death in her presence, as though the topics must have a personal application.

Lady Flora was not one to sit and twiddle her thumbs, as she would have said herself, nor to let Judy do it.

She manifested all at once a desire to revisit the lions of her young days in London, and to make Judy do them conscientiously. Major Lindley's expeditions with his sweetheart had mostly lain out of town; but Lady Flora plunged the girl into the labyrinth of London, where life is so much in evidence that even the dread hints of the undertakers' shops find no listeners.

The Tower, the Abbey, the Zoological Gardens, Madame Tussaud's, the British Museum, the Kensington Museum, the National Gallery, and the other collections, Judy was carried to day after day; and, being Judy, she won some delight from everything, even if it were dry-as-dust, although her lover had just gone out to face the guns of the enemy and the more deadly fever.

Once being in the neighbourhood of the Duchess's settlement, they saw her Grace for half an hour, and the occasion left more deeply on Judy's heart the impression the gracious woman had made at their first meeting.

"I don't mind Caroline's way of being sorry for one and understanding," Lady Flora said afterwards. "She can touch an open sore without hurting it."

"If ever I am in great trouble I shall go to the Duchess of Glastonbury," said Judy.

"Nonsense, child, you are never going to be in great trouble," said Lady Flora sharply. "Philip's wife will be the happiest woman in the world. And supposing natural troubles did come—we are none of us exempt from them—you will have Philip to turn to, and after Philip, if you want anyone else, there is myself and there is Mary Winstanley, and"—Lady Flora made an effort—"there is your own mother. Why should you go trapesing off to the East End of London after Caroline Glastonbury?"

Judy held her peace. She had no idea when the words were said how soon she would put her thought into practice.

June was flinging its faint dusts over the easily sullied green banners which are the divine gift of the pity of spring to London. One began to feel that legions of little leafy mouths were gasping for breath, parched with thirst, for there had been a drought of some weeks' duration. The exhaustion which creeps over London in a hot June, and drags more wearily as the summer progresses, till one longs for a tearing equinoctial to buffet and beat down the aching streets, had begun to be felt. The season was nearly at an end. A week more and it would be Speech Day at Harrow. Judy must not disappoint Jack Winstanley. "Nonsense," Lady Flora said again; "we are not mourners, you and I, Judy, but the proudest of women."

After that was over, it would not be long till they were all back at Stannington. Judy thought, with only languid curiosity, of the unknown cousin who was expected at the Red House in a week or so. Why hadn't Maurice Evelyn turned up six months ago? she asked. She would have been interested then. Now, her only interest—she had really a hundred, but she chose to say she had only one—was in the letters from Africa that she might be expecting about the time of her return to Stannington. Of course, as an engaged girl she could not be expected to take an interest even in a cousin who had come on the scene so unexpectedly, and about whom they had hardly heard before.

The weather, and perhaps other things, told on Lady Flora, despite her indomitable spirit. One day, to her utter disgust, she was laid up with a headache.

"No, no," she said, waving off Judy; "I don't want any smelling-salts nor any eau-de-cologne. As for drugs, I never take them. I want to be left to myself for about twenty-four hours. And I'll tell you what: Philip would be little obliged to me if he could see you this minute. I've been racketing you as well as myself too much. Go over to the station across the road, take a first-class ticket to Richmond, and spend the day and night with Mary Winstanley. If Hugo's at home to-night he'll take you on the river for a blow; but, anyhow, you'll sleep in fresh air. I wish I'd a maid to go with you, but since I haven't we must just make the best of it. I don't want to see you before lunch to-morrow."

Judy saw that Lady Flora wanted to be alone, and having left her in charge of a kind young blue-eyed chambermaid, whose brogue and manner showed that she came from the Emerald Isle, she went off obediently. She was sure of her welcome where the Winstanley household was concerned.

It was early afternoon when she reached Richmond and set out for the walk through the delightful old town and along the towing path which would take her to River Lawns.

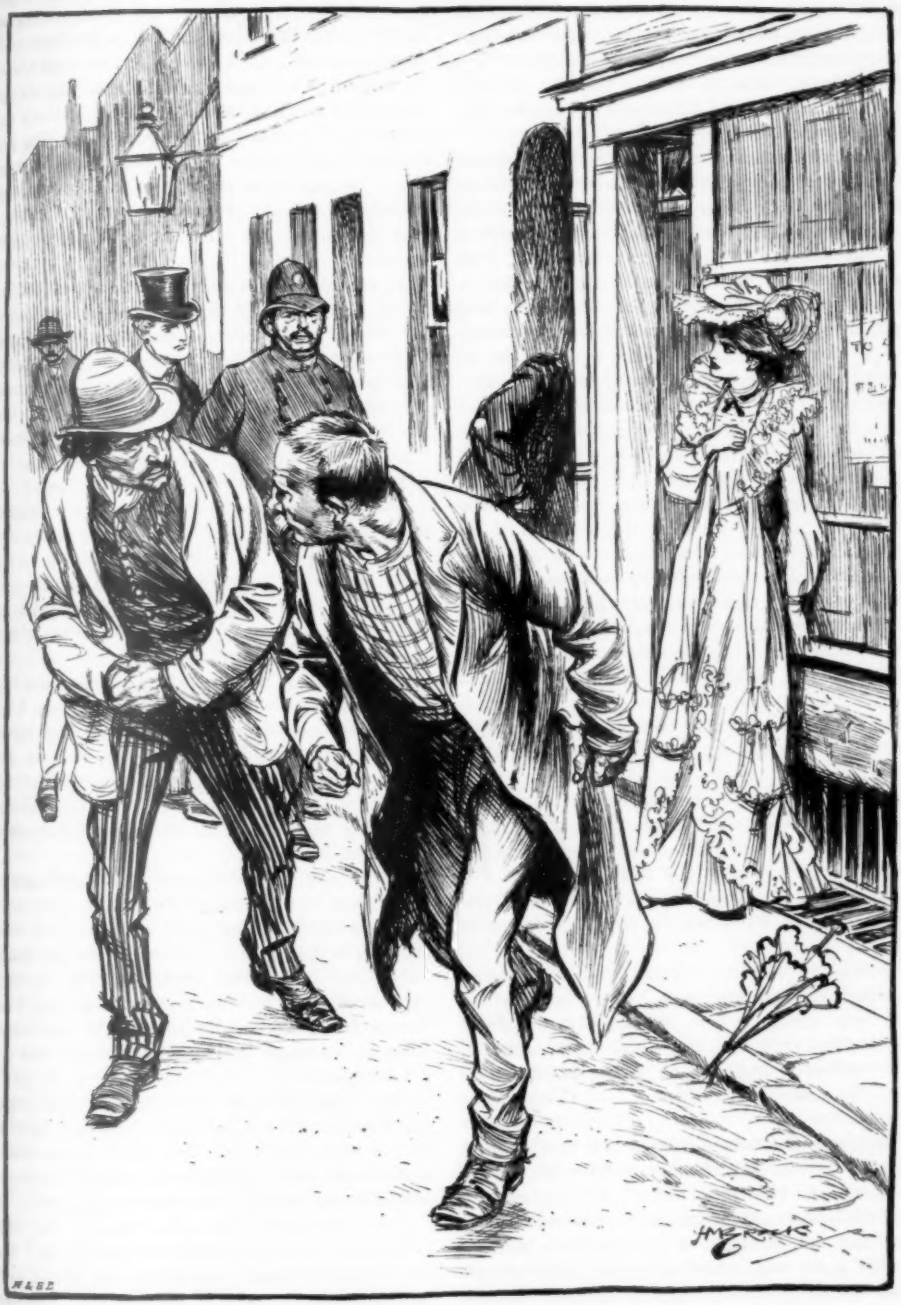
She found the postern-gate ajar, and went in, looking around her with delight on the green velvet of the grass, that seemed darker and richer by contrast with the arches of roses and the glimmering of the big white lilies which the hot sun had brought into premature flower.

She crossed the garden and went up the iron steps to the verandah in which Lady Mary was usually to be found. She was not there. She peeped into the boudoir; that, too, was empty. Perhaps Lady Mary was lying down asleep in her bedroom, or perhaps the Major had enticed her out for a drive.

The green quiet of the garden; the river beyond, with its one or two house-boats in sight; the lazy plash of oars in the water, the silver laughter of a girl—the only sounds audible besides the singing of birds—were delightfully restful. Judy sat down in the rocking-chair which was dedicated to her special use when she was at the Lawns, undid her fluffy white chiffon boa, took off her big white hat and laid it on a chair beside her; and leaning back, began to rock, with half-closed eyes.

There was no one to see her but a blackbird, who cocked his head knowingly at her and watched her between his short flights, till her eyes closed and the rocking became less and less energetic, till she was asleep.

She had slept perhaps an hour when the sound of voices found its way slowly into her consciousness. One voice was Lady Mary's, the other was—why, surely it was Miss Rosamund Lindley's. Between sleeping and waking she caught some sentences of the conversation, till at last the shock of what she heard forced her wide awake.



"I do not know," Miss Rosamund was saying, "why Lady Flora should have believed that I was engaged to Mr. Neville. Of course, I never was and never shall be. I suppose she must have been misinformed, for it could not be that she said it knowing it wasn't true. Besides, she could have no motive. It was not likely, after all these years, that—that—Major Lindley should have thought about me: especially is it to be thought now, —that he could think of anyone but little Judy? She is a sweet child, and I hope she will make him very happy. But Prim is so angry about some letter she has had from Lady Flora; and we are giving up the Manor House, dear friend, and going to live at the Spinney Farm. We are to make room for Major and Mrs. Lindley."

Judy clapped her hands to her ears, and began hastily gathering up her hat and boa. What would she do if they were to come out and discover her? She must go away somewhere and get time to think.

She heard, as in a dream, Lady Mary's voice answering Miss Rosamund's tremulous and agitated speech. They were in the boudoir. Any moment they might come out and discover her. And she could not face Miss Rosamund Lindley, whom she had robbed—yes, actually robbed of her lover. Perhaps they would think she was prying, eavesdropping. Judy's impulse was for flight, and she very rapidly put it into execution.

She ran more lightly than a fawn over the velvet grass, which muffled the sound of her feet. Still holding her hat and boa in her hand, she was outside the gate, and drew the postern, which fastened with a spring lock, closely to after her.

What was she going to do? She would not go back to Lady Flora. The river was full of pleasure-seekers. There was no quiet, no seclusion here, no place in which to collect her thoughts so far as to realise what she had heard, and to think what she would do. Why, she had no right to Philip Lindley at all! He had meant to go to his old love, who had had his heart all his days.

"In the instant Judy knew she was saved."—p. 271.

Through the hurry and scurry of her thoughts it came to Judy that there had been something in Major Lindley that had not come up to her romantic ideal of a lover's conduct. It had set in after the first few days, and seemed to her now to have taken tangible shape from that day when they had come face to face with Miss Rosamund in the woodland road. He had been kindness and tenderness itself, but—but—Judy remembered an occasion when his thoughts had been abstracted from her. It had been at an afternoon concert, when a great contralto had been singing an old-fashioned love song.

It had given Judy a sudden fear, seeing the tragic intensity of his face, the coldness of his eyes, as though they looked over a dreary landscape for just one moment; then he had felt her eyes upon him and had smiled, and the fleeting impression was forgotten.

But now she remembered many things all at once, many things pointing the one way. And was it possible that Miss Rosamund and Miss Primula were to be turned out of their beloved home because she, a wretched little usurper, must come and take their place? That must never be. If she had unwittingly wronged Miss Rosamund she must make retribution. She must give up Major Lindley. Why, it would not be so hard. It would be a thousand, thousand times easier than keeping him when he really belonged to another woman.

In the hurry and turmoil of her thoughts she had been walking fast, not knowing where she was going. Now, as she turned from the towing path into the streets of Richmond, she realised that it would be impossible to go back to Lady Flora till she had thought out things.

Suddenly the name of the person to whom she ought to go leaped into her mind with the remembrance of the speech made to Lady Flora a few weeks ago. The Duchess! How was it that she had not thought of the Duchess before?

Her mind was concerned with great things. The conventionalities of the matter hardly occurred to her, or occurred only to be dismissed contemptuously. It was not a time to think whether she ought to be flying about London and through the East End streets by herself. The Duchess did it, and those girls who followed and worshipped her. If Violet Wyndham and Margaret Greville could go alone into the East she could do it.

She took a ticket for Aldgate, a station she remembered. When she got out in the Whitechapel Road people stared at her as she passed. Her white hat and frock were fitter for a West End garden party than for the East End streets.

Judy noticed the staring at last, and looked about her for a cab. She saw one and called it. Then, as the cabman drove up to the kerb and the doors of the hansom clattered back, she put her hand in her pocket, and turned rosy-red. Her purse was gone.

"I'm so sorry," she said to the cabman. "I've lost my purse, so I had better walk."

"I'll drive you all the same, miss, and I can call for the money," the man said civilly; but Judy had already walked on after her hasty apology.

She crossed the crowded ample street at a point she seemed to remember, and without a thought of misgiving plunged into a network of narrow streets.

But presently she pulled up, baffled and disturbed. She must have taken a wrong turn. There was no one to direct her. The street was oddly quiet, no children playing in the gutters, no slatternly women standing on the doorsteps. Yet a policeman would have told Judy that she was in one of the most dangerous streets in London.

While she looked about her helplessly a man came out of one of the black doorways.

She looked up at him eagerly, her first impulse being to ask her way; but he had a villainous face. His little furtive, hungry eyes were fixed on the diamond lace-pin that fastened a flower in her dress. He said something in a foreign tongue which luckily she did not understand.

But suddenly she took fright and began to tremble. She looked to right and left as though she would fly. The blank house-fronts had become alive and furtive; stealthy creatures were closing in upon her from every side.

Judy had never been afraid before, but now her tongue clove to the roof of her mouth. She could neither speak nor move, but could only turn appealing eyes, like some hunted, terrified creature, from one side to the other.

The man who had come first made a dash at her brooch. She uttered a cry. Then someone spoke close at hand, shouted in the strange foreign speech also; but in the instant Judy knew she was saved. She saw the threatening hordes slink away and disappear. She looked round and beheld the friendly face of a policeman, and another face which for the moment seemed so full of splendid wrath that she thought vaguely of an archangel's.

But this was only an ordinarily handsome young man in a white passion of anger and terror.

"Good gracious!" he said, "if we had not caught you up! I followed you from the Whitechapel Road, and lost a second or two getting this good fellow to come with me. Then I almost lost you. What brings you into such a place alone? There, let us get out of it as fast as we can. See; they are all gone."

"Run into their burrows like so many bunnies!" the policeman said cheerfully. "They're mortal afraid of bringing the law down on 'em. You wouldn't have had much chance, sir, without the uniform."

"I know these parts," the young man said grimly; "and now that we are out of this rat-hole I think I can see after the young lady, if she will allow me."

"I got lost," said Judy, when they had taken one or two turns; "and, after all, I was quite near the place I wanted. This is River Street, is it not?"

"This is River Street, miss. There's no harm in River Street," said the policeman. "I'm sorry you were frightened, miss. A young lady like you shouldn't be about in these parts alone."

He went off touching his helmet, and then the young man with close-curling hair, like a picture of St. Michael, looked down at Judy.

"Promise me you will never do it again," he said.

"I will never do it again," said Judy. "Oh, if you knew how frightened I was! I thought I should be quite safe, because the Duchess and the other ladies go about here, and the nuns."

"Ah, you see, they know where they can go. You are going to the Duchess of Glastonbury?"

"Yes. You know her?"

"I know of her work. I have a friend—a number of friends here, who are doing the same kind of work. I happened to be visiting my friend Trafford"—a name which even that country-mouse, Judy, knew—"and I was just coming back from him when I caught sight of you. I had a feeling you were lost and might get into trouble, so I followed you, picking up the first policeman I could get hold of on the way. You were in a street of alien thieves. Luckily, they are as frightened of the law as a lot of rabbits, and our friend knew them and knew their lingo. I can never forget how we found you among those wolves like a white lamb. Thank God we were in time."

They were at the door of the Duchess's house now, and Judy held out her hand to him.

"I can never forget, never, what you did for me."

He looked in a fascinated way into Judy's eyes, which were lightening and darkening with the strength of her emotion.

"Good-bye," he said. What delightful hair she had, and how delicately the little ears, with their tiny jewelled studs, peeped out of the curls!

"Good-bye," said Judy.

The door was opened, and Peter, the hump-backed janitor, stood looking at them.

It was only when the door had closed upon Judy that she remembered her forgetfulness in not having asked the name of her deliverer.

CHAPTER XI.

THE NEW COUSIN.

THE Duchess had heard of Judy's trouble. It had been so easy to tell it there with the Duchess's hands holding her fast, holding faster when Judy broke into sobs and tears, the firm grasp giving the oddest sense of security and comfort to the girl.

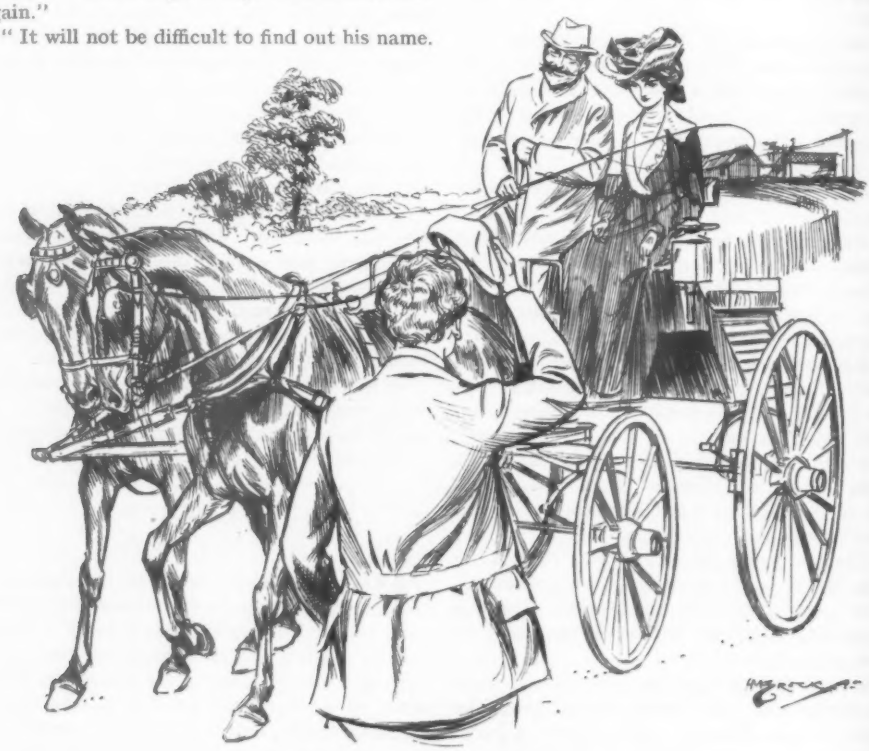
"You are the only one in all the world whom I could have told," Judy said, when she had finished.

"Well, then, I am glad you found me, even though you had to venture into the East. I hope you took a cab from the station. I always insist on my girls doing that when they come. You are only safe on foot here if you know every twist and turn of the place. There is so much virtue in the East—oh, thank God!—miles and miles of streets where the virtues flourish at least as well as in the West. But they are elbowed by the vicious streets. When you go away I must send one of my working girls with you. They are better than a policeman."

Judy had forgotten her recent peril for the moment. Now she remembered and poured the recital into the Duchess's horrified ears.

"My dear! my dear!" was all the Duchess could say. "That you should have gone into such peril! Yet God was in the thieves' street as well as anywhere else. He sent that young man to your help. And you do not know his name?"

"I never thought to ask him," Judy confessed. "Yet I hope, I hope I shall meet him again."



"It will not be difficult to find out his name. I know Mr. Trafford, his friend. What would your mother say if she could know?"

"It was my first thought," said Judy, "and afterwards I thought of how Philip would feel if he could know, for Philip is very fond of me, even if he loves Miss Rosamund Lindley better. And I have always been so used to the thought of that that it seems quite easy to go back to it. I thought of how Philip would have fallen upon them. And then I looked round and saw this gentleman's face, and I thought it was like the face of an angel!"

"Of course you did, poor child," said the Duchess compassionately. "You will never do such a thing again, Judy?"

"Never! I promised him I should not."

"And now about this other case. It is wiser and kinder for us, Judy, to believe that Lady Flora's information was a mistake. Indeed, we must not think anything else. Flora Lindley is a just and honourable woman. I would say nothing to her at present, little Judy, and I would do nothing. It is possible that Philip has ceased to care for his cousin."

"'Come to meet us, Maurice, hey?'"—p. 275.

Looking at Judy, the Duchess thought it more than possible; but Judy shook her head obstinately.

"I am quite sure he cares," she said.

"And you, child? Will it break your heart?"

Judy winced. She had been very proud of her lover.

"You see, I have always been used to think of him as Miss Rosamund's lover," she said.

"After a time, I daresay these few weeks will be like a dream."

"You mean to give up Major Lindley?"

"There is nothing else to do, is there?" asked Judy ingenuously.

"Unless he would not be given up. Little Judy, I have lived in the world many years longer than you, and I have had many experiences. I have seen those old patient loves wear themselves out, and the heart that had been supposed to be broken suddenly take on a new lease of life. Child, I would do nothing. Wait till Major Lindley comes back. The war cannot be prolonged indefinitely. When he comes back tell him about the mistake, and let him go to the old love, if he will. I think perhaps, myself, that he will keep to the new."

She had seen that wincing in Judy's face, and had gathered from it that her happiness was involved. After all, Rosamund Lindley had grown used to doing without her lover. Perhaps marriage at her age was a risk. And the Duchess had little doubt in her own mind that Judy had consoled Major Lindley.

Judy looked down at the ring on her finger, and twisted it about once or twice.

"It has a posy inside it," she said. "It is 'God in Trinity bless our unity.' I will do what you tell me. You must know better than I. Oh, do you think—would you take me in here for a time, even? I believe Mother would not object. I can't be supposed to have any heart in the common everyday life of other girls, with a lover at the war, can I? I thought when I was coming down here that I would just write to Philip, and tell him that it was all a mistake, that Miss Rosamund was free and he was free, and then that I would ask you to take me in and keep me for ever."

The Duchess smoothed Judy's hair. Judy had flung herself impulsively on her knees beside her, and had told her tale with her face half buried in the Duchess's lap.

"My child," she said, "this is not a conventual establishment, nor even one founded on a conventual model. My girls come and return to the world in which God has placed them. You know that Violet is married; and I have not altogether said good-bye to the world. And Margaret Greville—she tells me she has been making friends with you. Margaret is often here; but Margaret's place is in the world, where, poor child, I think she will be called to a position of great responsibility. She is fit for it too, happily. I should be glad if you would come like Margaret and Violet and Hilda and the others; but you will return. You have something happier before your youth than a perpetual mission in the East."

"If you would have me for a little while!" Judy pleaded. "I am sure mother would consent. Mother would win over papa; and though Lady Flora would not like it she would put up with it because of you, Duchess. Indeed, indeed, I would do everything you told me. I don't see how I am going to bear it, being accepted by everyone as a happy, engaged girl, for I shall never feel that I am really that at all. My ring even ought to be Miss Rosamund's ring."

The Duchess put two fond protecting arms about her.

"Why, you shall come to me, little Judy," she said. "And you shall learn how the East lives. I don't think you need the lesson, but it is very often a salutary one for those who have lived in the West all their days. I shall give you in charge to Martha Driscoll, who will know how to take care of you. You remember Martha, the Irish dressmaker, with the red hair and blue eyes. She is very wise and careful, and fearless as well. I should not like to have Martha angry with me myself. Ah, there is the tea-bell!"

"You will keep me for to-night, Duchess?"

"Is it likely I should let you go after what has happened? You look pale, and no wonder. You shall have Violet's little room under the roof, close beside mine. You will find the air is not really so bad—better than the West End, I think, for the wind blows up the river from the German Ocean, if it has to pass those miles of docks and warehouses on its way."

"I shall not find fault with the air," said Judy.

Nor did she. The room was so dainty that it might have been in a country house rather than in the black East. Its chintzes and white covers and curtains and bedclothes were spotlessly clean. The room was immaculate, as might well be where the work was done for love. And Judy slept, as she had not thought to sleep after the trouble and terror of the day, dreamlessly. Indeed, she awoke with a start to find a pattern of chimney shadows on her counterpane, and to realise that she had slept nearly all round the clock.

As soon as breakfast was over, the Duchess herself took Judy and put her in a train for South Kensington. Everyone seemed to know the Duchess in the streets through which they passed, and to greet her with the utmost respect and affection.

"They all know you," said Judy.

"I have been working here a good many years. I can go into streets where only the doctors and nurses are safe, worse even than your street of yesterday. Even the outcasts know their friends."

The train puffed off from the black station into the blacker tunnel, but the radiance of the rose and white face of the Duchess, the impression of her spotless white bands and inky draperies, the stern simplicity of which seemed to throw into strange relief the fresh fairness of that heavenly countenance, remained with Judy long after she was out of sight of them.

She found Lady Flora well of her headache and ready to suggest a jaunt somewhere or other. She was evidently tired of her own company, and delighted to welcome Judy back.

Judy had wondered whether Lady Flora would discover anything wanting in her, anything of the change which she felt must have come over her since yesterday; but Lady Flora seemed content, and made much of Judy in a way that stirred the girl's generous heart to an ache of compassion towards the godmother whom she felt she was in a sense deceiving. She had accepted the Duchess's will for her, as one might accept the will of some great servant of God, believing that it must represent His will. But it was hard for impulsive Judy. She would, if she had followed her own wishes, have made an end of the thing then and there, telling Lady Flora that it was all an inexplicable blunder that had made Philip believe Rosamund Lindley lost to him, and that being so, she must step out and make way for the old love, whom he had never forgotten.

She fell in with Lady Flora's plans, with a new readiness of acquiescence added to her usual sweetness. Lady Flora detected something wrong about that.

"What's the matter with the lassie," she said, "that she doesn't stand up for herself and choose where she'd go, knowing that the surest way to please me, who have seen all the things till I'm tired of them? It isn't like Judy to be indifferent; and I won't have Caroline Glastonbury making a saint of her."

Judy had made no secret of the night spent in River Street, merely mentioning that Lady Mary Winstanley had a visitor from Stannington, Miss Rosamund Lindley, staying with her, and that she, believing that she might be in the way, went to the Duchess instead.

Lady Flora rated her half humorously for the daring of the expedition.

"Hoity-toity," she said, shaking her curls at Judy, "because we're an engaged young lady we think we can make expeditions anywhere alone and unescorted! It wasn't the way when I was a girl, I can tell you. And what would your good mother think of it?"

Keen as Judy was to get back to Stannington, she did not forget the blow it would be to her old ally, Jack Winstanley, if she failed to attend the Speech Day at Harrow, so she waited with what patience she might.

On the great day she dressed herself in her best to do honour to Jack, and was rewarded by the young gentleman proposing to her in a tentative fashion while they strolled about after the lunch. Jack as yet was unacquainted with the fact of Judy's engagement.

"You've turned out a stunning girl," he said, "and I believe you're the only one in the world I'd sacrifice my independence to. If you wouldn't mind waiting while I finish here and go through Christ Church, we could be engaged now. I never thought I'd do it for any girl, much less for you, Ju, who used to fag for me; but you've bowled me completely over, and I don't mind telling you that you're the prettiest girl in the place to-day, which is, of course, a gratifying fact to me."

Judy did not tell him that Major Lindley had anticipated him. Indeed, she had the oddest feeling that she was not really engaged to Major Lindley at all, although she wore his ring on her finger.

"I don't think we'll talk about it yet, Jack," she said. "You see, there are so many things you want to do, and, of course, a wife is a great tie to a man."

"That's quite true, Ju," he said, with unflattering readiness to accept her decision, "though it isn't every girl would have the sense to see it. Well, anyhow, don't go getting engaged to anybody else while I sow my wild oats. That green frock you're wearing is no end becoming to you, Ju. All the other fellows are furiously jealous of me. Funny, isn't it, that the Pater and myself should be squiring the most charming girls in the place?"

Judy looked over at Major Winstanley, who was talking to Miss Greville with a very absorbed air, and smiled faintly. She hardly knew this coxcombical Jack.

A week later they were all at Stannington. Judy knew in an uninterested way that the distant cousin, Maurice Evelyn, was staying at the Red House. She hoped he would not disturb the quietness of the dear old sleepy place. Just at present she would have preferred to be free of strangers.

Her father met her at the station with the mail phaeton. It seemed that the rest of the family were lunching with Mrs. Parkinson, and were to be home in time to give Judy her tea.

They let the Court barouche start first, so that Lady Mary and Lady Flora, who had taken a seat with her, should not get the dust of the mail phaeton.

Mr. Evelyn sat contentedly enough with a cigar between his lips, waiting till the clouds of dust raised by the other travellers had settled a bit.

"I don't remember a much dryer time, Ju," he said, looking from the little height of the railway station over the beautiful country. "If it goes on, we'll have an early autumn."

Judy looked fondly at his rosy face and good blue eyes.

"I like to be back with you, papa," she said, giving his arm a little squeeze.

"I like to have you, Ju," he answered. "It was about time you came back, too. You're looking fagged, little girl, as though you'd been going the pace. You must stay at home now, and become a little country girl once more. We're very gay. Maurice has brightened us up a lot. We'd better be getting along now."

They drove down the incline from the station.

"You like the new cousin, papa?" said Judy, not greatly interested.

"He's a capital fellow," answered Mr. Evelyn cordially. "I wish you'd known him, Ju, before——Why, here's the fellow himself!"

A tall, alert young figure in a suit of homespuns was coming from under the arch of the railway bridge into the sunshine beyond. Mr. Evelyn pulled up.

"Come to meet us, Maurice, hey?" he said, well pleased. "That was right, boy. Jump up behind. Ah, this is Judy!"

"I wanted to welcome my cousin," said the young fellow pleasantly. The strong afternoon sun was in his eyes, but as he lifted them to Judy startled and delighted recognition leaped into their expression. As for Judy, she had known him from the first glimpse of him. He had a way of holding himself, of throwing his curling head back on his square shoulders.

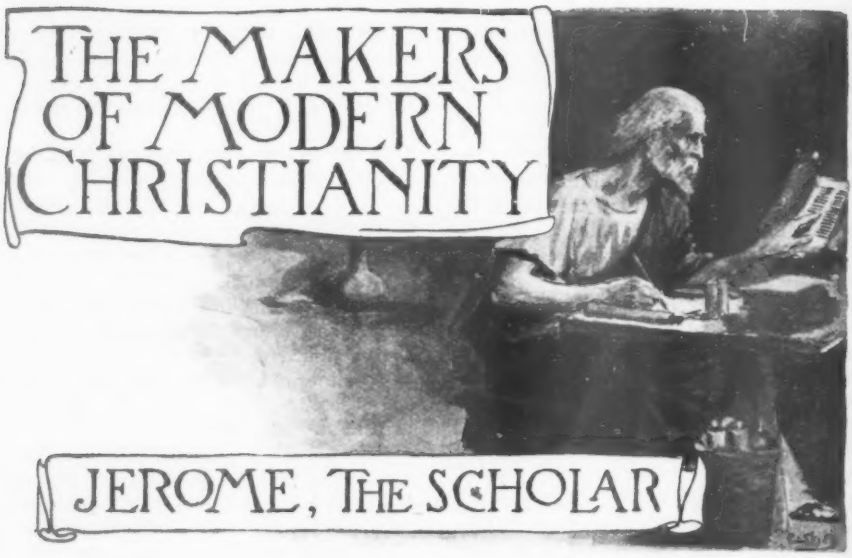
Maurice Evelyn was her friend who had come to her rescue in the East End, and had never been out of her prayers since, nor far from her thoughts.

[END OF CHAPTER ELEVEN.]

THE VOICE OF GOD.

A Prayer for the New Year.

"They heard the voice of the Lord God walking in the garden in the cool of the day."—GENESIS iii. 8.



O GOD, I pray Thee grant to me
To find within the daily life
A space fenced off from earthly strife,
Where I may wait and watch for Thee.

A garden which Thyself hast made;
Where grow Thy graces rich and fair,
And gently breathes the fragrant air,
And blooms the bliss that doth not fade.

And listening let me gladly run
With eager steps to walk with Thee,
With heart aglow to talk with Thee—
An hour when earth and heaven are one.

MARK GUY PEARSE.

THE MAKERS OF MODERN CHRISTIANITY

JEROME, THE SCHOLAR

By the Very Rev. H. Donald M. Spence, D.D., Dean of Gloucester.

II.

THE FORTUNES OF JEROME'S VULGATE THROUGH THE AGES.

HE work was done at last. The Latin Bible—"all of a piece," so to speak—soon was in many a scholar's hand through the length and breadth of the poor, distracted barbarian-harassed empire. The New Testament had been completed years before, when Damasus ruled over the Roman Church. This New Testament was a revision of an old rather than a new work, and it gradually and quietly took the old work's place in the Church and in the student's chamber. It (the New Testament) excited, comparatively speaking, little criticism, for the changes from the old Latin Italic version, although numerous, were not startling enough to excite much attention among the rank and file of Christians. A powerful and masterful Bishop of Rome (Damasus) had simply commissioned a well-known scholar to carry out the needed work of revision, and when it was completed sealed it with his imprimatur, and it seems with little stir to have passed into the Western Church's life.

But the Old Testament, done from the hitherto well-nigh inaccessible Hebrew, was a very different piece of work. It was undertaken under no official sanction, and received no official imprimatur, as had been the case with Jerome's New Testament version. Thousands, however, in many lands for the first time saw in Jerome's Latin Vulgate what the Old Testament really was. To the great majority, learned and unlearned, it was almost a new revelation; and, as might be expected, was very generally received at first with a loud cry of reproach. Even Augustin, in his distant African city, though he loved and admired the great scholar of Bethlehem with an ungrudging love and admiration, was afraid as he read the new translation, with its many corrections and changes, and as the work went on, and book after book of the holy volume issued forth from the Bethlehem cell, positively tried to dissuade Jerome from pursuing his task, which seemed to him dangerous, almost profane!

But gradually all hostile clamour seems to have died down, and men began to see what a mighty treasure they possessed in the new translation.

Long before the task was done, when only some of the Old Testament books had appeared in their new form, the name and fame of the old man of Bethlehem had gone out into all lands, and before he passed away men recognised that in good truth a giant had arisen up among them; that the greatest, truest scholar ever known in Christendom was toiling night and day in his lonely cell hard by Jerusalem in the service of the Master Whom he loved.

JEROME AND THE ROMAN LADIES.

* * * * * *

Undertaken, as we have already noticed, without any official inspiration, the Old Testament*—the Vulgate version, as Jerome's translation is commonly called—soon became the recognised form in which the Hebrew Scriptures were known and studied in Western Christendom. The following brief "historical" notices of its reception through the ages will be interesting.

In the fifth century the well-known Bishop Eucherius of Lyons formally adopted it in his great diocese. The famous theologian, Vincent of Lerins, in the same century, used it as his version. In the same age Isidore of Seville, the renowned Spanish canonist, while strangely enough affirming the inspiration of the Septuagint translation, recommended the use of Jerome's Vulgate version. In the first years of the ninth century Alcuin, the friend and Minister of Education of Charlemagne, at his master's bidding, revised the Vulgate text, which from frequent transcription had become in many places faulty. The English archbishop Lanfranc, in the days of the Conqueror, again attempted to correct these errors of the countless scribes of Jerome's great work.

All through the Middle Ages the Latin of Jerome was the version—the only version—of the Holy Scripture with which the schoolmen and the great theologians as a rule were alone familiar, and from his nervous, pregnant words, which reflected so much of the original with an almost faultless accuracy, they drew their knowledge of the infinite love and the perfect wisdom. In the fifteenth century the Bible, in the version of Jerome, was the first book which issued from the printing press. In the following century—the sixteenth—the Fathers of the Trent Council gave it their official imprimatur, when they affirmed its authority. A few years before, Cardinal Ximenes, in the splendid Polyglot edition of Complutum (Spain), after a careful revision of the text, printed the Vulgate of Jerome in the middle place of honour between the Septuagint (the Greek) and the Hebrew.

To sum up our story of Jerome's work. It is an undisputed fact that for many centuries the Vulgate was the only Bible generally used in the Western world. From it, directly or indirectly, all the vernacular versions of Western Europe were made, with the solitary exception of the comparatively unimportant Gothic translation of Bishop Ulphilas in the fourth century.

Coming down the stream of ages, we find the well-known English version of our Wycliffe (made in the latter years of the fourteenth century) is a literal translation of Jerome's work. In Luther's Bible the Vulgate had great weight. Through Luther the influence of Jerome's Latin passed into our own Authorised version. In Tyndale's and Coverdale's Bible the weight of the Latin (Jerome's) translation is indeed singularly marked.

* * * * * *

The great scholar survived the completion of the principal labour of his work-filled life some think several sorrowful years. It was a time of grievous anxiety and crushing care. He heard in A.D. 410 of the immemorial, world-famed Rome being taken and sacked by Alaric, and before he passed away in several of the provinces of the Empire the crushing fact was borne in upon him that the barbarians, ceasing simply to raid and to plunder, had come to stay. The closing years of Jerome's life were the most sombre period through which the world had ever passed, and the prospect grew darker with each succeeding summer and winter. His last years were indeed clouded with many sorrows. Most of his old friends who had cheered his middle and late life had passed away, and weakness and sickness enfeebled his body; but his powers of work and the vigour of his intellect seemed to have endured to the end. From all parts of the Roman world pilgrims constantly arrived at Bethlehem to see and to consult with the aged scholar, and almost to the last he maintained a vast correspondence with all sorts and conditions of men and women, who sought advice or counsel from one who was universally regarded as the "Oracle of Orthodoxy." Well-nigh his last letter was to Augustin congratulating him on his victory over the party of Pelagius.

* * * * * *

In this little sketch of the life of the greatest scholar Christendom has ever possessed,

* The New Testament (Latin Vulgate of Jerome), as we have already observed, was also the work of our scholar, but his individuality was not impressed upon it, as in the case of the Old Testament. The Latin text of the Vulgate Gospels was, in the main, Jerome's work; the text of the remaining New Testament books was in reality his somewhat hurried revision of the old Italian text.

we have only really dwelt on one of his many literary efforts; but that one will never perish, that one has permanently affected the whole Christian story. His other works were very numerous, and in their day, too, powerfully influenced Christian life and thought. But they cannot be compared with that gigantic literary production we have faintly sketched out—but this is, after all, only a slight sketch. Jerome, besides, was a commentator of no mean power, and his expositions of large parts of the books of both the Old and New Testaments are still among the treasures of Christian theology. His writings on questions connected with Holy Scripture, particularly his book on Hebrew names, which proved part of his preparatory studies for his great work, have considerable value. As an ecclesiastical historian he occupies no mean place. Among his writings here may be enumerated his lives of some of the more famous hermits, his translation of Eusebius' Chronicle (with certain additions of his own), and his "Book of Illustrious Men."[1] The last-named is a work of vast value, and one that is constantly quoted and frequently referred to by all writers of ecclesiastical history. He was, too, an indefatigable controversialist, and his vigorous, though occasionally violent and somewhat exaggerated treatises on the many points of dispute which were constantly agitating the Church of his day, rank still as classical pieces of reference, although they contain opinions and conclusions often at variance with modern thought. While his letters to his disciples, his friends, and to those who sought his counsel and advice, very many of which have been preserved to us, are of priceless value as living pictures of the life and society of Christians of varied ranks and orders of his time; still it must be confessed that although the value of many of Jerome's writings—historical, expository, controversial, epistolary—is generally acknowledged, this eminent Father, compared with Augustin or with the older Latin writers, Tertullian and Cyprian, has been little read by the mass of students in any age. Jerome was no popular writer, no winning theologian. He ever appeals (different from Augustin) to the head, rarely to the heart. "He is little read," says a brilliant modern writer, "because he seldom consoles." Sympathy, that divinest of gifts, rarely lives along the learned and often eloquent pages of the austere Bethlehem scholar. His fame, after all, must rest upon his magnum opus, the Vulgate. Into it he poured all his vast, his incomparable learning, his research, his matchless power of eloquent and picturesque composition. It is for this work Jerome is remembered. In it he has won, as he well deserved, the enduring gratitude of all the Christian peoples of the West.

* * * * * *

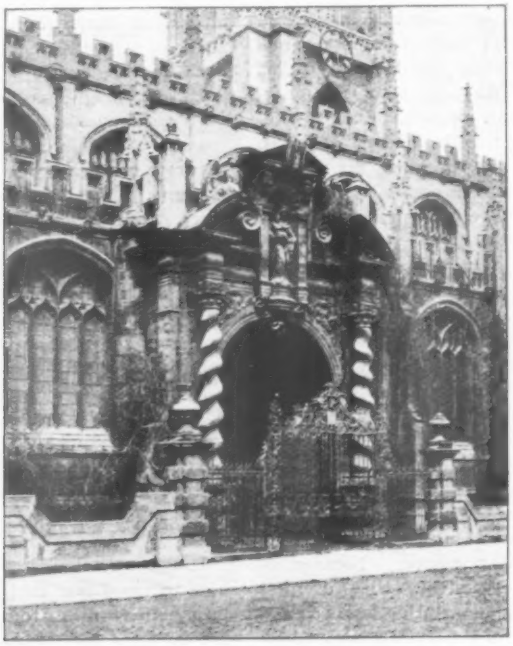
Monasticism, and all that Monasticism brought with it, was introduced into Rome and the western provinces of the Empire in the lifetime of Jerome, and before he passed away had become—if one may use the word—popular exceedingly, especially in the higher stratum of Roman society.

Jerome, in his earlier teaching during the period of his residence in Rome in the Pontificate of Damasus, was a passionate and consistent advocate of this form of Christian life. His best-known disciples and followers were among the first who in the West adopted celibacy and a rigorous life of self-denial. Paula, Marcella, Fabiola, Eustochium, and other well-known noble Roman ladies, are justly regarded as the pioneers of that great army of female monastics who for many hundred years exercised so vast an influence in the Christian world; and the life they led and emphatically adorned was, no doubt, adopted under the immediate inspiration of that great master, parts of whose career and influence we have been dwelling upon.

But although Jerome was an earnest and even an impassioned preacher of the glory and beauty of the monastic ideal, it is scarcely accurate to speak of him as the founder of the system. There were other great ones in that sorely troubled and eventful age as earnest and even more influential than even Jerome in the work of laying the foundation stories of the countless homes of those mighty religious companies of both sexes whose influence for good and evil has been so enormous in the many-coloured story of Christendom.

When we come to the strange romance—for it is verily a romance—of Basil, the saintly Bishop of Cappadocian Cæsarea, the real founder of Monasticism, we will discuss the momentous question in all its bearings.

* * * * * *



It is always hard for a writer who loves his hero to lay down the pen with which he has been endeavouring to make the long-vanished heroic form live again and walk once more among the sons and daughters of men. It is especially hard in the present instance, when so much in that busy work-filled life, which filled so large a place in the story of that age of stress and storm, when the mighty Empire was fast falling into utter ruin, necessarily has been left unwritten, the narrow limits of such a study as this rigorously forbidding all digressions, however full of interest, which did not bear directly upon the great work of his life, the grand object for which the scholar was raised up among us—the translation of the Hebrew Scriptures into the Latin of the peoples of the West.

Much, indeed, has been left untold. The story, especially of that wonderful society of noble Roman ladies, that charming picture of Christianity in the palaces of the Imperial city where Jerome was at once the inspiration and the life—this, too, must be told, but not here, not now. Only let the reader of the above sketch of a tireless Christian scholar remember how much has been left untold in that strange, wonderful life which did so mighty a work among us for God and His people.

* * * * * *

Looking back, as we can now look back, from the vantage ground of many piled-up centuries, we see how the strange experiences of a life like Jerome's were all part of his training for his supreme effort. His long and careful early education, his presence in the lecture rooms of so many of the renowned teachers of the East and West; his friendship with great ones like Gregory of Nazianzus at Constantinople; his training under the powerful Bishop of Rome, Damasus; his long intercourse with and his marvellous influence over the great ladies of the capital in the last sad days of her vanishing grandeur; his long and arduous travels in search of knowledge; his restless, tireless, patient industry—all these things, what he had seen and suffered, what he had done and learned, were necessary for the one work of his life. They all appear and reappear, in many forms and in divers manners, a thousand times in the charmed pages of his wondrous version of the Book of Life, which for centuries after Jerome fell asleep have been the joy and the solace, the comfort and the hope of uncounted thousands of loving, weary pilgrims to the King's City.

PORCH OF ST. MARY'S CHURCH, OXFORD

Love of Comrades.

A Winter's Tale by Dora M. Jones, Author of "A Soldier of the King."

PERHAPS one of the worst moments that Charles Forster ever experienced in his life was when he knew that his intimate friend, Maurice Raymond, was coming to Les Charmettes for a fortnight's skating.

People did not go to Les Charmettes in the winter five or six years ago as they do now. The little village at that time of year was practically deserted by the tourist throng, and only one hotel kept its doors open for about twenty enthusiasts—old Alpine Club men and a few of their womenkind—in the great white world of the Alpine winter.

Raymond's note was brought to him by the morning post, as he sat over his coffee and rolls and honey, opposite Sir James Farrar, the great throat specialist, who was there with his daughter Celia and his son Arthur, Forster's old school and college chum. As he read it his face fell, and he half uttered a vexed exclamation.

"Nothing wrong, I hope?" said his kind old friend, Sir James, looking across the table.

Forster assured him that it was nothing particular. How could he have said that his friend's presence would not be welcome to him? They had all heard him speak enthusiastically of Maurice Raymond, and would never have understood why his arrival should be unwelcome. After all, why was it unwelcome?

There are things we are not in a hurry to admit, even to ourselves.

Of course, he reflected, he would be glad to see the old fellow. The only thing was that when you had a thoroughly nice party and were completely at home with one another, an outsider coming in did make a difference. It was never quite the same, and he was having such a delightful time with the Farrars. That was all.

Then Miss Farrar appeared with a sealskin toque on her trim little head and a sealskin coat over her arm. There were only a few other ladies in the hotel; so that, even had she not been the very pretty girl she was, she would probably not have lacked attention, but she was distinguished enough to have made her mark in a regiment of "superfluous women." Forster, needless to say, was her obedient slave, and she made him happy and reduced two or three other young men to a state of pulp by walking off with him as her companion on the glacier excursion which had been planned for the morning.

Charles Forster's great enemy was one which no one would have suspected in the rising barrister. It was a deep-lying self-distrust, not of his capacity in the world of men, but of his power of winning affection. A motherless boy, brought up in an unsympathetic home, bookish at school, unpopular, averse to games, he was generally respected, but made few friends outside the Farrar household, where Arthur looked up to him for his cleverness and the saucy, gay Celia tyrannised over him at her will, till he met Maurice Raymond at Cambridge. They renewed their friendship in London. Forster read for the Bar, worked hard at his profession, and had inherited an income from a relative, which, taken with the fact that he was spoken of as certain to rise, made him not unwelcome in the houses of ladies with daughters and a due sense of their responsibilities. Meanwhile, Raymond, the handsome, brilliant Irishman, had shared the ruin of his family through the depreciation in the value of their estates. He had been forced to study his profession seriously, and after some vicissitudes, in which Forster had borne a part, and of which more hereafter, he had qualified as a surgeon and joined the Army medical service. Since then he had seen some service, had taken part in one or two brilliant exploring expeditions, and had gained distinction, but very little money. In a world which values wealth, respectability, a settled position, a dignified future, there could be no doubt as to which of the friends had done the better; and yet Forster had often felt that he would give up his good income and his professional success, the smiles of the mothers of Kensington, and the politeness of the party chiefs who were looking to him to contest Little Pedlington in the party interest at the next election, for a small fraction of Maurice Raymond's power of winning hearts. Yes; he was doing well enough, but who cared for him? Wherever Maurice went he conquered. The very tradesmen whom he kept waiting for their money, the servants to whom he gave endless trouble by his thoughtless ways, would let themselves be victimised by him to any extent, whereas they stood on their rights with Charles, who paid his bills with the regularity of a machine, and never rang his bell if he could help it. It would be the same again now.

At this point Celia asked him what he was thinking about.

"I was thinking of Raymond," he said, not knowing, in fact, what else to say. "I was wondering when he will be here."

"What, Mr. Raymond, your great friend? The Victoria Cross man? Is he coming to stay here? Are you not delighted?"

"I shall be glad to see him, of course," Forster said; "but when one is having a perfect time, don't you know how one dreads any change that might make it less perfect."

"I wonder you never came out in the winter before if you like it so much," said Celia, with a demure twinkle under her lashes; "but it would be very horrid of you not to be glad to see your friend. I think he is a perfect hero, and I am longing to meet him."

And when they sat down for an al fresco lunch a few minutes later on some logs by the wayside, backed by a grove of snow-laden pines, she proceeded to tell her father and brother how Raymond had won the cross for attending wounded men under fire in one of those Indian frontier wars at some unpronounceable place. He simply stayed there while the bullets were raining round him, and did his duty as calmly as if he had been in a hospital.

"Quite his 'bedside manner,' in fact," said Arthur.

"I hate the present generation," replied the young lady. "I wish I had lived in the dear old early Victorian times, when people were not ashamed to show a little enthusiasm."

"And the porkpie hats and the horsehair chairs."

"Better than cheap cynicism and imitation Chippendale. The old times were better, weren't they, father darling?" she said, with a tender little touch on the old physician's coat-sleeve. "At any rate, I am sure the men were."

II.

IT was a week later. As Forster stood in the hall, about nine o'clock at night, he was aware of much rushing to and fro, the girls of the party running upstairs for their snow boots and furs, the men muffled up and waiting—in short, the usual preliminaries of a great moonlight tobogganing excursion. Mrs. Dudley Brown, a florid matron of juvenile manners, who dragged a neutral-tinted husband in her train, and who could always be relied upon to chaperon a frolic of this kind, stopped on her way through the hall to tell him what an acquisition his friend was. "Everything has gone with a swing since Mr. Raymond came," she said.

At the same moment Raymond came out of the hotel drawing-room immediately behind Celia. "Aren't you coming, old fellow?" he said to his friend.

Celia glanced up at him with the same question in her eyes. She was looking exquisite. Her delicate, unusual beauty—Japanese, some people called it—her look of brilliancy and finish, with her creamy satin skin and the velvet blackness of her eyes, had never struck him as they did in this rough little mountain hotel. Raymond and she had been talking eagerly and gaily since they left the dining table. And now they were going out tobogganing together. Well!

Forster told his friend curtly that he had letters to write

"Won't they wait?" said Celia softly. "Your correspondence was not always so absorbing."

There was reproach in her eyes, and his heart leaped as the thought crossed his mind that she really wished him to come. But the bitter feeling with which he had watched Raymond's handsome head so near hers in the salon five minutes ago was still too strong.

"No," he said, "I don't care for these hilarities. I should only be a spoilsport."

"Everyone to his taste," she responded, with a little air of pique, and she ran up the stairs after the others.

Then Charles Forster betook himself to his room to attend to his correspondence, which important business he managed by staring moodily into the glowing depths of his wood fire, as, lounging back in an armchair, he reviewed the situation since Raymond came. All his presentiments had come true. The handsome Irishman with his dancing eyes and his irresistible tongue, his romantic record, and his winning pleasantness and kindliness, had not merely established himself as the leader in all the amusements of the little society—that was a trifle. He had got himself accepted by the Farrars, who were quite as exclusive and critical as most English people of any standing; he made one in their little excursions; Sir James and Arthur liked him heartily; and Celia—ah, could there be any doubt about Celia?

"My one little ewe lamb," he said to himself bitterly. "The one girl I have ever cared for seriously. And just when I thought she was beginning to like me."

He thought over Maurice's innumerable flirtations—innocent enough, but shallow and fleeting, the follies of a youth who had been spoiled by women for his beauty and his brightness ever since his babyhood; and asked himself if it were possible that such a one could bring any woman a deep heart-whole devotion. And yet, what chance had he now? He only knew he could not bear to look on any longer. Much better to leave at once, to make some excuse and get back to town, before he made an exhibition of himself with his miserable jealousy.

Suddenly a thought came to him that sent a burning heat through his frame. There might be a way of stopping it, if he could bring himself to use it; and why should he be scrupulous when so little consideration was shown to him?

There was a knock at the door, and in came Raymond, looking—splendid Hercules that he was—more triumphantly handsome than ever.

"Done your letters, old chap? You ought to have been with us. We had a glorious time."

"Thanks, I see no fun in sliding down a hill on a tea-tray or any other contrivance, especially in the company of Mrs. Dudley Brown and her train. But you have torn yourself away rather early."

"Oh, the others are still at it. Miss Farrar was tired, and I walked back with her. Then I thought I would look in on you and have a chat. We have not seen much of each other since I came, somehow."

He said it affectionately, but Forster hardened his heart. He was not going to be blarneyed.

"Well, whose fault is that?"

"Oh, no one's. Mine, if you like. I own I haven't much thought left for any but one thing, and I suppose you can guess what that is."

Forster was not going to help him He looked grimly into the fire.

"I never in my life met a girl like Miss Farrar," Raymond continued. "How you could have said so little about her in your letters baffles me. She is wonderfully pretty and dainty, she's clever, she's refined, she's adorably fresh and natural—in short, Charley, old man, it's the real thing this time."

"And so it was last time, and the time before that, and so on, ever since you fell in love with the girl at the tobacconist's at Cambridge."

"I see," said Maurice, looking at him with serious compassion, "I have come at a bad time. Something has put you out. I'll let you go to bed now. To be continued in our next."

"No, no," said Forster, "we'll have it now, please. If you have anything serious to say, say it."

Thus adjured, Maurice stated succinctly that he was over head and ears in love with Miss Farrar, that he had grounds for a modest hope that she would have him if he offered; but that he wanted Forster's assistance in approaching the father.

"It's nonsense, Raymond," Forster exclaimed. "You can't offer yourself to a girl like Miss Farrar. What sort of an income have you got? What sort of position can you give her?"

"I should hope," said Raymond, "that a Raymond of Castle Eden is good enough for a doctor's daughter; and as my cousin Fitzneligan will never marry now, I am bound to come into the title some day."

"I question if Sir James will think the prospect of a needy Irish peerage in twenty years' time particularly attractive.

"Well, hang it! I've come into a little money lately. I'll spend it in buying a West End practice, and my father-in-law can push me on. You know as well as I do that there are plenty of things a man can do with brains and connection. I have never shown what I can do yet, but I have a motive now. I want you to put this to Sir James for me."

There was silence for a minute or two Then Forster said, with a visible effort :

"Look here, Maurice ; we have always been good friends."

"You're the best friend I ever had in the world," cried Maurice, "and that is why I am here this minute."

"I've never refused you a thing yet," Forster went on, "but this thing I can't do for you."

"But why ?"

"Why ? Did it never occur to you ? Because I have hoped for years to make Miss Farrar my wife."

The bright confidence died out of Maurice's look as he replied in a grave, changed voice.

"I am sorry. I might have guessed. No one, of course, could help caring for her, especially you, who have seen so much of them. I see I can't ask you to help me ; but, all the same, a man must think of himself in a matter of this kind. I shall do the best I can alone."

"You are going to make love to Celia Farrar ?"

"I am going to try and win her for my wife."

"No, you are not," cried Forster, leaping out of his chair, his pale, nervous face tense with passion. "I can stop it. I can tell her about that affair in Great Ormond Street. She'll never take you after that."

Maurice had risen too. "You wouldn't do that, Charlie ?" he said, in a low, agitated voice.

"I will, indeed. You say that we must be each for himself in this matter. If she accepts you, she shall, at any rate, do it with her eyes open. I owe her father that much."

"Very well," said Maurice, in high scorn and anger. "Do your worst, I defy you. I was in your debt, Charles Forster, for more than I liked to think ; but you have wiped it out now. That score is settled."

And the men who had been closer than brothers in their love parted like bitter enemies.

III.

THERE is a hamlet about ten miles up the valley from Les Charmettes, which was a favourite goal of the winter sleighing parties. One of these expeditions was planned for the afternoon which followed Maurice's unfortunate explanation with his old friend. Forster excused himself from joining it, and Raymond had—what was a great satisfaction to him at the moment—the opportunity of putting Miss Farrar into her sleigh before his rival's eyes, and following on a "tailing" toboggan.

The arrangement was that they were to have coffee and drive back by moonlight.

Raymond had tried in vain to secure a few words with Celia during the afternoon. She seemed grave and preoccupied, and kept as much as possible at her father's elbow. At last, a little while before the word was given to collect the party for the return, while some of them were chatting in the verandah of the little inn, and others strolling about in twos and threes, admiring the exquisite colour effects of the setting sun on the snow-covered landscape, he saw that she had slipped away and turned into a path among the groves of pines, alone.

He followed her. He had too much to say ; it was not a moment for hesitation.

She looked surprised when she saw him, grave and troubled, but he had determined not to be discouraged.

"Miss Farrar," he began, "I want to ask you two questions, and in order that you may answer them I shall have to tell you a story. Will you listen ?"

She promised, and as he spoke the light of deep sympathy grew in her beautiful eyes. It was hard not to be interested when Maurice spoke, especially when he spoke as he did then. He described a pampered childhood, followed by a sudden change of fortune ; he hinted at the temptations of a great city to a thoughtless, undisciplined lad ; the careless habits fostered by evil company ; and at last the one act of dishonesty, committed in a moment of despair to cover a "debt of honour," at the expense of the friend who had stood by him through all, and who screened him and saved him then. Ought such errors as those, repented, lived down, forgotten or unknown by the world, to bar a man's right to honour and happiness for all his future life ?

"You need not ask," said Celia, with generous eagerness. "It is done with, repented, and lived down. It is no concern of anyone's."

"Then could you, could you," he said, almost stammering with eagerness, "receive such a one, think of him——?"

"As a friend, yes ; and honour him the more for what he had overcome."

"As a friend ?" he repeated. "That brings

"It was hard not to be interested."

me to my second question. I told you that this lad had a friend, who saved him and shielded him, forgave him the fraud, and covered it up so that no one knew of it but their two selves. Suppose that he at last, of all people, were to threaten to make this old story known, in the most damaging, the most hateful way."

Celia interrupted him with passionate energy. "Mr. Raymond, he would never do it."

He looked at her in astonishment, not so much that she had divined him—he had meant that she should—as at her attitude of indignant defence. That she should be so much concerned for Forster's character!

"He could not," she said eagerly. "He might be angry, he might threaten; but when it came to the point, he could do nothing base or ungenerous. Oh, I can't pretend not to know whom you mean, and I am absolutely sure you are wrong."

There was no time for more. The sleighs were waiting at the door of the inn, and the ladies were taking their places for the return journey.

Forster, meanwhile, had spent an unenviable day. After dinner, as he sat and smoked in the hall, he heard one of the men in the salon —a curate from an East End parish — singing one of Kipling's songs. There was a touching quality in the young fellow's voice, and a plaintiveness about the melody, that attracted Forster before he began to listen to the words, and it was only the last verse that he followed throughout.

"Cabul town was ours to take,
Blow the bugle, draw the sword.
I'd have left it for his sake,
His that left me by the ford,
Ford, ford, ford of Cabul river."

Something rose in the throat of the angry man as he listened. The smoky, dimly-lighted hall, and the careless chatter of the guests as they came out in twos and threes grew intolerable. He caught his fur cap and coat from the peg where they hung, wrapped himself up, and went out into the silent purity of the night.

As he crossed the courtyard the sleighs rattled up to the door with the returning party. He passed them quickly lest he should be recognised, and walked with long strides through the village, and along the main valley road. Overhead was the brilliant winter sky, sparkling with innumerable star points, around him the white silent waste. He was alone with his memories.

How he had loved that boy! How he had borne with him, saved him from disgrace, fought for him with the flesh and the devil! And had he gained nothing in return? What would his life have been worth without Maurice's trusting affection, his gay temper, his delightful companionship? He remembered one August when tedious illness kept him in London, and the lad had thrown up an invitation to one of the pleasantest of country houses to be near him in his lonely bachelor quarters, to nurse him and cheer him. The best thing in his life had been this elder-brotherly feeling, for the brilliant, careless fellow whose nature, both in its qualities and defects, "fitted in" so well with his own. All these years Maurice had leaned on him and loved him, and now—and by his own fault—

"Oh, we that were dear, we are all too near,
With the width of the world between us."

A couple of hours had passed somehow before he found himself under the window of the dépendance where Raymond was lodged. Most of the lights were out, for people go early to bed when they winter in the High Alps, but in one room a lamp was still alight. Forster saw his friend's tall figure emerge on the balcony for a minute, and disappear. The French window was shut, and a minute or two afterwards Forster was knocking at Raymond's door.

Maurice looked up in astonishment from the Gladstone bag he was packing.

"Charlie!" was all he could say.

"I am glad you are up, Maurice. I just wanted to tell you that of course I should never say a word about that old affair. I don't know what possessed me to think I could."

"All right," replied Maurice. "She said you wouldn't."

"Who said?"

"Miss Farrar. I told her, you see."

"What!"

"Yes, I told her the whole story, and I am not sorry I did. She is a girl of girls, Charlie. And, what is more, I can tell you, old fellow, she has a most uncommon opinion of you."

"Then I suppose," said Forster, with a gulp, "I am to congratulate you."

Maurice stood up from his work, and laughed a little sadly. "Do you see what I am doing?" he said. "I am packing my bag. Before you have finished breakfast to-morrow, I shall be off. My dear fellow, go in and win. The coast is clear, the road is open. There is one girl in England, or, to be more accurate, in Switzerland at this moment, who knows a good man when she sees him."

"Then, do you mean——" stammered the bewildered Forster.

"I was dreaming, so were you; and a sorry dream it was, bad luck to it, but it's over now. We can't afford to quarrel, eh, old man, especially as you carry off the prize?"

"Rather not," was all Forster had to say for the moment. But as he walked back to his room that evening in the keen frosty starlight, what was uppermost in his mind was not the image of Celia. That would come as he realised that the heart he had sought for so long was his at last. But just then he had no thought for the future. He was absorbed in the solemn sense of a present deliverance. It would be over no murdered friendship, but with the old comrade feeling warm at his heart, that he should step into his new life.

By the Rev. Frederick Hastings.

PAUL gives us a bit of secular history in his first letter to the Corinthians, in the eleventh chapter, verse thirty-two. He tells of King Aretas. The name of one who was ethnarch of Damascus under the king is unknown. Future researches may discover it, but for the present it is hidden. Aretas or Hareth was the father-in-law of Herod, and felt greatly the insult when the latter neglected his daughter for the sake of Herodias. To avenge it he seized Damascus, and certainly, when he afterwards retired to Petra, would leave a strong man over it and its garrison. This man may have been an Arabian or a Jew, who would doubtless obey orders implicitly. Whether Aretas was prejudiced against Paul or not, we know that the governor or ethnarch certainly objected to his presence in the city.

Paul's conversion was a sort of birthday in the world's history. He spent the first three years after that remarkable change in Damascus or in Arabia. There he doubtless had great influence. Possibly he came in contact with the governor. He may have spoken to him as plainly concerning moral and religious matters as he did afterwards to Felix. When he came back at intervals from Arabia to Damascus he evidently proclaimed the Gospel with power, and put to confusion the Jews. They were annoyed that they could not controvert his utterances, and had therefore recourse to that "force" which has been called by one the "last argument of a desperate cause." His conversion was startling, and the Jews could not deny it. He showed that Christianity was perfectly demonstrable, and that the expected Messiah had come. The Jews, in their deadly malignity, planned to get rid of Paul. They seem to have won the ethnarch over to their scheme. Professing to hate Herod, they would the more easily win over this man to their murderous plot. They, as Conybeare says, "furnished the motive, the ethnarch the military force." By the way in which the account is given we should infer that the commandant of the garrison was himself the subject of an increasing prejudice. The expression "desirous to apprehend" does not fully give the force of the phrase. He had a fixed purpose to seize Paul, and in every way he sought to carry his project into effect. He "kept" the city. He had the gateways carefully watched by day and by night. He had strictly commanded the guards to seize the renegade, turncoat, traitor—that ringleader of a seditious sect. Exact and detailed description of the proscribed man would be given. The governor intended to make short work of him. A bow string would strangle his earnestness, or a sweep of the sword cut short his career. The apostle was in great danger. Every outlet from the city was closed to him. He remained in hiding as long as possible. This would be trying to a restless, energetic man like him. He must attempt something. Is there no one to help? He is hunted like a hare from point to point, from street to street, from house to house. He seems completely hemmed in.

We doubt not but that Paul had recourse to God in prayer. "O Lord, defeat the arms of this military tyrant, deliver me from the mouth of this lion." But prayer was followed by effort. He keeps an open ear to any suggestion. Some individual believer has an idea. A friend has a house on the wall with overhanging windows, where a rope and a basket might offer means of escape. The risk is great to all, but if the apostle will venture to get into a basket he may evade the clutches of the governor. He consents. He waits in that house by the wall for darkness. He creeps up. A board is lifted between the ornamental beams. Fast hold of the rope cling several of his faithful friends. The tireless missionary, the expounder of Christian doctrine, the great apostle of the Gentiles, crouches in that non-creaking basket—a basket such as those slung over the camels to-day in the same streets, ofttimes with fuel or food. Slowly, silently, the apostle is lowered. No word of farewell is loudly uttered, for the watchmen on the wall would hear it. At length, disentangling himself, Paul creeps along the wall in shadow to some bank or deep shade of tree, and so finds security.

He can breathe now. He might still be seized by prowling guards or watchful sentinel. But he escaped, having passed through a period of intense anxiety, which evidently made a deep impression upon him. He refers to it afterwards as one of the pivotal points in his life

The ethnarch who kept the city could not keep all in his power. There was a greater than himself. He had not taken God into account. Paul had. That man of small stature and strong convictions was under the protection of a mightier King than the emir of the rocky fastness of Petra or the Emperor of Romé.

Note, then, that God can always find a way of escape for His servants. He is never baffled. His help comes in the most unexpected manner, and at the extremest point of our need. Thus Peter found it; shut in prison, the gates were opened unexpectedly. Daniel found it in the lions' den, when God shut every mouth as with iron bands. Jeremiah found that God delivers when an Ethiopian eunuch was moved to draw him up out of the miry prison. Further back still the Israelites found that when the foe was behind and the sea before them, a path was made through the waters. Thus many of God's servants have found deliverance. Thus Wycliffe found that John of Gaunt stood by him. Thus Luther found it when the Elector Frederic shielded him. God has His window and basket for men who put their trust in Him. He has also one that just fits—one the right size even for the fearful, as well as for the courageous. God knows where to find it and when to bring it out, and He produces it always in good time.

We cannot but notice, also, that insignificant things are often used by God to help His servants. The rod of a Moses is used at one time to deliver His people; the jawbone of an ass in the hands of a Samson at another. A smooth stone from the brook in the sling of a David is used to save a nation; stricken sinners are healed by the sight of a brazen serpent; a prophet is carried to his destination by a shark. God accomplishes His purpose by the arrow shot at a venture. He saves a nation by the sleepless night of a monarch. He delivers by the rumour in the ear. He alarms the enemies of Israel by the ditches of blood-red aspect. In this case a mere basket and piece of rope become the salvation of an apostle. More remarkable still, a cross becomes the sign of the salvation of the world, and an ancient gallows is seen to be rayed with glory.

We have to recognise the fact that the way of God's deliverances are sometimes humiliating to carnal nature. We can imagine that when Paul first looked at that basket he would shrink from creeping into it. Shall he who had sat at the feet of Gamaliel, he who had been accounted a great Jewish rabbi, he who was conscious of great abilities to rule, he who had seen the risen Christ, shall he have to submit to such humiliation as to crouch in possibly an old, repulsive, and strong-smelling basket? Yes, that is God's way. So it may seem repugnant to some to be saved and gain eternal life simply by faith in a crucified Saviour. It is not the way proud human reason would prefer. We like not to be reduced to depend on another. We have no objection to admire Christ, to attach ourselves to Him as a great leader, or as an inspiring example of self-sacrifice; but to admit that our forgiveness is not through a general passableness of character, but through the work of another—that our eternal life is through simple faith in another—this is not the way which we should have preferred. The Cross is still to many a stone of stumbling, and its preaching sounds like "foolishness."

An apostle in the basket dangling from a beam outside a wall would be a strange object by daylight, and a proud man at the foot of the cross is just such a remarkable centre of attraction. Over it angels may even stand in mute astonishment; for it they will even wake up praise in heaven. They know how much is involved. When a spirit escapes from sin's besetments, from its prejudices, from its slavery, it is a joy to the angels. We can imagine how the arch-enemy of souls, like the Damascus ethnarch, would, at the sight, gnash his teeth with anger in the abode of his despair. The spirit of malignity and envy must be piqued and angered when the snares are broken and the walls of hindrance to good are fallen.

The ethnarch was foiled, even as Saul was foiled when David by Michal's desire escaped. He was foiled as Benhadad was foiled when the prophet warned the Israelitish king over and over again as to an intended assault by his enemy. He was foiled as Herod was foiled when the wise men went not back to tell of where Christ was born. He was foiled as the officers who were sent to take Christ were foiled and compelled to return and say, "Never man spake like this Man." He was foiled as the forty men were foiled who found themselves under an oath not to eat or drink until they had killed Paul. Paul's sister's son carried the report to the Roman officer, and those men must have had long to wait for their breakfasts.

How the ethnarch of Damascus would rage when his officers said that Paul could not be taken, but that he had escaped and was preaching in another city! "Foiled! Foiled by that Paul! My precautions useless—my watchings vain!" Thus will the Evil One be foiled in respect to those who trust in the work of the Crucified One, and humble themselves under the mighty hand of God.

The Evil One sees a congregation gathered, and he says, "I will scatter their thoughts; that Gospel shall not be effectual; that preacher shall not win souls. I will pluck away the seed." Just then a sinner cries, "God have mercy on me." The Devil cries, "Foiled!" "Foiled" echoes to the uttermost dark ridges of despair.

Thus we are sure that if the arch-enemy of souls thinks that in the world the truth of God will be undermined, he will eventually be foiled. Whatever form the attack on truth may take, however keen may be the watch on the part of some to overthrow the servants of the truth, God's word will still be secure. Although the discoveries and speculations of some may be placed in antagonism to the truth, the reverent researches of others will show that there is no need to think that a true science is necessarily opposed to religion, and the doctrine of development merely a "development." Science need not be opposed to Christ. It must, if true science, fit in with the doctrines of Christ. "He must reign." All enemies must be put under His feet. The subtlest schemes even of Satanic hate will be seen to be only as the "baseless fabric of a vision." Devilish designs against souls, against the truth, against Christ or His Church, must eventually be defeated.

Ah! men may well ponder what they are doing when they set themselves against the truth. They will be "hoist with their own petards." They will be defeated like the Damascene ethnarch. I once heard that earnest evangelist Fleidner, of Madrid, tell of how persecutors in Spain were foiled. He had been becalmed in the Bay of Biscay, and translated into Spanish the hymn, "Eternal Father, strong to save." The sailors learned it, and when, for some infringement of ecclesiastical law, they were fined they had no money to clear the fine. Being unable to pay, they were thrown into prison for ten days. At the end of that period they were still unable to pay, and were remanded for another ten days. They still sang and rejoiced. The priest, hearing of their remand, himself went to the judge praying that the sailors might be released. Said he, "If they stay in prison longer, singing their hymns, alas! I shall soon have no one left in all the town to come and hear mass." One can easily understand his desire when we remember that in Spain prisoners can see and speak with their friends from the window grating. Hence the tremendous effect of the singing of that beautiful hymn. The incident illustrates aptly how all opponents of truth must always count on eventually being foiled.

We can imagine how great would be the apostle's gratitude for his deliverance from the Damascene governor. What should not be the depth of our thankfulness when we find we have been for ever delivered from temptation and sin and death?

The God who foiled the ethnarch and set Paul free can deliver us. But we must trust Him. We must accept His plan. We must not despise His way, nor expect the miraculous when the ordinary will serve. While we are grateful for deliverances, let us Christians be active and learn how the humblest may be useful to help forward the Gospel. And if we have only a basket, let us use it. Let us use any and every talent for Christ. Let us by any means glorify Him, and so foil the evil designs of the great enemy of souls.

A CONFIRMED BACHELOR

By Beatrice M. Brown.

"HE is quite a confirmed bachelor, my dear," Mrs. Martin was saying in one of her most assertive tones.

"Humph!" ejaculated the American woman, shrugging her shoulders, "there is no such prodigy as a confirmed bachelor."

"And yet," persisted her visitor, "you will find out, in time, that I am right. Yes, a confirmed bachelor, and the most strong-minded man I have ever encountered." And the disappointed matchmaker slightly frowned at the thought of her unsuccessful campaign.

"Humph!" Miss Bolton ejaculated again, "it's not so easy to tell whether a man be strong-minded or only obstinate."

But such fine disquisitions were quite foreign to little Mrs. Martin's mind, so she answered not a word, thus proving once more that "even a fool when he holdeth his peace is counted wise, and he that shutteth his lips is esteemed a man of understanding."

"And what may his strong point be?" Miss Bolton asked.

"In what way?"

"Well, what does he get excited, flustered about? Has he a hobby?"

"Oh, I see. He takes a great interest in missions."

"Um!" and Miss Bolton looked thoughtful. "Splendid!" she said, after a moment. "That's it."

Mrs. Martin wondered whether this woman were just a trifle wrong in her head. But no, her next question was quite a sensible one.

"What kind of missions?"

"All kinds. Principally Chinese, I believe."

"Splendid!" Miss Bolton reiterated.

Mrs. Martin's eyes turned to the clock.

"Dear me, it is six o'clock!" she cried in dismay, and rose to go. How time had seemed to fly. She had been there over an hour.

"I will come and call on you soon," Miss Bolton said, following her newly-made acquaintance to the door, and I will show you how to make those cuffs. Yellow silk and green velvet. Don't forget. Good-bye."

Mrs. Martin smiled as she walked up the street. "Yellow silk and green velvet! But I must humour her. I hope Lewis won't be a fool and let this chance also slip by. He is another of my failures. But brothers, especially elder ones, are not manageable. Now it was quite sweet of her to let me know how rich she was. Fancy an Englishwoman coming out with such a statement! Hope, however, she will not be so frank with everyone else."

Meanwhile, the object of these considerations had taken up her work—one of the green velvet cuffs, and was also softly speaking to herself. "Strange people these English! Quite babes in such matters. But, lah! it is we Americans who know how to manage the men. Now, with this kind it is always wiser to begin with a right-down good quarrel. Put him down, trample on him—anything that will force him to think of you. When once he is really interested in you, the hardest part of the task is over. I should like to try it myself, but, even if I wished to, I am too old to marry now, and I should not like—but there, it would not break his heart, in any case, for I am no beauty—never was," and she looked up at the reflection of the big angular face in the mirror and smiled.

She forgot, or did not take into account, that the smile was pleasant, even bewitching, for beneath the matter-of-fact exterior was a large, yearning, empty heart, which had never found its rightful inmate. She was, by no means, the woman in a thousand. Oh no; she was fretful at times and easily hurt, and, as most of us, she was not quite free from cant; but she loved children and flowers and righteousness and truth and courage. There was so much of the simplicity and ingenuity of a girl in this great big woman; something which forcibly reminded one of wide stretches of land and infinite horizons. She had been the best of daughters to her old widowed father and the kindest of sisters to Flossie and Eva. Now these were both married to Englishmen, and she was alone. But at forty-five one has got used to one's own company, and has generally schooled oneself into the belief that to be free and independent is the best thing, after all.

As she turned her eyes away from the unflattering mirror, the door opened and Dr. Robertson was announced. Miss Bolton was quick at preparing her smile of welcome; she deemed it "good style."

"How do you do, Dr. Robertson? Glad to see you," was what she said. Mentally, she was asking herself how anyone could possibly care for such an insignificant bit of humanity, or wish to marry him.

Not that this red-haired man was much beneath the average height of an Englishman; but his stoop made him appear much shorter than he really was. His face bore the indelible signs of past hardships; but the mouth and eyes told silent tales of kindness, and the smile which hovered around them at the unexpected greeting spoke of a sensitive soul.

He came forward in a somewhat shambling fashion, more due to habit than to timidity.

"I meant to come before, but I have been very busy preparing some young people for confirmation," he said, speaking as through closed teeth. His thoughts were always so occupied with his work and the welfare of his flock, that, when not talking of what lay near his heart, he made a poor conversationalist. But Miss Bolton, as a true American, could make up for that. She easily ran through all kinds of topics; she touched on America and its idiosyncrasies, then passed on to England and France, and finally successfully landed in China.

Then the clergyman's moment had come. He pressed his hands together nervously, and paid no heed to her further remarks.

"I am greatly interested in these poor Chinese," he said abruptly, interrupting her

The American woman was on the point of smiling, but she refrained.

"Poor Chinese?" she said, staring inquisitively at him. "And pray, why do you consider them poor?"

"Don't you know? Oh, surely you must feel sorry for them, labouring under delusions. We who are more advanced——"

"Are we?"

"So far above them in the matter of civilisation, we ought to help them."

"Now, Dr. Robertson, I am afraid we cannot agree——"

"Not agree that——"

"No; I consider the Chinese quite as civilised as the average Englishman—in fact, far more so in many respects."

"But you are mistaken," and his tone implied more than his words.

"I beg your pardon. Prove it."

"Well, to begin with, think of the poor Chinese women. What lives! They might as well not exist."

"Just so. Now please look at the English woman—I do not mean the upper classes, although even they are in sad plight! Think of the selfish husbands, the tyrannical husbands, the intemperate husbands."

"But they are not all so."

"Oh no, not all; but a very great number of them. Why, the life of a Chinese woman is a state of bliss compared to that of many of your countrywomen."

Dr. Robertson was not clever at arguing, and he felt ruffled. Moreover, he was not used to have his statements confuted.

"But surely their religion——"

Like most deeply religious people, the Doctor did not care to speak of what he felt so keenly; but here he was compelled for the sake of argument.

"Religion!" she put in. "Why, as far as that goes, it is more thorough than the European, and nobler in many respects."

She did not for a moment doubt that Christianity in itself was incomparably above Buddhism, Confucianism, and the like. What she meant by her crude statement was that in the faithful practice of the religious duties of the heart many of those we call heathens could teach us many a wholesome lesson. But the Doctor was shocked, and did not hide it. After a few commonplace remarks he rose to go. He had purposed asking this rich American for a contribution to foreign missions, but under the circumstances that was out of the question. He went home to his solitary dinner and, to his housekeeper's astonishment, forgot to make his usual kind remark about the food she so carefully prepared for him; and she was still more astonished, later on, when, having gone to bid him good-night, she found him sitting with his face in his hands and his books all closed.

The fact was that Miss Bolton's words had impressed him, as she had meant them to do, and he had done the best thing he could under the circumstances; he had given himself up to think the matter out. The American woman had vexed him; but withal, had not failed to awaken his interest.

In fact, their discussions did not end with that first meeting. Miss Bolton returned the clergyman's call within a few days, and when they separated it was on more friendly terms, although he had not succeeded in convincing her on the Chinese question.

As time went by, their friendship grew stronger, and the American old maid, with all her hostile ideas, proved a great help in his church.

She brought the women together by instituting all kinds of practical charitable work; and although at times she was laughed at for her pains, yet it was never in an unkind vein, for both young and old had learned to love this abrupt, outspoken stranger from over the seas.

Mrs. Martin was, perhaps, the only one who was not satisfied with the turn matters had taken. Although she had planned all sorts of excursions, fetes, and such-like, and had tried all in her power to bring her brother and Miss Bolton together, she was beginning to realise that even this campaign promised to be a failure. If she could have guessed what was going on beneath the surface, she would have harshly reproved herself for having ever mentioned missions or their upholders.

But as it was, neither she nor anyone else knew Miss Bolton's thoughts, and much less her feelings. In fact, the American was not quite sure of them herself. As a practical woman she put herself the question, "Do I love him? Should I care to live with him? Shall I make him love me?"

That she could fail to bring him to her feet, if she cared to, she never for one moment imagined.

There was no doubt that the growing friendship between them, and the confiding trust he had put in her was more than pleasing to her. If he went out of her life, she would sorely miss him, and whenever he failed to call she began to experience a strange new feeling of impatience. And yet nothing in their relationship led others to suspect that more than mere platonic friendship existed between them.

One stormy afternoon he dropped in, on his way back from a collecting tour. He looked weary and fagged, and Miss Bolton was quick to perceive it. The rain was pouring down, as only autumn rain can, and the parsonage was half a mile up hill.

"You must dine with me, Dr. Robertson," she cheerfully said, handing him a cup of tea.

And as he raised a deprecatory hand and glanced at his mud-bespattered clothes, she went on, "I take no refusal. We will dispense with evening dress; I can get plenty of those any day. Twenty years ago I was more used to homespun."

"And I to a very different kind in China. Perhaps those would be more to your liking," he said, with a faint shadow of amused irony.

She laughed good-humouredly. "As a true Californian, I hate black, and dearly love colours. But I had no idea that you had lived in China yourself; that accounts for your interest in the people."

He did not answer her; a far-away look stole into his pale blue eyes. She could not help being impressed by it, and she wondered at the infatuation of this man.

"Why did you come back to Europe, then?" she asked, following her own train of thoughts.

He turned his eyes from the fire, and looked away.

"Gracious me! The man is weeping, or, at least, not far from it." And the mother-love, born in every noble woman, rose within her. There was then something personal, as well as missionary work in this matter.

"How obtuse of me," she said to herself. "Poor fellow!"

He saw the pity in her eyes, and knew that she had guessed. What could he do but tell her all? It was the old, old story. He had known her out there in China—a frail-looking Californian, with all the energy of a man and the insight and kindness of a real good woman. Then, after nearly a year of daily intercourse, she had received a call to the interior, and had not been heard of for months. Meanwhile, he had sickened, and been sent home, a wreck of his former self. When fairly recovered, he had written, making inquiries about her; but for answer all he got was that it was believed she had gone back to America, but even that was not sure.

"What's her name?" asked Miss Bolton.

"Lucy Clare."

"Ah!" and the American woman bit her lip. "And were you engaged?"

"Not exactly, but—you know."

As a matter of fact, Miss Bolton had never been in the case to know. But is there a woman that does not understand, even although she has never known?

"Yes," she softly said.

The gong sounded just then, and the subject was dropped, and during the meal they managed to keep up a fairly lively conversation—this man and this woman—while each was busy with other thoughts.

"'Gracious me! The man is weeping, or, at least, not far from it.'"

He took leave soon after dinner, and Miss Bolton gave him a friendly grasp of the hand, and as he passed under the window she called out a cheery "Good-night!" Then she rang for Johanna, and told her that on no account was she to be disturbed.

Left alone, she crouched by the fire. She felt cold, and the pain in her hip, from which she often suffered, was intensified. She had no doubt now that she loved him, and that she wanted him. Had she then gone through life, to reach the supreme moment of bliss? Why shatter the glistening cup of joy? For in time, if she so willed it, he would marry her—of that she was sure.

"O'er the land of the just
And the home of the brave——" came ringing in her ears, with the old refrain—"Just and brave"—that had always been her motto. Should she then fall short of what was right? No, oh no! Even to have entertained the thought was unworthy of her. But there was a new ache to carry about with her now. Oh! the yearning of a heart which has found its rightful inmate and knows that it must not appropriate it.

She went to bed, and lay awake all through the night; but the next morning she rose at her usual hour, and before breakfast a letter had been written and sent to the post.

A month went quietly by. Neither Miss Bolton nor the clergyman ever referred to that memorable evening, and he was man enough of the world to be able to meet her without the least sign of constraint. Moreover, there was that something about her—the strength of the man and the insight and tact of the woman—which made him feel quite at his ease—although she knew.

The whole town was astonished one morning by the news that the American lady had a friend visitor from over the seas.

"Fancy coming down upon her so suddenly! Miss Bolton herself could not have known previously, or she would have told me," Mrs. Martin cried in astonishment.

But, as it happened, Mrs. Martin would have been the last person to whom Miss Bolton would have confided anything in the way of a secret.

The callers did not fail to drop in, but were disappointed for their pains.

"My friend is not very strong, and is resting," was all they obtained by way of food for gossip, and they found out, when they had left, that they had not even learnt the stranger's name.

That was on Saturday. On Sunday she did not appear in church, to the great disappointment of the curious amongst the flock. But Mrs. Martin, to her extreme annoyance, overheard Miss Bolton asking Dr. Robertson to go up to tea that afternoon. If it had been any other day but the Sabbath she would have ventured calling, under some pretext or other.

Miss Bolton, however, had carefully laid her plans, and she did not mean to have them thwarted.

Three o'clock, and the two American women sat cheerfully chatting of things at home and the past. Withal, Miss Bolton was on the qui vive, and kept her eyes steadfastly fixed on the street.

Suddenly she started. "Just so," she said, a propos of nothing, "I must fetch a book I promised the Doctor. Excuse me a moment." And she was gone.

"Dr. Robertson," the maid announced, and shut the door behind him.

It took Miss Bolton about twenty minutes to find that book—quite a wonder for such a careful, methodical person, but——

On returning to the sitting-room, she turned the handle of the door noisily, and paused a moment to let those within know of her coming. But on entering, two pairs of blue eyes looked up into hers. Possibly the owners thought themselves in China, and wondered who had thus come to disturb them. But, as light suddenly dawned upon them, they rose to meet her.

"I wish you joy," Miss Bolton quietly said, taking their outstretched hands in hers; and a glorified smile shone on her countenance, irradiating the plain features with a halo divine.

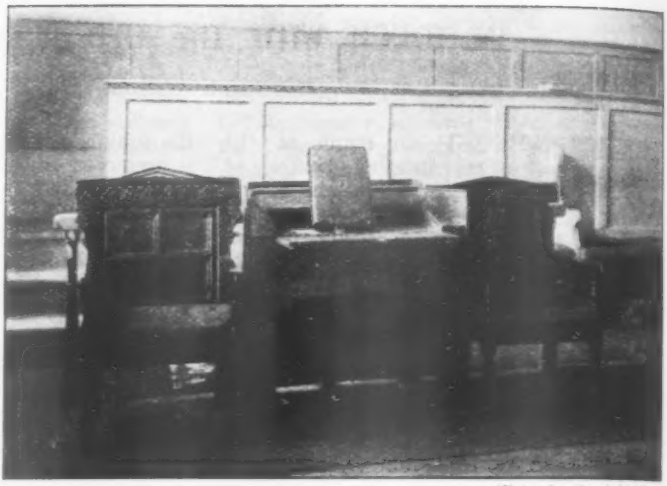
And wot you not that her happiness was as great as theirs?

IN TOUCH WITH THE OLD PURITANS.

By Sarah Wilson.

THOUGH so many of the first meeting-houses of the earliest Nonconformists have been rebuilt, either on account of dangerous dilapidations, or because of the selection of more accessible sites, or for the sake of more accommodation, it is a matter of satisfaction that in various parts of the kingdom there are yet a few of the buildings still standing that were reared by the steadfast Puritans in the days of old.

(Photo: Cassell and Co., Ltd.)



THE ANCIENT CHAPEL OF TOXTETH LIVERPOOL

Moreover, in those chapels that have been entirely rebuilt, we may often find some relic of the first simple building carefully preserved in it, which keeps us in touch with the old pious builders. For instance, in the rebuilt Ancient Chapel of Toxteth Park, as it is called, Liverpool, reared on the site of that built by the first settlers among their farms and meadows, there is a stone from the original edifice carefully placed in a prominent position over one of the windows. It has the date 1650 cut upon it. Some of the woodwork, too, carved with the initials D and M, with the same date, is preserved among the pews; and there is a bell in use there dated 1751, which is said to have been a gift from Oliver Cromwell, which was then recast. In the Presbyterian chapel in Alnwick, known as St. James's Church, which has been also entirely rebuilt, the tablets that marked the date of erection of the edifice taken down have been inserted in the walls of the new one. The original pulpits and other items of furnishing have been retained, too, in several new erections, as well as a few chairs, a few chained books, some items of Communion plate and alms-dishes.

Some of these interesting old structures, however, have only been enlarged, and retain within themselves two or three of the walls that were reared with so much zeal more than two hundred years ago, as well as several other features connected with the old Puritans. Others have been but slightly touched, except for repairs; and, as stated, some few remain as first erected. The bare whitewashed walls, the earthen or brick floors, and the plain forms for seats, in some of them, give us a very good idea of the rigorous-minded people who reared them.

There is one built by George Fox for the Society of Friends at Swarthmoor. Over the doorway is a stone on which is cut: "Ex dono G.F. 1688." Within are the same white-washed walls, unpainted seats, and the flagged floor, that were there from the first. There is a large Bible padlocked to a desk in it, printed by Richard Grafton in 1541, that was also the gift of George Fox. The meeting-house at Chalfont, with its bare white walls, oaken panelling, lattice windows, and brick floor, is another example. Knutsford Chapel will come to mind as a most interesting instance. It consists of a long, two-storied building, the upper one forming the gallery; and on the exterior at either end are flights of stone steps giving access to this upper part. In the recesses under the stairs are the approaches to the body of the building on the ground floor. It is so mellow with its years, so fraught with associations, so serene and orderly, it is a pleasure to look upon it, irrespective of its hallowed association with the memory of Mrs. Gaskell. We hear of others that were originally like it, at Dean's Row and Macclesfield.

(Photo: Cassell and Co. Ltd.)

BIBLE IN THE MEETING-HOUSE AT SWARTHMOOR, PADLOCKED TO DESK, THE GIFT OF GEORGE FOX, AND TWO CHAIRS BELONGING TO GEORGE FOX.

Matthew Henry's Chapel in Chester is of another form. It is square and lofty, and divided by two rows of oaken columns into a nave with aisles. In 1707 another congregation joined that already meeting there, which led to the erection of a gallery to acquire the needful extra accommodation, and after many years the space under the gallery was partitioned off, and made into schoolrooms. The great bulk of the building is the same as that of which the foundation-stone was laid in September, 1699. Matthew Henry wrote word in his diary that an older place of assembly proved inconvenient, and as "most places had built them new chapels, so it was agreed that we should build one." He took possession of it in August, 1700, and wrote subsequently, "It is a very commodious, capacious, pleasant place, and many a comfortable day we have had in it. Blessed be God." There are many particulars concerning it preserved in the chapel records — the names of the staunch Nonconformists who defrayed its cost; details relating to the workmen engaged on it, and the price of repairs in 1763—which enable us to realise various circumstances of interest.

(Photo: Cassell and Co. Ltd.)

MEETING-HOUSE BUILT BY GEORGE FOX FOR THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS AT SWARTHMOOR.

A petition addressed to the Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England gives us significant information relating to the form of chapels and churches in the seventeenth century. It stated that a brief was granted, laid, and collected in the City of London and in six counties, in the years 1641 and 1642, for the rebuilding of the parish church of Long Ditton in the County of Surrey, and that certain of the moneys then collected were remaining in the hands of Dr. Thomas Evelyn for the past twelve years, and that the ruin and exposure of the church was meanwhile getting worse and worse. But seeing that the church had to be rebuilt, the petitioners prayed that it might not be "re-edified" in the old superstitious form of chancel, church, and church-porch, "but in one entire roome as more convenient place for dispensing ye ordinances of God's publique worship to ye greater edification of all." The chapels of the Nonconformists were all built as "one entire room." A list of the briefs received and collected for in Matthew Henry's chapel was kept from 1713 to 1739. In 1728 the brief presented for Trinity Church, Chester, was responded to by the congregation to the amount of twelve shillings and sixpence. Some other items set down in the books belonging to this chapel are of equal old-time interest. A family going to New England had a gift of a shilling. Another, with a recommendation from Dr. Calamy, with the still inadequate sum of two shillings.

(Photo: G. Ward, Amersham.)

JORDANS MEETING-HOUSE, CHALFONT.

A minister required on account of the illness of the one in charge was rewarded with six shillings and sixpence.

Besides the chained Book at Swarthmoor, there is another relic from early Nonconforming days chained to the Communion table at Lydgate, a few miles from Huddersfield. This consists of three volumes of Tillotson s sermons. As we know that a copy of Matthew Henry's Commentaries was once chained under the gallery of his Chester chapel, we may conclude there may have been others elsewhere that have since been removed. The instances that remain bring us closely in touch with the past, as do the articles of church plate that have seen similar years of personal association and careful handling.

(Photo: Cassell and Co., Ltd.)

KNUTSFORD CHAPEL.

The Presbyterian chapel at Newbury, now Unitarian, is another of the original buildings of the days of William and Mary still left to us. Its serene simple front has three gables and two tiers of mullioned windows. It was founded in 1697; and with the earnestness of those days, when the practice of extra-mural interments was only just beginning to be advocated by Sir Christopher Wren and others, it was thought fitting, on the death of an esteemed minister, to bury him at the foot of the pulpit.

Ipswich possesses an ancient meeting-house of equal charm, known as St. Nicholas's. It is a timber framework building, filled in with lath and plaster; with many of the old staid features undisturbed. There is another old-world chapel of a much earlier date at Horningsham, in Wiltshire, which has on its picturesque front a tablet inscribed 1566. This place of worship is understood to have originated with a party of Scottish masons brought to the spot by Sir John Thynne for the purpose of building Longleat House, who objected to attending the services in the parish church. The grant sets out that the walls are never to be raised, and the roof is always to be thatched. Compliance with these requirements has handed the building down to us with its earliest aspect unimpaired; its hipped roof covered with thatch, its sedate doorways and dormer windows, and its general air of steadfastness and sturdiness. A Cheshire chapel, at Hill Cliffe, near Warrington, has in its graveyard a stone dated 1528, and another 1599. Jordans meeting-house, belonging to the Society of Friends, is another edifice that has endured but little structural change since its erection. Members of this branch of Nonconformity still meet in a part of the Dominican Friary, at Bristol, undisturbed by the changes around. As a rule, however, the larger towns have made most havoc with the buildings reared or used by the earliest Dissenters, owing to the great increase in the number of worshippers, and the ample means at their disposal. However desirable and admirable large modern edifices may be, all the same, it must be owned, there is an indescribable attraction in the modest efforts of the devout and ardent people, now generally spoken of collectively as Puritans. Their presence lights up the narrow lane or by-way, or quiet nook, in which they are situated; and as we look upon them, weather-beaten as they may be, we can but picture the streams of pious people so long ago departed to the mercy of God, who threaded the inconsiderable approaches to them with unflinching courage and enduring constancy, and feel ourselves, to an extent incommunicable, in touch with them.

(Photo: Cassell and Co., Ltd.)

MATTHEW HENRY'S CHAPEL, CHESTER.

As we look at the interiors of these old meeting-houses, it is interesting to consider the aspect and characteristics of the congregations that took their seats in them in placid silence so many years ago. Their costumes would be different from our own—with strange articles of attire not known to us now, save by mention in old books (Pepys writes of a jackanapes coat with silver buttons brought him by his brother, of a black camlet coat with silver buttons, of black silk suits, linen and black cloth stockings and wide canons); their coins, to be given generously on occasions, would be impressed with other royal profiles, William and Mary side by side, and later Queen Anne and George I.; their speech would have many different accents from those now in use, and some words, especially exclamatory, perhaps, that have since become obsolete; and their thoughts would turn to subjects very different from those that occupy our own, though it might be the news of the day—fresh enactments in their favour or against them, the return of Charles, the departure of James, the landing of William, the provisions of the Toleration Act, or the arguments of the divines of the time, or contents of works "of godly and wholesome doctrine"; or wonderments as to the safety and well-doing of those who had left England for Holland and America. We know there were many brave men among them who suffered gladly for what they considered right, and many faithful matrons and flower-buds of maidens as staunch and steadfast; and that it is to their earnestness we owe some of the privileges of which we are so proud. Then there would be the hearty, solemn service, perhaps with congratulations afterwards that it had not been disturbed (by constables, informers, magistrates, or soldiers), and finally the friendly dispersion from the inconsiderable lane or nook in which the building was situated. The state of the roads would present difficulties to be got over, and the absence of efficient lighting would make evening services in the winter months undertakings requiring considerable determination, quite apart from the consequences of zealous opposition from those who did not approve of their dissent.

(Photo: Cassell and Co., Ltd.)

IPSWICH: ANCIENT MEETING-HOUSE, KNOWN AS ST. NICHOLAS.

It is computed that the efforts to suppress Nonconformity lasted for four generations. Some of the dates of the earliest congregations take us a long way back. In Newcastle-on-Tyne the first gathering together of Baptists consisted of members of Cromwell's army in 1650. We read of them as meeting in a building on the steep Tuthill Stairs, which contained a large room. In 1652 another congregation gathered together in Hexham. North Shields had one in 1662, and South Shields, Penrith, Whitehaven, and Newbury, among other places, had meeting-places before the century was out. Kendal and Stafford have passed down to us their original meeting-houses. Remote places among the hills and lakes followed suit. We hear of one early meeting-house at Gulliford, in Devonshire, as being in the middle of a wood, and of the only access to it being a narrow footpath, though the congregation numbered some 500 souls from the neighbouring Exeter and Exmouth. After a time the wood was cut down and a portion of the site provided for the erection of a meeting-house for "the people commonly called Presbyterians" in 1689.

(Photo: Cassell and Co., Ltd.)

HORNINGSHAM CHAPEL, WILTS.

"PURE RELIGION AND UNDEFILED."

By James Miller, Fairyburn.

"Reading to her the blessed words of peace."—p. 303.

IN our countryside each season has its own particular charms, and no change in the weather develops but can at once claim a section of our small community as more favourably disposed to it than to any other portion of our year. The days of summer have a large following; the long clearness, and the beauty of the face of Nature at this period, making outdoor work practically a day-by-day holiday.

But those of winter can likewise claim admirers; the older farmers, the dominie, the inn-keeper, watch the advent of this season with impatient anticipation, and at the first nip in the night air enthusiastically greet one another with such as:

"Ay! its drawin', Dauvid; I'm certain o't. Gi'e her a clear week, and who says but you and I'll be tearin' back and forrit wi' switch and stane, fightin' the battles o' last year ower again!"

In the year particularly of which I write we had had an exceptional spell of frost. For weeks the Knaeck burn had proved an excellent sledge-run to the youths of the Loaning, and the soap-boxes which their respective fathers had converted into sleighs, with the aid of two chair-backs to act as "runners," at the first signs of frost, had long since developed unmistakable signs of rough usage, but earth, burn, and pond were still bound hard and fast.

It was a delightful Sabbath morning towards the end of March. Through the night there had been a slight fall of snow, just sufficient to give a fresh appearance to that of the previous day, and as yet no footstep had wandered abroad to disturb its perfect purity. But before nightfall it was doomed to be very much otherwise, for on the Sabbath I believe more people pass by my cottage door than on all the other days of the week taken together. There are very few indeed of the Loaning villagers who do not betake themselves at least once on that day to the kirk of their fathers, standing far up on the braeside.

This, too, is a day in the history of our kirk. Our old minister, ripe in years and good deeds, has gone to reap his reward, and to-day we have to pass a criticism on him whom our Committee unanimously recommends as a successor.

When it was first intimated that a young City assistant had been selected to come amongst us and stand for trial, there was no lack of householders eager to have the honour of putting him up for the time, but all willingly gave way before the claim of worthy Mrs. Eadie. In doing so, we call to remembrance a young man, beloved by the whole village years before, who came home one day from the City College, to find awaiting him a call to the Greater Ministry beyond.

From the interior of "Ivy-Twine" Cottage, it is evident that Mrs. Eadie has been early at work, getting all made comfortable for her guest; a huge log fire is blazing in the parlour grate, and the sofa has been drawn invitingly close to it, while a pair of hand-sewn house slippers is heating, soles upwards, on the fender. Although it is not yet much after eight o'clock—and with us the kirk does not take up till twelve—the minister can be heard moving about in his room, and Mrs. Eadie hastens to invite him ben.

"I have a fine gless o' warm milk standin' ready for ye, sir, if you would care for it the noo."

The minister appears at once.

"This is really too good of you, Mrs. Eadie; I thought I should have had to keep my room for an hour at least, yet. . . . Milk! did you call that milk? Why, in the City, if we get cream half as rich at that, we consider ourselves well off."

"I believe that, sir; but then, you see, you're no' in the City, and in the country we like a'thing to our taste. Even our sermons, if ye'll excuse me sayin' it, we like so that we can fully tak' in their meanin' and enjoy them."

With which remark the good woman took her departure.

Left to himself, the Rev. Adam Logan, B.D., began to manifest signs of conflicting thoughts. He had every reason to feel proud of the position he occupied, and perhaps he did so, to his own undoing. He was young, very young; he had not yet celebrated his quarter century of life. His last two summer vacations had been spent as tourist missionary at two of the most fashionable Highland resorts, and now, no sooner has he been granted his full "Reverend" than a beautifully situated and important country kirk like that of the Loaning invites him to preach a trial sermon, without having to undergo all the annoying preliminaries of a Short Leet. He has many a time dreamt of such a chance as this; at intervals in his College course he has gone over in his mind the great sermon he would preach that day; but now that the day has actually arrived he feels strangely dissatisfied.

"Hang it all!" he mutters, "that's the second time I've got dinned into my ears how much this people enjoy a simple service. I wonder how my 'Resurrection or Transition—Which?' will go down with them? I'm afraid I've made a mistake. But," he added, endeavouring to ease his mind with a shrug of the shoulders, "it can't be altered now anyway."

He had just arrived at this cheering reflection, and was endeavouring to draw the sofa even closer to the roaring fire, when the room-door suddenly opened (we do not stand on ceremony in the North), and Mrs. Eadie again appeared.

"I'm rael sorry to be troublin' ye again, sir; but I'm sure when ye ken the reason it'll be a' richt. That's ane o' the bairns doun frae 'Viewfield' Cottage, greetin' fit to break her little he'rt, wi' the news that her granny's no' sae weel again, and would like very much to see ye and wish ye weel before you preach. If it had been onybody else, sir, I would hardly have thocht mysel' justified in troublin' ye at sic a solemn 'oor, but every minister that e'er I've kenned liked to gaun and ha'e a crack wi' Mrs. Reid."

"Oh, but I'll be delighted to go, Mrs. Eadie. Just hand me in my great-coat, and ask the girl to wait to show me the way. I don't suppose it will be very far?"

"No, no, sir, just half a mile up the braeside, past the kirk. It's very guid o' ye to gaun, when every minute maun be counted."

Donning his coat, the minister set out, with the little girl by his side. He tried to get some particulars from her on the way up, but failed. Her nature was not one to open out at once, and all that he could learn was that her "granny wanted him," with which he had to be content.

The little girl's father, who had been standing at the door since sending her off on the errand, eagerly hurried down the brae, when he saw the two approaching.

"It's very guid indeed o' ye to come, sir. My mither wanted sae muckle to see ye. She likes to ha'e a word wi' every minister that preaches in the Loaning kirk. Will you just step in then, sir?"

"Certainly. I can assure you I count it a privilege to come and see one so highly spoken of as your mother is."

So saying, the minister was shown into the room where Mrs. Reid lay, her son's wife being then in the act of reading to her the blessed words of peace from the fifth chapter of St. Matthew.

The invalid turned her eyes to the door as he entered, and, on learning who he was, eagerly spoke at once.

"Oh, sir, I'm thankfu' to ye for comin'! I've aye had a warm he'rt to young men like yoursel', for I ken a' the special hardships that you've to come through. There's nae-thing I would 'ave liked better than to be able to come doun and hear ye the day, but the Lord wills otherwise, and I thocht I would seek a chance o' wishin' ye God-speed. It's mony a time struck me that the young minister is specially appointed to work oot the Gospel so that unschuled fowk like us can understand. When ye get aulder, ye begin to work among the deeper maitter, and, of coorse, sir, I wouldna daur say a word again' that—for arena we told by our Lord Himsel' that oor talents must be improved?—but then, you see, it's no' gi'en to the like o' me to bring mysel' up to understand ye, and I can but merely follow afar off."

When the old woman had finished, the minister stood for a minute in deep thought, and then he eagerly turned to her.

"Well, Mrs. Reid, I cannot but think that our Common Father has been using you to carry a special message to me to-day. This very subject of a simple sermon has kept me awake throughout almost the whole of the night, owing to a remark your worthy beadle made as we walked together up from the station; but I am convinced now, and, God helping me, I shall to-day preach so that all who love Him may receive a blessing."

At this, what a look of love and thankfulness came over the face of that fine old Scotswoman! Many a time afterwards, when the minister was apt to be dogmatical or narrow, he remembered it, and the words which he had intended to utter refused to form.

She asked him afterwards to read to her from her favourite chapter, the thirteenth of First Corinthians; and he then left, with the assurance that every word of his sermon would be faithfully carried home by one of her daughters.

On turning from the cottage, the minister slowly made his way up the frost-bound track, with only the book of Nature open before him, and as he walked he thought out the gist of that sermon which was to take the "auld kirk o' the Loaning" by storm; the course of events of the past two hours readily suggesting to him as a text those blessed words from the Epistle of James, "Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father."

It was a great sermon. The beadle awaited the preacher at the foot of the pulpit stairs, and silently shook him by the hand—such a hand-shake as told his appreciation better than many words. We all lingered about rather longer than usual at the skailin' that day, and, although it was not openly said by anyone, each knew that the Rev. Adam Logan, B.D., must be our minister.

In due time this came to pass, and it was one of the strange workings of God's Providence that the first duty he performed after his ordination was to guide us as we paid our final tribute to the memory of Mrs. Reid. I shall never forget the prayer which went up from the old-fashioned kirk-yard to the open canopy of heaven on that occasion.

Five years have now come and gone since he came to us, and in that time he has found his way into every heart in the Loaning side. On Sabbaths our little kirk is always full, and we can depend on receiving the finest of the wheat. It will be a dark day indeed for us when he intimates—as I am afraid, in his devotion to duty, he soon must—the acceptance of one of the numerous calls to larger centres which are continually being offered him.

RUTH AND NAOMI.

(After the Picture by Ary Scheffer.)

"THY PEOPLE SHALL BE MY PEOPLE, AND THY GOD MY GOD."—RUTH I. 16.

The Lapsed Masses

W.E. Tickner del.

ARE THEY RECLAIMABLE?

By Richard Mudie-Smith.

I CAN imagine and sympathise with the sigh of weariness which in all probability will escape the reader as the above heading meets his roving eye. Many texts in the Bible are disputed: "The poor ye have always with you" is not one of them. The masses haunt our sleeping and our waking hours. They occupy columns in the newspapers and pages in the magazines. They provide a well-thumbed theme for the preacher, and are the unfailing resource of the journalist, who, diving into the dismal deep they inhabit, returns to the surface of respectability with weird and eerie tales of its denizens with which to astonish a credulous and curious public.

Poets forsake the "rathe primrose" in order to cultivate the cockney dialect, and novelists vie with one another in giving realistic descriptions of mean streets and their tenants. Platforms resound with democratic declamations, and stupendous figures, collected by indefatigable statisticians, are hurled about with a dexterity worthy of an Indian juggler. These, patient audiences endeavour to realise with a success similar to that which attends their efforts when they are told the distance of the nearest fixed star or the age of the earth. Other methods failing, clever artists are called in who exhaust their ingenuity in attempting to illustrate by diagrams the appalling and amazing returns. Society ladies, smitten with a brief enthusiasm born of ennui, raid the hutches and hives where the masses burrow, to the intense delight of the infant population and the indifference or opposition of their parents. Volumes lean and fat roll from the press, advocating drastic remedies and prescribing infallible panaceas. In the ocean to which I have alluded (to return to my original simile), many mariners let down their nets and now and then secure "a few small fishes"; more frequently it has been let down "on the wrong side of the ship," and the skipper of the mission hall has to report that he and his crew have "toiled all night and caught nothing." The most successful hauls only emphasise the vast numbers that remain behind, notwithstanding the fact that the boats are furnished with the most approved modern appliances. These empty nets explain, and are my apology for, the present article.

Whether the title evokes a sigh or not, I trust it will evoke indignation proportionate to its presumption. I hope that if by any chance one of the masses should see these pages, he will immediately retaliate with an article on "Can Journalists be Saved?" I do not, however, flatter myself that my brother will solace his woes by any such justifiable sally, and am emboldened to go forward by the thought that since he seems to be regarded as a pen-cushion, one quill more will make little, if any, difference to his equanimity.

At the outset, I wish to protest against the term "masses." Just as I resent the dividing up of life into separate, water-tight compartments, so I resent the division of society into "classes" and "masses," for the simple but adequate reason that they are arbitrary and misleading. No one can say where the "masses" end and the "classes" begin. Granted that Park Lane and Woolwich Dust Hole are not synonymous, it is, nevertheless, certain that these extremes merge into one another. There is no sharp line of demarcation. For my part, I claim equal kinship with the king on his throne and his subject in the gutter. I am at the same distance from both, and that distance is so slight that no instrument has yet been found delicate enough to register it. In a word, we are brothers. If our patriotism were world-embracing, a patriotism for the race, universal peace would be our reward. If our habitual thought of our fellows were based on our solidarity, our reward would be the solution of the social problem. Just as we have had handed down to us, "by vain tradition from the fathers," heritages of resentment against Germany, France, and Russia, which prevent us ever seeing those nations or their actions truly, so class distinctions, similarly handed down, are the greatest obstacle to bringing about any alteration in the conditions under which the masses live. Fortunately for us, whether we like it or not, the whole body politic suffers for every single injury or deprivation done to one of its members. Grosvenor Square has to suffer for the existence of Notting Dale. My Lady Fashion, strive how she may to shut her ears and blind her eyes to the manner in which her sisters live, must help to pay the debt Justice owes them. Those payments may be spread over generations, or be distrained for suddenly by a French Revolution. They are paid. We fall or rise, advance or retreat, together, being made out of one lump, and bound so intimately that the Siamese twins were farther apart than are the beggar and the prince. The foremost amongst us must wait for the feeblest.

"PLATFORMS RESOUND WITH DEMOCRATIC DECLAMATIONS."—p. 305.

The first step, therefore, toward the reclaiming of the lapsed masses is to cease thinking of them as other than ourselves.

The term "the masses" is generally used to describe that great army which, beginning where the middle class ends, terminates at the bottom of the social scale. Between these are many grades, but it will be sufficient for my purpose to divide the masses into (1) those who earn nothing, who live by what they can pick up, and in a perfectly literal sense "take no thought for the morrow"; (2) those whose earnings are so small and so precarious that they never escape from pressing poverty; (3) those whose work is fairly steady and whose wage, provided they are thrifty, is sufficient to permit of some comfort: labourers and unskilled artisans form the larger proportion of this class; (4) those above this class, skilled artisans, clerks, etc., form part of the lower middle class. These latter occupy the endless and numberless streets which appear to have all been turned out by one machine, so alike are the houses in their "ferocious ugliness." Divisions one and two have found their delineators and interpreters in Mr. Arthur Morrison, Mr. George Gissing, Mr. Richard Whiteing, and Mr. Charles F. G. Masterman. Divisions three and four still, I believe, await exploitation. They lack the startling colours, the striking contrasts, the dramatic setting, the artist loves.

I know not what proportion of the masses has lapsed from healthier, freer conditions, and what proportion has never known any life other than the one they now live. This is immaterial. If a man is lying at the bottom of a well, the necessity of getting him to the top precedes the interesting information as to the manner in which he descended. I am satisfied that no one will controvert the statement that the environment of thousands of our fellows is capable of improvement. I have said that the first step toward reclaiming the lapsed masses is to cease once and for all to think of them as other than ourselves. I have thus acknowledged that I think they may be won. I do, most emphatically; my conviction is unshakable. Equally unshakable is the conviction that, unless the Churches and religious people generally change their attitude and methods, the salvation of the masses will not come through their instrumentality. Since I see no other weapon so potent for good, if wisely wielded, as organised religious effort, I imagine the desirable consummation referred to will be postponed indefinitely, unless the conversion of the Churches is accomplished.

The Daily News census has proved that, whatever else the masses may do, they do not go to church. A few attend public worship—few, that is, compared with those who forsake "the assembling of themselves together." The majority is either indifferent or antagonistic. Either the Churches never enter their heads, or, if they do, they are regarded resentfully. Accustomed as they are to their lot, they are subconsciously aware that their limitations are neither just nor necessary. From the Churches they get assistance in bearing their burdens, but not in changing the causes which render those burdens inevitable.

The second step toward the redemption of the masses is for the Churches to concentrate their energy on these causes. At present they are putting first things second. The gospel for the slum-dweller must make it possible for him to work out his own salvation; in other words, it must deal with his environment before it deals with him. There are two parties in the field at the present time—the Evangelist and the Socialist. The former affirms that if you save the man you will transform his surroundings; the latter asserts that if you change the man's surroundings you will transform him. Both are right—both are wrong. Each idea is the complement of the other. The truth lies in the union of both. The Evangelist has had a considerable period in which to experiment, and he cannot be said to have achieved his aim. The Socialist has had a briefer period in which to practise his cure, but unless he is prepared to add some other ingredient to his mixture his success will even be less than that of the Evangelist's. If we amalgamate these two, and while changing the environment also change the man, victory will "sit upon our banners."

Of what earthly use is it preaching to a "man and wife, two sons, ages twenty-seven and twenty-one, and two daughters, ages twenty and eighteen, all living in one room." It is the solemnest farce, and must make angels weep. It would be equally efficacious, and far more kind, to take a blind man to task for not seeing, as to speak of purity to people who sleep eight and twelve in a room. The word conveys no meaning to them. Religion is impossible without cleanliness. How can such be clean? Religion is impossible without meditation. Where are such to meditate? Think for a moment what symbolism and spiritual healing there is in a wash, in the donning of clean clothes, or in breathing pure air, and then try to estimate how much religion you would have left at the end of a week if you had to sleep on a vermin-covered mattress, with eight others in the room, in garments you could never change, foul speech for ever in your ears, foul smells for ever in your nostrils; condemned to an Inferno of ugliness: ugly streets, ugly houses, ugly faces, ugly smells, ugly sounds, ugly sights, and an empty stomach. No; as Mr. Charles Booth says, in many districts the sanitary inspector must precede the missionary. Let Christian people throw themselves into Borough Council work, toil on Housing Committees, fight the unbeautiful like the Devil, reserving their indignation and opprobrium for the slum landlord, the sweater, and the grinder of the faces of the poor. Let them see to it that no person defames their sanctuaries by making gain out of his brother's loss. Make it possible for the masses to carry out the truths you teach, and they will believe in them and you. Do not be afraid of what is called the "Social Gospel." It is because the Gospel that Christ preached has been narrowed down to the salvation of part of a man that it has become necessary to insist on the redemption of a whole man.

"SOCIETY LADIES . . . RAID THE HUTCHES AND HIVES WHERE THE MASSES BURROW."—p. 305.

In conclusion, I would advocate here, as I have elsewhere, the revival of open-air preaching. Since the masses will not come to us, we must go to them; and go to them with our best, not our poorest. I would have our ablest, most persuasive, most completely trained and equipped preachers at street corners, in courts, parks, and squares on Sunday evenings from May to October, accompanied by the choirs of their churches and as many of their congregation as cared to join them. Quite apart from the effect on the people, the good which would result to preachers and congregations would be incalculable. The latter are often over-fed, and suffer from spiritual indigestion, brought on by gluttony at a table which groans beneath the "means of grace." It is taken for granted that anything is good enough for the dweller in the slums, whereas the spirit of our work must be that nothing is good enough. He is suffering from soul atrophy, brought on by disuse of that organ, and needs the aid of the most experienced and skilful physicians if he is to be restored. It is of little avail to send him soul-tyros, with abundant fervour, strong voices, and little else. It is the specialist who must in the future be found preaching in the open air. Men of charm, culture, winsomeness, possessed of great knowledge of human nature (a knowledge that only experience can give), of saintly character and strenuous labour, replicas of the Master—let such go forth, and as surely as harvests followed from Christ's preaching in the street, on the mountain side, by the sea-shore, harvests repeated in John Wesley's day, so surely will there be a great ingathering; for the fields are white—'tis the labourers that are few. The human heart is the same to-day as of old. Not a vile man or a vile woman but has possibilities of a Frederick William Robertson or a Catherine Booth. And how dare we judge them? Place us where they are, with their heritage, and we might be viler than the worst. Each possesses the light that lighteth every man born into the world; they are sons and daughters of the Most High, and according to our treatment of them are we being judged. Only by loving them can we win them, and only by letting them have a place in our prayers, our energies, our thoughts, our lives, our enthusiasms, can we love them. In each Christ speaks, from each Christ appeals, and we with Him must remain unsatisfied until His likeness is revealed in the lineaments of every face.

"SINCE THE MASSES WILL NOT COME TO US WE MUST GO TO THEM."

SCRIPTURE ILLUSTRATIONS AND ANECDOTES.

BASED ON THE INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

JANUARY 17TH.—The Baptism and Temptation of Christ.

Passage for reading—St. Matthew iii. 13—iv. 11.

POINTS. 1. Christ filled with the Spirit at His baptism.
2. Is tempted to sin of the flesh, the world, and the devil.
3. Meets temptation by God's Word.

ILLUSTRATIONS. The Spirit-like Wind. How often have we felt on some fine morning the soft balmy air of spring! As it has come floating up from the west laden with sweetly scented vapours, we have seen it lightly fan the leaves of the wood or make a gentle ripple on the quiet waters, everywhere doing its appointed work, everywhere purifying and renovating the air. But where "He Who walks on the wings of the wind" has other work for it to do, there we have seen it in all its great might. By its power the waves have been uplifted and the trees uprooted. It has blown with mighty strength and prevailed. Just such is the Spirit of the Lord. In the power of the Spirit Christ in His human nature met and overcame temptation; and by the mighty power of the Spirit 3,000 souls were born again on the day of Pentecost. So He works still:

"And every virtue we possess,
And every victory won,
And every thought of holiness
Are His alone."

Christ Tempted Like Us. They tell us that in some trackless lands, when a man passes through a pathless forest, he breaks a twig from time to time as he goes on, that those who come after may see the traces of his having been there and may know that they are not out of the road. Oh! when we are journeying through the murky night and the dark paths of affliction and sorrow, it is something to find here and there a spray broken, or a leafy stem bent down by the tread of His foot and the brush of His hand as He passed by; and to remember that He has hallowed the path He trod; and thus we may find lingering fragrance and hidden strength in the remembrance of Him as "in all points tempted like as we are," bearing grief for us, with us, and like us, and made perfect through suffering.

The Use of the Bible. A black prince arrived in England from Sierra Leone in 1791. The teacher to whose care he was entrusted took great pains to convince him that the Bible was the Word of God. He received it as such with great reverence and sincerity. Being asked why he regarded it as God's Word, he said, "When I find all good men minding the Bible and ruling their lives by it, and all bad men disregarding it, I then am sure that the Bible must be what good men call it, 'The Word of God.'"

JANUARY 24TH.—Jesus Rejected at Nazareth.

Passage for reading—St. Luke iv. 16—30.

POINTS. 1. Christ preaches the Gospel at Nazareth.
2. Teaches pardon and peace for all men.
3. Is rejected and departs.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Duty of Spreading the Gospel. Huber, the great naturalist, tells us that if a single wasp discovers a deposit of honey or any other food, he will return to his nest and impart the good news to his companions, who will sally forth in great numbers to partake of the fare which has been discovered for them. Shall we, who have found honey in the rock of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, be less considerate of our fellow-men than wasps are of their fellow-insects?

"Salvation! oh, salvation!
The joyful sound proclaim,
Till each remotest nation
Has learn'd Messiah's name."

Spread of the Gospel. A missionary travelling in a distant part of Madagascar came unexpectedly on a town of Christians, although surrounded by heathen tribes. He inquired how it was, and heard that one of their number, who had been ill, was sent to Antananarivo for treatment in the hospital there. While in bed he had learned to read the Bible, found the precious truths of the Gospel, and carried them home with him. He persuaded his fellow-townsmen to build a chapel, and there he was, pastor over a Christian congregation.

Refusing to Hear the Gospel. When men refuse to hear the Gospel from the lips of a strange preacher, or because it is preached to others besides themselves, they are like the Spaniard in South America, who suffered severely from gout, but refused to be cured by an Indian. "I know," he said, "that he is a famous man, and would certainly cure me; but he is an Indian, and would expect to be treated with attentions which I cannot pay to a man of colour; also he visits all sorts of common people, and therefore I prefer remaining as I am."

JANUARY 31ST.—Jesus Calls Four Disciples.

Passage for reading—St. Luke v. 1—11.

POINTS. 1. Christ the teacher.
2. Christ the provider.
3. Christ to be followed.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Simple Preaching. Arthur Helps tells a story of an illiterate soldier at the chapel of Lord Morpeth's castle in Ireland. Whenever Archbishop Whately came to preach, it was noticed that this somewhat rough private was always in his place, mouth open, as if in sympathy with his ears. Some of the gentlemen playfully took him to task for it, supposing his keen attention was due to the usual vulgar admiration of a celebrity. But the man had a better reason, and was able to give it. He said, "That isn't it at all. The Archbishop is easy to understand. There are no fine words in him. A fellow like me can follow along and take every bit of it in."

Saying Grace. There is in Merton College, Oxford, a simple but somewhat unusual grace said in Latin before and after dinner in the college hall. It is very short, but very full of meaning. "Benedictus benedicat" is said before dinner, meaning, "May the Blessed One bless" (the food), and after the meal, "Benedictus benedicatur," that is, "May the Blessed One be blessed" (by His grateful servants).

King Wenceslas. An old legend tells how King Wenceslas of Bohemia looked forth from his castle window one night at Christmas time and saw a poor man a long way off gathering sticks. Calling to his page to bring provisions, the King took a bundle of wood on his shoulder and went forth to the poor man through the snow, the page following behind; and as they went the page's heart failed him "Sire," he said, "let us return. The wind freezes my very blood. I can go no farther." "Seems it so much?" asked the king. "Was not His path on earth colder and wearier than this?" The page made no reply. "Follow me on still," said his master; "only tread in my footsteps, and you will walk more easily." The servant knew that his master spoke not at random. He set his feet in the prints of his lord's feet, and as he strode his steps gained heat and life. He felt not the wind, he heeded not the frost. Zealously he followed his king on his errand of mercy.

FEBRUARY 7TH.—A Sabbath in Capernaum.

Passage for reading.—St. Mark i. 21—34.

POINTS. 1. An evil spirit cast out.
2. An apostle's mother-in-law healed.
3. Multitudes of sick blessed.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Casting Out Evil. A poor woman in Ireland experienced a change of heart. She had made a living by selling whisky without a licence. Her business had been illegal before God and man. She realised this, and resolved that the change of heart must be followed by a change of life. On reaching home, she brought out the large jar in which the whisky was kept and addressed it thus, "You and I have lived together for a good many years, but the Lord Jesus Christ is coming to live with me now, and you and He cannot get on together, so you must go." So saying, she took the great jar and dashed it to pieces on the stone floor.

Provision for Mercy. Abraham Lincoln, the President of the United States, gave his doorkeeper a standing order that no matter how great might be the throng, or even if senators and other great persons had to wait, he must see at once any messenger who came to him with a petition for the saving of life.

A Ministry of Mercy. The great Civil War in America did not lack women with as strong and tender hearts as that of Florence Nightingale. After the fighting at Gettysburg some 20,000 men, the flower of North and South, were left on the field. Many days passed before all could be moved to the distant hospitals. Through those awful days of suffering these messengers of human love and heaven's mercy went about their sweet and tender ministry. One of their most thoughtful acts was this: to carry about, with their food and cordials, pencil and paper, so as to take down from the lips of the dying their last words of remembrance for loved ones at home; and then, tenderly closing the eyes, to write to the distant wife or children the last words of the departed.

FEBRUARY 14TH.—Jesus Forgives Sins.

Passage for reading—St. Mark ii. 1—12.

POINTS. 1. The faith of the man's friends.
2. His own condition of sin and suffering.
3. Christ's mercy to soul and body.

ILLUSTRATIONS. What Faith Is. A doctor was visiting a Christian patient. He had himself been under conviction of sin, but had not obtained perfect peace. So he asked his patient one day to tell him what this faith is—this believing in Jesus and getting happiness. The patient answered "Doctor, in my sickness I have felt that I could do nothing to cure myself. I have put my case in your hands, and am trusting you. This is what every sinner must do in the Lord Jesus."

Sin Leaves a Mark. Can you remember the first time you sinned greatly and broke God's law? Do you recall the first lie or the first theft? They have left a mark on your life and character. The sins of our youth leave their scars in our old age. A man has a precious pearl in his possession, but it loses its colour and becomes stained, and he is told that nothing can restore its purity. So sin stains the character, and a life which has lost its purity can never be quite the same again.

God's Mercy Pursues the Sinner. There was a strange chimney ornament in the house of a professional diver. It was the shells of an oyster holding fast to a piece of printed paper. The diver had seen the oyster on a rock with this piece of paper in its mouth, which he took out and began to read through the goggles of his headdress. It was a tract about the mercy and love of Christ to repentant sinners. Coming to him so strangely, it touched his heart, and he said, "I can hold out no longer against God, since His mercy pursues me thus." He became a repentant and changed man. God's mercy saved him at the bottom of the sea.

(After the Painting by Sir George Hayter.) (By permission of Messrs. Henry Graves and Co., Pall Mall, S.W.)

LATIMER PREACHING AT ST. PAUL'S CROSS TO THE CITY AUTHORITIES, LONDON, MDLIII.

PAINTERS AND PREACHERS.

PICTORIAL RECORDS OF GREAT SERMONS.

THE PREACHING OF KNOX BEFORE THE LORDS OF THE CONGREGATION, 10TH JUNE, 1559.
(From the Picture by Sir David Wilkie in the Tate Gallery.)

THE history of Christianity is as full of stirring incidents as that of any great nation. Its progress has been marked by the advent of men whose names are perhaps better known than those of statesmen and soldiers who have brought honour to themselves and the countries for whom they have worked and fought. Their fame attaches not so much to the country in which they happened to be born as to the Universal Kingdom which they strove to establish. Indeed, many of them sacrificed their nationality and became nomads for the sake of their great work. Their lives, fashioned on that of their Master, were epitomes of their teaching: self-sacrifice, self-denial, suffering, endurance, patience, strenuousness, were theirs, and though in many instances their efforts were received with contumely and derision, their names are carved indelibly on the roll of the world's heroes.

Their records are to be found in the history and the literature of their several countries, and have not, it must be confessed, made a very wide appeal to artists for pictorial treatment. Contemporary art, indeed, where there was such, neglected them altogether. It has been left for the most part to modern artists to honour them in this direction. The old masters, painting for the Church, dealt with the early great preachers as saints, picturing them in saintly postures in the company of the Madonna or Christ, and not as they moved among men in their lifetime. Francis of Assisi, for instance, must have been a picturesque figure, and his life was full of incidents worthy of pictorial treatment; but outside the representations of him by old masters as a saint, I only know of two pictures dealing with his manhood—one, of his famous interview with Innocent III. on the terrace of the Lateran, by a modern French painter, and one by Stacy Marks, R.A., representing his sermon to the birds—a picture painted rather to show the artist's skill as a bird-painter than to honour the preacher.

LATIMER PREACHING AT ST. PAUL'S CROSS TO THE CITY AUTHORITIES, LONDON, MDLIII.

XUM

Going back to an earlier preacher, the great Irish saint Columba, to whom Scotland owes her first introduction to Christianity, it has been left to a living Scottish artist to commemorate his work in paint. One of the beautiful frescoes in the National Portrait Gallery of Scotland, by Mr. William Hole, R.S.A., represents Columba preaching to the Picts. Arrayed in his simple monk's habit, the saint is standing before a crowd of these warlike natives of Scotland, each with his sword or spear in hand, but listening intently to the wondrous message brought by the stranger priest. Augustine of Canterbury, too, has been the subject of several modern pictures in connection with his work in England. Coming down the ages, we have a pictorial record of that great preacher, Peter the Hermit, whose fiery eloquence brought about the first crusade—the work of J. Archer, R.S.A. The same artist also dealt with Bernard, the preacher at whose instigation the second crusade was organised.

To deal now with our illustrations. The first in chronological order of events is Sir George Hayter's picture of "Latimer preaching to the Civic Authorities at St. Paul's Cross." Living in troublous times, the great preacher of the Reformation was himself in "troubles oft." After his release from the Tower at the accession of Edward VI., we are told that crowds flocked eagerly to hear his sermons, both in London and the country. A few short years later, in 1555, he and Ridley went to the stake at Oxford, bold and fearless to the last.

Sir George Hayter, the painter of this picture, is best known for his portraits and the large semi-historical canvases executed in his capacity of Principal Painter in Ordinary to Queen Victoria in the early part of her reign. Among the principal of these are "Queen Victoria Taking the Coronation Oath" and "The Marriage of Queen Victoria." He was knighted in 1842, and died in 1871. The picture which we illustrate was purchased and engraved by Mr. Henry Graves, and on my inquiring of Mr. Algernon Graves as to its present whereabouts, he replied: "I remember it hanging here" (his office in Pall Mall) "when I commenced business in 1860, and at first fancied it was burnt in the fire of 1867; but on searching through the stock-books of that time, I find it was sold before 1862, and I think it went to America. At any rate, I have never seen it since." We had, therefore, to make our reproduction from the engraving of the picture.

GEORGE FOX PREACHING IN A TAVERN.

(After the Painting by E. H. Wehnert in the Victoria and Albert Museum.)

The leader of the Reformation in Scotland, John Knox, ranks equally as one of the greatest preachers and popular heroes of his country. Several pictures have been painted of incidents in his stormy life, but none so characteristically stirring as the one here reproduced. Painted by Sir David Wilkie—it was on his easel ten years before it was completed in 1832—for Sir Robert Peel, it now hangs in the Tate Gallery at Millbank. The scene represented occurred after Knox's return to Scotland in 1559, the stormiest and most strenuous part of his career. Proclaimed an outlaw within a few days of his landing at Edinburgh, he threw himself heart and soul into the Protestant cause. After preaching at Dundee and Perth, he arrived at St. Andrews with the "Lords of the Congregation," as the lay leaders of the Protestants were denominated. Unmoved by threats of personal violence on the part of the Archbishop of St. Andrews, Knox decided to preach in the parish church, and he did so on four successive days with such effect that the authorities of the town decided forthwith for the Reformed religion—the church being stripped of its images and pictures and the simpler form of worship only observed.

There being no original portrait of Knox in existence, Wilkie had to invent his presentment of the dauntless preacher, and was influenced therein by a visit he paid to a service conducted by the great divine, Edward Irving, who unconsciously served as model for John Knox. The pulpit was painted from one in which Knox actually preached, the artist having discovered it hidden away in a cellar. The following description of the persons represented in the picture was given in the Academy catalogue for the year 1832, when it was exhibited:—

"Close to the pulpit on the right of Knox are Richard Ballenden, his amanuensis, with Christopher Goodman, his colleague; and in black, the Maltese Knight, Sir James Sandilands, in whose house at Calder the first Protestant sacrament was received. Beyond the latter, in the scholar's cap and gown, is that accomplished student of St. Andrews, the Admirable Crichton. Under the pulpit is Thomas Wood, the precentor, with his hour-glass; the schoolboy below is John Napier, Baron of Merchiston, inventor of the logarithms; and further to the right is a child which has been brought to be baptised when the discourse is over. On the right side of the picture, in red, is the Lord James Stuart, afterwards Regent Murray; beyond is the Earl of Glencairne; and in front, resting on his sword, is the Earl of Morton, behind whom is the Earl of Argyll, whose Countess, the half-sister of Queen Mary, and the lady in attendance upon her, make up the chief eight of the picture. Above this group is John Hamilton, Archbishop of St. Andrews, supported by the Bishop Beatown, of Glasgow, with Quinten Kennedy, who maintained against Knox a public disputation."

In the gallery are the provost and bailies of St. Andrews and the professors of the university. Near the Archbishop's group is a soldier with a harquebus, looking at the Archbishop for the signal to fire upon the preacher.

The picture was purchased for the nation with the others comprising the Peel collection.

The Covenanters and their trials formed a favourite subject for the exercise of Sir George Harvey's brush. The picture reproduced on page 317, which is in the Glasgow Art Gallery, was the first of a series dealing with Covenanter scenes. The fervour and grim enthusiasm which animated these proscribed worshippers are admirably suggested in this picture. Most of the men are armed, and all are listening intently to the preacher, while on the distant hill, silhouetted against the sky, is the form of a sentinel, posted to give warning of the approach of the soldiery.

The picture of George Fox hangs in the water-colour gallery of the Victoria and Albert Museum, and is the work of Edward Henry Wehnert, an Anglo-German artist who lived from 1814 to 1868. The subject of it is one of the most interesting and original of the great religious workers England has known.

Born of humble parentage in 1624, George Fox, the founder of Quakerism, was at an early age influenced by deeply religious feeling. He tells us that, "When I came to eleven years of age I knew pureness and righteousness, for while a child I was taught how to walk to be kept pure." At nineteen, he says, "At the command of God, on the 9th day of the 7th month, 1643, I left my relations and broke off all familiarities or fellowship with old or young. I was to forsake all, young and old, and keep out of the way of all, and to be a stranger to all."

WHITEFIELD PREACHING IN MOORFIELDS.

(From the Painting by Byrn Crone, A.R.A.)

A small competency supplied his scanty needs, and he commenced his lonely wanderings up and down the country, "a stranger in the earth, which way the Lord inclined my heart, taking a chamber to myself in the town where I came, and tarrying sometimes a month more or less in the place."

In 1647, in the light of the revelations "to 'thee' and 'thou' all men and women, without any respect to rich or poor, high or low, great or small." As he travelled up and down he "was not to bid people good morning or good evening, neither might he scrape his leg to anyone." All of which, naturally, incurred the resentment of all classes.

In 1649 he made his first protest against "steeple houses" in Nottingham Church, with the result that he was imprisoned. Upon his release he proceeded to Derby,

THE COVENANTERS PREACHING.

(From a Picture by Sir George Harvey, R.S.A., in the Corporation Art Gallery, Glasgow.)

he received, he commenced his life's work as an itinerant preacher, the scenes of his early efforts being in the neighbourhood of Dukinfield and Manchester. Known as "the man with the leathern breeches," he set himself sturdily not only to preach the Gospel simply and straightforwardly, but also to denounce intemperance, excess of public amusements, and social conventionalities. On the last point he says that "the Lord forbade him to put off his hat to any, high or low," and he was required and made a further public protest there. Imprisonment again followed, which lasted until 1651. Five years later his influence had so grown that no fewer than 1,000 of his followers were in prison, and by 1690, when he died, Quakerism had become a recognised force in the religious life of the country.

The life and work of John Wesley are too well known for any detailed reference to be here made to the subject. The picture reproduced on page 318, which is in the Salford Art Gallery, was painted by Marshall Claxton, a frequent exhibitor at the Royal Academy during the years 1832 to 1877. The scene represented is a meeting of the little coterie of Oxford students in Charles Wesley's room at Christ Church. On his return to Oxford in 1729, John Wesley found that his brother Charles had instituted these meetings for religious devotion, and at once threw all the might of his zeal and energy into the movement, one as momentous as that of the great Anglican movement of later years. A student of Christ Church wrote at this time, with reference to the Wesleys' meetings, "Here is a new set of Methodists sprung up." And the name, given in derision, became the distinguishing one of the movement.

Prominent among this earnest band was George Whitefield, who was destined to become as famous as Wesley himself. Possessed of extraordinary talent as a preacher and orator, he was able by his impassioned eloquence and wonderful voice to move his hearers in a manner almost unequalled by any other preacher. It is said that no fewer than 20,000 were assembled on one occasion to hear him, and that his words were heard by the whole of that vast crowd. Mr. Eyre Crowe's picture represents him preaching in Moorfields, where his Tabernacle was afterwards built. The occasion is doubtless at Whitsuntide in 1742, when Moorfields was the resort of shows of all kinds. Whitefield's preaching is said to have been a greater attraction than all of these. Immense audiences thronged to hear him, and many stories are told of the marvellous effects of his preaching. In his tours through England and Scotland it is estimated that he preached eighteen thousand sermons to ten millions of people.

ARTHUR FISH.

JOHN WESLEY WITH HIS FRIENDS AT OXFORD.

(From the Painting by Marshall Claxton in the Royal Museum and Art Galleries, Salford.)

IN THE STRAITS OF TIME

A ROMANCE OF OLD FRANCE.

By Christopher Hare, Author of "Dreams to Sell," Etc.

SYNOPSIS OF CHAPTERS I.—V.

The story opens in the reign of Louis XIV. Two young girls of noble birth, Yvonne Elisabeth de la Féronniere, of a Huguenot family, and Gabrielle de Beaumanoir, betrothed to the Duc de Maillebois, are being educated at the famous Abbaye aux Bois. In the midst of a game with their companions they outpass the convent bounds, and suddenly find themselves adrift in the streets of Paris. They have the good fortune to meet M. de la Forêt, a Protestant pastor from Yvonne's home in Poitou. He recognises her, and takes the girls to the house of Gabrielle's sister, Madame de Chamans, who makes their peace with the Abbess.

CHAPTER VI.

HÉLOISE was triumphant. Fortune had smiled upon her bold design, and moulded all things to her will in this matter of her sister's wedding. That which a few months ago had seemed little more than an audacious dream was now almost an accomplished fact.

The Duc de Maillebois, one of the first partis in France, was about to marry the dowerless Gabrielle, straight from her convent school. The bridegroom-elect was full of courtly devotion, generous beyond expression; for the corbeille, which was his gift, was magnificent, the talk of all Paris, with its priceless jewels and costly lace and brocades, not to mention a purse of two hundred louis d'or, concealed in a white satin bonbonnière which found its way to his lady's dressing-table. The behaviour of the future bride was all that even her sister's critical taste could desire. She was gay, and yet strangely sedate and dignified; modest and simple, but never dull; in fact, she might have been acting a part which she had carefully rehearsed at the Abbaye aux Bois.

As for that unlucky escapade of Gabrielle and Yvonne beyond the convent walls, even here was a strong card in the hand of Madame de Chamans, who was inflexible on the point that her sister must return to the convent after the wedding until her sixteenth birthday, and spend the intervening months in learning all that was needful to do credit to her high station.

The bridal morning had dawned at length, with that ideal August weather, when the slumberous summer sunlight still lingers, and yet a breath of cooler air gives new life to a languid world. Héloise sat in the great bay window of the salon, which commanded the terrace, and with a congenial friend by her side, she could enjoy her first moment of leisure, and revel in her success.

"My dear Madame de Sévigné, how can I ever thank you enough for your help and advice?" she murmured to the lady whose delicate charm and well-preserved beauty made it difficult to believe that she was a grandmother.

"You are an apt pupil, ma belle Marquise, and deserve your triumph, for such it is, thus to attract outside Paris all the élite of our society. Indeed, we are much in your debt, for this country fête is delicious. The marriage of a child fresh from the convent gives the daintiest touch of romance, and Monsieur de Maillebois is a most interesting personality. We are longing to make his acquaintance. His great wealth and position, his mysterious, secluded life of a scholar, all pique our curiosity!"

"And his age, Madame?" said Héloise below her breath, with a slight touch of anxiety.

"What of that, my dear? Nay, set your heart at rest. Think of my daughter's marriage. Could anything be happier? Yet Monsieur de Grignan had already buried two wives—a dispensation of Providence to make room for the prettiest girl in France. But this is all ancient history—sixteen years ago! Pardon an old woman's memories."

"Ah! with you, dear Madame, there is no question of years. They will ever leave you untouched. And to know Madame de Grignan is to share your worship!" cried her friend, with tender flattery.

"My child, you are charming with your delicate compliments! I have often told you how much you remind me of—her, who is never absent from my thoughts."

"I had dared to hope that Madame de Grignan would come with you to-day."

"Alas! she was detained in Paris by troublesome business—a law-suit about some lands which the Grignans have had for three hundred years! Every day is so precious when she is with me that I could scarcely have left her, save for your sake, ma chérie. Also, it is my rôle to keep in touch with all that passes in the world of fashion, that I may never come short of news to tell her, though rarely indeed by word of mouth. But you will pity me, Madame de Chamans? Next week I must leave her to go to Brittany, where the estate needs my presence.

"You know what it is to marry a sister, and you remember that I have had to marry a son this year. He prays me to go back and join the new household at Les Rochers, and tells me that my room is ready for me, but I call it ma chambre défunte," she added, with an eloquent shrug of the shoulders.

Héloise was silent, for in her inmost heart she had misgivings about this much belauded marriage. Report said that the great heiress, the bride of the Chevalier de Sévigné, was in wretched health, and but a dull companion. Possibly the brilliant woman of the world guessed her thoughts by instinct, for she lightly changed the subject.

"I have just heard the most delightful story. I must tell it you, my dear. Amongst my possible daughters-in-law, who looked up to me with reverence not unmixed with fear, was a Mademoiselle de Gauron, a young lady of quality, with a good figure and a hundred thousand crowns by way of dowry, a perfect saint into the bargain. What more could man desire?

"Yet my son missed this paragon, and the prize was won by the Marquis d'Alègre. Madame la Marquise seems to have continued her pious studies about the holy women and the hermits of the Egyptian desert, and her poor head was not strong enough to control her zeal and ardent charity. She would emulate their example, this Don Quixote of religion! Three weeks ago she left home at four o'clock in the morning, with five or six pistoles and a little lacquey. She found a chaise in the Faubourg, and set off for Rouen, where she arrived at length, tattered and torn, as you may fancy. There she made a bargain to go from Dieppe, in a vessel bound for the Indies. She had seen on a map the very place where she will accomplish her penitence, and end her days in sackcloth and ashes.

"Meantime, they had missed her at home, scoured Paris and all the churches for her, and only at the last moment did they find her at Rouen, on the point of going off to the end of the world!"

She paused, and a little humorous smile rippled over her expressive countenance. But Madame de Chamans could not control her laughter.

"Ah, Madame, this is delicious! And what do her friends say?"

"Can you ask? They are in shame and despair, the jest of all Paris. Any scandal would have been better than such ridicule. What a subject for a comedy! À propos, Mademoiselle de Scudéry has just sent me her 'Conversations Nouvelles'; I must lend them to you. And did you not tell me that our friend Monsieur Racine was expected here to-day?"

"Yes, Madame; but at the last moment he had to obey the King's command to read his new poem, 'L'Idylle de la Paix.'"

"My daughter will be interested to hear that. Now tell me all about the company present. I see so many familiar faces. No one could mistake the Count d'Auvergne, who always reminds me of a wild boar, and there is Monsieur de Brissac—who was it dared to write that triolet?

"'A duke was he of noble race,
And yet, to look him in the face,
A barber's stall had been his place!'

Yet you must not judge him by his looks, for he is full of humour and character."

Monseigneur Fénélon wrote his 'Traité sur l'Éducation des Filles'? Did you tell me the Archbishop of Paris was to perform the ceremony? Why, he is a Molinist; but I see you have my dear Abbé Charrier to counteract him."

"I fear you will think us sad heretics here. Old Admiral du Quesne, who sat opposite

"A passionate longing seized him to protect her from every foe."—p. 323.

"I would trust your keen insight, Madame, to find some good in everyone," said Héloise. "My father has strong Jansenist leanings, so you will not be surprised to see the Duc and Duchesse de Chevreuse and the Comtesse de Guiche, who is yonder in earnest talk with the Duchesse de Beauvilliers."

"Has she brought any of her nine daughters with her? You know it was for them that you at the banquet last night, is a Huguenot, and so is the tall, fair girl who was by his side, Gabrielle's dearest friend at the convent."

"Ah, yes, I noticed her. She has the same far-away, spiritual look as Madame de Grignan's youngest girl, Marie Blanche, who is with the Filles de Sainte Marie at Aix, and who, I fear, will find her vocation there. I know that heresy is all the fashion now; but when you come to my age, and are nearer settling your final accounts with Heaven, you will hold firmly to the old solid faith. Do not be tempted by this new spirituality, as young Madame de Bethune called it. It was in her room that I saw a marble statuette of Apollo side by side with a crucifix!

"These women! They are mostly Pagan at heart, for all their devotion to St. François de Sales, whose 'Introduction à la Vie Dévote' you find in every boudoir now."

Here the conversation was interrupted, for the Marquise de Chamans was called away, and went to seek her father that he might take her place.

Madame de Sévigné leant back with closed eyes in her great tapestried chair. Only her brave unconquerable spirit nerved the fragile body still to haunt the gay world, that she might describe it with her matchless skill for the daughter she loved so well.

Meantime, the distinguished guests were scattered about in little groups—some in the great salon, where a hum of conversation filled the air; while others had strolled out on the broad sunny terrace, or wandered into the gardens beyond. Amongst these last were the old Sieur du Quesne and Mademoiselle de la Féronniere. He had made friends with her the day before, and had been greatly interested in the young girl when he found that she was a Huguenot like himself. Meeting her on the terrace, he had been eager to continue his conversation, when presently Réné de Beaumanoir joined them.

He led the way beyond the ancient avenue of elms, to the west, under the pleached walk, and on into the walled garden, where, in spite of all neglect, fruit and flowers grew in wild luxuriance. Here figs and great luscious plums and nectarines ripened in the sun, and tall hollyhocks reared their stately blooms, and the scent of lavender rose like incense on the still air.

The Admiral knew Poitou well, and had been a friend of Yvonne's father before she was born, and to him it was a rare pleasure to talk of old times and old friends.

"You spoke of Monsieur de la Forêt? Ah, my child, what a noble character! Never have I met with anyone who so perfectly carries out the ideal of Christ's early disciples. He seems to have no personal wants or desires, but lives only for the sake of others. His old housekeeper at Croisette has told me how she has seen him give his own coat to a beggar, and his untouched dinner to a poor, starving family with a glad, light heart and a sweet way, and that when there was no money in the house and she knew not where to turn for the next meal."

"That is so like him!" cried the girl. "Then, too, he fears no man, and is ever ready to take the part of the oppressed, so that many a time he has been thrown into prison for the sake of his people."

"Alas! we Huguenots are fallen on evil times. Trouble and persecution await us, and such men as Monsieur de la Forêt will be the first to suffer. But remember, my child, in the darkest hour, yea even if bonds and prison await you, that 'as thy days so shall thy strength be,' for the soul is ever free and ever in God's sight. Aye, the clouds will pass away, the light of God's truth will shine again; and you, who are young, may live to see it. My days are numbered."

The old man broke off with a gasp in his breath; and Réné, full of self-reproach as he noticed the feeble steps and bent head, exclaimed:

"Forgive me, sir, I have brought you too far. Will you take my arm to support you to the house?"

"No, my friend; I will rest awhile in this sunny arbour; 'twas but a passing weakness," replied du Quesne, as he sank exhausted on the wooden seat. "You will do me a service if you leave me alone for awhile. I pray you continue your walk."

In silence they moved on side by side—the young sailor with his stirring record of fighting and adventure, and the convent flower to whom the outside world was almost a closed book. Thus accidentally thrown together, their common love of Gabrielle had been the first bond of union, but this scarcely accounted for the rapid and marvellous growth of their sympathy and mutual attraction.

Strangely enough, it was Yvonne who was the first to speak, and she gave utterance to the thought which was uppermost in her mind. She was conscious that it formed a barrier between them, and yet at the same time it gave her a certain dignity of self-sacrifice, as of one set apart.

"As Gabrielle's friend at the convent, you would not have thought me to be a Huguenot? But it was the creed of my fathers, and it is my own earnest faith. It has been, indeed, a joy to meet the dear old admiral. You are a great friend of his?"

"Can you wonder, Mademoiselle?" cried Réné. "I, who have lived with him day by day, and week by week, with only sea and sky to hem us in; I who have obeyed his word, and fought by his side!"

"How I envy you!" said the girl simply. "Tell me about him. He only spoke of the brave deeds of others. By the bye, Monsieur, who was it only last year, at the siege of Algiers, who saved his friend by desperate gallantry, well-nigh at the cost of his own life?" As she asked the question, she looked up in his face and their eyes met.

"Ah, he seems to have told you about the Chevalier de Choiseul, who was to have been shot from the cannon by those barbarous pirates?" said the young man quietly. "But, indeed, the credit of saving him is not due to me alone. I could never have rescued him without the help of a corsair, who had been his captive, and loved him.

"Think of our triumph, Mademoiselle. We brought away safely the 320 French slaves and 180 other Christian captives reclaimed by our King."

"That was, indeed, a prize worth fighting for!" exclaimed Yvonne, with sparkling eyes.

"Do you know what that old wretch, the Dey of Algiers, said afterwards? Why, that if King Louis had given him half the money which the expedition cost, he would have destroyed Algiers himself!

"It is only fair to tell you that we owed much of our success to the engineer, Petit Renau; for he invented a galliot, armed with a new kind of bomb, which did wonderful execution. I never saw anything like it, and we had them again this year at Genoa."

"Yes, the Sieur du Quesne spoke of the war against Genoa; but he said 'twas too long a story to tell, and that M. de Seignely was even now writing a full account of it."

"It is to be printed in a broad-sheet; you will permit me to send it to you, Mademoiselle?" was the eager request. "But the end of that story is not yet, for the King made it a condition of peace that the Doge of Genoa is to come here in person to do homage. It will be a splendid ceremony, and I will take care that you and Gabrielle have a special invitation and privileged seats to see it, in the palace of Versailles!"

"You are too good, Monsieur. But my future life is uncertain. When that event comes to pass, I may be no longer at the convent with my friend, for I am a ward of Monsieur de Vaudreuil, who is now away in the provinces; but when he returns from Blois, where he is taking the Governor's place, he will doubtless require me to live with his family."

"I have heard of him. He is by repute a man of unbounded ambition, who will suffer nothing to stand in his way. Will he not require you to give up your faith, Mademoiselle?"

"Yes, that is his aim; but by God's help he will not succeed," was the low reply.

"Do you know how the Sieur du Quesne made answer to the King, who sought to convert him? 'During sixty years of service, I have given to Cæsar all that Cæsar could require of me. Sire, you must allow me to give the rest to God.'"

"Ah, that was sublime!" she murmured.

"I myself am a Catholic by birth and training, and I should hold him dishonoured who changed his religion," rejoined young Beaumanoir; "but if trouble or persecution drew near, let the hand of the spoiler touch our altars, our churches, and burning enthusiasm would take the place of calm assent. Nay, I make bold to say that I would defend them with my life!"

"Ah! you, too, can feel like that?" said Yvonne, below her breath.

Then silence fell. They were standing by the edge of a ruined fountain, where a moss-grown ganymede raised his cup, and the water sparkled and glistened, as it trickled on the floating water plants below.

The young girl in her festal dress of white crape with silver threads, was like a tall Madonna lily, or as Réné looked at her uplifted face crowned with a golden aureole, he thought of a virgin saint and martyr about to be cast to the lions in a pagan amphitheatre. A passionate longing seized him to protect her from every foe, to shield her from the dangers which threatened her in the near future.

That vision of Yvonne, as she stood there in the sunlight, was imprinted on his heart, an unfading picture of vivid loveliness, until his dying day; but at that moment the deep note of the chapel bell broke the stillness, an echo of distant voices was wafted on the air, and the spell was broken.

Mademoiselle de la Feronniere suddenly awoke to the present, and turned with a hasty exclamation. "Hark! the wedding guests are summoned. See, the Admiral has risen; we must join him and return at once. How the time has flown!"

Réné could not restrain one last word.

"Mademoiselle, will you bear in mind that I am ever at your service in case of need?"

Her only answer was a smile, but that was guerdon enough for the young knight, who had vowed himself to his lady.

CHAPTER VII.

THE wedding was over—the stately ceremony, surrounded by every pomp and circumstance which wealth, and rank, and splendid ritual could lend to it. Gabrielle Antoinette de Beaumanoir was now Duchesse de Maillebois. Dazzling in her bridal gown of silver brocade sown with diamonds, she had taken her place at the banquet. Then, standing beneath an embroidered canopy by her husband's side, with charming girlish dignity she had received the congratulations of the wedding guests, and taken leave of them before they dispersed.

Even the Marquise de Chamans was satisfied, and when all was over kissed her sister with smiling approval.

"Now, dear, the carriage waits. You return with me to Paris, and before nightfull I take you and Mademoiselle de la Féronniere back to the convent."

"Ah, Héloise, are you quite inflexible?" exclaimed the Comte de Beaumanoir, in his gay, genial way. "Have you the heart to take the child away from all this queenly state and change her royal robes for the pensionnaire's little black frock?"

"Nay, my father, do not make it harder for us all," she pleaded. "Indeed, it is for Gabrielle's own sake; and Monsieur le Duc, too, will thank me in the days to come. She is still too young to do justice to her position; and the next nine months, until her birthday, spent not in class, but in learning all that is needful to rule a great household, will give weight and strength to her character and be invaluable. My sister quite agrees with me; is it not so, dear?" And she turned with a glance of appeal to the girl, for on the tone of her answer hung so much.

"Why, Héloise, little mother, of course you are right. This was settled long ago. But I hope to gain experience quite as much in the salon as in the kitchen. Perhaps Madame l'Abbesse will admit me there as one of her chosen spirits."

"Always with the permission of Monsieur de Maillebois," rejoined her father, with a jesting laugh.

"He is a man of learning himself, and would wish his wife not to be too unworthy of him," said Gabrielle, looking with a smile towards the Duke, who was delighted with her graceful homage.

He took advantage of the opportunity to explain that he proposed to spend most of the winter abroad. He had received a commission from the King to be the bearer of costly gifts to various distinguished foreigners, amongst others the librarian of the Vatican at Rome and the celebrated mathematician Viviani at Florence.

There was a courteous delicacy in the manner of this announcement, for which Héloise could not feel grateful enough, as it smoothed her way, and put an end to all shadow of opposition.

The last farewells were said; the great gilded chariot, with six horses, and postilions in green and gold, was drawn up in front of the stone steps, when Réné de Beaumanoir waved aside the lacquey and himself held open the door.

"I have news of my own to tell you. Monsieur de Maillebois has carte blanche to choose his escort, and he has just asked me to be one of his companions on the King's mission," he exclaimed eagerly.

"Ah, I am glad. Rome will be all new to you, and now that peace is signed and sealed for twenty years, you would have been at a sad loss," said Gabrielle.

"I will send you letters, if occasion serves. You will welcome tidings of us." He spoke to his sister, but for one vivid moment his eyes rested on Yvonne.

There was no time for more. Already they were on the move. Amid stir and excitement, the ponderous equipage drove off with a great noise, the cracking of whips, and the blowing of horns For the three travellers it was a somewhat silent drive back to Paris, as they were all too much engrossed with their own thoughts to make much conversation.

The Marquise de Chamans leant back wearily against the velvet cushions; now that all was over, she could give way to her fatigue of mind and body. She had carried out her plans with bold mastery and complete success. Only one thing marred her content. Jean-Charles, her husband, had been invaluable in entertaining the guests, for he was a most popular man in society and a delightful companion But unfortunately, lansquenet had been started "'Never fear, my darling; when God calls you, then you will find your mother waiting to welcome you in that blessed Home.'"—p. 327.

late the previous night after the ladies had retired, and from some chance words which caught her ear she had reason to believe that the play had been high. Then, to add to her anxiety, the Marquis de Chamans had pleaded an engagement, and driven back to Paris after the wedding with a young officer, a La Fayette, whom rumour spoke of as a gambler. But Jean-Charles did everything with such perfect grace and gay good temper that it was impossible to be angry with him long.

With a light sigh his wife dismissed her vague misgivings. She was going home to her baby, the two-year-old darling from whom she had now been separated for the first time in her life. It had been quite an heroic effort on her part to leave him behind; but she knew that her little Jean would have absorbed too much of her time, and that she would need an undivided soul for the task before her.

It was small wonder that the two young girls were quiet and thoughtful. For a few brief hours they had played a splendid part in the brilliant world of society, and this sudden return to the seclusion of the convent was striking and dramatic—a fall from a dizzy height. They would awake from a dream of pomp and luxury and adulation, to find themselves in the shadowed path of humility and obedience.

But the echo of Gabrielle's triumph was destined to linger yet awhile. She went back to the Abbaye aux Bois, laden with presents of fans and embroidered satchels, and a few medallion portraits, to receive quite an ovation from her companions, for, popular as she ever was, her romantic story made her still more interesting. From Madame l'Abbesse downwards there could scarcely fail to be a new tone of sympathetic attraction towards the young girl who was now a bride—Madame la Duchesse de Maillebois.

Time passed on, and life settled down once more into the ancient peaceful round. Yet to Gabrielle there were some notable changes. It had been arranged that she should take in turn her share of all the various duties of the convent—the kitchen, the linen room, the infirmary, the sacristy, with the mending of old embroidered chasubles and other priestly garments, and delicate lace and altar cloths. Perhaps most interesting of all was the care of the library, with its store of precious old manuscripts and books. Yet in all these successive cares she no longer found herself in the constant society of Yvonne; indeed, whether by accident or design, the two friends were almost entirely separated, and this was a great trial to them both.

Mademoiselle de la Féronniere had also cause for much anxiety and sorrow. The late autumn was damp and unhealthy that year, and amongst other cases of illness little Alix de Courcelles, her special charge, had sickened with fever, and was lying seriously ill in the infirmary.

The child had been devoted to her from the first, and now, in her weakness, moaned pitifully for her "little mother," until the doctor insisted that she must be pacified and have her way, at any cost. Yvonne thus found herself, nothing loth, a constant watcher in the sick room, for Alix clung to her with such passionate affection that it was impossible to part them. The old nurse who had come to the convent with the child might well have been jealous of the new friend's influence, but she soon fell under the same charm, and became her devoted adherent. One evening, when they were sitting together in the twilight, and their charge was sleeping, Madelon told her story.

"Ah, Mademoiselle, you bid me rest and not wear myself out, but you cannot know what my darling is to me. She has been my care ever since her birth, and her dying mother made me promise never to leave her. When her father married again, and her stepmother sent her here to be rid of the trouble, I should have been dismissed, but Madame l'Abbesse would not hear of it when she saw what a fragile little creature it was. She is a good woman, though not in the way of salvation."

"Then you are a Huguenot too, Madelon!" exclaimed the girl. "But tell me, how do you live at peace with the lay sisters and the servants?"

"I have learnt wisdom, Mademoiselle, in a hard school. I speak little and toil much. My hands are strong and skilful, and I am ever ready to do the work of others, so no one asks about my religion."

There was a restless movement in the bed, and silence reigned for a while. Then Madelon continued:

"My heart misgave me when they took my child away from her native air, her home by the sea, and brought her to this great crowded city. It is the water of Paris which gave her the fever, and is killing her, my little lamb!" and she broke off with a sob.

They were interrupted by Sister Virginie, of the infirmary, who came to send Mademoiselle de la Féronniere down to supper, and to persuade the nurse to take a few hours' sleep. She was a good, kind creature, but greatly given to superstitions, one who would hear the tick of the death watch in the stillness of the night, and see omens of coming sorrow on every side. The doctor, on arriving one day, had found his little patient in a perilous state of excitement, as she listened to Sister Virginie's vivid stories of Hell and Purgatory and fantastic demons. He felt it his duty to interfere, and suggested:

"Why not talk to the child about Paradise, dear Madame?"

"Ah, yes; I can tell her all about it. I saw it once in a vision," exclaimed the good woman, with the greatest eagerness. "Paradise was like a beautiful big chamber all set with diamonds and rubies and precious stones. Le Bon Dieu was sitting in the middle of a great throne, the Son on His right hand, the Blessed Virgin on His left, and the Holy Spirit like a dove on His shoulder. And all the blessed saints were passing backwards and forwards; the little children were in front."

"Tell me, Madame Virginie, did you see my dear mother there?" cried the sick child, with keen anxiety.

"Ah, no, my dear; you see, she was not one of us," she stammered, and Madelon, entering at that moment, silenced her with an imperious gesture, and clasping little Alix in her arms, hushed her sobs.

"Never fear, my darling; when God calls you, then will you find your mother waiting to welcome you in that blessed Home," she whispered, in loving assurance.

After this incident it was little wonder that she kept watch night and day over her precious charge, and that only to Yvonne would she trust her for the brief rest which Nature imperatively demanded. With rare tolerance and generosity, the Abbess refused to interfere, and embitter the last memories of a dying child, for soon the rumour spread through the convent that there was no hope.

A great hush seemed to rest on all that young, eager life. There were no games, and even in class the lessons were disturbed, for all were restless and half-hearted. With noiseless steps the girls crept along the corridor, and listened outside the sick room for the faintest sound, or in little groups whispered low the latest news. Some were full of superstitious terror at the near approach of the shadow of death, while others would become over-excited and see visions, like Madame Virginie.

At length the end came, and little Alix passed away, with a smile on her lips, folded in the arms of Yvonne, who softly sang her to rest with the words of one of those glorious old canticles which had soothed so many meek souls in the hour of death.

The sad news was proclaimed by the hammer of St. Benedict, the bell with a cross, which only tolled in the last agony, and was never heard without a thrill of emotion, and a prayer for the passing soul from even the lightest-hearted.

Poor Madelon at first was stunned with grief, but when calmer thought followed her hours of despair she realised that her frail darling was taken from the evil to come. "It is well with the child," she murmured in lowly submission, and henceforth all the passionate devotion of her strong nature was transferred to Mademoiselle de la Féronniere, in whose service she remained. No one could foresee how greatly her courage and fidelity would be justified in the eventful future.

Yet already coming events were casting their shadows before, and each day fresh rumours reached the convent of the King's strong feeling against the Huguenots, and of the stern measures of persecution which were being taken against them.

Before the end of that year, 1684 A.D., the notorious dragonnades began, when companies of soldiers were sent to all the towns and châteaux in the provinces, where there were many Calvinists. Each party was conducted by a bishop, a curé, a delegate, or someone in authority; and the orders were to use all measures, short of actual killing, to compel the heretics to renounce their "so-called reformed" religion.

This being the case in the outside world, it was not strange that party feeling and intolerance began to rise high in the convent itself against all who were known or suspected to hold the Huguenot faith.

CHAPTER VIII.

"AT last, dear Yvonne, I have a chance of speaking to you. How long I have waited! Come, come quick to our quiet arbour, or we may be watched and followed."

It was Gabrielle who found an opportunity of whispering this in the midst of the crowd of girls who were hurrying out of the refectory after the midday dinner. All the morning it had rained without ceasing, but now at two o'clock the weather had cleared, and the order had come for an hour's recreation in the garden.

The two friends ran lightly down the avenue of plane trees, beneath the falling leaves, to the wilder part of the garden, which, in the yellow and russet of late autumn, gloried in a beauty of its own.

"I have a letter to show you from my brother Réné," she began eagerly. "Two days have I carried it about, and never was able to give it to you, alas! now that we no longer even sleep in the same dormitory."

"Ah, Gabrielle! It is not only with you, but I am constantly watched and interrupted if I speak to anyone," said the girl sadly. "It seems to me that Madame Scholastique is always at my side."

"Then take the letter quickly, before any spy finds us. Oh, my poor Yvonne, you cannot tell how I feel for you! Does Monsieur le Directeur Orse still persecute you to go to confession?"

"Yes; he has long arguments with me almost every day, and even Madame hardly dares to take my part."

"The time will soon pass, dear. Only a few months, and May will bring my birthday; then you shall come and live with me, until——"

"Nay, Gabrielle, I will not bring trouble on those I love," she began; but her words were hushed by eager kisses.

"Wait till the time comes, my dear. We must not waste these precious moments in dispute. You can read the letter when you are alone. Indeed, I half believe that 'tis all meant for you. Réné never took so much trouble about his little sister before."

The words were lightly spoken; but she looked wistfully at her friend, over whose face mantled a conscious flush of pleasure.

"There! I knew it!" cried Gabrielle, delighted at her own insight. "Come, the shadows are lengthening—we must return."

They had scarcely left their shelter and turned homewards, when a sharp, querulous voice behind them cried:

"Mademoiselle de la Féronniere, I have sought for you everywhere. Have you taken the key of the drug cupboard?"

And the friends knew that they had been watched and followed.

But in spite of all Yvonne went through her varied tasks that day with a light heart and a smile ever hovering on her lips. Not until late at night, however, beneath the hanging oil lamp of the dormitory, with its dim and flickering glimmer, when her companions were asleep, was she able to read her precious letter, the hidden source of her joy. Thus it ran, in bold, strongly marked characters:

"The Villa Medici at Rome,
This 6th October, 1684.

"According to my promise, dear sister, I send you this letter by the hand of the messenger who bears the despatches of the Duc de Maillebois.

"After Marseilles, we touched at Genoa, where I was filled with amazement at the splendid palaces. But we did not long abide in this great city by the sea, being warned that the plague raged in the lower part by the harbour. Thence to Florence, which for beauty is past my power to describe, with its stately towers and pinnacles rising against the sky, set like a gem in the marvellous fertile country. Here we had our quarters by night in the Tower of Galileo, in a villa standing in a fair garden, and we lost no time in seeking out Messer Viviani, the great mathematician, of world-wide fame. He was highly honoured by receiving the King's liberalities, and purposeth to build himself therewith a fine house, and inscribe on the face of it, in letters of gold, 'Ædes a Deo datæ,' which, I had best explain, is in compliment to King Louis, 'the God-given.'

"Our mission being accomplished, we could scarce tarry long enough to see all the treasures of art collected in this pleasant city, for we had a long and perilous journey before us. So we set forth in much state, with a goodly retinue, on our travels through this land of Italy.

"It was a day long to be remembered when at length Rome dawned upon our eyes—that queen of cities, the very jewel and pride of the whole world! Ah, Gabrielle, I would that you and your friend were with me here, and could yourselves behold that which no poor words of mine can describe. We are lodged in princely style, on a wooded hill called the Pincio, from whence we look down on the countless churches and mighty palaces and the massive ruins of olden times, mouldered away, and the shining Tiber alone unchanged, since Cæsar looked on it in his pride.

"We have been received in audience by his Holiness the Pope, and he offered Monsieur de Maillebois a suite of rooms at the Vatican, high up in the Borgia Tower; but the Duke, well knowing that Innocent XI. is not on close terms with our King, thought well to decline in all courtesy. Yet all alike conspire to do us honour. We have been nobly entertained by princes and cardinals, and men of note. The Duke spends much of his time in the picture galleries and museums of the Vatican, and amid the priceless treasures of learning in the great libraries. A great friendship has risen up between him and the old librarian, to whom he was specially commissioned.

"But for me, the life of the crowded pavements, the pilgrims from all lands, the grandees in their gorgeous coaches, the endless variety of the priests' dress, the gallant show of the papal soldiers, and the wild-looking peasants of the Campagna are of ever-changing interest. My thoughts often turn to you and Mademoiselle your friend, and I try to fancy you in the midst of our gay company at the Villa Medici, which takes the air under the ancient ilexes, or on the sunny terrace. You would love to see the noble ladies who arrive in their gilded sedan chairs, the red cardinals, the abbés in their silken mantles, the men of rank or letters in their richly broidered coats, which outdo all the quaint conceits of Paris, even the gorgeous lacqueys.

"Monsieur de Maillebois will do justice to the grandeur and beauties of Rome; but, as you well know, I was never an adept with my pen, and can but lightly skim on the surface. In the course of my frivolous wanderings I have found a quaint old chap-book of mirthful ballads and wood-cuts for you, my sister—'tis all I should dare offer to a duchess! Also, I have an ancient ring, with an Egeria cut in a carnelian—a gem lately dug up in a vineyard, which I reserve for Mademoiselle de la Feronniere, to whom I pray you give my humble greeting and remembrance.—Your dutiful brother to command,

"René Gaston de Beaumanoir."

As she finished the last words, Yvonne looked up, with a dreamy smile. In a softened glow of happiness, she felt as though she were transported far away from that low, dimly lighted chamber, and that she, too, stood amidst the glory and splendour of the mighty city, with Réné by her side. It was a vision of delight, an earthly paradise. As she thought of the promised ring, the long-buried amulet—maybe the symbol of some pathetic love story in the far-off ages—the warm blushes mantled over cheek and brow, and she murmured softly to herself, "Réné, my Réné!"

But it was only for one moment of sweet forgetfulness. Relentless memory swiftly called her back to the cold, stern reality. She was parted by an impassable barrier from the Chevalier de Beaumanoir. That he should take a Huguenot bride would mean ruin for him in his profession and his fortunes, for too well she remembered the law passed in 1680, by which Catholics were forbidden to marry Protestants, under pain of losing all their rights of succession. Then, too, she was not of age, and her guardian, alas! had other views for her, and would never give his consent; so that she was doubly barred. It was with these saddened thoughts that she crept back shivering into her little white bed, and presently fell asleep, her eyes still moist with tears.

"Not until late at night . . . was she able to read her precious letter."

[END OF CHAPTER EIGHT.]

On Lying

A Sermon by the Rev. Charles I. Graham, B.D., Incumbent of Celbridge and Canon of Christ Church Cathedral, Dublin.

"Wherefore, putting away falsehood, speak ye truth each one with his neighbour: for we are members one of another."—EPHESIANS iv. 25 (R.V.)

A LEADING English journal (Spectator, June 13th, 1903) recently called attention to a French pamphlet written last year by a Roman Catholic professor of theology, in which he pleaded that to speak the truth always was neither possible nor desirable. Indeed, this pamphlet was written to supply rules for the regulation of lying, and to give illustrations of circumstances in which the truth, as this professor thought, might be legitimately sacrificed. All permissible lies, he says, may be brought under two heads—those told to guard a secret, and those told in self-defence. He gives two illustrations of the latter. A witness in a court of justice may lie if he have grave reason to fear the resentment of the criminal, or if the evidence required of him would damage his own character. A servant is bound to speak the truth to a kind master, even if telling the truth involves blame to his fellow-servants; but if he have to fear from his truthfulness some notable injury to himself, this may be a sufficient reason for not speaking the truth.

I am sure these illustrations shock you—at least, I hope they do. For I think our sense of right and wrong would be very perverted indeed if we gave any sort of approval to such a regulated system of lying. You ought to feel more shocked, however, when I tell you that the sanction of religion is claimed for this system of lying. For this professor bases his theories on the foundation of religion. Where, then, do you imagine, in the whole of the New Testament, is there a text to be found to support his view? Strange to say, he derives his proof from that saying of our Lord recorded in St. Mark, xiii. 32, "But of that day or that hour knoweth no one, not even the angels in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father." Our Lord, says this professor, knew everything about the last day; and when He says, in the words which I have quoted, that He did not, He merely exercised the right of every man to keep a secret. This endeavour to cite the example of our Lord in defence of lying is as bold as it is preposterous. Could we, for a moment, believe that He Who declared Himself to be the Truth, Who turned and looked on Peter as he uttered his shameful lie so that the Apostle went out and wept bitterly, Who set before men the ideal of character contained in the Sermon on the Mount, Who characterised the devil as a liar, who abode not in the truth, because there is no truth in him—could we believe, I say, for a moment that He would utter a deliberate lie in order to guard a secret? No; the old explanation, difficult of comprehension as it may be by some, is quite satisfactory. Our Lord pleads ignorance of the date of the last day because as man on earth He was ignorant; because, sharing to the full our human nature, He shared at times our human ignorance.

Setting aside, then, this absurd attempt to claim the example of our Lord in defence of lying, we may well ask, Is there any passage in the Acts of the Apostles, in the Epistles, or in the Revelation of St. John which teaches a modified kind of lying? In the Acts, as you remember, there is a very striking instance of how God punished lying in the case of Ananias and Sapphira—even though the lie was not a spoken one. In the Epistles we have the words of our text, and St. Paul's similar words to the Colossians, "Lie not one to another"; while in the Revelation we are told that "all liars" shall have their part "in the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone; which is the second death." Can anything be clearer or more definite than this teaching of the New Testament? May not its advice be summarised in the words of our Lord spoken in the Sermon on the Mount, "Let your speech be Yea, yea; Nay, nay; and whatsoever is more than these is of the evil one"? Invariably speak the truth; be true, whatever it costs you—this is what the New Testament everywhere presses upon us.

Yet good men, even of our communion, have debated the question whether it is allowable under any circumstances to tell a falsehood, and therefore whether all falsehoods are lies. "The general rule," said the great Dr. Johnson, who was honoured and admired for the truthfulness and accuracy of his conversation, "is that truth should never be violated. There must however," he said, "be some exceptions. If, for instance, a murderer asks you where a man whom he is pursuing has gone, you may tell him what is not true, because you are under a previous obligation not to betray a man to a murderer. But," he adds, "I deny the lawfulness of telling a lie to a sick man for fear of alarming him."

Archdeacon Paley also pointed out that there are falsehoods which are not lies—that is, which are not criminal—as (1) Where no one is deceived, which is the case in parables, fables, novels, jests, tales to create mirth, ludicrous embellishments of a story, where the declared design of the speaker is not to inform, but to divert. In such instances no promise to speak the truth is violated, because none was given or understood to be given. (2) Where the person to whom you speak has no right to know the truth—as where you tell a falsehood to a madman for his own advantage; to a robber to conceal your property; to an assassin to defeat or divert him from his purpose. At the same time, he admits that it is almost impossible to pronounce beforehand with certainty concerning any lie that it is inoffensive.

Yes; we feel that Paley is right there. There may be falsehoods which are not lies, and yet it is difficult to say that any lie is perfectly harmless. How often, for instance, just to save themselves trouble, do parents tell silly falsehoods to their children! The habit is and must be a bad one. For I cannot but feel that one's moral sense must be a good deal perverted when it is seriously argued that it is lawful to tell a lie to children because they have no powers of judging. "Accustom your children," said Dr. Johnson, "constantly to this: if a thing happened at one window, and they when relating it say that it happened at another, do not let it pass, but instantly check them. You do not know where deviation from truth will end." And when objection was raised to this statement, the Doctor replied by saying, "It is more from carelessness about truth than from intentional lying that there is so much falsehood in the world."

Perhaps we shall see this more clearly if we think for a moment of one great cause which leads, above all else, to lying. To all of us, in greater or less degree, there have been given what I may term conversational powers. But, having this gift, we need something on which to exercise it, and we exercise it more commonly on persons than things. The reason is obvious. It is much easier to talk about persons than things; for to talk of things always requires a large amount of reading and reflection. Now, the power of talking well always presupposes the power to amuse and interest. But as in the actual lives of many of our neighbours there is not much of surpassing interest, as life is humdrum enough for most of us, our tendency, if we wish to create interest, is always to invent and to exaggerate; and so, from the habit of unconscious exaggeration, we pass into the habit of lying. We possibly do not mean to do so; but falsehood always grows apace where accuracy is sacrificed to embellishment or to anything else. "Some men," it has been said, "relate what they think as what they know; some men of confused memories and habitual inaccuracy ascribe to one man what belongs to another; and some talk on without thought or care." Thus it is that we lie; not because we altogether love lying, but because we are careless about truth, and do not reverence it as we should.

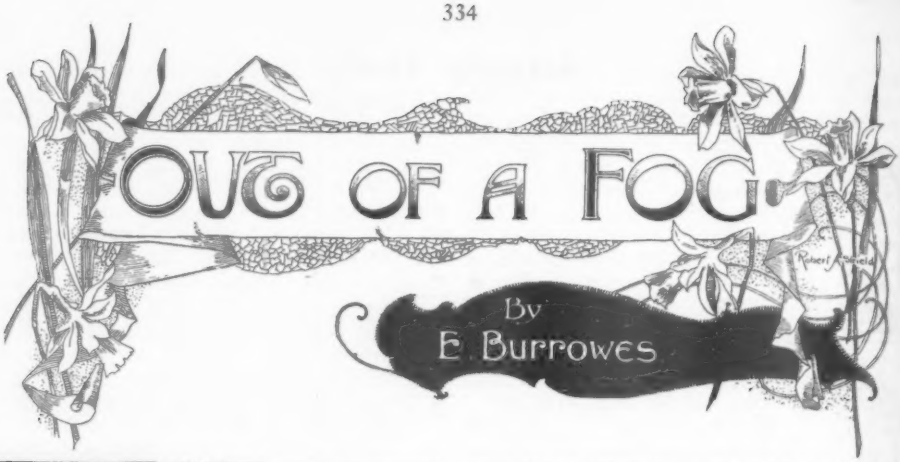
Now, in the light of what Scripture tells us of the sinfulness and punishment of lying, we are but fulfilling a Christian duty when we strive to be accurate in our conversation, and to aim above all things else at truthfulness. Look how a lawyer or a scientific man will train himself to accurate habits of thought and speech, so as to find out facts, and deal with them alone. We need, looking to God for His help, to train ourselves in very much the same way to repeat accurately what we hear, and describe accurately what we see. It is from this unintentional untruthfulness, caused by inaccuracy, that so many misunderstandings, so many quarrels, so many evil rumours, so many scandals arise.

The great thing in this Christian warfare against lying is to resist the beginnings of the sin. If you give yourself the habit of practising deceit in small things, you will soon find yourself practising it also in matters of importance. And the habit of lying, once it attaches itself to a man, like the drink habit, seldom leaves him. It is not hard to see why. One lie always requires another to cover it; and so we go on from lie to lie, until at last it actually comes to this, that we cannot speak the truth, even if we wish to do so. I have known instances in my own experience of men who, I believe, would really have felt awkward and unhappy in telling the truth. For them the bitter had become sweet, the evil good. And yet we ought to know, if we have eyes to see and intellects to think, that lying has no promise of good things in this present life. For the liar, like the murderer, is generally found out. "Lying," it has been said, "is like borrowing of the money-lender; for the credit which we get by it we have always to pay heavily for, and at last we find that the interest by far exceeds the principal, and we get so irretrievably involved that we never fully recover."

To the Christians at Ephesus St. Paul gives a pregnant reason why, putting away falsehood in every form, they should speak truth each one with his neighbour. It is because "they were members one of another." Have you ever thought of your duty to society in this matter of speaking the truth? How long would society keep together if everyone practised falsehood? If the truth-telling portion of society were withdrawn from it, in what evil case would it be! Truthfulness, transparent honesty in what we say and do, is the salt of our political, our social, our religious life. Little as we sometimes esteem it when compared with other things, we cannot do without it. In the political life of our own country there is too little of this savour of truthfulness. Politicians speak; but they do not always say what they mean. There is a reservation in their utterances as unwholesome as it is dangerous. And it is this want of candour—bred, I believe, largely by the system of casuistry which prevails in the Roman Church—which has made Ireland less happy and less prosperous than any other part of the British Empire.

But in a higher sense than this St. Paul teaches us to put away lying—because we are members one of another. The Church of Christ is the grandest of all societies. And the members of the Church are bound to the Head of the Church, and in Him to each other in a way unknown to any other society. Alas! that in our practical everyday life we do not realise this fact as we should. The world's attitude towards religion nowadays is too smooth and easy-going to enable us to realise our membership in the one body of Christ as we should. It takes a touch of persecution to do that. Difficulties and dangers shared in common bind men together as nothing else can. And it is when we cling to each other in love and mutual dependence that we feel how base, how treacherous, how ruinous a thing it is to be untrue to each other. If falsehood tends to break up human society, it must also tend to break up the body of Christ. To be a liar and to be a member of Christ—the two things are really quite incompatible. Because Christ loved us, because He has redeemed us, because He has bound us in one great body as members of Himself, we try to be true and loyal to each other, and to put away that sin of lying as an offence against Him Who loved us, as a grievous wrong done to the family of which He is the Head. Recognise yourselves, and teach others to recognise, the grandeur and beauty of truth. Recognise that to be truthful is to be like Christ. He did not only speak truth, He was Truth. "If thine eye be single thy whole body shall be full of light." There is an elasticity in the step; there is an openness in the look; there is a bravery in the heart of a truthful man which the liar and the hypocrite can never have. "Wherefore, putting away lying, speak every man truth with his neighbour, for we are members one of another."

Angels Holy.



Words by JOHN STUART BLACKIE.

Music by SIR A. C. MACKENZIE, Mus.D., LL.D.
(Principal of the Royal Academy of Music.)

3. Praise Him ever,
Bounteous Giver;
Praise Him, Father, Friend, and Lord!

Each glad soul its free course winging,
Each glad voice its free song singing,
Praise the great and mighty Lord!

THE HOUSES were all exactly alike: built after one monotonous pattern, with bow windows on either side of a porch, bow windows again on the next storey, and conventionally twisted chimney-stacks, they belonged to that order of dwelling known as "superior villa residences standing in their own grounds, with extensive views of surrounding country." The grounds, indeed, consisted of a few square yards of sooty grass and bare flower-beds, in which cats scratched and nothing but weeds would grow; while the extensive view resolved itself into an expanse—extensive, certainly—of brick-fields, with grimy hedgerows and fields beyond, and—far, far away—a suspicion of real unadulterated country, in the shape of a belt of trees climbing a slight eminence.

Scrope stuck his head out of the cab which was crawling along the ill-lighted road, and peered at each house anxiously: a thick fog of the order called "pea-soup" made any clear scrutiny a difficult matter. Its pungent smell filled his nostrils and made his eyes water, and when at length the cab halted before a feebly gleaming light, and the man declared he had now reached his destination, he alighted with relief and rang a peal at the bell, in eager haste to get inside the house, two of whose windows sent forth cheery lights into the foggy outside world.

After a long waiting, during which he stamped his feet to induce a little circulation, and the cabby groaned audibly under the weight of a portmanteau and bag, the door was flung open by an elderly servant, and he was ushered into a lamp-lit hall, with the information that the mistress was expecting him, and would be down in a few minutes, if he would be kind enough to go into the drawing-room.

Scrope obediently went into the fire-lit room to the right, saw with relief the pleasant scene within those four walls, as contrasted with the outward dreariness, heard his baggage being deposited with several objurgations on the part of the cabman, who was answered with amazing fluency by the respectable elderly servant, and then fell to looking round him as he waited for the coming of his cousin's wife.

The room was charming as revealed to him by the light of the dancing flames: they lit on faintly tinted pink walls, a few good prints and etchings in dark frames, plenty of flowers — faded and drooping, to be sure— and a pile of books and needlework on a table near the fire. Scrope looked at this last approvingly.

"Good old Tom!" he muttered. "Married a very model of domesticity and all the virtues. If she's only half good enough for him, she'll do. I wonder." His wandering eyes fell on the picture of a girl standing on an easel near the piano. It arrested his attention in some strange manner; whether it was the fact that the light from the fire danced over that laughing face, making it stir into life under its elfin touch, or what it was, he could not say, but those hazel eyes looked mockingly at him out of the canvas, and he took a step towards it. The woman was lovely, the perfection of daintiness and charm.

He drew back as he heard quick steps outside and a voice speaking in low tones; then the door opened, and a girl came in from the outer gloom of the hall.

She started back with a sharp cry, whether of surprise or anger he could not say. The next moment a flood of light poured upon him from the electric globes overhead, and he found himself face to face with the original of the picture on the easel—a beautiful and apparently angry woman.

"I must ask your pardon for leaving you in the dark," she said icily, "but you have arrived rather earlier than we had expected. You can sit down."

Her glance, full of scorn, travelled from the top of his fair head to the tips of his immaculate boots. As he obeyed her command, rather than request, a great wonder filled him: that this could be Tom's wife—good-natured, jolly Tom Freville!

"Er—thanks!" he said meekly, and thereupon a silence fell between them, as they eyed each other unwinkingly. Of all the extraordinary receptions——!

"I suppose you are not too proud to eat supper?" demanded his hostess, with some asperity, "for we don't dine late here. Of course, if you wish——"

"I am content with bread and cheese," averred Scrope, with haste and a certain amount of truth, seeing that he was particular as to the kind of cheese he ate as a rule; "but pray don't let me put you out in any way. Had I known it was inconvenient to you to take me in, I would have——"

"There is no question of convenience surely," she retorted. "You said you would come, and there was nothing for it but to let you do so. Beggars can't be choosers, as of course you know only too well."

The situation was becoming more strained every moment: Scrope pulled at his moustache in perplexity. He had offered himself to Tom as a visitor, to be sure; but had he known of this reception awaiting him at the hands of Tom's newly married wife, wild horses would not have dragged him to the door. The mere idea of dear old Tom being in the hands of such a little virago, of his having given up his beloved late dinner for a supper of, presumably, bread and cheese, was too funny, and he laughed suddenly and involuntarily.

His beautiful vis-à-vis, who was evidently determined not to let him out of her sight, sprang from her chair.

"How dare you laugh?" she said hotly. "First of all you insult us by coming here at all; then you—you laugh! If only Tom were here, instead of being, as he is, miles away——"

"But—but I certainly understood he was here," said the bewildered Scrope. "I wired him only to-day at his office. I certainly owe you an apology, Mrs. Freville, for intruding on you during Tom's absence, but——"

"I don't understand you. Is there some mistake somewhere? I am not Mrs. Freville. Tom left England a week ago. Oh! surely you, of all people in the world, know that? Why, it was you who advised it! It was you who——"

She pulled a handkerchief from her pocket and turned away from him, but he followed her across the room.

"Tell me," he urged gently, "for there must be some mistake: if you are not Mrs. Freville, my cousin Tom Freville's wife, who are you? And where am I?"

"I am Margaret Morse, and you are at No. 10, Mount Road."

Scrope stared at her in amazement; he discovered signs of tears in her beautiful eyes. She was the most fascinating and lovely creature in the world. But Tom——

"Tom is away?" he asked, in sheer astonishment.

"Of course he is. Would you be here if he were not?"

"Mount Road! I ought to be at No. 10, Morton Road!" cried Scrope; and then, as bewilderment chased both tears and smiles from her face, Margaret Morse stared at him with parted lips.

"Then you are not—Robert Broad?" she breathed rather than spoke. "You are not the—the man in possession?"

"I am Gilbert Scrope," he said simply, and he thought the girl murmured 'Thank God!' under her breath. "I don't know what to say to exculpate myself," he said, remorsefully, "but I can only think that owing to the fog I—I came to the wrong house. Can you tell me where No. 10, Morton Road is? I am on my way to stay with my cousin Tom Freville and his wife: that alone can be my excuse for my unpardonable conduct. You see, I do not yet know my new cousin Mrs. Freville, and I naturally thought you were she. Will you forgive me?"

"Of course; it was a natural enough mistake," she said quietly. "And I can tell you where Morton Road is: just round the corner. That, too, has something to do with the mistake. We were also expecting a visitor, and the whole thing was, of course, caused by the fog. I am sorry you should have suffered for your mistake."

There was not a glimmer of a smile in her face as she spoke. She seemed to be listening for some distant sound: it came a second later, and before Scrope could answer her the door opened and an old man came into the brilliantly lighted room. He walked with the aid of a stick, and had the attentive bearing of one who is blind. At once the girl's face changed; it softened with intense affection, and with a glance at Scrope she met the old man and led him to a chair near the fire.

"It is a mistake, father," she said. "This is not Mr. Broad; it is a gentleman whom I unfortunately mistook for him, and who came by mistake to this house in the fog. Perhaps, father, Mr. Broad is not coming after all."

"Pray Heaven, child, he is not!" said the old man feebly, and at a sign from the girl Scrope left the room silently. She followed him a moment later into the hall, where his baggage was still standing.

"I will see that your things are sent to you without fail," she said. "I owe you an apology, Mr. Scrope; I ought to have seen at once that you could not possibly be the—the unwelcome visitor we are expecting to-night."

"Nay, you must forgive me," he said, with his pleasant smile, "so we should cry quits. Or let us blame the fog for it all."

She smiled, and they looked out into the chill, foggy darkness. Before he stepped into it and received her instructions as to the way to his destination, she gave him her hand. Her eyes shone like stars on a stormy night, and he was suddenly seized with a mad desire to know who and what the unwelcome visitor was to her. But he was forced to say good-night a moment later, as the voice of the old man was heard calling her.

As he turned out into the dimly lighted road a man stumbled up against him. They looked at each other with a muttered mutual apology. Scrope caught sight of a coarse red face, with watery blue eyes and a cruel under jaw; then the man hurried on his way, and turned in at the gate of No. 10, Mount Road.

Was it possible that he was that unwelcome expected guest?

Scrope plunged down the road through fog and mire, and saw only the face of the most beautiful woman in the world before him. Yet he did not know if she were maid, wife, or widow.

* * * * * *

"Better late than never, old chap! We had quite given you up, hadn't we, Ella? Come in, my dear Gilbert—Ella, you need not be formally introduced, for you're cousins by marriage, eh? And there's a fine bit of mistletoe over her head, Gilbert, my boy!"

Tom Freville broke into a jolly laugh, and Scrope took the hint and kissed the pink cheek of his new cousin, young Mrs. Freville. She was a pretty, dark-eyed, kittenish young person; involuntarily his thoughts fled back to that other wonderful face.

"But where is your luggage, Gilbert?" said Mrs. Freville, in her most matronly manner.

Scrope started; his face broke into a smile, and then the story came out. The Frevilles listened with undisguised interest and amusement, and Tom slapped his leg with vigour when it was finished.

"Goodness!" he said. "Ella, that must be the beautiful unknown who has puzzled us so much. They are newcomers," he continued, turning to Scrope, "and we have seen the lady you speak of several times, but no one else. There is some mystery about them, I believe. Didn't we hear some queer story of a wild brother, or something of the sort, Ella? Anyway, no one knows much about the inhabitants of No. 10, Mount Road, except you, Gilbert. Well, adventures are to the adventurous, you know. The fog is thick to-night and no mistake. Care for a smoke, old chap, before you survey your quarters? You're our first guest, isn't he, Ella? So there have been tremendous preparations for your comfort. Oh! I've seen what's been going on."

He ushered Scrope out of the pretty drawing-room towards his own special den, and avoided the cushion aimed dexterously at his head by Mrs. Freville, with a laugh.

It was January, and frost, which had bound the earth in an iron grip, followed by thick, impenetrable fog, stopped all idea of hunting, for which amusement Scrope had come down to spend a few days with his cousin. Three days later, however, the weather changed: a rapid thaw changed the spirit of the world entirely, soft rain did wonders, and on the fifth day Scrope and Tom Freville jogged out to the meet together with some twenty other persons from the surrounding neighbourhood. Whether he expected or hoped to see the beautiful Margaret Morse among the number, Scrope hardly knew, but he recognised in an instant the coarse, red-faced man who had stumbled against him on that foggy night, and who had gone into No. 10, Mount Road. He was mounted on a fine grey, and rode with some knowledge over the country, which was pretty was this unwelcome visitor to her? For he had no doubt whatever that this was the very man—Robert Broad—whose name had been pronounced by those beautiful lips with such terror and loathing.

An impulse for which he could not account

"She met the old man and led him to a chair near the fire."

stiff, later in the day. Somehow Scrope found himself beside him more than once, and he asked the Master who he was.

"Some wealthy chap who has bought a hunting-box near here," was the answer. "His name is Broad: he's a keen sportsman, and keeps a fine stable; that's all I know about him. Looks a rough diamond, eh?"

Scrope nodded. He thought of the face of the woman when it was raised to his with a look of horror on it only five days ago, and again the thought flashed upon him, What made him accept with eagerness the Frevilles' cordial invitation to prolong his visit, and it was on Sunday, in the little village church, that he saw again the beautiful haunting face of Margaret Morse. She was sitting alone in a corner; her black hat cast such a shadow over her face that he could scarcely see her, but he knew it must be she. Once during the service he caught the look of horror she cast at a distant pew, occupied by Robert Broad, and before the sermon she slipped out. A few minutes later he understood the reason, for from the pulpit the vicar read out the banns of marriage between "Robert Broad, widower, of this parish, and Margaret Morse, spinster, also of this parish, for the first time of asking."

"So the beautiful unknown is going to be married to that rich brute Broad!" said Tom Freville, with a shrug of his handsome shoulders, as they walked home from church. "I call it sacrilege—Beauty and the Beast, eh?"

Scrope nodded. It had struck him in exactly the same light. He was convinced that Broad had some powerful hold over the girl; else why her look and words pregnant with terror and loathing on that foggy night? Why—— Such questionings drove sleep from his pillow, and when towards morning he dozed, his dreams were haunted by Margaret Morse.

* * * * * *

"I don't believe it!" said Tom Freville.

"My dear, it's a fact. Only last night the Boulays' house was broken into; two thousand pounds' worth of jewellery was carried off, and no one has an idea how the thief came or went. You know this is not the first burglary of note, either; why, there have been at least four in the neighbourhood during as many months. I'm beginning to fear for all my pretty wedding presents, I assure you, Gilbert."

"What is the matter?" said Scrope lazily, looking up from his letters. "Are you two young people talking of burglars?"

"Yes; there's a very clever gentleman of the profession about evidently," said Freville cheerfully. "Don't worry your little head, Ella; such an artist in his trade only comes where he knows the swag—to use the proper term, my love—is worth the risk of taking. They want diamonds and plenty of 'em. Thank goodness we don't run to more than one or two of those precious things in this establishment. One of the advantages of being poor but honest, my dear Ella, is that no one tries to relieve you by force of either of those estimable possessions."

"Tom, you're a philosopher," laughed Scrope. "There's collusion with the servants in nearly every case I ever came across; probably it's an important factor in your burglaries about here."

"Daresay. Wish I could catch the man, that's all. A lark if he were to try his little game on at the Court to-morrow night, Ella? There must be a valuable harvest in her ladyship's dressing-cases and jewel-bags, if only Mr. Burglar knew it. You're coming with us there, Gilbert?"

"Thanks very much; I should like to. It's a concert. Oh, good!"

Ten days had passed since Scrope's arrival, and for no ostensible reason—since a frost had again made hunting out of the question—he still lingered on with the Frevilles. He had seen the mysterious Miss Morse on several occasions, but only in the distance; once, indeed, he had met her in the village street; she had recognised him, and bowed distantly, and then passed from his sight. But the mere fact of her recognition determined him to stay yet a little longer. He longed to elucidate the mystery of her connection with Broad, her reasons for marrying such a brute; then he apostrophised himself as an ass for his trouble. After all, what possible business was it of his?

Yet when that very afternoon, walking across the churchyard, through which lay a short cut to one of the prettiest walks in the neighbourhood, he found it was his business. Ahead of him he saw her walking slowly with down-bent head, and, moved by an irresistible impulse, he hastened on and overtook her. She turned swiftly at the sound of his footsteps, and a look of terror which had flown into her eyes faded as she saw him.

"Oh, you!" she said, with relief. "I thought it was——"

"Another unwelcome visitor?" he asked lightly. "I seem fated to frighten you, Miss Morse. But, believe me, I would not do so willingly."

"No; I don't think you would," she said, looking at him consideringly. "I should never be afraid of you."

"Yet you were——" he reminded her.

"No, not afraid," she said quickly; "only startled; but I had some cause for that."

"It was my fault," he said, with ready contrition. "I have never ceased to blame myself. But since our acquaintance was formed in so strange a way, may I not congratulate you on your approaching—marriage?"

She turned and looked at him steadily, a world of trouble in her deep dark eyes.

"You are very kind," she said, "but it is not a matter of congratulation—rather of necessity."

"I have met Mr. Broad in the hunting field," he said, and was afraid to say more.

She left him with abruptness at the corner of the road, and that was all that passed between them. He watched her out of sight and continued his walk, more puzzled than ever over the matrimonial arrangements of his oddly made acquaintance.

The fog which hung round the country with such persistence descended again like a thick curtain when the Frevilles and Scrope were on their way to the concert at the Court, a country house some four miles distant.

"Fine night for burglars," said Tom Freville jovially, as they drew slowly up a steep avenue, and so to the door of the long, low mansion, from which twinkled a hundred yellow lights, shining like diamond pin-pricks through the fog. From the distance came the strains of a violin solo, and the air inside the beautiful old house was sweet with the perfume of many flowers.

Scrope stood and watched the pretty sight for a while; he was not averse to introductions, and his hostess introduced him to several pretty girls, with whom he sat and talked during intervals in the music. It was near upon midnight that he afterwards looked out into the night from a side door leading from the conservatory into the garden. The fog had nearly cleared, a pale moon shone coldly out of the dark sky, one or two stars twinkled in her wake, and everything outside was very cold and still. Lighting a cigarette, Scrope stepped out on to a gravelled terrace which ran the whole length of the house. No one was about, he had the place to himself, and he was free to smoke and meditate there for a few minutes No one would miss him. As he sauntered up and down his thoughts lingered—as they had a queer trick of doing of late—round Margaret Morse and her future. That the marriage was uncongenial to her he knew from her looks and words; that there must be some overwhelming power at work he as surely knew. He had heard Broad's name mentioned only that night by his host; he had heard him say that Broad had gone away to town on business presumably connected with his approaching marriage, otherwise he would have been present at the concert. No one apparently knew anything about Miss Morse and her blind father, except that they had recently come to the village, and that the house in which they lived belonged to Broad. That opened up another train of thought, and he had allowed his cigarette to go out unheeded, when a sound above his head startled him. He looked up. Above him ran a row of windows of bedrooms, all looking out on the terrace; he was standing in the shadow, and from thence he saw distinctly against a faint light in one of the rooms the figure of a man climbing out and making ready to descend to the very place in which he was standing. He had unconsciously made his way round the house to a comparatively quiet part at a distance from the concert-room and drawing-rooms. That the man overhead was a thief was evident, and immediately it flashed upon him—the burglaries of which Tom had spoken! It was well known that the hostess at the Court had diamonds of great value. He stood motionless, watching the descending figure and rapidly making his plan of action.

He was young and athletic, a match for most men, be they burglars or not. He eyed with caution the bulk of the descending figure, then the next moment he had closed with him as his feet touched the ground.

The man uttered a sharp exclamation of rage and surprise, something hard fell from his hands to the ground; by its jingle Scrope guessed it to be the jewels which the man had stolen. They fought silently and savagely; but though the thief was big and burly, yet the science which Scrope had at his fingers' ends stood him in good stead; he had not been a first-class athlete at the 'Varsity for nothing. Slowly but surely the man in his grasp knew he was mastered; his struggles became feebler, and then Scrope shouted for help. Five minutes later two men came running to his assistance; the host followed, and the man, hopelessly beaten, was taken into safe custody, together with the jewels he had so nearly made off with. Reluctantly he turned his lowering face to the light which streamed out from the side door to which they took him, and Scrope, with one glance at that red, coarse face, that cruel criminal jaw, fell back a pace. His host followed him.

"Good gracious, Broad!" broke from both.

* * * * * *

So the celebrated burglar, the terror of the neighbourhood, was caught at last in the person of Robert Broad, alias half a dozen other names—one of the cleverest scoundrels of his day. Scrope, looking back, traced the whole amazing story to that little adventure of his, when out of the fog he went into the wrong house and saw—Margaret Morse. Had he not done so, he would only have remained for the inside of a week in the place instead of a fortnight; he would never have noticed the red-faced brute in the hunting field; never have gone to the Court; never have been the means of catching the burglar. So do great matters hang upon a very small incident!

Of course, the story of the burglar travelled like wildfire through the country; little else was talked of by field or fireside. Scrope wondered what was happening at No. 10, Mount Road; but though he longed to see Margaret Morse, he would not intrude upon her, and left the village, surrounded with a sort of halo of heroism, having instructed the Frevilles to keep him posted in any news concerning the burglarious Broad's history or—the occupants of No. 10, Mount Road. Ella, with a gleam of understanding and sympathy in her pretty eyes, promised to write without fail if there was anything to report, which there was a few days later, for a bulky letter reached Scrope at breakfast time when he was seated at his lonely meal in his chambers. He opened it with a smile, and read the closely written sheets, from which the following extracts may be made:—

"It is a regular romance in real life, my dear Gilbert, and I have met your beautiful Miss Morse: she is charming. But, poor thing, how she has suffered! I heard the whole story—though not from her, but this is quite, quite true; perhaps some day you will be able to hear it again—from her lips! The brother, whose name is Tom, got somehow mixed up with this scoundrel Broad in a club. There was card-playing and the usual sort of thing; and then there was a question of a diamond ring at a dinner. It was missing, and suspicion—I don't know why—fell on young Morse. This scoundrel Broad, who had himself stolen the jewel, professed to believe the boy guilty; told him there was only one thing to be done, and that was to clear out of the country; gave him the money to go to America, and then began an elaborate system of blackmail on the unhappy sister, whom he had once seen, and whom he—in his own way—loved desperately. He told her that he would and could bring her brother to justice; that the disgrace would inevitably kill her father, who, as you know, is old and blind; but that nothing would be said or done if she would consent to come down here to a house he would buy, settle her father in there, and become his wife. Driven to it for the sake of those dear to her, she consented; and you know the rest. She had not an idea of the real character of the man, but hated and distrusted him from the first. Of course, his ill-gotten wealth came from his robberies. He appears to have been one of the cleverest criminals of the day, for no one suspected that the man who hunted and raced and kept open house was nothing more than a burglar! When are you coming down here again? I hear the wretch is to get fifteen years; no more than he deserves. I think you will find Miss Morse still here. What it must be to her to feel she is free! The brother has been telegraphed for, I believe."

"The celebrated burglar was caught at last."—p. 339.

The letter dropped from Scrope's fingers. She was free—free. Yes; he would go to her, and tell her that out of that fog he had found the greatest thing in the world.

TEMPERANCE NOTES AND NEWS.

By a Leading Temperance Advocate.

A NORTHERN WORKER.

FEW men are more widely known, and none more deservedly respected in the ranks of the Church of England Temperance Society, than is Mr. John James Cockshott, J.P., of Liverpool and Southport. He was born at Preston, and when a youth at Kirkham he became a member of the local Temperance society. Mr. Cockshott was the first honorary secretary at Preston of the local branch of the Church of England Temperance Society, and is now a leading member of the Liverpool diocesan branch of the Society. He is a member of the Council of the parent Society in London, and for thirty years or more has been prominently identified with the legislative aspects of the Temperance question. As a solicitor of very large practice, and a magistrate of long standing, his wide experience has been of special service in shaping the legislative policy of Church Temperance workers. Keenly alert to the trend of public opinion, and thoroughly in touch with all sections of Temperance workers, Mr. Cockshott has upon many occasions been able to guide the policy of reformers with rare wisdom and sagacity. He is a cultured and able speaker, apt in debate, and persuasive in appeal, so that his services on the platform are in constant request. Like most Temperance folk, Mr. Cockshott takes a keen and practical interest in religious and philanthropic work generally, and has been long associated with the public life of Lancashire.

(Photo: Russell and Sons, Baker Street, W.)

MR. JOHN JAMES COCKSHOTT, J.P.

THE BLACKBOARD IN THE BAND OF HOPE.

Mr. W. N. Edwards, F.C.S., of the United Kingdom Band of Hope Union, is an enthusiastic advocate of the improvement of the methods of carrying on Band of Hope work. He rightly holds that in the teaching of the young, "eye-gate" as well as "ear-gate" may well be employed. To this end he urges the constant use of the blackboard in Band of Hope meetings. By the aid of a piece of chalk one may gain the attention of a roomful of little people, by building up a diagram or an acrostic address on the blackboard. Take a castle, for example, and show how its foundations must be well and truly laid if it has to stand four-square to all the winds that blow. Or sketch a beehive and illustrate your teaching by the wonderful example of the busy bee. Speakers may make a mental note of these hints, although probably many of them will be appalled by Mr. Edwards' emphatic instruction that no Band of Hope address, with or without the blackboard illustrations, should occupy more than ten minutes at the outside!

(Photo: Hault and Fox, Piccadilly, W.)

MR. L. ST. LEMAN-GIBBARD, M.A., J.P.

LICENSING ADMINISTRATION.

This important matter is likely to come in for a considerable share of public attention between now and the next General Election.

Mr. L. Stileman-Gibbard, M.A., J.P., of Sharnbrook, Bedfordshire, has made a special study of the matter. The Church of England Temperance Society has published, in a penny pamphlet, "Licensing Administration: Its Possibilities and Difficulties," which is the development of a speech delivered at Hereford, when the late Archbishop Temple, who was in the chair, promptly said, "I should like to have that speech printed on behalf of the Society and circulated all over England." The Archbishop was a man who never condescended to say merely pleasant or complimentary things about speakers or speeches. He detested "votes of thanks," so that his emphatic praise of Mr. Stileman-Gibbard's effort meant very much. Those, then, who want to know what a magistrate has to say about licensing administration will do well to get this pamphlet. Its author has for many years been a believer in the power of the Press. He has not only written many telling pamphlets himself, but has been a very liberal dispenser of the writings of others, and has done much to support Mr. John Abbey in his zealous crusade against drink in the hay and harvest fields. Mr. Stileman-Gibbard has taken an active part in all phases of Temperance work in his county, and is one of those true and sterling friends of the cause whose active co-operation and sympathy can always be relied upon. He is a powerful and convincing speaker—clear, logical and incisive—and has an all-round knowledge of the Temperance question which makes his help in any public conference of special value.

THE TEMPERANCE PLEDGE.

Why is it that in so many Temperance meetings no reference whatever is made to the signing of the pledge? Speakers seem to be very chary of mentioning the subject, and, more remarkable still, no provision is made in many meetings for the signing of the pledge. In the early days of the movement the pledge was always to the fore. An invariable "tag" to the newspaper report of any Temperance meeting was, "So many persons signed the pledge." It is high time to return to first principles. Will the secretaries of the great national organisations, in making arrangements for their next annual meetings, see that at least one speaker is especially charged with the duty of inviting men and women to sign the pledge? Will they also arrange for pledge books and pledge cards to be in readiness? We are satisfied that an effort in this direction would give real satisfaction to subscribers, and no doubt result in a substantial addition to our ranks.

"BILL-STICKERS."

If this should meet the eye of some well-to-do abstainer who wants to give a real help to the Temperance propaganda, may we suggest the practical utilisation of the hoardings of our large towns? Anyone with half an eye can see how the caterers for the amusements of the people, to say nothing of the enterprising traders, call in the aid of the pictorial poster. If some striking design were specially made for Temperance purposes, with sufficient space left to print in some stirring sentence from a prominent statesman or other public personage, thousands of people who are not at present reached by ordinary Temperance meetings might be brought into touch with our work.

PRIVATE SCHOOLS.

The Young Abstainers' Union has recently met with considerable success in getting an entrance for their speakers in middle-class and upper-class schools. The importance of such an effort cannot be over-estimated. The young people found in these establishments have been too often left out in the cold, partly from the difficulty of securing the help of the heads of the establishments, and, more often than not, from the paucity of speakers with the necessary equipment for this delicate work. Now that a beginning has been made, we trust the Y.A.U. will keep the movement going until it is placed on a thoroughly organised basis.

OUR SENIOR MEMBERS.

In conferences of Band of Hope workers one venerable topic is constantly cropping up—"How Best to Retain our Senior Members." There is one way, at least, in which some of them may be retained—that is, by getting them to recite or to sing, either in the Band of Hope meetings, or in the meetings of the adult societies. A good, stirring Temperance recitation may make amends for a dull, indifferently prepared, and badly delivered Temperance speech. Most audiences will welcome a good reciter or a good singer as a relief from the dreary drip of oratory, and, always provided that the recitation or song is of a Temperance character, a change of this nature will be decidedly helpful.

THE PRINCESS AND THE RAINBOW.

A Story for Children by Beatrice Heron-Maxwell.

"I AM tired," wailed Chryssa, "and I don't want to play any more. Why can't someone play for me?"

The two maids of honour exchanged glances of dismay, for the Princess Chryssa had been hard to amuse all day, and they were at their wits' end now to avert the forbidden catastrophe—the Princess's tears.

"She must not fret herself," the Court physician had said. "She is very delicate, and she does not eat enough to make her strong."

"But we cannot persuade her to eat," the King told him. "She says she is tired of nice things, and wants to have the same food as the gardener's children. Then when it is brought to her she cannot eat that either, for she has not the children's appetite, and so she cries and will take nothing."

"You must make her laugh," the physician said. "Get her to romp and play like other children; make her forget she is a princess and be just a happy little girl. Don't give her everything before she wants it; let her want it first. Children like surprises, treats, presents, holidays, games with other children, fun and frolic. They don't want Court ceremonies and cream all day long."

"The Princess has had no lessons for weeks now," said the King in a downcast way; "she cried over them so much, and said they made her head ache."

"Then, of course, she cannot have a holiday," said the physician, beginning to smile; "and if she possesses everything in the world she wants we must strike presents and treats and surprises off the list. I am afraid your little daughter has a dull life of it, your Majesty."

The physician had hit the mark. Chryssa was dull. So all the colour had faded from her cheeks, and even her hair—the pretty golden curls that matched her name of Chrysocoma—had lost its lustre and looked as if the sunshine itself could not make it bright.

"Shall I fetch my cousin Laline?" asked the page, for he sympathised with the Princess. It was poor work being a girl at all, he thought, and to be a princess as well, and have no one to fight or to play truant with was to live a joyless life in his eyes. "Laline can play for other children," he said sagely. "I have seen her do it for my little crippled sister."

"I don't want Laline," said Chryssa wearily, her lips quivering.

"Very well," said the maids of honour soothingly, with a vexed glance at Bertrand the page; "she shall not come."

"She has a magic pipe," said Bertrand musingly, "and tells you wonderful stories about the bubbles she blows from it. There was one about a dragon—but I have forgotten it now. It made me laugh at the time."

The lady-in-waiting shook her finger at him for his want of tact in telling the Princess what she did not care to hear; but Chryssa lifted her listless head, and said, "Where did she get the pipe?"

"She found it in a wood," said Bertrand. "We told her someone must have dropped it there; it is just a white clay pipe. But Laline says a fairy put it there for her to find, and that no other pipe can make bubbles like hers."

"I want to see it," said Chryssa imperiously; "bring it here."

"I'll go and ask Laline," he answered, and ran away.

The maids of honour offered no objection. It might keep the Princess from crying until bedtime.

Presently Bertrand came back.

"She is learning her lessons," he said, "and she keeps the pipe in a secret hiding-place that no one must know. Will to-morrow do? It is a half-holiday."

"No, no!" cried the Princess. "I cannot wait till to-morrow. She must take a holiday to-night."

But Laline's German governess said she would give no holidays except at the King's own command, and the King was holding a council, and could not be disturbed.

Bertrand flew backwards and forwards with messages, and the Princess got angrier and angrier, and tears were on the verge of falling when Laline saved the situation.

"She has given up her half-holiday to-morrow," said Bertrand, "and so Fraulein has let her off to-night; and she is coming now."

Two minutes after, rosy-cheeked, bright-eyed Laline ran breathless into the Princess's presence.

"If you will come with me," she whispered to the Princess—fancy whispering to a princess! No one had ever ventured to do it before, and it tickled Chryssa's ear and made her burst out laughing—"I'll show you the secret hiding-place; and then there will be three people who know it: you and I and the squirrel with the white tuft to his tail."

"Why has he got a white tuft?" whispered back the Princess.

"Because his tail was caught in a trap once," confided Laline, "and the tip wouldn't come brown again. I let him out of it, so he knows me; and he wouldn't break the pipe for all the world. He takes care of it for me. Come along; it's only across the park there, and into the plantation a little way."

And without their hats, or gloves, or even outdoor shoes, the two children raced out of the room, down the stairs, through the great conservatory, and on to the terrace, deaf to the remonstrances of the Court ladies, who sent Bertrand galloping after them, and made as much haste as they could themselves to follow.

"Go back!" said Chryssa. "We won't have you. It's our secret, Laline's and mine."

"But, Madam," said the page, "the King's orders are——"

Chryssa stamped her foot

"I don't care," she said. "You shan't come!"

Laline interposed.

"Never mind Bertrand," she said. "He can shut his eyes, and he won't tell anything when he promises 'honour.'"

Then they ran on to the pine tree with the withered branch, and there in the hollow of a dead twig was the little white pipe.

"Now we'll go back and blow bubbles," said Laline, all flushed with jumping (for the branch was high above their heads, and had to be caught in mid-air and held down). "You shall blow sometimes."

"Let me carry it," coaxed the Princess, for a glimmer seemed to have come to her that in Laline's play-world royalties did not count, and you had to be fair, whoever you were.

"You must not break it, then," said Laline, graciously handing over the treasure,

"'I'll show you the secret hiding-place.'"

" because the fairies wouldn't give me another, perhaps."

Chryssa understood the importance of this special pipe, which even the King could not buy, and let Laline hold one of her hands in case of accidents ; for Laline was bigger and more sure-footed.

And when bedtime came no one dared to suggest bed, for the Princess was interested at last.

" Oh, how lovely ! " she exclaimed, clapping her hands when a great beautiful bubble balanced itself on the bowl's edge, and after a gentle shake from Laline sailed upwards into the air.

It was like the opals in Chryssa's necklace, only bigger and clearer, and it had red and green and purple gleams in it.

" It is a rainbow car," said Laline confidentially, " and it is full of fairies. They are all going back to Rainbow Land after their day's work. Shall we ask them to take us, Chryssa ? "

" Yes ; tell them they must."

" They say they cannot, unless we bring someone who is sick or sorry," said Laline, after a pause. " The Rainbow Queen would wonder why two happy little girls should want to come away from their own homes. Shall I fetch my little cousin, Chryssa ? She walks on crutches, you know, and she is often in pain."

" Yes, yes ! " said Chryssa eagerly ; " let us take her."

For she wanted so much to go to Rainbow Land that she quite forgot the sight of Bertrand's little crippled sister had made her cry once, and she had not been allowed to see her again.

Five minutes later they were in the car and sailing up above the hills, above the clouds and into the blue of the sky.

It was such a glorious blue, just like sapphires, and the fairy next to Chryssa said : " Isn't it pretty ? I helped to paint it, and I gained the prize for my bit. I had to practise for a long time on flowers before I was given a corner of sky. I had done a border of lobelias for the King's garden. It was a great honour."

" Why ? " asked Laline. " Do kings have to have prettier flowers than anyone else ? "

" Oh, no," said the blue fairy, laughing ; " that would be waste. We do the best ones for the country folk in the fields, or the cottagers' gardens. But this King has lost his wife, and misses her very much ; and lobelias were her favourite flower. He keeps her garden just as it was when she walked in it. So we take trouble with the flowers."

" I have been working all day at some pansies," said another fairy, dressed in brown velvet ; " I and Cowslip there. I couldn't finish them off without her ; they had to have yellow centres."

" They were for the Princess's own little bed of flowers," added Cowslip ; " but she took no notice of them when she passed by."

" Has the King any little children ? " asked Laline.

" Only one," the blue fairy answered ; " a little girl, who used to be like a flower, all pink and white and blue and gold. But she is discontented, they say, and is getting to look like a faded leaf. She does not care for flowers. You see, even in winter, when the country children have only berries, the little Princess has all the flowers of summer in her conservatory."

Chryssa, feeling a little worried, whispered to Laline, " Don't tell them I'm a princess."

Laline nodded. " Of course I won't—that would be a shame. They won't ever guess it, Chryssa ; you look just like us."

Which was a great consolation.

" Now," said the fairies, all jumping up, " we must climb the ladder. How are you going to manage, little maiden ? "

For it was a ladder shaped like a wheel, and the rungs were very slender and of many colours, and there was no hand-rail to cling to if you slipped. Chryssa thought the fairy was talking to her, but she found they were all clustering round Valence, the little cripple.

" We will carry you," they said. " Come along."

And, taking the crutches, they crossed them and made a little seat for Valence ; then ran lightly up the ladder with her, while Laline climbed quickly after them.

" Come back ! " the Princess commanded. " I can't possibly climb by myself ; I shall tumble through."

And the tinkle of the fairies' laughter at the idea floated down to her.

But Laline stopped, and stretched out a helping hand downwards.

" Come along, dear," she said. " We shall miss all the fun if you are so slow."

It was a toilsome climb to Chryssa, but they were up at last ; and there, on the top, at the Rainbow Gate, was Valence, with crowds of fairies vieing with each other to please her. They had twined the loveliest blossoms round her crutches, and put a crown of roses in her hair; and some of them had brought her honey-dew to drink and bunches of "bread-and-cheese-and-kisses."

"You shall be a princess while you are in Rainbow Land," they said; "Princess Valence! And we will be your subjects. What would your Royal Highness like to do next?"

It was on the tip of Chryssa's tongue to tell them she was a real princess, but she looked over the edge of the gate instead, and saw what a beautiful arch the cloud ladders on either side made.

A fairy came and stood beside her. "How pale you are, little girl," she said, with compassion. "Are you very unhappy when you are down there?"

She pointed to where, far, far below, the white towers of the palace were touched by the sunset.

"I suppose your parents are poor and make you work," she went on, "and you live in a dingy street in the city? Poor little Chryssa!"

This was just a little awkward for Chryssa, so she said nothing.

"Never mind," said the fairy; "you shall have a good time up here. Come! Princess Valence says she wants to see our Queen, and you shall see her too."

So they all passed through the gate with its mother-of-pearl doors and ruby handles, and found themselves on a path of gold with trees of frosted silver on either side. Then they walked through fields of golden corn and marigolds, and groves of orange trees full of ripe fruit; and then came carpets of bluebells and cornflowers, and afterwards green woods, with ferns and creepers and tufts of moss, with violets peeping out; and then again meadows of purple iris, and long stretches of heather, and carnation borders.

It was such a blaze of colour that it made you feel all warm and gay and merry.

It was the time of the Queen's evening audience, and all the working fairies were hurrying towards the throne; troops and troops of them, dressed in wonderful gauzy robes of every hue.

Chryssa understood now where all the beautiful colours in the world came from. Sometimes they were the fairies' work and sometimes the fairies themselves. And when she saw the Rainbow Queen she felt suddenly as if all her discontent had slipped away from her—just as though it had been a dull cloak she was wearing—and she knew at last what it was to be glad. For everything that was sweet and gracious and lovely seemed to be blent into the Queen's face, and when she smiled it was like a ray of sunshine.

"Well, my people," she said; "tell me what you have done to-day."

"We have made a whole field gay with anemones," said a bevy of fairies who were all in scarlet; "and some of the city children came and picked them and took them home. The flowers will make them happy for days; they had never seen any before."

"I painted a forget-me-not," said a pale blue fairy shyly. "It took me all day."

"Why did you take so much trouble with it?" asked the Queen gently.

"Because it was going to be sent in a letter, to take a sweet message," answered the fairy.

They all had the same tale to tell.

There were pink and green and mauve and orange fairies; and even grey and brown ones, to soften the brightness of the others for tired eyes or sorrowful hearts. And their business was to make the world brighter; to put colour into sad lives and gaiety into youthful hearts. They had to work very hard, for flowers and trees would fade, and blue sky would grow cloudy, while the purple bloom on the mountains got washed off by the mists; and so there was always plenty to do to paint them all over again.

And the Queen had a word and a smile for all; but the sweetest words and the best rewards were for those who had helped to make a sick child well or a sorry child gladsome.

Chryssa would have liked to stay in Rainbow Land. She had ceased to be jealous of Valence (who was as happy as a princess is always supposed to be), and she was enjoying herself running about with Laline, peeping into all the fairy treasure haunts, finding how they made their colours, learning all their games, and even helping some of them to get ready for their work next day.

Then she went into the schools, and saw how the little fairies were taught and what a lot of things they had to learn.

"Don't you mind lessons?" she asked them in surprise, for they all looked as happy as possible.

"Oh, no," they all said; "we like them, because we can learn all the things that the grown-up people know. You can't know without being taught, and we shouldn't like to be stupid when we are older, and have to be left out of everything."

"You little girls must be off down the ladder again," said the Queen at last. "Your parents will be getting anxious about you, won't they?"

She appealed to Chryssa, who stammered out that she did not know, for, truth to tell, it had never occurred to the Princess that her father, the King, loved her very dearly and was often very unhappy about her; and when the lady-in-waiting had told her so once, she had stopped up her ears and refused to listen—for that was one of her wilful days.

"Don't forget," added the Queen, "that my happiest fairies are the ones who have made someone else happy. Try and do the same; you will find it such a good plan."

Chryssa promised not to forget; and then Laline and Valence and she had to pass through the mother-of-pearl arch and descend the ladder once more.

"We can't come down with you," said the fairies; "it is too dark. How will little Valence manage?"

"We will carry her," said Laline. "Won't we, Chryssa?"

And Chryssa never dreamt of saying anything but "Yes."

It was very tiring carrying the little girl down the ladder, which seemed more steep now that its changing colours had turned to grey; and when they reached the end of it, it was rather discouraging to find that the rainbow car had disappeared and there was only a sea of dark cloud beneath them.

"We must be brave," said Laline, "and take hands and all jump down together."

Valence cried and said she was frightened, but Chryssa never thought of crying; she only wanted to comfort Valence and make out that it was quite an easy and pleasant thing to do.

So they all took hands and dropped gently down together, and they landed on the terrace of the palace.

"We will take Valence home first," said Laline; and they made their way to the

"She pointed to where, far, far below, the white towers of the palace were touched by the sunset."

Lord Chamberlain's wing, where Valence lived.

Then Laline said she would see Chryssa as far as the royal courtyard, but Chryssa would not hear of it. "You are tired," she said; "you must go straight home. I am not frightened, and I can find my way alone."

It was quite easy, too, to steal in and up the grand staircase and into the little ivory and blue bedroom that was the Princess's own, and to creep into bed without disturbing anyone.

A slanting ray of sunlight woke her in the morning, and she opened her eyes to see the fairies bending down and smiling at her before they vanished.

"Is your Royal Highness tired?" anxiously asked a waiting-woman. "Would you like your breakfast in bed?"

But Chryssa sprang up, bright and well.

"I am quite rested, and I want Laline to breakfast with me," she said; "we have such a lot of work to do."

"Work!" It was a new word in the Princess's vocabulary. The lady-in-waiting stared.

But Chryssa was bubbling over with excitement.

"I am going," she said, as they dressed her, "to have a flower fête for children. All the little girls and boys must come, and they may pick the flowers and take them home. I want to give them tea and biscuits and cakes and crackers. All the cakes must be pink and white, and the crackers must be rainbow ones."

She clapped her hands with glee.

"It will be just like Rainbow Land," she said. "We will have a maypole dance, and there shall be ribbons—red and blue, and green and yellow, and pink and violet. . . . . Oh, and Valence must come!" she went on. "She shall be Princess instead of me at the fête, and we will all do exactly as she tells us. I'll just be Chryssa for once."

The maids of honour were too astonished to answer her. Where were the tears and pouts and frowns? Even the pale cheeks had vanished, and there was a rose flush like day-dawn on the Princess's face.

"And then to-morrow we will work," she continued, "Valence and I and Laline. We will all do lessons together. Then we shall love our play; and when we have worked and learnt something then we will have another fête."

The maids of honour rang the bell and summoned Bertrand.

"Go and bring your cousin and your sister," they said; "the Princess invites them to breakfast. And tell his Majesty the Princess would like to see him this morning; she has important business to arrange with him."

Bertrand broke out into laughter. It was all Laline's doing. He knew that well. He had always said she could cure the Princess if they would let her try.

"You must come and help us write the invitations to the fête," said Chryssa, giving him her hand to kiss. "We must write them all ourselves, because the children will like that better. Hurry, Bertrand! We have not a minute to spare, we are so busy."

The whole palace seemed to have wakened up that morning. Everyone was running to and fro, and they all came to the Princess for orders; so that she had more work than there was time to do it in. But Laline helped her, and when the fête day came everyone said it was like fairyland. The children would have cried when it came to an end if the Princess had not stood up and made them a little speech to comfort them.

"I am so glad you have liked the party," she said. "It has been fun, hasn't it? I am sorry it is over, but we couldn't be always at play, could we? We must do some work in between. It is only three weeks now to next holidays, and you shall all come, if you will, to a harvest home then. We will make hay and have tea in the field; and the children who have worked the hardest shall have prizes."

Then the children rose up with one accord and gave three cheers for the Princess.

And when they had all gone the King came and took Chryssa into his arms and kissed her, with tears in his eyes.

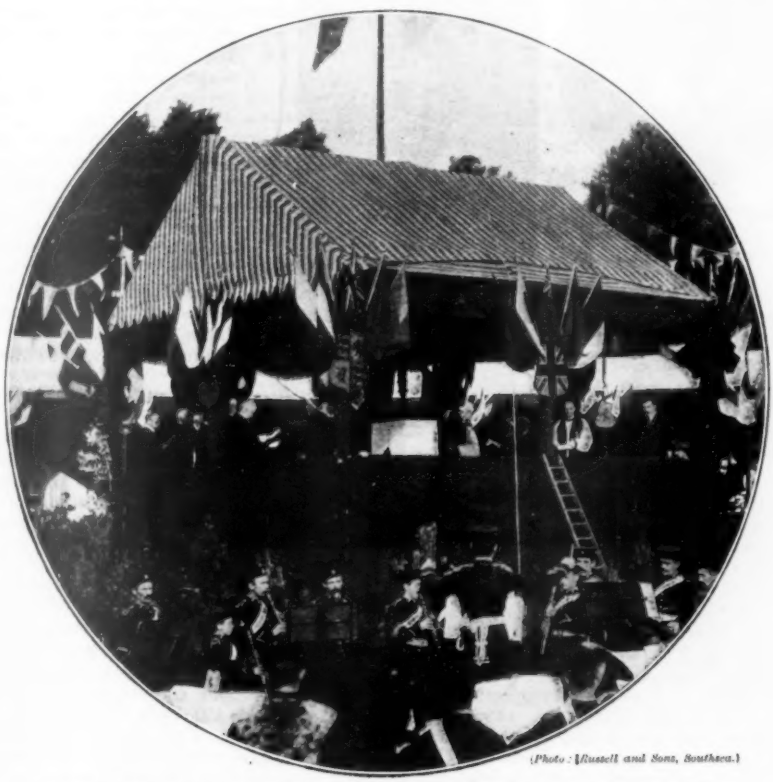
"You must not cry," said Chryssa sleepily; "I want you to be happy."

"So I am," the King said; "so is everyone. Chryssa, you have made us all happy."

"The Rainbow Queen said it was a good plan," murmured the tired little Princess.

"She is dreaming," whispered the King softly to the lady-in-waiting. "Don't wake her. I will carry her to bed."

And the little golden head, with its ruffled curls and rosy cheeks, lay on his shoulder—fast asleep.



SHORT ARROWS.

"A Thing like Father!"

IT is long since we have heard a more striking illustration of the awful loneliness in which some colonists from the Mother Country are compelled to pass their lives than an account of a recent bush expedition from the lips of a clergyman born in the English Midlands, and now home on furlough after eighteen years in Australia. He was riding through a vast and thinly populated district, many miles from Adelaide, and approached a homestead, where he saw a comely and ruddy urchin of some six or seven years, sitting upon a fence at the bottom of the garden. With a yell of terror this son of solitude rushed up the path into the house and called out, "Oh, mother, mother, come; here's something on a horse!" "Whatever is it, my dear?" "Oh, I don't know, mother; but it's a thing like father!" It turned out, when the monstrosity was invited to tea and "damper," and a conversation ensued, that the child, during his whole existence, had never set eyes upon any man whatever except his father. We may reverse the common proverb of civilisation, and say that the world is not so very small, after all.

The King's Sanatorium.

THE King's Sanatorium for the open-air treatment of consumption is now being built near Midhurst, Sussex, and our illustration reproduces a photograph of the laying of the foundation stone of the building by his Majesty on

(Photo: Russell and Sons, Southsea.)

THE KING LAYING THE FOUNDATION STONE OF THE NEW SANATORIUM NEAR MIDHURST.

November 3rd last. The Sanatorium, it will be remembered, is the outcome of the munificent Coronation gift which was presented to the King by a donor whose original anonymity has not been preserved, and who is now known to be Sir Ernest Cassel.

"The Quiver" Good Conduct Prizes.

WE publish this month portraits of the winners of these prizes for 1903. At the Gordon Boys' Home the medal and the prize of one guinea were awarded to Corporal George Marsh, who has been in the Home since 1899, and has during that time not once "been up for any offence." In the National Refuges the prize-winner was George Frederick Walker, of the Fortescue House Home, who was selected by the suffrages of his schoolfellows, with the full approval of the masters. At the Reedham Orphanage the prize was divided between a boy and a girl, each receiving a medal. The girl selected was Dorothy Mary Ewell, of whom the master of the school reports that she has not lost one mark in the year and a half she has been a pupil. Her fellow prize-winner was George Barnett, a year her senior, who has been twice as long in the Orphanage, and of whom his teachers speak well.

God's Fragments.

FOR those who are sadly conscious of marred ideals and broken purposes in life, who have fallen away from their first promise, who have left undone the things they ought to have done, and who have done the things they ought not to have done, there is still responsibility, and there should be inspiration in the thought: You may only be a moral or a spiritual fragment, but you are yet God's property; none may take you out of His hand Who created you, and Who is ready to redeem and to sanctify you; you dare not throw yourself away. You, and all that is left of you, are not your own. Think of your neglected duties; begin to do them, and there is hope still. From many a parchment which looked worthless a priceless palimpsest has been restored. The writing of your heavenly birthright can never wholly be rubbed out. That porphyry vase in the British Museum would not be quite valueless, even in pieces. "Gather up the fragments," said the Master, "that nothing be lost."

Posthumous Cynicism.

A FATHER of a household is said to have been financially in such low water that he determined to sell his big Family Bible; but on turning over the leaves for the first time he found the following memorandum: "Since my experience of life has taught me that man does not turn to his Bible till he is in the deepest trouble, I have put £100 in notes between pages ninety-six and ninety-seven." Is the satire on the selfishness of some folks' religion quite unjust?

"The Quiver" Order of Honourable Service.

THE Order has now been closed for some years in all Classes save that for Distinguished Members, who must have served not less than fifty years in their present situation to be eligible for enrolment. Instances of such lengthened service are necessarily rare, but we have recently had the pleasure of adding three new names to the roll:—

Name.	Employment.	Address.	Years of Service.
MARY DAVIES	Nurse	Stockport	50
MARY EVANS	Nurse	St. Mary Church	50
HONOR EDWARDS	Lady's Maid	Norwich	52

We are sure that our readers will gladly join in our congratulations to these new Distinguished Members, and in the hope that they may long be spared to wear the Star of the Order.

A Home for "Robert."

THE guardians of the peace do not always receive the attention they deserve, and in many towns no provision is made for their social happiness and comfort. The policemen of Birmingham have, however, no cause for complaint. The Midland metropolis has set a splendid example to other cities, and illustrated in a practical manner how Robert's lot can be made happier when his beat is finished. The men in blue get more kicks than halfpence in these days of drunken hooliganism, and it is therefore gratifying to note that a home opened for their exclusive use has been carried on with conspicuous success. The Police Institute in Birmingham is now one of the chief social organisations of the city. It was founded in 1878, with the object of "promoting among the members of the police force the fear of God, habits of self-improvement, thrift, temperance, and social intercourse." Success from the outset smiled upon its career, until it was found necessary to quit the old premises and erect a larger building near the Law Courts. This venture entailed a cost of £8,000, but mainly owing to the large-hearted generosity of the late Mr. Richard Cadbury and Mr. Barrow Cadbury the Institute has this year been enabled to celebrate its silver jubilee free of debt. Nearly £200 has been subscribed by members of the force and their wives, a fact which speaks eloquently for itself. The Institute occupies a corner site, and has a commodious assembly room for religious services and social gatherings. Everything conducive to rational enjoyment is provided. There is a billiard-room, a smoking-room, a reading-room, a refreshment department, and a well-equipped gymnasium. Electric light is installed throughout the building, and an air of homely comfort pervades every nook and corner. On the top storey are bedrooms for constables and recruits visiting the city. The Institute throws open its doors to all members of the police force in the city irrespective of creed, and with perfect freedom to attend the religious meetings or not. There are week-night classes for physical exercise and self-improvement. As a recognition of the work accomplished by these classes, the Watch Committee last year voted a sum of £50 to the funds of the Institute. In addition there are classes for the constables' wives and daughters, a Band of Hope for their children, and social evenings and lectures.

THE BIRMINGHAM POLICE INSTITUTE.

Some New Books.

OF all the books which have been issued this season none will be more welcome to lovers of Nature than Mr. Richard Kearton's "Wild Nature's Ways" (Cassell), illustrated by 200 reproductions of photographs by the author and his brother. This is not a book which one can afford to borrow; it is one which the reader must have for his own, and which will become increasingly precious to him as through its fresh pages he comes into closer touch with Nature at its truest and best. Messrs. Cassell have also just published, as a gift book for children, Mr. W. S. Stacey's series of exquisite coloured plates, "The Child Wonderful," with six thoughtful and helpful "talks," written by himself. Readers of THE QUIVER need no introduction to Mr. Stacey's work, and they will find in this a most acceptable seasonable gift.—Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton are issuing a new series of volumes, to which they give the title, "The Crown Imperial Series," the volumes of which are both handy and neat. The first two are Spurgeon's "The People's Christ and Other Sermons," preached at New Park Street Chapel, Southwark; and Mrs. Henry Wood's well-known Temperance story, "Danesbury House." The same publishers send us Miss Amy Le Feuvre's new story, "The Making of a Woman," which is more ambitious than have been some of her recent stories. Jean, the heroine, is a finely drawn character, set in an interesting story. From Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton also comes an interesting memoir of the Rev. Thomas Richardson, founder of the Bible and Prayer Union, written by his wife, and entitled "Forty Years' Ministry in East London." With it is a volume of essays by the Rev. Hugh Black, of Edinburgh, on "Work"; and full, as is all his writing, of helpful thought, incisively expressed.—Messrs. Longmans send us a tastefully presented volume on "Marriage and Marriages," by E. C. Harvey-Brooks, which gives advice (always needed, but seldom heeded) to those who are about to marry.—Mr. J. A. Walpole-Bond has written, and Mr. Oliver G. Pike has illustrated from original photographs of his own, an attractive book on "Bird Life in Wild Wales," published by Mr. Fisher Unwin.—We have also to acknowledge the receipt of a new volume of "The World's Pulpit" series (S. C. Brown, Langham and Co.), containing sermons by our old friend, the late Dr. Hugh Macmillan, collected under the title "The Touch of God"; also of "Glimpses into Paradise" (J. Finch and Co.), by the Rev. Septimus Hebert.

"THE QUIVER" FUNDS.

THE following is a list of contributions received from October 29th, 1903, up to and including December 2nd, 1903. Subscriptions received after this date will be acknowledged next month:—

For "The Quiver" Waifs' Fund: "A Working Woman," 10s. 6d.; Anonymous (Lee Green), 5s.

For Dr. Barnardo's Homes: "Bradford," £1 1s., £1, £1, £1, 5s.; L. R. (Newcastle), 5s.; "A Constant Reader of THE QUIVER" (Brighton), 4s. The following amounts have been sent direct:—X., 7s. 6d.; "Lochalsh," 4s.

For The Children's Country Holidays Fund: E. F. L. (Cape Town), £1.

For The Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children: "Pity" (Sheffield), 5s.

For The Ragged School Union ("Robin" Dinners): H. W. Williams (Gloucester), 1s.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

BASED ON THE INTERNATIONAL SERIES OF LESSONS.

QUESTIONS.

25. Why was it that St. John the Baptist had an objection to baptise Jesus?

26. How does St. John speak of the three forms of sin to which our Lord was tempted?

27. What is generally understood as "the pinnacle of the Temple," from which Satan desired our Lord to cast Himself down?

28. How does our Lord teach us the duty of worshipping God publicly every Sunday?

29. What attempt was made on our Lord's life at the beginning of His ministry?

30. In what way was St. Peter connected with St. James and St. John?

31. What miracle did our Lord perform at the calling of St. Peter, and on what other occasion did a similar miracle take place?

32. What incident took place in the synagogue at Capernaum which must have deeply impressed the early disciples of our Lord?

33. How did our Lord on that occasion manifest His divine power?

34. What efforts did our Lord make to avoid public notoriety?

35. What is very noteworthy for us in our Lord's life on earth?

36. On what two occasions did our Lord claim for Himself the power to forgive sin?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 188.

13. By the name of Ephrath, from which the inhabitants were called Ephrathites. (Genesis xxxv. 19; Ruth i. 2; 1 Sam. xvii. 12.)

14. Because at that time, as Suetonius and Tacitus, the Roman historians, say, there was "an ancient and settled persuasion throughout the East that someone should proceed from Judæa who would attain universal empire." (St. Matt. ii. 3.)

15. The prophet Micah uses the words, "thousands of Judah," which refer to the divisions or districts of land over each of which there was a prince or governor. (St. Matt. ii. 6; Micah v. 2; 1 Chron. xii. 20.)

16. Psalm ciii. 13.

17. Because God knows how weak we are and thus unable to resist sin. (Psalm ciii. 14.)

18. Psalm ciii. 11, 12.

19. St. Luke ii. 40.

20. All that heard Him speak were astonished at His understanding and answers. (St. Luke ii. 47.)

21. In His perfect obedience at the home in Nazareth. (St. Luke ii. 51.)

22. Because he required all his followers, though Jews, to be baptised as a sign of their repentance. (St. Matt. iii. 5, 6.)

23. St. Matt. iii. 2.

24. The coming of Christ, as foretold by the prophet Daniel. (St. Matt. iii. 2; Dan. ii. 44, and vii. 13, 14.)

INTERESTED.

(From the Painting by Sophie T. Pemberton, exhibited at the Royal Academy.)

MR. COLERIDGE-TAYLOR'S NEW ORATORIO.

By Raymond Blathwayt.

(Photo: Cassell and Co., Ltd.

MR. S. COLERIDGE-TAYLOR.

MR. COLERIDGE-TAYLOR AT THE AGE OF THREE.

THE son of a West African negro, who was himself a medical man living in Croydon, Mr. Coleridge-Taylor, the well-known composer, was originally intended for a violinist, and it was with the intention of studying to become one that he went to the Royal College of Music in Kensington. But whilst there he devoted himself so assiduously to composition that he abandoned the violin, won a scholarship in composition, and then devoted himself for the five following years to seriously studying it under the supervision of Sir Charles Stanford, who, indeed, actually produced some of his clever pupil's orchestral compositions while he was still pursuing his course at the college. In 1898

MR. COLERIDGE-TAYLOR AT THE AGE OF THIRTEEN.

FROM THE ORIGINAL MS. OF "THE ATONEMENT" BY MR. COLERIDGE-TAYLOR

(The beginning of the soprano solo, Pilate's Wife, in the section called Pontius Pilate.)

an orchestral composition of his was performed at the great Gloucester Festival of that year. Shortly after that he wrote the first part of his musical adaptation of "Hiawatha," the other two parts following in the two consecutive years.

In February he will produce for the first time in London his Atonement, in which he has made important alterations from the original edition to meet the views of the critics. The first performance will be given by the Royal Choral Society on Ash Wednesday, the composer himself conducting. In connection with this it may be interesting to detail in quite untechnical fashion his mode of procedure in connection with the composition of a class of music which is somewhat removed from the ordinary compositions as we know them here in England.

(Photo: Cassell and Co., Ltd.)

HIAWATHA, MR. COLERIDGE-TAYLOR'S LITTLE SON.

To begin with, Mr. Coleridge-Taylor professes to be thoroughly acquainted with all the English poets, and the poem of "Hiawatha" had always appealed to him for its musical possibilities. His method is to thoroughly absorb the poem itself into his mind—its motif, its story, its rhythm, the whole poem in short—and as he ponders over it the music gradually comes. He then sketches it out for the piano and voices, and then sets himself seriously to his orchestration. Frequently when this is done the last score bears but little resemblance to the first sketch. He often sits hard at work for six hours a day engaged in this scoring, and it is quite usual for him to rewrite a page of music twenty times over before he succeeds in satisfying himself. It is worthy of note that whilst actually composing he never needs to touch a piano, as he can think out the whole score without once hearing the music. The orchestration work, though tedious in its details, is not so difficult as the actual composition, for there one has to wait so much upon the vagaries of the imagination.

The composing of the Atonement, with its orchestration, cost him a whole year of extremely hard work. When the idea of the sublime story first entered his mind he wrote to his librettist, and told her that he wanted something absolutely different from anything that had ever been written before, and therefore he suggested to her scenes in a kind of Eastern style, he himself writing the music to it rather from its pictorial than from its spiritual side. He has tried to illustrate incidents in the story of the Redeemer, and his hearers can evolve the spiritual for themselves as they listen to the harmonious strains, and in this, of course, they will be greatly assisted by the Biblical words to which the music is set.

Mr. Coleridge-Taylor is enthusiastic on the condition of music in England at the present time. During the last ten years he considers that there has been a great increase of knowledge and capacity for appreciation of high-class music, compared with what used to be the case in the early Victorian era. The whole tone of orchestral music has gone up, he says; the popular taste is on a far loftier scale. At the same time he is perfectly conscious that the capacity for music itself differs much in different localities; for instance, Wales, Yorkshire, and Lancashire are immeasurably more musical than London, the Midlands, Norfolk and Suffolk, or the South Coast generally. And who that knows the British Isles does not realise this? I have heard the miners in a little unknown Welsh village returning home at night singing classic choruses with voices and with a knowledge of music and a power of part-singing that the finest of our public singers might well be proud of. I remember once, some years ago, attending a service in a little Dissenting chapel in a Yorkshire fishing village, and the amazement which came over me as I listened to the superb choruses tossed from one side of the chapel to the other; great volumes of the most exquisitely balanced harmonies, superb recitatives, waves of melody, all ending in a crash of brilliant music which you would scarcely hear surpassed even on a festival day at the Crystal Palace. And here in London it would often be difficult to get people of the same class to render correctly the simplest hymn, and hardly in any part of London could people, as a rule, take an inner melody in part-singing. Mr. Taylor is of

(Photo: Cassell and Co., Ltd.)

MRS. COLERIDGE-TAYLOR AND HER CHILDREN.

(Photo: Cassell and Co., Ltd.)

MR. COLERIDGE-TAYLOR: CHARACTERISTIC POSITION WHEN COMPOSING.

opinion that this lack of musical knowledge—or, at all events, the lack of capacity to produce musical sounds—is due somewhat to the difficulty of obtaining people from all classes of society to sing together. In the North he considers class conditions are not so rigid, and there a man or a woman is chosen for vocal capacity rather than because he or she occupies a certain social position in the village or town in which they happen to be living.

MR. COLERIDGE-TAYLOR AT THE AGE OF SIXTEEN.

And there may be something in his theory, though I hold myself the idea that in this respect there is a radical and ineradicable difference between North and South. The North can sing, and the South cannot, and that is all there is to say.

In the Atonement Mr. Coleridge-Taylor has not attempted any realistic Eastern music, being of opinion that the absolutely correct would be hopelessly out of place in such a composition. He has confined himself entirely to his own imagination of what Eastern music might be; for, says he, "how can the cultivated Western mind appreciate that which is absolutely uncultivated?" He considers that as a rule folk-music, though he dearly loves it, should not be used in general, though he makes an exception in favour of Dvorák's "New World Symphony," where that great master has incorporated certain old negro melodies; though Mr. Coleridge-Taylor considers that even in that case the interest in the symphony is rather owing to Dvoràk's superb genius than to the melody of the tunes he has chosen.

THE SOLOISTS IN "THE ATONEMENT" AT THE ROYAL ALBERT HALL.

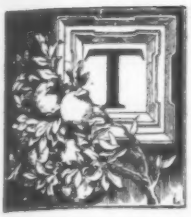
Talking over this question with Mr. Coleridge-Taylor, we drifted into a discussion as to how far the negroes of West Africa or of the West Indies, or the inhabitants of India and the Far East, were affected by Western ideas of music. Mr. Taylor considers that in the United States the negroes are considerably influenced by the West, and he is at present engaged upon the writing of a work in which he deals very thoroughly and scientifically with the whole question of negro music. He is strongly of opinion that the negroes of West Africa have a great capacity for music. But he frankly owns he has not travelled—curiously enough, he has never been out of England—and so he cannot say anything from actual personal experience, though he was much interested in what I was able to tell him of my own knowledge. Unfortunately, I am not in any way a musical expert, but I have travelled far and wide, and I have been able to make my own rough observations in this direction, and have noted that both the coloured races, East and West, can to a certain extent adapt themselves to our Western music.

For instance, I have heard negroes in the West Indies singing hymns "Ancient and Modern," or ecstatically shouting the choruses of Moody and Sankey in a Wesleyan chapel; and the very next day, as I have stolen through some primeval forest, unobserved myself, I have caught a glimpse of these people engaged in some fearful Voodoo orgy, and have listened to the wild barbaric chant which has mysteriously been transmitted to them from the dim unknown West African forest of thousands of years before. But it seems almost impossible to blend the music of East and West with any real or lasting success, and Mr. Coleridge-Taylor is wise indeed in avoiding any attempt at literalness in his forthcoming Atonement.

Mr. Coleridge-Taylor is Professor of Composition at Trinity College, London, a position of great importance and far-reaching influence in the musical world.



The composer will probably go on a prolonged tour through the States this year. His work is much appreciated by our Transatlantic cousins, and there is actually a Coleridge-Taylor Choral Society in Washington—a purely negro choir—named, of course, after himself, for which it is claimed that it is the finest choir in the States. The membership is about 200, and the position of the society is shown by the fact that, despite all we hear of racial difference, white people make strenuous efforts to obtain admission.

FACSIMILE OF MR. COLERIDGE-TAYLOR'S MS. SCORE OF "THE ATONEMENT."

THE DISPOSING OF CAMMY.

A Complete Story.

HE early morning sun was smiling over the braes and hills of purple heather; the pulses of Nature were quickening to the newborn life of another day.

The daily routine had commenced at the Vale Farm. At a white-painted gate leading from the garden to the farmyard one Peter McTavish was standing, his hands thrust into the pockets of his workaday corduroys, a hat of nondescript shape pushed to the back of his head, and a time-blackened pipe in the corner of his mouth. Peter was no longer youthful—he was past forty—but his shoulders were broad and strapping, and his figure muscular. His face, through exposure to sun and wind and rain, showed a network of lines, especially underneath his eyes, which were blue and had a slow humour; and his hair was beginning to show iron-grey threads.

"I canna help thinking," Peter was saying to himself, "as the lassie's ta'en wi' me; there's summat in the wy she looks—coy-like."

But here his ruminations were brought to an abrupt termination by a shrill voice:

"An' what be ye standing there for like a gawky, lettin' the gress grow aboot yer feet? Oh! 'tis a rale handy man ye are; an' the pigs squeakin' for their stuff, an' the kyes no' so much as ta'en oot to meadow."

But Peter, clutching up a pail that had stood beside him, was already out of earshot. If there was one person he lived in terror of, it was his half-sister Cammy (contracted from Camelia). She was nine years his senior, and was generally regarded as the mistress of the farm; Peter, though in reality its master, was never taken into account. Cammy ruled him and everybody else with a rod of iron. She had eyes like a lynx, and a tongue, as Peter expressed it, "like a carving knife." Men and maids lived more or less in dread of her; she was wont to pounce down on them when least expected, and severe was the censure delivered to any who were idling or gossiping. Peter himself was not allowed to have a voice in anything. Cammy supervised and managed everything, himself included; he was as much under her thumb as any domestic, if not more so. Peter's existence, taken all round, was by no means an easy one. Cammy's tongue and Cammy's tyranny were two thorns that probed him daily. For his submission and docility Peter was looked upon with no little contempt by the farm lassies. Gossip even rumoured that in his more youthful days Cammy caught him sweethearting with a maid; that thereupon she had secured him by the collar of his coat and marched him home, giving him such a rating that Peter had never again gone wooing. Cammy, it was known—doomed, as it seemed, to bud, blossom, and fade on her stalk without being plucked—showed direst contempt for anything concerning love-making and matrimony; so there may have been a good deal of truth in the gossip.

Peter's thoughts were wool-gathering as he discharged his usual duties. He stood leaning against the door of the cowshed, waiting while two or three rosy-cheeked damsels finished the milking. Their pert sallies to the farm men passing failed this morning to arouse an appreciative twinkle in his eye.

His thoughts ran thus:

"If so be the lass is ta'en wi' me, why shouldn't I?"

Here Peter seemed to come to a deadlock, as if the question were too weighty to solve—at any rate, hastily; so he repeated the words over and over to himself, and Peter began to feel quite bold as each "Why shouldn't I?" marched after its predecessor—so bold, in fact, that if Cammy had happened to be in proximity at the moment he would certainly have faced that astonished lady with a defiant "Why shouldn't I?"

When Peter had thoroughly picked the bones of that "Why shouldn't I?" without feeling very much the fatter, a more serious and weighty question presented itself. Peter never confused himself by thinking of too much at a time.

The last question was this:

"What was to be done about Cammy?"

But Peter felt he had quite come to the end of his tether here. Such a problem had surely never been presented to mankind before; so he merely smothered a sound that was almost a groan, and gave it up.

Now it chanced that Peter, after driving the cows into the meadow, wound his way round to the road, which was somewhat an indirect route of returning to the farm, but a certain low cottage with a thatched roof had become an object of interest; and, strangely enough, it happened that as Peter was passing, a strapting lass of some five-and-twenty summers was scattering grain to some chickens in a coop against the wall. Peter touched his hat sheepishly and puzzled his brain for something to say.

"'Tis a bonny day the morn," he commented, after due consideration.

"Ay, 'tis sae," said she, with her eyes lowered, and after that became tongue-tied; though Peter, used as he was to Cammy's frequent and scurrilous remarks, looked upon this rather as an attraction than otherwise. But it was embarrassing that Peter himself was also far from garrulous, or his wooing might have made more rapid strides. He looked about in the hope that some original remark would present itself, and his eyes fell on a cluster of blood-red carnations just in front of him.

"They be rale fine carnashies, noo, thae be," he remarked.

"Mebbe ye'll be liking ane," she said, and promptly picked one of the largest and gave it to him. Peter beamed with pleasure.

"I'll wear it wi' me best claes the morn," he said. "But I'll no let Cammy see it; nae, man, you'll no be sich a fule."

He stood eyeing the flower tenderly, till suddenly remembering that Cammy's wrath would fall upon his head if he appeared late for breakfast, he added:

"I'll be bidding ye gude mornin', Miss Maggie."

"Gude mornin,' Mr. McTavish; mebbe I'll see ye at the kirk the morn?"

"Ay, ay, nae doot, nae doot," responded Peter, and seemed quite struck with the brilliance of the suggestion. "Maist certainly the lass is ta'en wi' me," he said to himself as he went down the road. "An' she's bonny and comely too, an' has no a tongue like a razor. But ye mus'na be too hasty, Peter man, a meddlin' wi' the weemen wants muckle consideration—and there's Cammy——"

Again Peter came to a stop. Cammy was the blank wall that he always came against; thus far could he go, and no further.

Another difficulty to be got over was how to temporarily dispose of the carnation, so that Cammy's watchful eyes should not unearth it. To put it in the pocket of his corduroys meant destruction, and there seemed no other hiding place about his person. At last, however, he hit upon the plan of putting it inside his headgear for the time being; but, as ill-luck had it, when he removed his hat in the farm kitchen he forgot all about that fated carnation, and it dropped upon the brick floor. Cammy's sharp eyes covered it in a moment; then they were levelled at Peter, who stooped to pick the flower up with an air of unconcern.

"Whaur hae ye gotten tha' carnashie?" she demanded.

"Pickit it," Peter shuffled.

"Pickit it, ded ye? Humph, whaur frae?"

"The garden, o' coorse. Whaur else should I pickit it?"

"No' in this garden," said Cammy in a voice that brooked no argument. "Peter McTavish, are ye no ashemed o' leein', and you gaen to the kirk twice a day o' the Sabbath!"

"Why did ye hide it in your bonnet if ye pickit it in the garden?" went on Cammy, with fine sarcasm. "Nae, ye are a depraved man; but ye'll no get sae easily ower Cammy McTavish."

Peter stood sheepishly under this fire of artillery from his half-sister's tongue, offering no defence. He had doubtless found from long experience that to argue with Cammy was a waste of speech; so he took his seat at the table and began to eat his porridge from the basin in a dogged silence.

Now there is an old saying that "even a worm will turn," and that was what Peter did when Cammy renewed the attack.

"Na, I was na born yesterdee, nor the day afore neether," she began.

"An' I wish ye hadna bin born ava, to plague me," responded Peter fervently.

Cammy stood stupefied and speechless for the moment, scarcely believing she heard aright. Never before had Peter retorted so defiantly, or indeed retorted at all.

"An' that's your gratitude is it, Peter McTavish? Whaur wud ye ha' bin, I should like to ken, if it wasna for me? A fine middle ye'd hae made o' things, an' a braw well-ardered hoose it would hae bin. Mebbe ye'd like to try it; if sae, I can assure ye I hae na objection. You wish I hadna bin born, do ye? I'm sair regretfu' ye canna hae yer wish; but come the day wull, Peter McTavish, when thae words wull come hame to ye. A man that doesna ken when he's weel off, an' jist tempts Providence, wull get what he deserves suner or later."

"I wud speir o' ye," said Peter, "if ye hae ever read in the Scraptures that a contentious wumman's tongue is like the continual drappin' o' rain on a roof-top ? "

"An' quoting the Scraptures to me, be ye, Peter McTavish, when ye telt me a lee but a meenute agone ! Mair shame to ye ! Dinna forget when ye're in the kirk the morn that ye pickit thae carnashie in the garden ! " And with this parting shot Cammy bounced out of the kitchen, determined that, at any rate, Peter should not have the last word.

Peter, left alone, finished his porridge with a muffled grunt between whiles. Then he rose, and after inhaling the scent of the carnation for nearly five minutes, put the flower in a cup of water. And oh—so great was his daring—he placed the cup where it was most likely to meet Cammy's eye when she re-entered. Peter the worm had most certainly turned.

After this he lit his pipe, and, going to the door leading out to the garden, leaned one shoulder against the post. To be caught in this particular attitude by Cammy had always meant such shrill denunciation that Peter had very seldom cared to risk it. But if he thought of it at all now, it evidently did not disturb his peace. Peter was chasing an idea that had entered his brain ; or, to be more absolutely correct, as it was beyond Peter to hurry about anything, he kept the idea in sight. There were some knotty points connected with it, beyond doubt, for he scratched the back of his head very hardly at times, and let the pipe fall slackly at the corner of his mouth. Peter's thoughts, put verbatim, ran thus:

"'"Tis a bonny day the morn,' he commented, after due consideration."

"If it wasna more than a day or two sin Jamie Grierson says to me, 'Peter man, noo my mither has gaen, I think I'll look out for a wife—no one o' yer young lassies that be geddy and ower pert, but a wumman who'll look after the hoose and mak saxpance go as far as a shilling.' Cammy? Lord, she'd be a mickle o' a handfu', an' he'd gae fair skeer aboot her toongue!"

Peter walked after his idea all day; and the same evening, on business more than pleasure bent, paid a visit to Mr. Jamie Grierson, who owned a farm about a mile and a half away. Jamie's years numbered five-and-fifty; he had never taken a wife—people said because he was too mean and "thocht too much o' his siller." His hair and short stubby whiskers were of a pale sandy colour, and his narrow grey eyes were always on the alert. He measured over six feet in his stockings; his figure was spare and angular. Altogether, Peter thought that if there was one man in Scotland likely to prove equal to Cammy, Jamie Grierson was that man.

Peter, after a few casual remarks about the weather and the crops, went straight to the point of his business.

"I hae bin thinking, man, if ye want a rale sherp wumman to see after the hoose, ye couldna do better than tak' my sister Cammy."

Jamie's narrow eyes became narrower, and glanced a little suspiciously at Peter.

"Can she cook?" he said.

"My gosh, can she no!" replied Peter.

"Can she mak saxpence gae as far as a shilling?"

"Ay, and further than that, man. She's a fair wonderfu' wumman is Cammy. The wy she manages things is maist astoneeshing—an' sherp—oh losh, she is sherp!"

Jamie clapped his hand on his knee.

"Guid! Do you think she'd be wullin' to enter into matrimonee-wi' me?"

"I hae nae doot; only ye mustna be ower impatient or speir of her too suddin like. A wumman wants patting this wy and smoothin' t'other wy."

"Mebbe; but it's a muckle waste o' time, man," said Jamie practically.

"It's the queeckest in the lang run," said Peter; "but though I wouldna speir too sudden I wud advise ye to start courtin' at ince. There's naething like takin' the bull by the horns. Mebbe ye'll like to step in an' hae a bit dinner wi' us to-morrow. I'll be seeing ye at the kirk the morn."

"Ay, thank ye, I'll be recht glad to," responded Jamie with alacrity, more pleased at the idea of saving the cost of a meal than anything else.

Peter chuckled to himself many times on his homeward way; the possibility of disposing of Cammy to Jamie Grierson lifted him to the seventh heaven. If she were safely out of the way, Peter would be able to pursue his wooing unmolested; but to bring another mistress to the farm while Cammy reigned there was out of the question. As he himself expressed it, "One wumman was eneuch at a time."

Peter said never a word to Cammy that he had invited Jamie Grierson to dinner; he thought the wisest and safest plan would be to get that gentleman on the premises first and tell her afterwards. Accordingly, after the morning service, while Cammy lingered in the kirkyard to talk to various neighbours, Peter hastened Jamie down the dusty road, and reaching the farm took him into the best parlour. This room, the especial object of Cammy's pride and care, was kept religiously locked all the week, and only used on Sundays and rare occasions. Every piece of mahogany furniture was polished to a mirror-like surface; a case of wax fruits stood on a table, a pair of blue vases showed conspicuously above the tall chimney-piece; and each chair back was arrayed with a spotless crocheted antimacassar. Peter in the best parlour was something like a cat treading on hot bricks: he was not so much as allowed to shift the leg of a chair by an inch; to smoke, cough, or blow his nose; and the antimacassars, somehow or other, had a trick of getting hooked to his coat tails, for which misfortune he was severely censured by Cammy.

Leaving Jamie sitting on the edge of a slippery chair, Peter installed himself at the front door to wait for Cammy, with some secret uneasiness as to what mood that lady might be in. It happened, fortunately, that she was in a moderately good temper, and, though she rated him about "bringin' faulks hame withoot askin' her permission," she took it with a better grace than Peter had dared to hope. He sat down at the dinner table with nearly as much misgiving as if his chair had been studded with pins, fearful lest Cammy's asperity of speech should once and for ever nip Jamie's matrimonial intentions in the bud. But so flattering was the visitor's praise of the dishes, which Cammy, as usual, had prepared the day before the Sabbath, that she perceptibly began to thaw, and finally resolved in her own mind that Jamie Grierson was the most sensible man she had met. As for that gentleman's sharp eyes, nothing escaped them; the spotless cleanliness of everything, the order, the well-served meal and plenteous fare, loudly trumpeted the merits of the mistress of the farm. He noted, too, the brown poplin dress pinned up all round her, displaying feet by no means small or pretty, and the capacious apron to protect the skirt from any risk of stain. All this implied personal economy and care, which pleased Jamie mightily.

It ended that Jamie stayed to tea also, at the gracious invitation of Cammy. Peter's stolid countenance showed no more expression than a doornail, but he was deeper than his face portrayed. He made himself scarce at the time of starting for evening worship at the kirk, thus leaving Jamie to accompany Cammy. He himself took the road that led past the cottage at the foot of the brae, where Maggie was hesitating a little expectantly at the gate. She smiled graciously on Peter, and allowed him to carry her books.

Presently—strange thing—Peter found Maggie's plump hand resting on his sleeve. His heart gave a great thump beneath his best coat. He looked at Maggie, and she looked at him. Peter seized the opportunity.

"How would ye like, lass, to mairry me and be mistress o' the farm?"

"I'd be maist glad," replied she readily. She knew little of the wiles and coquetries of women; therefore she kept him in no suspense by delaying her answer. Nor could it be asserted that Maggie shyly blushed, as the natural carmine of her cheeks vied with the carnation in Peter's buttonhole.

"We maun abide ahint tho," continued Peter presently. "Ye see, 'tis this wy, lass, that I daurna think o' gettin' mairit an' Cammy livin' at the farm; but if she'll hae Jamie Grierson, we'll no wait. Baith o' ye couldna be mistress; na. na, it would mak sich a terrible middle o' things."

Jamie meanwhile had quite settled in his mind that if any woman was to be his wife Cammy should have the first chance. But the question of getting married, he thought, wanted a little more thinking over, for a wife, however clever her management, meant some extra expense. Cammy McTavish certainly seemed economical; that was one great point in her favour. He even fell to wondering how long the brown poplin dress would last her for the Sabbaths before she wanted another. Sentiment of any kind had no part in his business-like courtship. If there had ever been a spark of romance in his nature, it had died out many years before. There are some hearts that keep the freshness of youth always, but these are they with a lofty ideal, and Jamie was mercenary, mean-souled, and grasping, and his nature had become warped as his youth dried up, like sap from the root of a tree.

Great was Peter's inward rejoicing as the weeks passed to see that Jamie came frequently to the farm, and that Cammy, so far from showing that she was averse to his visits, made his welcome obvious. The daintiest dishes were always reserved to tempt Jamie's appetite, and he was allowed the entrée to the best parlour on weekdays as well as the Sabbaths. Strong-minded Cammy certainly may have been, but she quite succumbed to her wooer's flattery. Even to Peter, Jamie sang her praises.

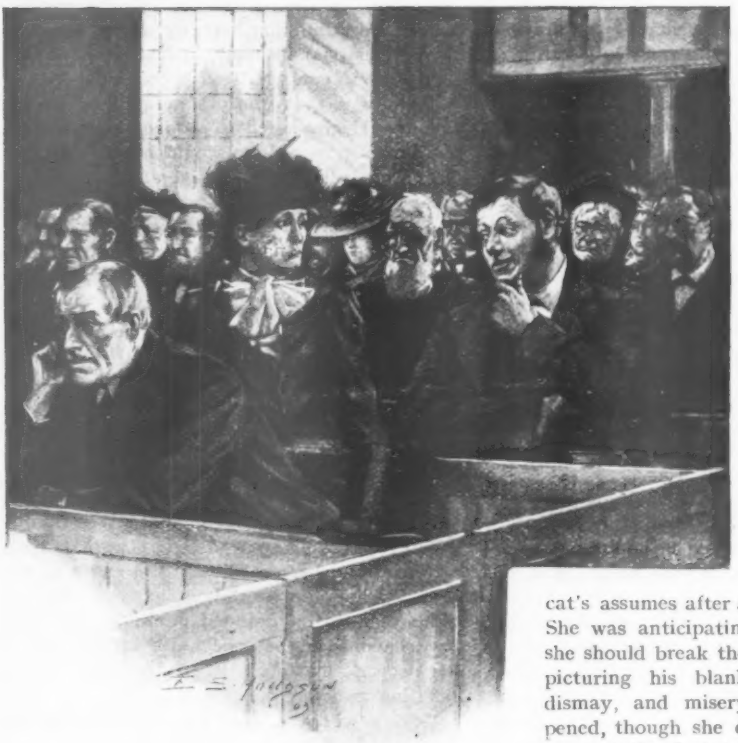
"She's wi'oot a doot the maist wonderfu' wumman I've iver kent," he said.

"Ay, I'm re'cht glad, Jamie man, as ye hae made the discoovery," replied Peter dryly. And he added to himself, "I'll no let oot aboot her tongue. I dinna conseeder it wud be fair to tell tales oot o' school."

And if Peter's conscience wanted any satisfying on that score, that was how he satisfied it.

Jamie's visits at last culminated in a proposal of marriage. He put the question in a precise and businesslike fashion.

"I'm sair wanting somebody to look after the hoose. Things ha' bin gaen saxes an' sevens wi' nabody to see to them. And I canna help thinking, Miss Cammy, that you're the wumman."



It was the first proposal Cammy had ever received, and she bridled like a girl of twenty.

"You're no serious?" she said a little suspiciously.

"Am I no?" returned Jamie. "I'm that set on't I'll be maist terrible deesappointed gin ye winna become Mrs. Grierson."

Cammy, convinced of his genuineness, stood reflecting on the situation.

"I'm wondering what'll become o' Peter,"

"Cammy herself sat suddenly erect."

she remarked presently, and could have smacked her lips with relish at this chance of revenge; for never had she forgiven Peter for wishing that she had never been born. "He'll just go doited wi' nabody to manage. No but what he deserves it an' a deal mair. Them that's no thankfu' for their blessings dinna ocht to hae any."

She would have been very much disillusioned had she known the share Peter had had in Jamie Grierson's wooing, and likewise that she was a blessing he would decidedly prefer to be without.

Jamie, gathering that Cammy had no objection to become Mrs. Grierson, ventured to express the hope that she would settle an early day for the ceremony. She, with the idea of taking complete vengeance on Peter, fixed an earlier one than he had anticipated.

"Ye micht look in at the minister's on yer wy back, and ask him to ca' the banns the Sabbath."

Jamie, if a little staggered by this promptitude, could do nothing but acquiesce, and so it was arranged.

After Jamie had taken his leave, Cammy for once sat idly with folded hands, her usually alert eye fixed upon the geraniums on the window sill, leaving the dairymaids to flirt unmolested, and letting the kettle sing itself hoarse on the hob. Her face wore that benign, self-satisfied expression that a cat's assumes after a rich lick of cream. She was anticipating the moment when she should break the news to Peter, and picturing his blank astonishment, his dismay, and misery. But as it happened, though she did not know it, she was not the first to impart the tidings, for Jamie met him on the road as he was returning home, and greeted him with the words:

"It's dune, man. I axed her gin she'd hae me, and she's gey wullin', so we'll to be tied in holy matrimonee."

"Ye dinna say sae!" said Peter, with difficulty concealing his exultation.

"Ay, but it's Bible truth," replied Jamie; and I'm gaen strecht this meenute to ask the minister to read oot the banns the Sabbath."

Peter could scarcely believe his ears; he was nearly on the point of tossing his bonnet in the air, but refrained from thus exhibiting his joy, and clapped Jamie on the back instead.

"Ye're a maist mechty clever man, Jamie Grierson, an' I congrateelate ye. There's na mistak aboot it but what ye ha gotten a rale bargain—a maist splendid bargain. I niver thocht ye'd hae pu'd her ower sa syne—an' to think o' your havin' the banns put up the Sabbath!"

"Wull, ye see," explained Jamie, as if to excuse his haste "I telt her it was na guid puttin' it off; the suner it's ower the better."

"Quite recht, the suner the better," agreed Peter with a nod; and it occurred to Jamie that for a man who was to be left in the lurch he took the matter in a very congenial way.

They parted a moment or two after, and every wrinkle in Peter's face seemed to have a tendency to smile as he watched the unsuspicious Jamie walk up the road to the manse.

"He's no found oot about her tongue," he soliloquised; "but I dinna conseeder it's my duty as a Christian to tell him," and with that Peter also went slowly down the road to the manse.

Barely two minutes had elapsed after Jamie quitted the manse when Peter marched importantly up to the door. Ushered into the presence of the reverend gentleman, he said:

"Will ye be sa guid, Minister, as to ca' Maggie Douglas and myself the Sabbath?"

"What! you, too, Peter? Did you know that Jamie Grierson had just been here to ask me to put up the banns of himself and your sister?"

"Ay, Minister, I kent it fine. If it hadna bin for him being wullin' to take the responsibility o' Cammy I'd no be here. He's a vale plucky man is Jamie. I alwus did admire him; but since he speired o' Cammy I admire him mair. You see, it was this wy, Minister. Maggie Douglas was gey ready to mairry me, but I couldna bring her hame to the farm till Cammy was oot o' it first. She wud ha bin that raged I daurna ha faced it."

It was all the minister could do to cover a smile; but after Peter had taken his departure he sat back in his chair and indulged in a laugh so prolonged that the little maidservant Jean wondered whatever could be the matter.

Peter reached the farm and sat down to his tea with a countenance no less obtuse than usual. A little triumphant smirk curled the corners of Cammy's mouth, which did not escape him; but apparently he saw nothing.

"Hoo lang sin is it ye said that ye wished I had niver bin born?" she asked presently, so suddenly that Peter might indeed have been startled had he not been prepared.

"Hoo lang? No sae very lang," he replied, after a moment's consideration.

"Humph!" (There was a vast amount of expression in Cammy's "Humph!") "Micht I be speirin' o' ye, Peter McTavish, if ye ha iver repented and wanted to reca' thae words?"

"Na," said Peter reflectively, helping himself to a cake, "I canna say as I hae."

Cammy's smirk lost a little of its confidence. Her hair had no tendency to curl, or it might certainly have done so.

"Wull, then, I wud tell ye, ye may be repentin' before ye're mich older. For ye winna hae me langer than a minth at maist, an' then ye can jist gae yer own gait, for, Peter McTavish, I'm a gaen to be mairit to Jamie Grierson."

Cammy's voice rose to a concert pitch of triumph. Like an avenging angel pronouncing the ingrate's doom, she stood, her lips pursed with satisfaction, the tip of her nose pink with many emotions. Peter most assuredly, she thought, would sit dumb with a conflict of misery and repentance. Peter munched the last morsel of the wheaten cake deliberately; then he took his pipe, lit it, and walked to the door of the kitchen.

"Be ye deaf, Peter McTavish? Dinna ye understand that I am to be mairit to Jamie Grierson?" Cammy's voice had a shrill inflection of impatience.

"Ay, ay," responded Peter slowly, as if he had just tumbled to it. "It's niver too late; but I would na be in Jamie's shoon."

And thus expressing his congratulations Peter stepped out into the garden for his customary evening smoke; and she bore some slight resemblance to a hen when its plumage is fluttered with anger.

But not until the following Sabbath did she fully appreciate how far Peter was from repentance, or realise that his slow wit had proved more than a match for her. She clung to the notion still that Peter's behaviour was mere bravado; that, though he sought to hide it, he was inwardly alarmed and ill at ease; and that when he was left to face the problem of managing the farm without her his hardened heart would know its bitterness and his spirit be overwhelmed with misery and dejection. Therefore when the moment came for the reading of the banns she stole a surreptitious side-glance at Peter's inscrutable countenance, in the hope that some betrayal of emotion would even yet give her the satisfaction of victory. But he never changed expression by so much as the flicker of an eyelid when he heard Jamie Grierson's name coupled with hers. It was Cammy herself who sat suddenly erect, doubting her ears, her eyes glued on Peter, who turned and beamed at her pleasantly, every wrinkle on his face betokening his triumph.

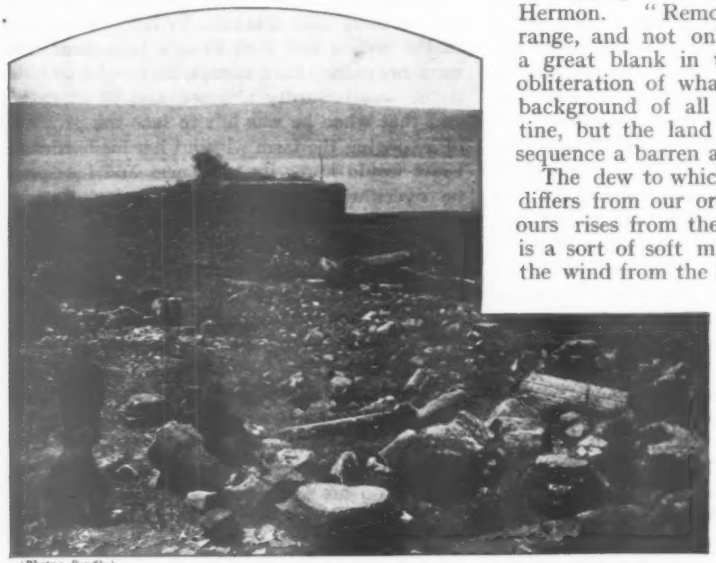
"I publish the banns of marriage between Peter McTavish and Margaret Douglas . . ." read the minister.

BIBLE SUMMITS.

By Dr. J. G. McPherson, F.R.S.E., Minister of Ruthven.

DEPRAVED instinct taught the ignorant pagans that mountains were suitable objects of worship, for they were nearer the sky, and had grander views, and finer and more invigorating air than any other parts of the earth. They were commanding objects, clothed with awe-inspiring shadows and crowned with a resplendent diadem of snow. They attracted the clouds and commanded the rain, and made weird the lightning that leapt life-like from peak to peak. As the people advanced they saw that the mountains were sources of blessing as field fertilisers. And we come at length to the sublime confidence of the psalmist, "I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills, from whence cometh my help."

Nature's most commanding monument in Palestine is Mount Hermon. It is the Mont Blanc of the Holy Land, for the snow is never entirely removed from its massive summit. It is on the north-eastern border, over against Lebanon, adjoining the plateau of Bashan, and towering high above the ancient border-city of Dan and the fountains of the Jordan. From whatever part of Palestine the traveller turns his eyes northward, Hermon is there, terminating the view. From all points of the journey, that pale-blue, snow-capped mass forms the one feature on the northern horizon.

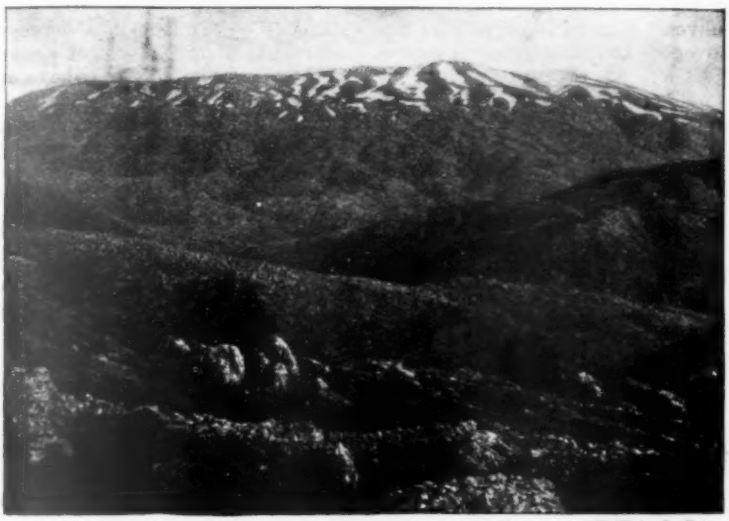


In the Hundred and Thirty-third Psalm is a geographical puzzle: "As the dew of Hermon, and as the dew that descended upon the mountains of Zion." One is so apt to jump to the conclusion that "Zion" is the mountain at Jerusalem. But it should be spelt with an "S," and not a "Z," for in Deuteronomy we read of "Mount Sion in Hermon." Sion, the "lofty," is the oldest title of Hermon, and the two names are used in the psalm in accordance with the well known parallelism of Hebrew poetry.

In his admirable work, entitled "Gleanings in Holy Fields," the late Dr. Hugh Macmillan describes the peculiar dew of Hermon referred to by the psalmist. The God of the whole earth "had commanded them the blessing, even life for evermore." The fact that the land was blessed instead of accursed, that it was a fruitful field instead of a useless waste, the fact that animal and vegetable life was maintained on it in health and strength from season to season, was owing to the dew of Hermon. "Remove that mountain range, and not only would its place be a great blank in the landscape, and an obliteration of what formed the noblest background of all the scenery of Palestine, but the land would become in consequence a barren and leafless desert."

The dew to which the psalmist referred differs from our ordinary dew. Most of ours rises from the ground, whereas this is a sort of soft mist that is carried by the wind from the Levant, like that mist

> "Which kept the heart of Eden green
> Before the useful trouble of the rain."



When the country is burnt up with the terrible sunshine in summer, this "haar" is attracted by the inland heights, and condensed in copious moisture upon their sides, creeping down upon the plains, and refreshing every green thing. "It comes first of all to Mount Hermon, and helps to keep up its unchanging robe of snow, and to fill its springs, and feed its cedars, and then it flows down and makes the corn to grow green in the valleys, and the vines to swell out their purple grapes in the vineyards, and the lilies to unfold their crimson radiance in the fields."

(Photo: Bonfils.)

THE RUINS OF CAPERNAUM.

MOUNT HERMON. (Photo: Bonfils.)

Mount Hermon has three summits, one reaching to the height of 10,000 feet. On one of these summits are curious and interesting ruins. Round a rock which forms the crest of the mountain are the foundations of a rude circular wall; within this is a large heap of hewn stones, surrounding the remains of a very ancient temple. Probably Baal was first worshipped there. It was very likely to the old Syrians what Jerusalem was to the Jews, what Gerizim is to the Samaritans, and what Mecca is to the Muslems.

Following the late Dean Farrar, we consider that Mount Hermon was the Mount of Transfiguration. It is named by St. Luke "the mountain," and He mon comes nearest this description. It is natural to suppose that our Lord, wishing to know well the Holy Land of His birth, would be attracted by the glorious sun-smitten dome of purity at every stage of His journey. Slowly would He walk northward till He reached the splendid, snow-clad mountain, whose glittering mass ever reminded him of the Hermon of Jewish poetry. This was the "holy" mount which St. Peter, in his Second Epistle, speaks of as the scene of transcending glory. On those dewy pasturages, fresh and cool with the heaven-sent breath, our Lord found rest for His troubled spirit in quiet communion with His Father.

North-west of Mount Hermon is the Lebanon range, the highest mountains in Syria, best known to us by the famous cedars that are still to be found there. The name Lebanon means "white," for the snow covers the whole summit during the greater part of the year. There Solomon got timber for the Temple. One of the peaks is very nearly 10,200 feet high. The backbone of the range has smooth, barren sides, and grey rounded summits. The white limestone cliffs and peaks conceal any little verdure; cultivation is seen about 4,000 feet below the summit. The descent is everywhere broken by precipices, chiselled into romantic shapes by the elements. Ravines of singular weirdness furrow the whole mountain side. Here and there, too, bold promontories shoot out, and dip the precipitous rocks into the foaming Mediterranean. The cultivation is wonderful, and shows what all Syria might be if the same industry prevailed all over. Small grain-fields appear where one would imagine it was unprofitable to cultivate the thin soil. Fig-trees cling to the naked rock; vines are trained along narrow ledges; stair-like steps of mulberries attract the eye; and deep down in the glens are found dense groves of olives. Hundreds of villages are scattered over; and numerous communities are settled on every summit. Dr. Porter, so well acquainted with the whole district, says, "When viewed from the sea on a morning in early spring, Lebanon presents a picture which, once seen, is never forgotten; but deeper still is the impression left on the mind when one looks down over its terraced slopes clothed in their gorgeous foliage, and through the vistas of its magnificent glens, or the broad and mighty Mediterranean." How beautifully do these noble features illustrate the words of Hosea, "Israel shall grow as the lily, and strike forth his roots as Lebanon"! And the fresh mountain breezes, filled in early summer with the fragrance of the budding vines and throughout the year with the rich odours from the clusters of aromatic herbs, call to mind these scripture words, "The smell of thy garments is like the smell of Lebanon."

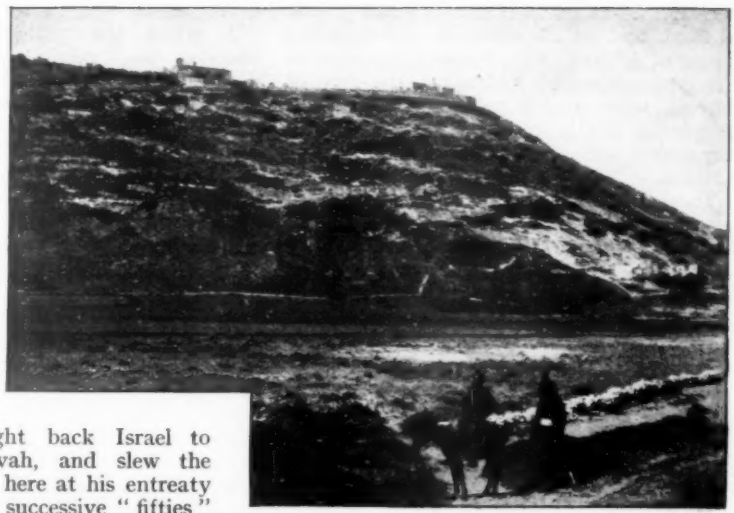
(Photo: Bonfils.)



MOUNT TABOR.

We have the sacred river, Kadisha, descending from the side of the loftiest peak in the whole range through a gorge of surpassing grandeur. Upon its banks is perched the great convent of Kanobin.

The grove of trees known as the cedars of Lebanon consists of about four hundred trees, standing quite alone in a depression of the mountain, about 6,400 feet above the level of the sea. The older trees have each several trunks, and spread themselves widely round; but most of the others are of cone-like form. They are regarded with much reverence by the natives as living records of Solomon's power; and the patriarch of Kanobin was formerly accustomed to celebrate there the Transfiguration at an altar of hewn stones.

Mount Carmel forms one of the most striking features of Palestine. As if to accentuate more distinctly the bay which forms the one indentation of the sea coast, this noble ridge, twelve miles in extent, runs out with a bold bluff promontory all but into the very waves of the Levant. The range consists of a soft white limestone, with veins of flint. It abounds also in caves, often of great length and extremely tortuous. The highest part is some eight miles from the sea, 1,728 feet in height. In appearance Carmel still lives out the original meaning of its name, "the well-wooded place." It is still clothed with the same excellency of wood which supplied the prophets with one of their most favourite illustrations. Dean Stanley considered that its shrubberies were thicker than any others in Central Palestine. Its rocky dells with deep jungles of copse, its impenetrable brushwood of oaks harboured game and wild animals. The whole mountain side is dressed with hollyhocks, jasmine, and fragrant herbs.

There seems good reason for believing that from very early times Mount Carmel was considered as a sacred spot. But that which has made it most familiar to the modern world is its intimate connection with the history of the two great prophets of Israel—Elijah and Elisha. The fiery zeal of the one and the healing tenderness of the other are inseparably connected in our minds with this gaily clad mountain. Here Elijah brought back Israel to allegiance to Jehovah, and slew the prophets of Baal; here at his entreaty were consumed the successive "fifties" of the royal guard; but here, on the other hand, Elisha received the visit of the bereaved mother, whose son he was soon to restore to her arms.

(Photo: Bonfils.)

MOUNT CARMEL.

The summit at the extreme eastern point of the range of Carmel commands the first view of the great plain in front. There, according to Dean Stanley, on the highest ridge of the mountain, may well have stood on its sacred "high place" the altar of Jehovah, which Jezebel had cast down. Close beneath, on a wide upland sweep, under the shade of ancient olives and round a perennial spring of water, must have been ranged on one side the king and priests of Baal, and on the other the commanding figure of Elijah. Full before them opened the whole plain of Esdraelon, the city of Jezreel, with Ahab's palace and Jezebel's temple distinctly visible. In the nearer foreground was clearly seen the meandering Kishon.

(Photo: [illegible])

GENERAL VIEW OF THE FOREST OF CEDARS OF LEBANON.

There once, too, did Elijah send his servant to a commanding peak whence there is a wide view of the azure Mediterranean. Seven times the servant brought back news that he saw nothing. "At last out of the far horizon there rose a little cloud, and it grew by the deepening shades of evening till the whole sky was overcast, and the forests of Carmel shook in the welcome sound of the mighty winds, which were the harbinger of the approaching tempest."

MOUNT ZION AND THE MOUNT OF OLIVES, FROM THE BETHLEHEM ROAD.

The sanctity of Mount Carmel no doubt remains, but it is its richness and its prominence—

"Tabor among the mountains; Carmel by the sea"— which appear to have taken hold of the poets of the nation: and their references to it are frequent and characteristic.

This allusion to Mount Tabor naturally takes us to the summit of that famous hill, which the psalmist associates with Hermon as "rejoicing in the name of Jehovah." It is one of the most interesting and remarkable of the single mountains in Palestine. It rises abruptly from the north-eastern arm of the Plain of Esdraelon; and a narrow ridge connects it with the hills of Nazareth, six miles distant. It presents to the eye in the distant horizon a beautiful appearance, being so symmetrical in its proportions and rounded off on its summit, studded with dense forests of oak, a shelter for wolves and other wild animals.

It requires about an hour to reach the summit of a thousand feet. The traveller, as he ascends, can occasionally get a glimpse of the parti-coloured fields—some red, in new-ploughed land; others yellow, where the harvest is ripening; and others green, with grass or springing grain. The top of the mountain consists of an irregular platform, embracing a circuit of half-an-hour's walk. According to Dr. Halkett, the panorama spread before the observers from the summit of Tabor includes as great a variety of objects of natural beauty and of sacred and historic interest as any one to be seen from any position in the Holy Land. On the east the waters of the Sea of Galilee are seen glittering through the clear atmosphere, and the course of the Jordan can be traced for many miles. The dark line on the western horizon is the Mediterranean, a ridge of Carmel towering above. North are the ranges of Lebanon and the snow-capped Hermon. On the south are seen the summits of Gilboa, and in the plain the village of Endor, the dwelling of the sorceress. Nain clings to the hill-side, where the Saviour restored to life the widow's son.

All around the top of the mountain are the foundations of a thick wall, built of large stones, with the traces of a fortress, and dwelling-houses. Some belong to the era of the Crusades, while others seem to date back to the time of the Romans. Most travellers who have visited Tabor in recent times have found it utterly solitary, so far as regards the presence of human occupants. The early Christians believed that our Saviour was transfigured on this mountain; but this idea is now exploded. Accordingly, in early times several churches and monasteries gave evidence of the religious enthusiasm of the Crusaders.

We have mentioned that the summits of Gilboa are seen from Tabor Mount. It is a mountain range some 600 feet high, on the eastern side of the plain of Esdraelon, rising over the city of Jezreel and extending some ten miles. It is only mentioned in scripture in connection with one event in Israelitish history—the defeat and death of Saul and Jonathan by the Philistines. When the tidings were carried to David he broke out into this pathetic strain: "Ye mountains of Gilboa, let there be no rain upon you, neither dew, nor field of offering."

At the northern base of Gilboa, half a mile from the ruins of Jezreel, the abode of Ahab and Jezebel, is a large fountain, and it was probably from it the name Gilboa (bubbling fountain) was derived. There is still a village on the top of the mountain. The sides of the range are bleak, white, and barren; they look, in fact, as if the heart-wringing curse of David had proved prophetic.

Further south, in Samaria, is Mount Gerizim, 2,500 feet in height, where the blessings of the obeyed law were pronounced, adjoining Mount Ebal, where the curses were cast on the disobedience of the law. The view from Gerizim is one of the finest in Palestine. It was to this mountain that Abraham was guided by Jehovah to have his faith tested in the offering up of his son Isaac. About the base was the altar which Jacob built. Here also was his "well," made world-famous by the interview between our Lord and the woman of Samaria. On the summit of the mountain Sanballat built the temple of Manasseh; but after it had stood for a couple of centuries it was destroyed by Hyrcanus. This, however, did not crush the rancour of the Samaritans. The liberal attitude of our Lord and His disciples was thrown away upon them. But much had they to suffer for it; on one occasion 10,600 of them were slain, and their city (Neapolis) came to grief.

RANGE OF MOUNT SINAI. (Photo: Frith and Co., Reigate.)

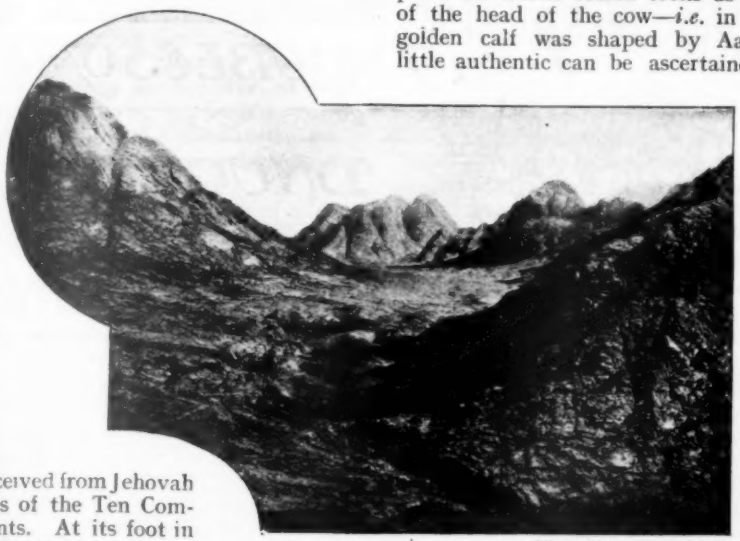
The Mount of Olives has most blessed of prayer great drops of blood were to sweat from His fevered brow. Eastward He saw the wilderness of Judæa to the purpling line of the mountains of Moab. The mysterious waters of the sea of Lot lay between. All afforded visible tokens of God's anger and man's sin.

(Photo: Bonfils.)



GENERAL VIEW OF MOUNT GERIZIM.

associations, for often the sacred feet of the Master pressed the slopes, as He went there for secret prayer, or on His way over to Bethany. The mount overtops even the highest part of Jerusalem by rather more than 100 feet, for it is 2,724 feet above the level of the sea. Its northern and southern outlines bend round slightly towards the city, and give the effect of "standing round about Jerusalem." We can imagine the little band listening to our Lord's discourse on the summit before they went over to Bethany. Jesus sat down to rest—perhaps under the green boughs of those two stately cedar-trees which then adorned the summit of the hill. It was a scene well fitted for His discourse. Beneath Him lay the corrupt city, waiting for His blood. At His feet was the garden of Gethsemane, where in the agony

The tombs of the kings were in the city of David—that is, Mount Zion, which was an eminence on the northern part of Mount Moriah. The royal sepulchres were probably chambers containing separate recesses for the successive kings. This was on the "Upper City" of the Jews, higher and more massive than Mount Moriah, or the "Lower City" of Josephus, now occupied by the great Mohammedan sanctuary with its mosques and domes.

Only a little space remains for a few notes on Mount Sinai and Mount Horeb. Nearly in the centre of the peninsula which stretches between the horns of the Red Sea lies a wedge of granite and porphyry rocks, rising to 8,000 feet above the sea. The mountain known as Jebel Katherin has two well-marked peaks, the northern one called Horeb and the southern Sinai (or the Mountain of Moses). There has been much wrangling about the special sites and names. Sinai was the sacred mountain on which Moses received from Jehovah the tables of the Ten Commandments. At its foot in a ravine stands the fortress-like monastery of St. Catherine, and a short distance above it the chapel of St. Elias; whilst on its summit is a little pilgrim church. The rock in Horeb was what Moses smote. Just east of Sinai lies the convent mountain, called also, from a local legend, "the Mount of the Burning Bush." Tradition has also fixed on a hollow rock in the plain on which Horeb looks as the mould of the head of the cow—i.e. in which the golden calf was shaped by Aaron. But little authentic can be ascertained. There are a great many Nabatæan inscriptions engraven on the rocks of Sinai, which date from the early centuries of the Christian era.

(Photo: Frith and Co., Reigate.)
MOUNT HOREB.

(Photo: Bonfils.)
THE MOUNTAINS OF GILBOA.

A SERIAL STORY.

SYNOPSIS OF CHAPTERS I.—XI.

The first chapter introduces us to the village of Stannington, where Judy Evelyn, third and youngest daughter of Mrs. Evelyn of the Red House, is visiting all her friends round the village green in company with Jack Winstanley, the thirteen-year-old son of Major and Lady Mary Winstanley, of the Court. Judy is just home from her French school. By her mother's wish she is put back into the schoolroom with her old governess, Miss Meredith, and is restricted to a hard-and-fast schoolroom course, which frets the high-spirited girl. Lady Flora Lindley, Judy's godmother, carries her off from her lessons to a seaside village near a great port, where presently Lady Flora's son, Major Lindley, is to arrive, invalided home from the South African war. Lady Flora has succeeded in dividing her son and his cousin, Miss Rosamund Lindley. Lady Flora and Judy go to town for shopping purposes, and visit the Duchess of Glastonbury, who is the head of an East-End settlement. Major Lindley arrives, and it is decided that they all stay on a while at the big seaside hotel, so that the hero may pick up after his wounds. Judy and Major Lindley are constantly together. He confides to her that he is going back to Rosamund, his old love, to clear up the misunderstanding between them, before he returns to the front. Judy tells Lady Flora that he loves only his cousin, and is going to seek her out and ask her to take him back again. Lady Flora is furiously angry, and suggests to him that he has made Judy care for him. He asks Judy to marry him, and Judy says "Yes." There is a certain Maurice Evelyn, a distant cousin, who loses a portion of his inheritance if he does not marry one of his three cousins. Judy has misgivings as to whether Major Lindley's heart is really hers. She goes to stay with Lady Mary Winstanley, and finds her depressed, and meets Margaret Greville. Major Lindley goes back to Africa. Judy overhears a conversation between Lady Mary Winstanley and Miss Rosamund which proves that her worst fears about her engagement are true. She runs away to the Duchess of Glastonbury for comfort, accidentally gets into a low street of alien thieves, and is in a very dangerous position when she is rescued by a strange young gentleman. Returning home, she is introduced to her cousin, Maurice Evelyn, who proves to be the hero of her East-End adventure.

CHAPTER XII.

IN WHICH JUDY DESIRES TO FLEE AWAY

IT was true that Maurice Evelyn had wakened up the Red House. There was something irresistibly bright and joyous about him, though only Judy knew how stern he could be on occasion.

His presence there seemed to have relaxed in some indefinable way the over-prim atmosphere of the house. Quite possibly, if Mrs. Evelyn's son had lived, there would not have grown up the hedge of narrow little conventions with which she had bounded her life and the lives of her daughters. Mrs. Evelyn was one of the many women who have one law for the man, another for the woman, being quite unconscious of it the while.

Her husband had accepted his wife's rule for her daughters without questioning it. Now it surprised and amused him to see how she smiled on the innovations young Evelyn introduced, and how he routed Mabel and Bertha out of their prim and narrow ways.

"District visiting?" he said. "Oh, yes; district visiting is very good in its way, especially if you will let me come and carry your basket. But there can't be much scope for district visiting in this fat and comfortable county. The idea of your not playing golf! We'll begin to-morrow. The beauty of golf is that it is an all-round-the-year game, and will keep you out of doors all day in the winter as well as in the summer."

Judy's eyes met her father's, and there was an answering twinkle. What, then, was to become of the life of the tesselated pavement, as Judy had called it in her rebellious moments —the half-hour's reading, the half-hour's embroidery, the half-hours of piano practice, of French, of German, of Italian, by which the girls kept their accomplishments fresh, yet learned the process of an incessant weaning from the things of this world.

"You are quite right, Maurice," Mrs. Everyn said easily. "They are too fond of sitting over the fire in winter; and even in summer they will sit in a basket-chair in the garden and never think of getting up on the Hill, where the air is so fresh and bracing."

The golfing began the next day; and not only was their cousin in readiness to coach the girls, but young Edward Hunter and Teddy Parkinson showed a great willingness to assist in their golfing education. The first day happened to be a windy one, and Bertha and Mabel returned with all their neat little curls blown into a most admired disorder. As for Judy, her hair was always inclined to flame about her head, so it made no great difference to Judy.

The colour, too, was blown into her sisters' somewhat languid cheeks, and altogether they returned home looking quite unlike the demure young ladies who had gone out; and there was more laughter and chatter over the tea in the garden, to which the whole party of golfers had returned, than Judy remembered to have heard from her sisters' lips in all the years she had known them.

As they entered the house, Judy overheard a scrap of conversation between Mabel and Teddy Parkinson which brought the quick smile to her lips and eyes.

"I'm afraid I'm shockingly untidy," her demure sister said in a coquettish way, at the same time putting up her two pretty bare hands to smooth down the hair that stuck out about her face in a fine little tangle of gold wires.

"Don't!" said Teddy, who was a youth of few words. "It's lovely as it is."

And Mabel did not, not even when she retired and came back with little touches added to her dress that were suitable for an afternoon toilet, if not for the roughness of golf.

Judy's sisters had not realised before how much pleasure mere movement gives to the young. There was something to be done every day, and no time except in the after-dinner hour for sitting still.

Mrs. Parkinson beamed delightedly on the young people's enjoyments, and was eager to make the occasions. She promised great things as to what she would do to wake up the neighbourhood in the coming winter, "unless—unless"—the good soul's ruddy tints were apt to fade at this point—"unless Teddy's regiment and all her dear boys were at the front," which seemed likely enough.

Mrs. Parkinson was so kind that it was almost impossible to distinguish between her kindness to one guest and another. Yet there was a shade more tenderness in her manner to Mabel Evelyn than was there for the others, and sharp-eyed Judy noticed that with other things.

A whole fortnight went by. By this time Judy had an address up-country to send her letters to, and she wrote conscientiously, keeping a sort of running diary for her lover, to which she added a little day by day.

If you could have looked over her shoulder as she penned these additions, you would have found very little mention of Maurice Evelyn's name, considering how much Judy was in his company. This was a great deal more, indeed, than Jack Winstanley liked. He knew by this time about Major Lindley, and had made up his mind to regard Judy as a sister henceforth; but all the same, he didn't like being cut out as a brother by Maurice Evelyn.

Once when she added to her diary at an hour when she might have been supposed to be in bed, Judy, in the seclusion of her bedchamber, turned red and pale, placed her hand against her heart as though it were beating too fast, and then wrote rapidly for a few moments. It was scarcely a matter to cause such perturbation. She merely mentioned that she had met Miss Rosamund Lindley looking as sweet as ever, but rather sad; that she had stopped and spoken, hoping that Judy had good news from the seat of war.

She was tempted to add that Miss Rosamund and Miss Prim had moved into the Spinney Farm, and that the Manor House stood empty, but some instinct kept her from touching on that subject. He would know, of course, that they had ceased to be his tenants; and probably the subject was painful to him.

When Judy had written that little bit about Miss Rosamund she put the sheets of her diary into an envelope, sealed it, addressed it to Major Lindley, and then ran down and placed it on the hall table, where the letters were laid for the early morning post, which left the house before anyone but the servants were astir. And to-morrow was not the South African mail-day either.

A day or two later Mrs. Evelyn was amazed by Judy's request to be allowed to go for a time to the Duchess of Glastonbury.

"Not really, dear?" the mother said in distress. "You have seemed so happy with us, Judy dear."

"I read the other day," said Judy, "in a book about Madame de Guyon—Mr. Neville lent it to me, dear, so it must be perfectly orthodox—that those girls called to the conventual state were remarkable beyond all others for their gaiety and love of enjoyment, and that the very hardest vocations of all fell to the most lively; so that you might see a young girl dancing in rose satin and jewels till midnight, and hear next day that she had fled away to the poor Clares or the Carmelites. It was always the happiest who went. Not that there is anything very ascetic about the life at Bethlehem House."

Mrs. Evelyn frowned, almost for the first time since Judy had come home.

"I think such reading cannot fail to be unwholesome," she said. "Perhaps Mr. Neville had not read the book. And, of course, the Duchess is much too wise for any of that nonsense. Still, I don't like your leaving us when we are all so happy."

Judy turned away her head, and a little grey forlornness came into her face for the fraction of a second; but, short as it was, the mother saw it and ached over it.

"Poor little Judy, poor child!" she said, gathering her into a loving embrace. "Is it as bad as that? I'm afraid we've been selfish, enjoying ourselves and forgetting what you have to bear, and poor old Lady Flora too. Not that she would let us pity her, or forgive us if we were dull for her sake."

"Dearest mother," cried Judy, clinging to her, "there was no time in all my life when your love had not power to make me happy. But I want to go, indeed I want to go. I want to be good and quiet for a little while."

"I know, I know," the mother said hastily. "There are times when we all want to be good and quiet for a little while, because our Master is calling us. Do you think I would keep you, Judy dear?"

"You will speak to papa?"

"I will speak to him. He won't like your going, Judy. You seem to have been so much away from us lately. But he will listen to me."

She made an opportunity to speak to her husband that evening, and found him more amenable than she had expected.

"I'm not surprised," he said, "not surprised. I shouldn't have consented to the engagement, Helen, but you persuaded me against my better judgment. I shall never be reconciled to Lindley's age—and then, a man going out to be shot at! Stuff and nonsense! he'd no business to ask Judy."

"It has gone very deep with her," said the mother. "I'm afraid we've been forgetting what the child must have been enduring in the separation from her lover, and the anxiety for him. I think it will do her good to go. I remember what I suffered during our only separation."

Mr. Evelyn looked at his wife with a mixture of tenderness and trouble, but without the usual humorous glint in his eye.

"I'm not sure I oughtn't to step in now," he said, "and stop it all."

"Oh, Marmaduke! I can quite trust the Duchess with Judy. She won't let her go anywhere or do anything she oughtn't to. Besides, I don't think we can prevent Judy's going. She wants quietness and prayer, poor child."

"Who talked about preventing her, ma'am?" Mr. Evelyn asked.

"Why, you did, surely."

"I did no such thing. It was something quite different. I think perhaps it's the best thing Judy can do—for the present. Of course, she won't go where there are any nasty infectious things to be picked up."

"No, indeed. We should have very little sense of our responsibility to Philip Lindley if we——"

"Bother Philip Lindley!" said Mr. Evelyn, with some asperity.

Then he changed the subject.

"Have you noticed," he asked, "that betwixt and between us the provisions of poor Cousin Peter's will seem likely not to be executed?"

His tone was dry, and Mrs. Evelyn's face underwent one of those sudden changes of colour that were as natural to her as to Judy.

"No, indeed. What do you mean, Marmaduke?"

"I thought women saw more of that particular game than men. However, it's perfectly obvious to my dull intelligence that your daughter Mabel seems to prefer that stupid fellow Teddy Parkinson to Maurice, and when the couples are sorted out Bertha invariably falls to young Hunter. So, of course, Maurice and Ju have had to pair off, and, as ill-luck would have it, Ju's already bespoke. If I could be only a little surer I'd interfere, but I'm afraid to. There is just the possibility of my doing mischief."

Mrs. Evelyn found part of her husband's speech rather cryptic; but there were occasions on which she did not understand him, so she let it pass.

"I wonder if Maurice knows," she said calmly, "that Judy is engaged?"

"Good Heavens, surely! How could he be here and not know? You told him, didn't you? Or if not, someone would have told him."

Mrs. Evelyn looked at his disturbed face with some wonder.

"I never told him," she said. "I avoided discussing the girls with him at first out of motives of delicacy. It's bad enough to have a young man coming to the house to pick one of your daughters for his wife. He mightn't have been half as nice as Maurice, and I think it was a very odd thing for your Cousin Peter to do. I couldn't begin by telling him that one of the girls was out of the question."

"Perhaps not," her husband said gloomily. "Still, since you and I have not told him, it is just possible that it was nobody else's business. In that case, it occurs to me, Helen, that we may have been doing poor Maurice serious wrong."

"Oh, I hope not," said Mrs. Evelyn in distress, "for he is a dear boy. And, Marmaduke, I can't really believe that Mabel and Bertha could like Teddy Parkinson and that Hunter boy better than Maurice. I am sure you are mistaken."

"Perhaps so. But the thing I am afraid of is that Maurice may not be concerned about Mabel and Bertha at all."

"The golfing began the next day."—p. 375.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE BEST BELOVED.

JUDY had gone over to the Court to say good-bye to Lady Mary and Jack.

She found no Jack. Jack was playing in a return match of Stannington against Orchard Green, and was not expected back till dinner-time. But Lady Mary was on her wheeled sofa in the garden, doing nothing, and alone. Judy, coming unannounced by way of the garden, caught a glimpse of Lady Mary's face, full of heavy melancholy—for an instant only, then she saw Judy, and her expression changed to one of pretended cheerfulness, which did not deceive Judy, and would not have deceived a less interested and observant person.

However, there was no pretence about her welcome of Judy. She put out her arms and drew the girl within them and kissed her warmly.

"I just wanted you, Judy," she said. "The Major has driven Margaret over to Castle Uplands to see the ruins, and my book doesn't interest me, and I was beginning to feel very lonely."

"And neuralgic," said Judy compassionately. "The minute I saw your face I said to myself, 'Poor Lady Mary, it is one of her neuralgic days.'"

Lady Mary smiled in her odd way.

"I haven't neuralgia, Judy," she said. "At least, not what is called neuralgia."

"Well, then, I don't see why you were looking so gloomy. Jack would have rated you if he had seen it, and the Major and Margaret would have been sorry they had left you. When did Margaret come?"

"Last evening. I was just going to send you over word. Stay till they come back. They said they would get back in time for tea."

"I am quite free. The others went to Battlements for tennis. Dear Lady Mary, aren't you glad Margaret has come? How long will she stay?"

"I am very glad she has come. And she will stay with us for a fortnight. It will be very pleasant for the Major. He is never tired of talking to Margaret. What news, Judy? You have heard from Major Lindley?"

"He is very well, thank you," Judy said, as though her mind were not given to her answer. "But I came to tell you that I am going to the Duchess of Glastonbury for a while. Papa and mother have consented. Later on, I shall join the others at Eastbourne; but I shall have a month or longer with the Duchess."

"In that East-End slum of her's! You will like it, Judy?"

"I shall love it. And her house isn't a slum; her face makes it all beautiful."

"Poor little Judy! And I've heard them saying that it has been such a gay summer at Stannington. That cousin of yours and Mrs. Parkinson and her nephew have wakened us all up. Of course, it couldn't be very happy for you."

"No; it hasn't been very happy for me," Judy said, with a deep, almost painful, blush.

"And so you want to flee away like the dove, and be at rest. Poor little Judy, that you should already have arrived at that desire. It is too bad. I have found out that the most desirable thing on earth is rest—or perhaps it is not on earth. But that is a knowledge that ought to belong to the old, and weary, and disillusioned."

"Like you!" said Judy, with tender raillery.

"Like me," Lady Mary responded, and sudden tears rushed to her eyes.

"You have been moping," cried Judy. "I know your way. You would make them go away and leave you, and then be miserable by yourself. I have noticed your doing it and wondered about it. Why should you? You know Major Winstanley is never so happy as when he is by your side."

"Dear Judy, I hope there is a greater happiness preparing for him. Yes; Hugo has never wearied of me, never would weary. Though it is hard for a man like him to have an invalid wife. Why, with the right kind of wife there is no height to which he might not attain. I feel my health failing, Judy. I have grown weaker and thinner for some time past. Haven't you seen it? Look at my wrists."

She extended her hands to Judy, and the girl saw it was true. Lady Mary had had beautiful arms. Now the wrist-bones showed too much, the skin hung loosely.

"I see that you have been fretting yourself thin," said Judy, with a tender roughness. "But there is nothing the matter with you—nothing, nothing. Why haven't you seen a doctor if you have been growing thinner? Hasn't the Major noticed? He must know. He would never forgive us for keeping from him anything that affected your health."

Lady Mary laughed, a queer little triumphant laugh.

"Dr. Sebright knows," she said, "and he has been giving me tonics. But tonics are no good at all. Do you know what is the matter with me, Judy? My heart is broken because I can never be anything but a drag and a burden on Hugo. Poor Hugo, he will be grieved. I wish I could spare him the grief.

And oh, my boy, my Jack!" For an instant she covered her face with her hands, Then she controlled herself and smiled unhappily. "The sorrow will pass," she said, "and Hugo will marry again. He must marry again. I shall ask it of him when I am dying. And then the love of some beautiful and noble woman will repay him the debt of tenderness I owe for his faithful patience with me."

"You are talking nonsense," said Judy. "Nothing—no one can repay him but you. And Dr. Sebright is old-fashioned and timid. I've heard Major Winstanley say so himself. You should see another doctor, Major Winstanley is right. Dr. Sebright may have been good enough the time you had your accident. Surgery has been making strides since. He is not the man to keep up with them."

"Do you know the thing that would make me well, Judy? It would be if I were told that I should walk again. I know that it is an impossibility. Oh, Judy, I was always so active as a girl. If you were to know what a martyrdom it has been to lie still all these years. I was only twenty-two when it happened. Was ever anyone so punished for an act of reckless disobedience?"

Her frame was shaken with sobs, and Judy could do nothing but put an arm about the shoulders where the bones stood out prominently and murmur inarticulate words of pity and love.

"I was never a weakling," Lady Mary said, between her sobs. "If I had been, it would not have been so hard. I was meant for a very strong woman. Margaret is looking splendid, Judy. She has the bloom of a peach. Her beauty has got something new and wonderful in it. She smiles as though she had the most exquisite and tender of secrets. Who could see Margaret and not love her? She smiles at me as though there were a secret between us. Judy, if it were not for my fall, I should have been nearly as beautiful as Margaret. I am not yet thirty-five."

A servant brought the tea-table across the lawn at this moment, and set out the things within reach of Lady Mary's hand. Before the silence which his presence made necessary could be broken Major Winstanley and Miss Greville were seen coming towards them.

Margaret had enjoyed her drive, and the ruins were wonderful, but they had both wanted to get back to Lady Mary as soon as possible. And how delightful it was to find Judy! Major Winstanley had promised to go over to the Red House after tea and fetch Judy back.

Yes; there certainly was a startling increase of beauty in Margaret, who had always been beautiful. Some warmth and ripening had come to her, as it might to one of the peaches on the southern wall. She was gayer, more animated, less serious than of old—some happy man's Egeria, but also his dear, natural human love.

"I could call you Peg, as the Duchess does, to-day," said Judy enigmatically, and refused to explain when asked why to-day and not other days.

The Major, meanwhile, had sat down by his wife and spoken a few words to her in a low, tender voice. His eyes were the eyes of a lover. What was Lady Mary thinking of, said Judy to herself, when she planned consolation for this husband bereft of her? Why, he would never be consoled. Though he smiled at the two girls in his kind, grand way, he had the air, sitting there beside his wife, of being isolated with her in a great space where no one came near them or touched them. The sight of it made Judy impatient. Such a love ought to work miracles for the woman who possessed it—greater miracles, even, than to make her keep her hold on a world which without her would be in ruins for this man.

He still kept his seat by her when they had drunk their tea, and Margaret, putting an affectionate arm about Judy, asked her to come and show her the garden, which she had not yet made friends with.

"I am always glad to leave those two together," she said. "Did you ever see such devotion? But what's the matter with Lady Mary? She looked ailing before she left town, and I thought it was only the heat, the smaller house; and that her own place would set her up. But it hasn't. She looks worse than before. Doesn't the Major notice it? I believe he does, for he seems to me harassed at times."

"She has been talking about dying—in order to add to his happiness—this afternoon," Judy said drily.

"Dear Heavens! she mustn't die. Just when I am so full of hope for her, too. I know. She has talked to me about the drag an invalid wife is on a man like Major Winstanley. Otherwise, he is so perfectly satisfied with her as she is that I should have let the thing alone."

"What thing?"

"It is the profoundest of secrets. Let me whisper it in your ears, Judy, and then you will tell me if I ought to tell her at once."

They were in a little garden maze, at the heart of which was a fountain full of gold-fish.

"Judy, I have spoken to Sir Francis Burnett about Lady Mary's injury. He says from what I have told him that it may be possible to make her a quite strong woman. Her injury no longer belongs to the category of the hopeless. He is to see her when she returns to town in October, if she will consent to it. You know he has just been to America. I don't know how many cases of the same kind he has cured. Think of what a hope it is. And for her to talk of dying!"

Judy became rosy-red with excitement.

"She will die, too," she said, "just for the want of the will to live, unless we make her have the will. This is just in time. She will live for the chance."

"I tremble to tell her, lest hers should be the one case out of a hundred, incurable."

"Ah, we mustn't think of that. We must let her know at once. She must begin to pick up strength for the treatment. Oddly enough, she detected your excitement, and spoke to me about it. Is it this secret that has made you blossom like the rose, Margaret?"

Miss Greville blushed.

"There is something else, Judy," she said, "Can't you imagine what?"

"Love?" said Judy.

"Yes, love. And the proudest love a woman ever had. I am to marry Mr. Mountford."

"Oh, Margaret, what a splendid destiny!"

"Yes, it is splendid," Margaret said slowly; "but I hadn't thought about his being Prime Minister. I have only thought how great and noble he is, how full of sympathy for humankind, how ready to redress evils and fight the good fight. I have only thought how great my love for him is, and wondered how he could ever stoop to me."

"Ah, the Duchess meant that when she said you were probably destined for a great position."

"I've worshipped him since I was a little girl, Judy," went on Margaret, with rapturous eyes. "And he has always been in love with me, he says, only—just think, Judy!—he thought I would not care for him because he is so much older than I am. As though every year hasn't made him more splendid!"

"You will be his Egeria."

The beautiful girl bowed her head with the most touching humility.

"I pray that God may make me fit to be his wife," she said. "I have just told Major Winstanley. How glad he was! Do you know, I believe he had fathomed what always seemed to me my hopeless passion, and was sorry for me? He was so very glad."

She laughed and blushed, and then stood smiling at Judy across the basin of clear water, looking the very incarnation of happy love.

"I am so glad, so glad," said Judy, rushing at her and giving her a tremendous hug. "You deserve to be the proudest and happiest woman in the world. Do you suppose Major Winstanley has told Lady Mary?"

"I told him he might. We are not talking about it yet. It will make such a frightful buzz when it is known. We want to elope together and make a secret marriage somewhere."

"That would never do—for Mr. Mountford. As the newspapers will say, 'His marriage is an event which stirs the great heart of England to its depths.' England wouldn't like to be left out of it."

She laughed light-heartedly. Judy was only too eager for an opportunity to be glad, and she had turned her back upon her own troubles for the moment.

Now she seized Margaret Greville by the hand.

"Let us run and peep through the trees," she said, "and see how Lady Mary is taking it. I have an idea that the joy of it may give her just the fillip she wants. And then, at the first possible moment, we will tell her about Sir Francis."

"If she were really dying, Judy, I could not feel that even my engagement brought me happiness. She was the first person I thought of when I realised my own happiness. I love her so much, Judy."

"Yes, and she loves you. Why, she is alone! The Major must have been called away. Let us run to her."

Lady Mary's face was incredibly brighter for the news. Yet, as she kissed Margaret's peachy cheek there was the oddest little air of reproach mingled with her joy.

"Ah, she is not sorry that the woman who is to console the Major is not in sight, after all," Judy thought, with tender laughter, "and yet she is inclined to think that Margaret has failed her."

XUM

"Major Winstanley and Miss Greville were seen coming towards them."—p. 379.

"Judy," said Lady Mary when they were alone together for a moment, "what do you suppose Hugo said when I remarked that Mr. Mountford must be a happy man to possess such a creature?"

"I can imagine," said Judy demurely.

"No, you can't, Judy. He said there was only one more fortunate, and that was himself in possessing me. Think of it, Judy! Me, a sick, crippled woman!"

"That is exactly what I should have supposed he would say," said Judy. "And if there is one woman more to be envied than Margaret it is you, for possessing such a husband and son."

CHAPTER XIV.

TANGLED THREADS.

WHEN next they met Judy found a subtle change in Maurice Evelyn. She had stayed to dinner at the Court, and her place by the cousin at the Red House dinner table had been filled up by Sylvia Hunter.

Judy came in quietly about nine o'clock to the drawing-room, where they were playing at charades. She looked tired; perhaps she had been giving too much sympathy all round at the expense of her own vitality. Anyhow, she crept quietly into the corner of a sofa by her father. Mr. Evelyn could always be trusted to be sympathetic and silent. Judy was not sure that she could have trusted any woman as far.

Perhaps he divined now that she was tired and disinclined for the merriment. Anyhow, he asked her in a whisper if she would like to come with him to his den, where he was going to smoke. Judy squeezed his hand gratefully, and they slipped off together. Maurice had not seemed to notice her coming or going.

Mr. Evelyn put her into his own chair with an awkward tenderness. Outside the dews of late summer were white on the grass as hoar frost. He drew the curtains across the windows.

"Let us have a fire, Ju," he said. "That is the worst of such summers as we have had of late. They seldom give an excuse for a fire. Fortunately, this is always set."

He put a match to the fire, which caught, and presently the wood was crackling merrily. Judy, in her armchair, stretched out her two chilly hands to the blaze, and felt the warmth grateful.

"I wish you were not in such a hurry to be gone again," Mr. Evelyn said, standing with his back to the fire and looking down at Judy.

"It is only for a little while," said Judy.

"What has come to you, Ju? You used not to be so restless."

"I suppose things make a difference—Philip, and all that. I don't feel the same as those young people. I suppose it is not to be expected."

He smiled down at the bronze head wistfully. It was lowered. Judy apparently was staring at the toes of her bronze slippers to the exclusion of all else.

"You are the youngest of them all, Ju," he said, "in actual years. I wish you hadn't been in such a hurry to grow up. I liked you very well as you were."

"And I liked myself very well as I was," with a little tremble of her voice, "even with the schoolroom and all that. It was very peaceful. Perhaps it would have been better if I had waited for Jack as he asked me."

The sudden smile flitted across the shadow of Judy's face, bringing out her dimples for a moment.

"I wish your godmother had let you be," Mr. Evelyn said impatiently. In his heart he had a troubled conviction that Lady Flora had somehow manœuvred the engagement.

Judy said nothing. The fire was burning up warmer now, and her engagement ring seemed like a thin band of fire on her slender brown finger.

"An extraordinary thing," Mr. Evelyn went on, with the same air of a general exasperation, "is that Maurice did not know of your engagement till I told him this afternoon. Let me see, how long have you been back?"

"Three weeks to-morrow. There has not been much time to tell him anything. We have been so gay."

"I don't know when the house has been so pleasant. I wish he had come before. It was a stupid thing to put it off till you girls were of an age to know your own minds. It would have been much wiser and safer if you had grown up knowing each other. I could have trusted Maurice. How did I know that he was going to be what he is?"

Judy looked up at her father with her curiosity plainly awakened.

"I'm talking riddles, Ju, am I not?" he asked, leaning to stroke her cheek. "Of course, you don't know; but since you're out of it I don't think it matters about my telling you. Maurice came here to see if he could find a wife among his cousins. It was a provision of old Cousin Peter's will. The dear old fellow was very anxious that his nephew should marry one of my daughters. He had an idea that if you children grew up with him on brotherly and sisterly terms that might defeat his purpose. I'm afraid it looks like enough to be defeated. I said it was not fair to you or to Maurice that you should not be free when he came. I wish I had refused my consent to your engagement, as I was inclined to do, only for your mother."

A sudden spot of red came into Judy's cheeks, as though sent there by a throb of the heart.

"I'm afraid you are right," she said. "Mabel seems to have found her affinity in Teddy Parkinson. Why, papa? It has nothing to do with money. She would like Teddy just as well if he hadn't a red cent." She lifted her eyebrows humorously.

"Oh, Bottom and Titania, I suppose!" Mr. Evelyn said impatiently; then repented, and added that Teddy was a good fellow and a gentleman, despite his looks.

"I can understand Mabel much better than I can understand Bertha, papa," said Judy, in a fit of confidence. "The Hunter boy is so uninteresting, despite his good looks; whereas Teddy—oh, Teddy's good nature is genius and beauty and all the rest of it. Mab's very wise to have found it out."

"I might have been left one daughter," Mr. Evelyn grumbled. "And then poor Maurice! He is penalised to the extent of £30,000 because he does not marry one of you. That's the odd thing. You each get £10,000 under Cousin Peter's will unless Maurice marries one of you. It's an absurd provision, that's what it is. Then, the money will be of no use to either Mab or Bertha. They will have enough without. I daresay it will come in uncommonly handy in your case. Lindley has very little of his own."

Sudden tears flashed into Judy's eyes, and she sprang to her feet.

"I won't take that money," she said. "I won't, papa! Isn't there some way of handing it back to him—a deed of gift or something?"

"Only in novels. There, my dear"—soothingly—"you needn't be anxious about Maurice. He'll have a pittance of a couple of hundred thousand left. He won't miss it, I assure you. Take it as an evidence of Cousin Peter's goodwill. Poor old fellow, how grieved he would have been at the failure of his plans!"

"Perhaps—Cousin Maurice might have rejected us," said Judy, looking from under the curling upward sweep of her lashes.

"He hasn't had much of a chance. I think we have treated him pretty badly all round. He ought to have known as soon as he entered the house that one of you was out of the question. I blame myself. I left it to your mother to do. Her delicacy prevented her. She always rather resented Cousin Peter's will, although it was the finest compliment to her. The poor old fellow thought that there wasn't a woman in the world like her."

"Was Cousin Maurice—did he seem to think he ought to have been told? How was it he did not notice my ring? I thought my engagement would have been spoken of by someone. He did not look at me when I came in this evening, yet we have been such friends."

"He took it quietly, Ju. After all, three weeks is not very long. One does not receive very lasting impressions in three weeks."

Judy said nothing, only became redder than before, and from the beginning of the interview the colour had been coming and going in her cheeks that had been pale.

"I think, papa, I will go upstairs to Miss Meredith," she said sedately. "Indeed, I ought to have gone to her before, for she told me she had something to talk to me about. And she has had a deal of loneliness of late."

"Go, child," said her father. After all, what was the use of talking? He might only do mischief that would not be easily mended. He was jealous over his children and their happiness, but once they had grown up, he did not believe very much in trying to act as their special Providence. His experience had been that things usually worked out for the best in the end. It was as well Judy was going away. She had will and character in an unusual degree. He thought, he hoped, that if she found she did not love Major Lindley well enough she would not marry him because of any fanciful scruple about the breaking of her word.

Judy was glad to escape. She went quietly up the stairs, past the drawing-room door, at which she cast a nervous glance, as though someone might issue from it whom it would be an embarrassment to see. She walked silken-footed, and she had an air as though she were poised for flight. However, nobody came.

She found Miss Meredith sitting alone. The lamp was lighted, and the moths were fluttering about it. The windows were yet wide open, and the scent of flowers drenched in dew was as though someone were swinging a censer.

Miss Meredith sat by the old schoolroom table. She was never one to make herself comfortable in a soft fireside chair unless Judy were there to make her.

The lamplight fell on her pretty brown hair, which was growing a little thin. Her mild blue eyes were in shadow. A soft fichu of old lace, a gift from Mrs. Evelyn, clung about her shoulders, veiling their too insistent narrowness. She had an open book before her, but she was drumming on the pages with a nervous finger, not reading. The flight of white moths had an air of circling round her head rather than following the lamp.

"I am going to give you the last hour of my last evening," said Judy, coming in. "But how twilit you are, Merry. The dews are heavy to-night. Come, we shall talk when I have made you comfortable. I have been sitting by Papa's fire. Now this room strikes chilly; we are going to have a fire."

She took away Miss Meredith's genteel screen, worked in tent stitch and framed and glazed, and in spite of her protestations lighted the fire.

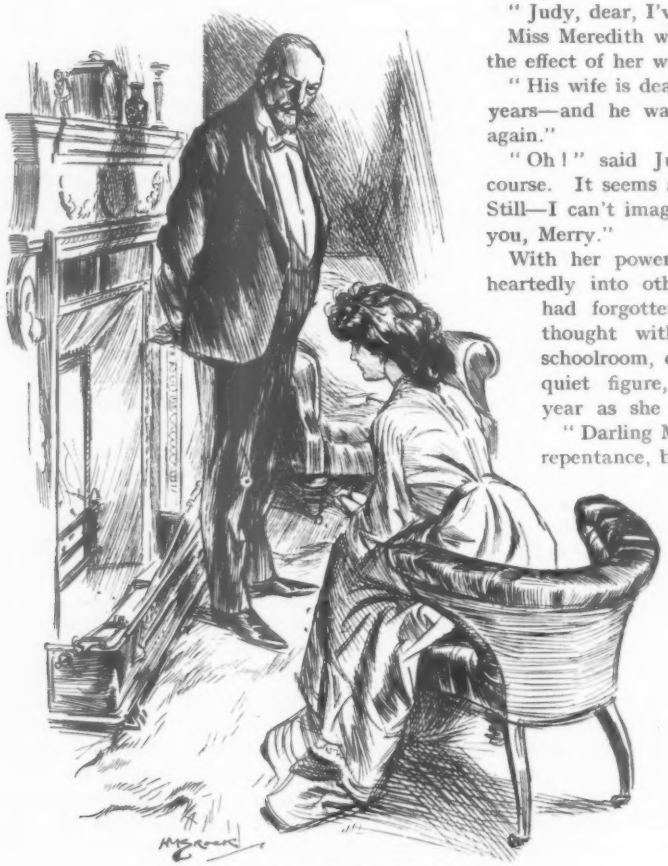
"Presently," she said, "I am going to have a schoolroom supper of bread-and-milk and raspberry jam, because I didn't eat much dinner, and because we must have an entertainment of some sort to bring back the old times. And now, Merry, what is the matter with you?"

"Judy, dear, I've had a letter from Willie."

Miss Meredith waited a moment to enhance the effect of her words, then went on hastily:

"His wife is dead—she has been dead some years—and he wants to be friends with me again."

"Oh!" said Judy. "I am delighted, of course. It seems almost too good to be true. Still—I can't imagine the Red House without you, Merry."



With her power of flinging herself wholeheartedly into other people's interests Judy had forgotten her own troubles. She thought with a sudden pang of the schoolroom, emptied of Miss Meredith's quiet figure, sitting there year after year as she remembered it.

"Darling Merry," she said, with sharp repentance, because in her heart she was not glad, "of course I'm rejoiced, beyond words, at your happiness."

"That's just it, Judy," said Miss Meredith in lachrymose tones. "The question is, am I happy? And will you really be glad when I am gone?"

Her eyes filled and overflowed. Great tears began to race each other down her cheeks.

She wiped them off hastily, and looked at Judy with a watery and wavering smile.

"'It is only for a little while.'"—p. 382.

"I'm afraid, Judy," she said. "I couldn't tell anyone in the world but you. But think. It is—a great many years since I have seen Willie." Even at this moment of great emotion Miss Meredith would not refer particularly to her age. "My dear, he will have changed. He has been at sea all that time, and is now settled down in an Essex village. Seafaring men are very often loud-voiced and violent in their speech. He may be bald; he is sure to be red-faced; he may be—even fat!"

Judy would have laughed out only for the entreaty in the little spinster's swimming orbs.

"Oh, Merry," she said reproachfully, "is this the end of all your romance? Why, when I suggested things about him long ago—you remember?—you always said that he was Willie, and that was enough."

"I thought so at the time, but now—I have grown used to the Red House. It is my real home—such a home as I thought I never should have. That heavenly angel, your mother—what a privilege it has been to live in the house with her! And no girls could be sweeter than you and your sisters. And Mr. Evelyn—I'm sure you'd hardly know there was a gentleman in the house. I'm sure Willie smokes the strongest of tobacco. Think of living in a house continually scented with the strongest tobacco!"

"Don't think of it," said Judy, seeing the scared look in her eyes.

"I couldn't bear to have a man untidy about the house. I always keep my things so beautifully. Even your papa is not tidy, Judy. They say, of course, that sailors are very tidy. Still, Willie's wife has been dead some years, and he speaks of a little girl. It is the little girl who makes me feel that perhaps I ought to go, that perhaps it's my duty I'm shrinking from."

"You couldn't marry for duty," said Judy, with conviction.

"You think so, dear? You don't think it would be right?"

Miss Meredith's lips were parted in eagerness as she looked to Judy for light and leading.

"I am sure it would not be. And to marry from a sense of duty would not be the best way to be a dutiful wife. I don't see why you're so bent on breaking your heart."

"What a wise child you are, Judy! But if I broke poor Willie's? Supposing I go my own selfish way now and refuse him. Oh, how happy I was yesterday before that letter came! I shall probably suffer afterwards. thinking of poor Willie and that neglected little girl. Of course, I have never been much with young children. Still, I couldn't be as helpless as a man, could I?"

"I'll tell you what, Merry. You must not decide before you have seen Willie. I don't want regrets to come afterwards."

Miss Meredith clapped her two hands to her face.

"Oh Judy, what are you thinking about? And the servants, and the village, and your papa, and your sisters, and all! Oh, I couldn't see him, I couldn't, indeed."

The end of the sentence was like a succession of sobs.

"We shan't have him here, Merry," said Judy consolingly; "but you must see him. Supposing you come to London with me to-morrow. It will save papa's leaving the grouse. The Duchess will give you a bedroom for a few days, and we will go down to Essex and see Willie quietly; no one will know."

Miss Meredith was startled at first, then saw that the suggestion had advantages, and finally acceded.

Later Judy went to her mother to consult her about the new arrangement. Miss Meredith had urgent private business. She would escort Judy to Bethlehem House, and stay a few days.

Yes, Mrs. Evelyn thought it would be a good plan. Papa had really no business in town, except to escort Judy; and town was empty. Most of the clubs were closed, and it would be uncheerful for him.

So it was arranged, and Judy went back to Miss Meredith to help her through her small packing.

"It will be a dreadful ordeal to see Willie again," Miss Meredith said. "And I couldn't do it without you, Judy. And I couldn't have trusted anyone else. You won't laugh at poor Willie, even if he is bald-headed and red-faced and fat? I remember the time when he was so handsome."

"I daresay we shall find him quite handsome, but not handsome enough for you," said Judy, kissing her. "No, Merry, the Red House can never give you up, unless to—the Manor House, perhaps. If you were inclined to take Willie we should have to adopt strong measures."

"Yet you said you were glad," said Miss Meredith reproachfully, "and it almost broke my heart."

[END OF CHAPTER FOURTEEN.]

THE MAKERS OF MODERN CHRISTIANITY.

BASIL: THE ORGANISER.

In Two Parts. Part the First.

By the Very Rev. H. Donald M. Spence, D.D., Dean of Gloucester.

BASIL OF CÆSAREA AND GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS.

A WONDERFUL charm rests on the story of the life and work of Basil and Gregory. In the long and stately gallery of pictures of Christian worthies, in that special division of great ones who belong to the fourth—that golden century of Christian endeavour—Basil and Gregory occupy a very prominent position. No greater organiser has ever helped to guide the fortunes of the Church than Basil, no more profound theologian than Gregory has ever enriched the Church with truer, more clear-cut teaching. They were both orators and preachers of the first rank; and Gregory, besides, was a poet of no mean order. But the wonderful charm to which we have alluded was the unbroken, almost romantic, friendship which united these two eminent thought-leaders. A friendship that was only interrupted—and then only, we can but think, for a little while—by death.

Basil was born some five years after the Council of Nicæa, and Gregory perhaps a little earlier. Both of them belonged to wealthy Christian families, and in the case of Basil the riches of his house were very considerable. The mother and sisters of Basil became celebrated, even in that age of striking examples, for their devotion and piety. The father of Gregory was Bishop of Nazianzus, a small Cappadocian city chiefly famous for its connection with the great writer and theologian, some pages of whose story we are about to put together.

Gregory and Basil were first thrown together in their early youth at Cæsarea. Even then the two were distinguished for their marked ability. From Cæsarea Basil proceeded to Constantinople, where he studied for some time with the distinguished Pagan rhetorician Libanius. Gregory we hear of at the other Cæsarea in Palestine, a well-known centre of learning. The two friends eventually met again at Athens, the University, so to speak, of the Roman world of the fourth century.

It was at Athens where the old friendship was cemented. Amidst the crowd of students in the great university of the world, the two Cappadocian scholars were famous for their proficiency in all the classical lore which men prized in that last age of the Empire perhaps more highly than in any other. They were, too, well known for their singular and devoted attachment to each other; more than brothers, they were inseparable alike in their hours of work and rest. In Athens they were thrown often in the company of Julian, the near relation of the despotic Emperor Constantius, whose jealous, fickle fancy summoned the young Julian from the classical studies he loved so well, to a share in that dangerous royalty which led so often to disgrace and death, as it had done in the case of Julian's elder brother. But Julian never forgot his brilliant student friends of Athens; and later, when he had attained supreme power, summoned, but summoned in vain, the all-accomplished Basil to his side.

The two devoted friends were, however, parted for a time, Gregory remaining at Athens alone, where he was soon considered the foremost in the crowd of students in that famous home of learning; and for some time it is probable that he publicly lectured. Basil returned to Cæsarea, and for a while practised as a lawyer with conspicuous success; but a change passed over him. It is probable that the religious influence of his mother and sisters determined him to throw up his brilliant prospects of success in civil life, in which for a time he took deep interest, being evidently proud of his position and of the high estimation in which he was universally held. For some two years he gave himself up to visiting the cells of the more famous ascetics in Egypt, Palestine, and Syria, and in making himself acquainted with the secrets of their strange lives of renunciation and passionate devotion. Then returning to his native province, he gave up most of his ample fortune, and retired to a remote and solitary little estate in Pontus, in the neighbourhood of the Euxine, which he still retained, and there, part of the time in company with his friend Gregory, put in practice the lessons he had learned in the cells of the ascetics of Egypt and Syria; but while living the sternest life of self-denial and austerity, still pursued his studies with ardour and zeal, thus hammering out in his own person his elaborate system of austerity and rigid self-denial, united with unremitting work and tireless industry, a rule of life which he subsequently embodied for the main part in his famous "Directions for the Monastic Life."

Very rigid was his life at this period. He had but one outer and inner garment; he slept in a hair shirt, but he allowed himself only a scant period for sleep; he only drank water, and his food consisted of dry bread and herbs; his bed was the ground. But all this austerity ruined his health, never very strong; he became emaciated; the seeds of the grave and wearing sickness which in a few years afflicted his life, were then sown. Gregory, his dear friend, describes him as "without wife, without means, without flesh, well-nigh without blood." No doubt in later years the consciousness that his bodily sufferings had been occasioned in great measure by these unnatural austerities induced him to assert, when he made labour, either of hand or brain, the corner-stone of the life to be led by the true monastic, "that if fasting hinders you from labour, it is better to eat like the workman of Christ that you are." Nor did he, in his monastic code, allow any vigils and fastings to be undertaken by the monks besides those enjoined by 'the rule' of their house. His rapidly growing reputation for learning and sanctity brought great numbers to him in his retreat in Pontus, and many monasteries under his influence and government were founded in his native province of Cappadocia and the surrounding provinces. His great enduring and far-reaching work in the reformation and re-creation of the monastic system we shall speak of again presently.

Now, Christianity, especially in the Eastern Empire, all through the career of Basil was gravely suffering from the insidious inroads of Arianism. Its very existence was threatened. It was a new religion altogether which the Arian teachers preached. For the old aims and hopes of the Gospel story new ideals, purely of man's device, were substituted; to the leaders of the deadly heresy "the preaching of the Cross" was indeed foolishness, and the divine redemptive work of Jesus, the Son of God, was practically ignored by the refusal of these leaders to acknowledge the Godhead of the Redeemer. Sadly enough, the Imperial Government and the Court, for various reasons of a purely worldly nature, were on the side of heresy. Few dioceses but were more or less infected with the glamour of this false and fatal teaching. Among the orthodox teachers in these years of perplexity and grave danger there were none of higher repute than the two friends, Basil and Gregory, the reputation of whose great learning and splendid eloquence was spread abroad far beyond Cappadocia and the neighbouring provinces of Asia Minor.

As a preacher, in his day, Basil was simply unrivalled. It is not too much to say that he was the first really great Christian orator, the first of that long historic line of Christian teachers who from their pulpits for some 1,500 years have stirred men up to love Christ better than their own lives, who by the recital of the simple story of the Cross have made men and women's hearts all aflame to do and to suffer just for His sake who died for them. Only some thirty years had elapsed since Rome had publicly allowed the peoples of the Empire to be Christian; and the one great teacher in the Eastern Empire who had arisen since public preaching in the Name had been formally sanctioned—Athanasius of Alexandria—was rather the profound theologian, the cold and perfect logician, the setter-forth of divine truth in clear-cut, accurate language, than the fervid, eloquent and impassioned preacher. Athanasius had ever spoken to the head rather than to the heart. But Basil was different. His style, it is true, was polished and ornate, enriched with innumerable memories of classical learning, as well as of the writings of the earliest, purest Christian doctors of the faith; but the language, though ornate, was studiedly simple and clear; it went home to the hearts of all sorts and conditions of men; it touched all alike. The sermons of the great preacher of Cæsarea were often based upon the incidents of the day and time. Nothing was too insignificant; nothing, on the other hand, was too sublime for him to dwell on in his marvellous pulpit utterances; the common people heard him as gladly as did the trained and polished rhetoricians of the city. Especially was he the preacher of suffering and sorrow. No one like Basil has ever moved men to open their hearts and purses to relieve misery and want. The vast and noble foundations for the relief of sickness, for the solace of the poor and miserable, the widow and the orphan, the stranger and the forlorn, which were the glory of his Cæsarea, are the enduring monuments of the results of his marvellous oratory. Basil was the real founder of those noble, and at the same time novel, foundations which are among the glories of Christianity—not the least striking and beautiful of the results of the preaching of the gospel of Jesus Christ.*

Basil was too eminent to be left long in the seclusion he loved so well, and was summoned from his Pontus monastery to take part in the discussions which followed the the acceptance by so many distinguished Churchmen of the semi-Arian creed of Rimini, which the policy of the Emperor Valens wished to enforce upon the Eastern Church, but to which false, specious symbol the orthodox Basil was bitterly hostile. For some time he occupied himself in public Church matters; in the election of Eusebius as Archbishop of Cæsarea he was actively concerned, and for a considerable period exercised great influence in the vast Cæsarean diocese; and so widespread and general was his power that he excited the jealousy of the Archbishop Eusebius of Cæsarea. The popularity of Basil in the city and provinces was great, and many would have even saluted him as Bishop in place of Eusebius. To avoid even the appearance of favouring a schism in the Church, Basil again retired to his solitude in Pontus.

The great scholar-preacher's life was ever a harassed one. He had lately incurred the intense hate of his old fellow-student, the Emperor Julian, whose advances he had spurned, and whose vengeance was only delayed by his absence on the Persian campaign; but Julian never returned from the fatal expedition. Basil was once more recalled to public life when the policy of the Arian Emperor Valens—who after the brief reign of Jovian succeeded Julian, slain in Persia—threatened the very existence of the Catholic Church in Cæsarea. Through the mediation of Gregory, Basil was reconciled to Eusebius the Bishop. Once more the scholar and statesman whose life story we are rapidly sketching, organised the orthodox party of his great province, and enabled them successfully to resist the Arian innovators, backed by all the power and influence of the Emperor Valens and his government. In the year 370 Archbishop Eusebius died, in close and intimate friendship now with Basil, whose wisdom and learning he had at last come to appreciate. Then, as might have been expected, Basil was elected by the popular voice to the vacant arch-see, and for some nine years presided over the church of the great Cappadocian diocese. But his power and influence extended far beyond the limits of the province.

But the sorely harassed life of this most eminent chief of the Church, after his elevation to the archbishopric, where the chief care of so many churches was imposed upon him, grew still more difficult. Sad disorders among the clergy of his province had crept in, although so short a period had elapsed since the Peace of the Church had been proclaimed. These Basil repressed with a strong, though loving, hand, but the work of reformation won the reformer many enemies.

With these internal reforms were the liturgical labours of Basil closely connected. He had long been convinced of the necessity of a formal liturgy that could be generally used, instead of the varying and varied uses of different churches, and had given much thought and pains to that most important department of Church order and discipline. The great liturgy which for ages has been used in the Eastern Church, and which bears his honoured name, no doubt has been largely altered, but probably in its main features is the work of Basil.

During the nine years of his work-filled episcopate, he toiled at all these things with a restless energy—alas! ever bearing about a dying body, constantly racked with sickness and pain, preaching his wonderful sermons, charming his audience with ever new and fresh imagery, as he told them the great truths of the Christian faith with a living power few like him have ever done, writing, in the intervals of his public work, in the hours when pain and sickness allowed him, deep and powerful treatises on grave points of theology—writings that have been, ever since the day when he fell asleep, estimated by Eastern and Western Christendom as "classics," absolutely inimitable in their force and power. Alas! that "falling asleep" for the Church was all too soon. Worn out with labour, sorrow, care and sickness, the great scholar-saint passed to his rest in the year 379, before he had reached his fiftieth year.

* It was in the second half of the fourth century that the idea of a "Hospital" for the sick was first conceived and carried out. Rome and Cæsarea (in Cappadocia) were the first places apparently where these Christ-like conceptions took root. But the great Cæsarean group of buildings erected under the influence and, indeed, at the suggestion of Basil, were probably somewhat earlier than the Roman hospitals, and certainly were on a more grandiose scale by far than the foundations at Rome and Ostia, which were the work of Fabiola and Marcella, noble Roman ladies who were disciples of Jerome. The charitable foundations of Basil at Cæsarea, apparently, were a number of buildings of great size and importance, grouped round a church, and formed, indeed, a considerable quarter of the city, and even excited the jealousy of the Roman magistrates.

BASIL PREACHING.

(From a Drawing by W. H. Margetson.)

PARSON TREVAIL'S SALVAGE.

A Complete Story by Maurice Gerard.

THE "Dog's Teeth" had been hungry for weeks. They are a series of sharp-pointed, serrated rocks in the English Channel, about a mile from the mainland. They have been islands of death to thousands of sailors and fishermen, not to mention other folk. Great liners, storm-driven, or drawn by some mysterious magnetic current, have flung themselves on the terrible teeth and become a total wreck within the hour. Smaller craft of every description have added to the tale of victims, year in year out, for centuries. Yet the Dog's Teeth still demand their pounds of flesh, human flesh—and get them.

But that season of which I am writing had been a wonderfully mild one; wrecks were few and far between. Now it was a week off Christmas.

The wind had risen to the fury of a gale from the north-west. A dirty sea was the floor to the roof of a gloomy sky. The Calsand lifeboat had been got ready for action; it had not been used for nine months.

Calsand village was right opposite the Dog's Teeth. Many were the gallant deeds which had been done by the lifeboat's crew. The small village, sheltering in the neck of land between almost abutting cliffs, had supped its full of horrors times out of number.

The pride of Calsand was its lifeboat. The soul of the lifeboat was the Vicar, Parson John Trevail. This is no imaginary picture, for Trevail is a country hero known far and wide beyond the long straggling seaboard parish over which he rules with a benevolent despotism, compounded of love and fear.

Trevail was a strong man mentally and physically. He had stroked the Cambridge boat in the 'seventies; and ever since he had come to live at Calsand, where he was admittedly the right man in the right place, he had been captain of the lifeboat.

The parson was a rich man and a bachelor. He lived in frugal simplicity at the great barrack of a vicarage, which would require a large family to fill it adequately.

The storm had risen to a height almost unequalled even in that region of tempests, after two days of preliminary lashing itself into fury.

The short afternoon was waning when a low murmur arose from the crowd, which lined the shore, looking for what was sure to come.

Sheltered comparatively as was the beach, standing upon it was by no means easy for strong men, and in the crowd were not a few women and children. A small passenger steamer, evidently quite out of hand, was drifting right on to the Dog's Teeth. No signals of distress were hoisted, no rockets sent up, no gun fired. Sullenly, silently, the doomed vessel advanced to its inevitable destruction.

The gaunt form of Parson Trevail was in front on the shore. Behind him nearly all the seafaring men of the place were gathered in a loose knot.

The Vicar turned to them.

"It's not possible to get her out, sir?" a burly fisherman, one of the crew, bellowed interrogatively, pointing to the lifeboat.

"With God's help all things are possible," replied Trevail simply. "You don't go, Silvanus—you're a married man. I don't take any married men this trip; they would be too much missed." The Vicar turned to some younger men: "Who goes with me, lads?"

Fourteen or fifteen stepped forward. It is of this stuff unsung heroes are made. Trevail selected his crew with a gesture.

In five minutes a score of willing hands had run the great boat into the tossing, tumbling surf. The men leaped into her, headed by John Trevail, just as a great crash sounded through the air above the shrieking, whistling, booming of the gale. Yet there was no cry of human fear or pain. There is a silence which is more impressive than even a cry of agony. Many prayed audibly for the brave men about to peril their lives.

A titanic struggle followed. Inch by inch the lifeboat fought its way through the boiling surf, then through the giant waves beyond. Again and again it was driven back, almost to the beach from which it had started. Only John Trevail, of all the men along that coast, would have achieved the feat.

The Calsand boat was the only one for fifty miles which ventured out that December afternoon. Yet many another wreck cried aloud for aid besides the Belle France, which had just broken its back on the Dog's Teeth.

Parson Trevail never faltered, never hesitated. He seemed like one lifted out of himself, inspired. Now they were engulfed, looking up to the green foam-crested wave above them and apparently about to submerge crew and boat; now they were lifted high, and for a minute could see the wild waste of waters on which they alone were struggling for life. Through it all Trevail and his gallant supporters held on.

They were rewarded, for the Dog's Teeth were reached. Broken amidships, one half of the Belle France had disappeared; but the rock fangs held the fore part in firm grip. Was anything living on the dismembered moiety of the vessel? If there was, could he, she, or they be saved? These were the questions which had to be answered.

As they topped a wave eager eyes scanned the derelict vessel.

There was no movement, no sign of life. Stay! Lashed to the steps of the bridge there seemed to be the form of a woman, the fluttering of a dress.

The crew were just keeping a headway on the boat, not trying to advance nearer; for to do so meant only another victim for those insatiable teeth. Had there been anyone on board to fasten it, a rocket with string attachment would have been shot over the bows of what remained of the Belle France. Then a rope could have been drawn on board This was now out of the question. There only remained the alternative for one of the crew to swim to the vessel. It was an alternative which in that sea, and with the countless jagged edges of rock under as well as above the water, might well daunt the stoutest heart.

It did not daunt John Trevail. Clad in jersey and trousers only, he slid into the sea and struck out manfully, the lean, herculean frame breasting the waves, the single-hearted courage of the man giving him nerve for the task, and the fear of God in his mind. The men in the boat held her as steady as they could, but they shipped sea after sea, and more than once the boat grated on a rock.

Parson Trevail, cut and bleeding from a blow on his forehead, the scar of which he would carry to the grave, reached the side of the Belle France, and after two or three failures clambered up on to the sloping deck. A cheer greeted him from the boat, when they saw that the first part of his undertaking was accomplished.

Their eyes had not been deceived. A woman was lashed to the ladder of the bridge. The fracture of the Belle France was just behind her. A yard further back, and nothing could have saved her. Nay! Was she saved even now? Her head was hanging down; her drenched clothes wrapped her like a shroud, showing the slim, graceful form. But there was no sign that she still lived.

On his hands and knees over the slippery inclined plane of the deck, Parson Trevail crept to that solitary figure. Death had claimed all the rest of the passengers and crew. The cabins below were submerged. Here was the one chance of the salvage of a life, the one possible reward of the brave deed of Trevail and his crew. It was a slender one.

John was near enough now to clasp the girl by the knees and so hoist himself up. A wave rose high and flung a column of water over them. But the Parson had seized the woodwork with both hands and so held on. When it passed, John put a flask to the girl's blue lips and, holding back her head, forced her to swallow a little of the cordial—then a little more. She sighed and partly opened her eyes. As her head rested on his arm something stirred in Trevail, he hardly knew what it was. On that deck, beneath the storm-swept sky, was a girl of rare and delicate beauty; and John's rough, honest heart had found it out.

There was no time to lose. He had brought the end of a cord with him, which he attached to the bulwark of the steamer, the other end being fastened to the lifeboat. Clasping his prize under his left arm, he dropped into the sea, and so fought his way back with his burden, resting with the support of the rope every now and then when his strength failed him.

At last they were both hauled on board the lifeboat, and the return journey began. The storm was abating a little, and the tide set towards the shore.

Trevail took up his burden gently in his strong arms when the boat was beached, and bore it through the crowd of cheering people to the vicarage.

"Is she alive, Parson?" more than one asked.

"Yes," he answered laconically, through set teeth.

The housekeeper took her from Trevail, and carried her, still unconscious, up to bed:

Then the doctor, who had been close at hand, went into the chamber, and closed the door.

John paced the hall of the vicarage and wondered—wondered what stirred in him, wondered why he felt something he had never felt before.

"Will she get over it?"

"I don't know—concussion of the brain," was the doctor's verdict.

In the days that followed John Trevail had to wait. It is the hardest thing man has to do. There was sickness in the village. He ministered to it, as he had always done, but now with an added tenderness. His heavy tread on the stairs was a message of joy and hope to the sufferer, for in John's face was written the expression of a great sympathy. The village had feared the massive, cast-iron man; now they learnt the truth that "perfect love casteth out fear."

At the end of every round, and after more than one expedition with the lifeboat, he returned to the vicarage with the question burning on his lips, "How is she?" And the answer varied, as the patient rallied and sank, sank and rallied again, like the waves of the sea which had nearly been her doom.

John grew haggard, his face was worn under the suspense. His housekeeper wondered. The doctor shrewdly guessed. Trevail alone knew that the face with the half-closed eyes, the form he had borne through the resisting sea, had crept into his heart, there to abide.

At the end of six weeks Sophie Vaillot, white and wan, but convalescent, came downstairs.

"Trevail bore his burden through the crowd of cheering people."—p. 391.

John was there at the foot. She made a little moue. "I have to thank you, Monsieur Trevail—for my life. It is all I have left—the rest is gone—down in that dreadful sea." She covered her eyes with her thin, wasted fingers. After a minute or two, she withdrew her hands and placed one of them in John's. "I do thank you—I owe you everything—and those other brave men—I shall never forget."

Trevail looked down at the little hand; then very gently he kissed it.

Neither of them ever quite knew when it was settled that what John had found, his salvage of the sea, was to be his—always.

THE ESSENTIALS OF NATIONAL GREATNESS

By the Rev. A. B. Boyd Carpenter, M.A., Honorary Chaplain to the King.

"So Israel rebelled against the house of David unto this day."—1 KINGS xii. 19

THE advocates of corporal punishment have been wont to base its necessity on the authority of Solomon's opinion. His words about sparing the rod and spoiling the child have been repeated again and again; and it has been taken for granted that the question had been finally settled by the declaration of one who has been regarded as the wisest of men.

But every theory must stand the test of experience, and must vindicate itself by the results which follow from its being put into practice. It is, therefore, interesting as well as wise to see how far this theory was successful in the case of Solomon's own household. Did the son who succeeded him on the throne give evidence as to the efficiency of that educational system which we may infer Solomon put into practice? The answer is certainly disappointing. For of all the men who ever sat upon a throne there was never one more foolish or mischievous than Rehoboam. His conduct was disastrous not only to himself, but to the nation at large. Under him the splendour and greatness which distinguished the reign of Solomon came to an untimely end. Solomon's own son—the specimen of Solomon's own training, the son of the father of many proverbs—was the very man who was instrumental in rending the kingdom, and bringing about that tremendous breach between the northern and southern portions which was never healed.

We may well pause and ask, What is to be thought of this young man and his education when his first act on obtaining power is to undo what his father had been doing, and to split up the kingdom, the unity of which was at least one of the distinguishing features of the reign of Solomon?

But we shall be unjust to Rehoboam himself, and shall be politically shallow, if we imagine that the mere frivolity or obstinacy of a single young man could have brought about of itself such disastrous political results. We do not find rebellion or revolution taking place with such permanent results simply because some one young man, wanting in common sense and political sagacity, finds himself upon the throne. He may have been a factor, and he may have given an occasion, he may have been the spark applied to the powder; but there must have been other factors at work as well.

The rebellion which took place under Rehoboam had in reality two factors, and it was the union of these two which caused the final and fatal explosion. There was Rehoboam himself acting as the spark. But there were also the explosive elements, of which Jeroboam was the expression, and which had been in active progress before Rehoboam came to the throne. If, therefore, we are to understand the power for mischief which Rehoboam possessed, and if we are to understand the rebellion which took place under him, we must ask what had been working in the hearts and minds of the people during the time that Solomon himself was king. And we shall find that whatever blame may be laid at the door of Rehoboam, he cannot be held wholly responsible, for that under the reign of Solomon the seeds of discontent had been fostered.

Thus in this crisis of the national life we have, on the one hand, the irritation of the people, and, on the other hand, the self-willed folly of the new king, and both of these may in large measure be traced to the mistaken policy pursued by Solomon himself.

Let us look back for a moment, and take a brief survey of the reign of Solomon.

It was the very period in which the kingdom of Israel, the kingdom of the united tribes, reached its greatest splendour. Under Saul the monarchy was at its commencement, and may be said to have been on its trial. But Saul never established himself firmly. It was only when David came to the throne that the monarchy was anything like consolidated under his strong hand, his wisdom, and his impetuous spirit. But it was after he had passed away that Solomon, inheriting the peace which David had accomplished by his wars, had the opportunity of developing the resources of the kingdom. Therefore it was under Solomon, the clever, subtle, wise Solomon, that the kingdom attained its greatness, not only in its unity, but in its peace and in its wealth. We see these great results springing from the action and reign of Solomon. In the first place, the territory was extended, and perhaps never did a king ruling in Jerusalem exercise sway over so large a tract of country as was the case under Solomon. We may say, therefore, that territorial possession was one feature of the monarchy under Solomon.

Peace was established in all the borders by the strong hand of Solomon. The nation enjoyed peace within itself. And this peace was a strong contrast with the wars carried on under David.

In addition, there was wealth, owing to the development of trade. Solomon had the mercantile instinct and tact, and he extended his commercial transactions north, south, east, and west. He made alliances with Tyre, and through Tyre he was enabled to get at the merchandise of the Grecian Isles. He established posts across the desert, he made openings for his commerce down the Red Sea. He entered into alliance with Egypt, and with Egypt he carried on a profitable trade. From the east and from the west, from the north and from the south, the produce of various countries poured into the central kingdom of Israel. From this commercial prosperity came great and amazing increase of wealth. This wealth was spent in lavish splendour. A Temple was reared that surpassed the dreams of David himself. A palace was raised for Solomon such as David had never enjoyed. Ornaments and ornamentation, all the luxury that wealth could accumulate, made Jerusalem a city glittering in splendour.

People might say, "Here is wealth—surely one of the signs of national greatness. Here is extended territory—surely this is one of the signs of greatness. Here is peace within and without our borders, all maintained by the strong hand and settled policy of Solomon—surely here, too, is another evidence of national greatness!"

And so there was greatness, and there was splendour, and there was power. But underneath all there were certain defects. This territory, this peace, this accumulation of wealth, did not represent the whole aspect of the case. Solomon himself was exercising a sway and a power that were new to the genius of the people over whom he reigned. He was giving signs that a change had taken place in the spirit of the monarchy as it had existed in the days of David. David was the ideal king who considered the wishes of his people. He differed from the Oriental monarchs by the sympathetic spirit he showed towards his subjects. But with the accession of Solomon there came monarchy of a more distinctly Oriental type—that despotic power that does not hesitate to remove from its pathway anyone who might be a rival. His own brother was removed out of his path. Joab was taken advantage of that he too might be removed. Even Shimei, who had been pardoned, was trapped with difficulties, and as an adversary to the house of David was got rid of. And all this was just that which had taken place time after time under Oriental monarchies, the reckless destruction, the putting out of the way by the king of those who might in any way constitute themselves rivals to his power. Nor were probable or possible rivals the only victims of this changed monarchy. The toilers were increased, the tasks were multiplied, the taxes grew heavier and heavier, until there was a burden of taxation and a burden of labour upon the people which created a spirit of discontent that was destined sooner or later to make itself felt.

Moreover, the alliance between Israel and Egypt introduced a new element into the kingdom. Not content with making commercial and political alliances with Egypt, Solomon made provision for the introduction of a religious worship that was antagonistic to that of Jehovah. By introducing that worship he did not merely bring in or permit a harmless thing that might exist under the shadow of the national religion, but an element which upon the moral side, as well as on the religious, was in opposition to the pure spirit of the worship of God. It was, therefore, an element which had a tendency to corrupt the religion of the people, and to eat out the heart of their virtue.

Such, then, was the condition of affairs under Solomon. There was a religion introduced side by side with the worship of Jehovah which threatened to demoralise the people; there was wealth in abundance, but it was lavished on king and court, and involved the overtaxing of the people; there was peace, but it was a peace that was preserved by the strong hand of an Oriental despot, and interfered with the just rights and liberties of the people.

Under these circumstances, can we wonder that the different elements of discontent took some definite shape and drew closer together in a common opposition? There were the religious feelings and sentiments which were shocked and alarmed, and the spirit of freedom that felt itself hurt and injured. And as there was Jeroboam coming forward to give expression to the political feelings of the people, rebelling against the tyranny and the hard burdens which they had to endure, so there was the prophet coming forward, as the representative of the spirit of pure religion, and not only uttering his protest, but declaring that the result of all this would be the ruin of the kingdom.

Thus the spirit of discontent was there, and was only waiting for the opportunity, which came at last. For when Solomon passed away and Rehoboam took his place, then came the opportunity for the people. Then came the time for their religious sentiment and their sense of freedom to assert themselves. What they had endured under the comparative greatness of Solomon they cannot and they will not submit to under Rehoboam. This was their opportunity, and they used it. They came to the king, as of old, to assert their rights. They asked for a reduction of the heavy burdens under which they had suffered, and that a more liberal policy should be pursued. Without these reforms there was but one alternative, and that was revolt. If they are to preserve their freedom, if they are to preserve their religion, then their just demands must be granted. Failing that, they will break loose from the house of David, and start a kingdom of their own. And when Rehoboam found himself face to face with this crisis, it was the test of his foresight and his wisdom. And when, with reckless folly and insolent pride, he not only roughly refused, but even threatened more despotic methods, he signed the death warrant of his power and his greatness, and called into existence the northern kingdom under the rule of Jeroboam.

Such was the defective side of Solomon's policy. It failed in three ways.

First, it forgot the recognition of pure religion, the worship of Jehovah, the worship of the one true God. It forgot that the strength of Israel was to be the servant of the Most High; that there could be no compromise between Him and the gods of other lands; that His religion was intended to be a great moral and spiritual force, working out righteousness in the people and the nation; that to tolerate any influence side by side with it, which had a tendency to corrupt the people, was not only a danger, but a treason—a treason against the people and against Jehovah. And therefore the religious instincts of the better spirits were arrayed against this invasion of their religious rights and duties, and they said, "If you as king cannot respect the religion of Israel, if you cannot remember that you are the servant and representative of God, do you suppose that we are to forget as well? That religion shall be voiced by others, if you refuse to voice it. What the king refuses to do, that will the people undertake."

That was one violation, the violation of the spirit of religion. But there was another. There was the neglect of freedom. In his policy the king seemed to care nothing for the freedom of his people. They were all like slaves, bondsmen, carrying out his policy. It made no matter if increased burdens were laid upon them. What did it matter, so long as the Temple reared itself in splendour? What did it matter, so long as Solomon lived in an ivory palace? What did it matter, so long as he could boast that silver was of no account in Israel? What did it matter if increased burdens and arduous tasks were put upon the people, and that increased taxes were wrung from the poorest, so long as Solomon could reckon his wives by hundreds and his attendants by thousands? But because the spirit of liberty was there, because it could not be crushed, because it and despotism are uncompromising foes, that spirit was destined to make itself felt in the tremendous protest which it uttered when Rehoboam came to the throne.

And there was lack of sympathy. What was it to the people that the king should be arrayed in all his splendour, if there seemed to be no sympathy from the throne of David for the poor, and the weary, and the heavily laden? Had they not rejoiced at his judgment when he first came to the throne and let the poor harlots bring their case before him for settlement? Was there not in it the assurance of an opportunity for the very poorest in the land to approach the king and find in him the embodiment of justice and a personification of sympathy? But in their heavy burdens, where had that sympathy gone? He seemed, in the accumulation of his wealth and in the carrying out of his Oriental policy, to have forgotten that sympathetic spirit which David was always ready to show to the people. And so the lack of the sympathetic spirit, the increasing distance between their simplicity and his splendour, had been alienating the people from their king.

Here are three things which brought about the discontent, and when it came to a head, and there appeared on the scene a man not inheriting the judgment of Solomon, but inheriting only his spirit of Oriental despotism, imagining that because he was called king that therefore he could do just as he liked, there met face to face the two factors which held between them the elements of uncompromising war. Inflated with despotic pride, the foolish, self-willed Rehoboam came into conflict with the reasonable demands of the people, and became the instrument for the breaking up of that national unity which his father seemed to have so thoroughly consolidated.

Such is the story. What is the lesson? We sometime imagine that national greatness is to be found in extent of territory; or sometimes speak as if it depended upon the success of commercial enterprise and the profitable development of trade; or, again, we measure it by the contrivances and luxuries which go to adorn and improve the conditions of life. These are great and good if only there is a noble spirit in the people. But if there be no such spirit to use these things aright, then, with nations as with individuals, these may become curses instead of blessings. The voice of experience, the voice of the Scriptures, the voice of Christianity, are continually telling us that the greatness of a nation is not in its wealth, its territory, or its splendour, but in the spirit which is animating the people.

And would we know what that spirit is? It is this threefold spirit, lacking in the policy of Solomon. It is the spirit of freedom, where people are allowed to develop their powers, and to voice the laws which they are to obey. It is the spirit of religion, going into the hearts and souls of the people, uplifting them, inspiring them, ennobling them, as the spirit of religion only can do, and which is the greatest power which God puts into men for the counteracting of corrupting influences. It is the spirit of sympathy from the throne down to the poorest in the land; that spirit between class and class, section and section, individual and individual, which is the great cohesive power of a nation. These are the three things which go to make up national greatness. Would you be great? It is not in the property you possess; it is not in the power which you may wield over your fellow men. It is only in the spirit which is lodged in your soul. Do you ask what that spirit is? It is the spirit of religion; it is the spirit of full independence; it is the spirit of sympathy, bringing all the members of a nation in harmony and mutual help. This is the highest of all spirits, for it is the threefold spirit of which Christ Himself was the embodiment in the profound sacredness of His soul, in the freedom of His life, and the sympathy which He showed with all sorts and conditions of men. This spirit He would have embodied in His Church, and this must be the spirit in each one who would live the life of Christ. The Kingdom of God is not outside; it is within. And only shall we learn the greatness of our humanity, the value of our work, and the nobility of the hope which God gives to us as we realise within us the dominating power of that spirit of Christ, which is the spirit of liberty, of purity, and of sympathetic love.

"Saviour, while my Heart is Tender."

Words by J. BURTON. Music by MYLES B. FOSTER.

2. Send me, Lord, where Thou wilt send me,
Only do Thou guide my way;
May Thy grace through life attend me,
Gladly then shall I obey.
Let me do Thy will, or bear it—
I would know no will but Thine;
Shouldst Thou take my life, or spare it,
I that life to Thee resign.

3. May this solemn consecration
Never once forgotten be;
Let it know no revocation—
Registered, confirmed by Thee.
Thine I am, O Lord, for ever
To Thy service set apart!
Suffer me to leave Thee never;
Seal Thine image on my heart. Amen.

BECAUSE OF THE BABY.

By L. G. Moberly.

THEIR neighbours considered them—and rightly—to be a most forbidding couple.

"Regular old curmudgeons, that's what they are!" was the verdict of their fellows.

In their own parlance, they "kept themselves to themselves," which meant that they possessed no neighbourly qualities of any description whatsoever, and that they rigidly held aloof from everybody in the vicinity.

They lived in a very small white house, which had in front of it an attempt at a garden. Nothing to speak of grew in that garden, excepting one stumpy and emaciated lilac bush which did not flourish, and an elder tree that contrived to exist and even to do fairly well despite the London atmosphere.

Once, at some remote period, grass had grown on either side of the flagged path; nothing grew there now unless Mr. Denham occasionally put in some cabbage seed. The crop was neither plentiful nor large, and when there were no cabbages there was nothing.

Josh Denham worked in a big warehouse in the City; his wife kept herself to herself at home. They occupied the two downstairs rooms of the house. The top they let to lodgers, with whom the Denhams held no communication whatever except on rent days. They collected their rents with punctuality. They were well hated by their tenants for their hardness.

"Mean old skinflints," was the opprobrious epithet bestowed upon them, and certain it is that their rooms would always have remained unoccupied had it not been for the increasing difficulty of finding houseroom anywhere.

As for children in the house, Mr. and Mrs. Denham strove persistently to keep them out, and anyone with a family who applied for a room was curtly refused.

Two babies, however, had had the audacity to be born in the establishment, and Mr. Denham, with many grumbles, declared that it was better to keep the rooms let, babies and all, than to run the chance of having no lodgers in the winter. But those babies were subdued to the furthest limit to which it is possible to subdue a baby.

They were rarely allowed to cry; and if, as they grew older, they dared to uplift a voice upon the stairs, the Denhams coldly informed their parents that they would receive notice to quit unless the children were kept under control.

The children themselves came to regard the old couple as nothing short of ogres of a fearsome kind; and crept past their door, poor little mortals, in daily terror of their lives.

Rumour had it that in some far remote period the Denhams had had a child of their own; but it was in a prehistoric time, before they took up their abode in Lime Row; and now they were regarded as hopelessly dour and hard, especially to little children.

Mr. Denham viewed life altogether from a depressing standpoint, and although his own wages were good, and a pension assured to him, though he belonged to a reliable club and had no bodily ailments, his soul was pessimistic. He looked upon his fellow creatures as mainly composed of fools and knaves, he saw nothing good under the sun, and considered the world in general as depraved and evil.

Not that he made the slightest attempt to set things right or to help on mankind towards improvement. Nobody, ever in their wildest dreams, thought of coming to Josh Denham for help, however palpable their troubles.

Once upon a time some of his poorer neighbours had appealed to him in a difficulty; but they had appealed in vain. He merely told them coldly that "them as saved in good times had summat to do with in bad," which was cold comfort to a man laid up through an accident, and with a wife and six children dependent on him.

"Oughter be ashamed o' 'erself askin' for help," Mrs. Denham affirmed of another neighbour, who had once come to her in great trouble. "Widder indeed! Well, she ain't the first widder in the world. She'll 'ave to work like the rest, and save like the rest."

It will be seen that the Denhams had not laid themselves out to court popularity; indeed, they were the best hated people in Lime Row, and the inhabitants of that district tacitly avoided the old couple with their sour visages and disagreeable ways.

On one cold March afternoon, towards six o'clock, Josh Denham arrived as his own gate, feeling, as he would have put it, "a bit nippy." Perhaps the keen wind had affected his liver, perhaps someone in the warehouse had ruffled his never very smooth temper; in any case, Josh was distinctly cross. He flung open the iron gate of his garden, and flung it to again loudly and imperiously, then began to tramp up the flagged path, when the low cry of a child struck on his ear.

"Now, if I've a' said it once, I've a' said it forty thousand times; I won't 'ave no children playin' about in this 'ere garden," he said, peering about in the semi-twilight to discover the intruder. "Come out o' that," he said harshly, gazing at the stumpy lilac bush whose leaves were beginning to show faint green. But nobody came out, and there was no response, save, once again, a low wailing cry.

"Well, if you ain't a-comin' out, you can jolly well stay where you are till I gets my big stick to yer, that's all," Josh exclaimed roughly, tramping on to the house and seizing a stick from inside the kitchen door.

"A brat in the garden!" he said succinctly to his wife, and marched down the flagged path again.

When he reached the gate the lamplighter had just lighted the lamp outside, and stooping down, stick in hand, to prod at the intruding child, Josh saw a tiny bundle under the lilac bush, so tiny that he drew back the stick and put his hand down instead. That wailing cry greeted his touch, and with a hasty ejaculation he pulled the bundle from under the bush.

Wails of a more vociferous nature proceeded from within the folds of what appeared to be an old shawl; and Josh Denham, holding the bundle gingerly as though it were some kind of reptile, walked with it into his kitchen.

"Lor', Josh," his wife exclaimed, "whatever 'ave yer got there? A nasty bit of a old rag shawl? Good Lord!" she screamed, as a fist issued from the depths of the bundle, "why, if it ain't a baby! Good gracious, Josh, are yer gone clean off yer 'ead?"

Her husband's grim face relaxed not a muscle. He laid the bundle upon his armchair, and unfastened the shawl.

"You 'old yer jaw," he said to his wife, "we've got ter see 'oo the kid belongs to. I ain't going to 'ave no bloomin' kids left about my garden. This 'ere kid 'ull soon be took to its parents, with a few remarks from me. An 'oax, that's what it is—a narsty sort of an 'oax; but Josh Denham ain't one to put up with no 'oaxes."

The shawl fell back under Denham's awkward fingers, and lying upon it was a baby, who might have been a year old, dressed in a little white nightgown from which her bare feet peeped like pink rosebuds.

Her blue eyes, dim with tears, looked appealingly into the stern face above her; she stretched out her dimpled arms, and gurgled loudly, "Dad, dad, dad!" Then a bewitching smile flashed over her face, and a tiny hand clawed at Josh Denham's that lay still upon the shawl.

He looked down at her blankly, whilst his wife stood beside the chair, eyeing the child with undisguised amazement.

"Well, I never!" she said at last. "Look at 'er face, and 'er clean little clothes and all. My goodness, 'oo ever can 'a done it?"

The baby's blue eyes turned from Denham to his wife, and the flashing smile broke forth again.

"Dad, dad," she gurgled. It appeared to be a generic word she applied indifferently to either sex.

But apparently Mrs. Denham did not please the small stranger so much as Denham had done; her eyes went back to him, and her little arms were stretched out to him again, with an imperious gesture which said plainly, "Take me up," and Denham, glancing shamefacedly at his wife, and nervously at the door, stooped and took the child awkwardly into his arms. He held her much as he might have held a young rabbit, but she was evidently entirely satisfied. She even tried to nestle against his shoulder, and reiterated happily, "Dad, dad, dad!" with a comfortable cooing laugh.

"Seems sort o' friendly, don't she?" Josh said, looking at his wife, with a fatuous grin. "Seems to a' took a fancy to me. Not as I mean to 'ave no brats left lyin' about in my garden," he added hastily; "we'll 'ave a look around to-morrer to see 'oo've done it"

"To-morrer?" his wife asked. "Why, whatever are you a' goin' to do with the kid to-night?"

"Well, she might stop in 'ere just fer to-night," he said dubiously. "I can't go worritin' round now. She can lay 'ere wrapped up in 'er old bit o' shawl. She ain't a troublesome kind o' child," he added, looking anxiously at his wife, whilst a soft hand stole up and stroked his bristly chin.

Mrs. Denham stared at him as if she thought he had suddenly gone mad.

"Well, it don't matter to me what yer do with the thing," she said tartly; "you've brought it in, and you can mind it."

"Oh, I'll mind it," he replied, roused by opposition into obstinacy. "It ain't more trouble to mind a infant for one night than to mind a puppy," and Denham subsided into the armchair, the child still in his arms.

She lay there contentedly enough till he had had his supper; then she all at once puckered up her face, and began to cry.

"Now, whatever makes 'er do that?" Josh asked, alarm depicted in every line of his face. "I ain't hurtin' of 'er, as I'm aware."

"'Urtin' of 'er? No, yer silly old fool; she's 'ungry, a' course."

"Well, we've got to feed 'er, then." The voice of Josh Denham was almost genial. "I knows 'ow to feed a young pup; I'll be bound it ain't very different how yer feeds a baby. Give us a drop o' milk, Liz, and some warm water to it, and a spoon."

Mrs. Denham snorted, but being accustomed to do her husband's bidding promptly, she fetched the milk and put it beside him.

Then Josh propped the baby upon his knee, and proceeded to pour milk out of a spoon down its throat. His methods were rough and ready, and the baby choked more frequently than could have been quite pleasant for it, but the milk went to its destination, and Denham's face shone with satisfaction when he had thrust as much upon the child as he thought necessary.

Perhaps the tiny fingers that twined themselves round one of his big ones pulled at some chord in his heart which had not vibrated for years; certainly the expression of his face was less grim than usual.

His wife looked on with some scorn when, later in the evening, the child having fallen asleep, he wrapped it up carefully and laid it in a corner of the old sofa by the fire.

"She'll keep warm there," he said, "and to-morrer I'll go and look up them fools as thought to 'oax Josh Denham."

But when to-morrow came, although he took a day from his work and spent hours in inquiries and searchings, he could find no smallest trace of the baby's belongings; where she came from, who had put her into Denham's garden, who she could possibly be—all these remained a mystery, and Josh came home in the evening as wise as he had gone out.

His wife, when he left her, grumbled terribly at the bare idea of having the child to tend throughout the day, and Josh entered the house full of unpleasant forebodings as to the greeting he would receive.

As he was about to open the door, a sound fell upon his ear which made him pause on the threshold. It was the sound of a faint crooning, which resolved itself into words.

To Josh's supreme amazement, his wife—his wife who, like himself, loathed and abominated children—was singing a lullaby to the nameless babe.

He peeped cautiously through the chink. Yes, there, sure enough, sat Mrs. Denham, in the armchair by the fire, the baby in her arms, the child's yellow curls against her shoulder; and she was crooning to it some old song of days long gone by!

Josh listened open-mouthed till the song was ended, then he stole in gently. The baby lay asleep, and Mrs. Denham looked up at her husband with a strangely softened look on her hard old face.

"Funny," she said, "'ow I've a' bin' thinkin' o' poor little Bessie all day."

Bessie was their child who had died such years and years ago that they had forgotten to love children for her sake.

"She do seem to make yer think o' the little un, don't she?" Denham replied, lowering his voice to a whisper and drawing a chair gingerly towards the fire. He sat down and looked meditatively at the soft baby face pillowed upon his wife's breast. The little sleeper's peaceful breathing was the only sound for a few moments, then Josh said, with considerable hesitation:

"I ain't bin able to find nothin' out about the—the kid, an' 'oo it was played sich an 'oax on us. The bobby what I talked ter, 'e says there ain't nothin' fer it but to send the kid to the 'Ouse, she bein' a foundlin', as yer might say."

He looked at his wife, and rubbed his bristly chin thoughtfully and silently. His wife's eyes were riveted upon the baby's face. One of its hands was in hers; the other lay against her neck, its warm touch sending queer little unaccustomed thrills about her heart.

"Send 'er to the 'Ouse?" she said slowly at last. "Well, I ain't one for children—I never was, but——"

"Nor more ain't I," Josh put in hastily. "I ain't no likin' for brats, can't abide 'em, in fact; but this 'ere kid——"

"'Seems to a' took a fancy to me.'"—p. 399.

He also broke off short, and looked again at his wife, a curious appeal in his eyes.

"She've a takin' sort of a way with 'er," Mrs. Denham said, and her free hand touched one of the yellow curls; "and you might say a remarkable nice child—for a child," she hurried to add.

"I ain't one as wishes to encourage folks to leave their kids under other folks' lilac bushes neither," Mr. Denham went on, "but this 'ere infant 'ave made itself very much at 'ome, in a manner o' speakin', and it don't seem a altogether pertickler nice kind o' thing ter—ter"—he looked anxiously at Mrs. Denham, with an evident desire that she should finish his sentence!

"Ter put 'er out agin, you was goin' to say, Denham? Well, that's the way I looks at it likewise. Not bein' one as takes quick to children, I've took to this 'ere child, an' it seems fer to go agin somethin' inside of me to think o' sendin' 'er to the 'Ouse. Well, come to think of it, I wouldn't a' thought much a' anybody as sent my pore little Bess to the Ouse, supposin' as she'd a' fell into other 'ands, as you might say. That's the way I looks at it."

"My feelings exactly," Josh exclaimed eagerly. "I don't know as I could make up me mind neither to turn the kid out agin, now she've come, not as I can abide children," he ended, with a not very successful effort at severity in his voice.

Just at that instant the child opened sleepy blue eyes and looked at him. Undaunted by the frown on his brow, she pulled herself up, and held out her arms to him, her face lighted with her bewitching smile.

"Dad, dad," she cooed drowsily, struggling to reach the old man and stretching out her dimpled hands imperiously.

The frown vanished from Denham's face, he smiled back at the smiling baby, and lifting her from his wife's lap, transferred her to his own arms with a chuckle.

"Seems ter take ter me, don't she?" he said, as the baby nestled close against him. "Seems to a' took a fancy to me like from the very fust. Pretty little dear!" he murmured under his breath; and when his wife's back was turned to him as she rose to prepare his supper, he laid his grey head against the yellow curls, and softly kissed the little face.

For days and weeks "Denham's baby" was a nine days' wonder in Lime Row, and though the old couple were careful to spread a report to the effect that they were keeping the baby against their inclination only until its lawful owners could be discovered, the neighbours speedily saw through this polite fiction.

The astounding vision of Josh Denham standing beside the lilac bush holding in his arms a yellow-haired baby, who crowed and chuckled at him in friendly wise, produced a profound effect on the dwellers in the street; and the children gazed open-mouthed at the strange spectacle of their dread ogre on intimate terms with a real live baby, who was evidently not in the least in awe of him.

By-and-by, as the months sped on, Josh might be seen guiding the toddling baby footsteps, as the small person made her first essays in walking; and the next thing that greeted the eyes of the astonished neighbours was the turfing and planting of that dreary strip of garden, whose sole product hitherto had been cabbages.

"Don't seem very nice for the kid to play about among cabbage stumps," Denham said to his wife. "I'll get a bit o' turf off a man as I know of, and I'll plant a few bits o' flowers and things—red and white daisies, now, they'd look fine; like the kid's cheeks too," he added poetically.

They called the child "May," because, as Josh remarked sheepishly, she was welcome as the flowers in that month; and although she had in the first place brought her own welcome with her, she triumphantly took her place as head of the Denham household long before the summer was over.

She could twist Josh round her small fingers with absolute ease; and if Mrs. Denham was not quite so manageable, Baby May nevertheless contrived, as a general rule, to get what she wanted. Not that she was spoilt—she was too loving and contented a little soul for that,—but without a doubt the Denhams were her loyal slaves.

Nothing was ever discovered as to her parentage, and by degrees the Denhams dropped the pleasing fiction that they were merely housing her for a time, and frankly allowed the world to know that they had adopted May for good and all.

That little person no longer permitted them to be ogres to the other children in the house and neighbourhood; she enjoyed the society of her contemporaries, and "Denham's garden" became a delightful rendezvous for the small people in the street. They came to recognise after a time that they must look at the flowers but not pick them, and that then they were at liberty to play on the patch of grass, which was distinctly pleasanter than the pavement.

It was noticeable, too, as time went on, that Denham was more gentle and merciful in his dealings with his tenants and neighbours; and although the change in himself and his wife was not perceptible at once, it became plain after a while that something had softened them curiously.

Perhaps Denham explained the matter in a nutshell when he said the other day to his wife:

"'Pears to me as you an' me is gettin' to be general favourites in our old age, Liz. We ain't never 'ad sich a many friends as we've got now. Sometimes it seems ter me as we was a bit 'ard in them old times, and if you was to arsk me what's bin and changed us, I believe I'd say, 'It's because o' the baby—that's what it is, you mark what I says—it's because o' the baby.'"

A SCHOOL OF DOMESTIC TRAINING.

By A. Parsons.

(With Illustrations from Photographs taken in the School by Cassell & Co., Ltd.)

THE English are of necessity a homely race, and so long as our climate retains its peculiar and distinctive characteristics, the art of "home-making," though it may occasionally suffer a temporary eclipse, will continue to be one of the most highly prized of the national virtues. A school, therefore, which has for its raison d'être the making of better, healthier, and happier homes cannot fail to be an object of interest to a majority of the readers of an English magazine.

Such a school—one, happily, of many now scattered throughout the kingdom, though few can boast of so many features of notable interest—is the Gloucester School of Domestic Science, which is justly regarded by all connected with it as an object lesson in the best methods of grappling at all points with the much-debated domestic problem. Here girls of every class, the future mistress of a well-to-do household no less than her humbler sister of the artisan class, may acquire that knowledge and skill in household ways necessary to the wise and economical management of the homes of rich and poor alike; the would-be teacher of the domestic arts may qualify for her now requisite diploma; the girl colonist is equipped for her life beyond the sea by a course of special and practical training; while the lassie who wisely chooses the safe old path of domestic service in preference to the overcrowded shop or factory, may receive a training such as will render her a treasure to any mistress fortunate enough to secure her services.

The school is carried on with the support of and in association with the Gloucestershire County and Gloucester City Councils, but its origin, like that of so many other social and educational developments, may be traced to a private and philanthropic enterprise. Some fifteen years ago a Gloucestershire lady, Mrs. Arthur Playne, of Minchinhampton, who had for some time been working for the betterment of the condition of the factory hands in the picturesque Stroud Valley, was struck by the amount of misery and discomfort occasioned by the lack of domestic knowledge among the women and girls employed in the numerous cloth mills of the district. To combat this evil, she instituted classes for cookery and other domestic arts, which at once became both popular and useful. The success of this private endeavour stimulated Mrs. Playne and several other Gloucestershire ladies to the consideration of what might be done to provide practical instruction in domestic economy for women and girls in the other towns and villages of the county. Their first step was to make an application to the County and City councils for a share of the funds which just at that time (1890) had been assigned to them for assisting the work of technical education. Fairly substantial grants were made by both bodies, and on the strength of this official, and a great deal of very generous unofficial, support, the Gloucestershire School of Cookery began its work in the spring of 1891, since which time its development and progress have been continuous. Its original quarters, in rooms lent, free of charge, by the Gloucester Gas Company, were speedily outgrown, and in 1894 the present school buildings in the Barrack Square were provided for its use by the County Council.

PUTTING THE FINISHING TOUCHES TO A BATCH OF CAKES.

The work of the school falls into four main divisions. It fulfils, in the first place, the original aim of its founders, by organising classes and supplying teachers of cookery, laundry-work, nursing, and needlework in nearly a hundred centres throughout the country. From these classes, and from those of the neighbouring county of Worcester, are drawn the County Council scholarship holders, for whom a thoroughly practical training in every branch of household economy is provided at a residential centre in Gloucester. Further, the school occupies an almost unique position as a residential college of housewifery for girls of the well-to-do classes who wish to acquire a practical knowledge of cookery and household management before taking upon their shoulders the burden of their own or their parents' establishments. This branch includes a recently instituted course for intending emigrants to the colonies. Finally, as a training centre for teachers of domestic science, the Gloucester School occupies a position of acknowledged prominence and distinction.

VIEW OF THE SCHOOL BUILDINGS, BETWEEN THE BARRACKS AND THE COUNTY PRISON.

Each branch of the school possesses its own features of interest, and a brief description of those of the training departments for diplomated teachers and for the County Council scholars may prove useful and suggestive to such as are beset by the difficulty of selecting for their girls a career which is neither underpaid nor overcrowded, and also to any who may be seeking a practical solution of the ever-present problem of the domestic servant.

For an intelligent, well-educated girl, blessed with good health and a liking for practical work, there are now excellent opportunities, both at home and abroad, as a teacher of one of the subjects grouped by the education authorities under the title of Domestic Economy, the requisite course of training for such a career being neither so long nor so expensive as to be beyond the means of the average middle-class parent. Roughly stated, the Gloucester fees for training and examination in cookery amount to a little over £21; for laundry-work, to £15 7s. 6d., unless taken in conjunction with another subject, when a reduction of four guineas is made; while the training and examination for the housewifery diploma (the holder of which may teach housewifery as a whole but not a specific branch, such as cookery or laundry-work), costs just over £20. For a course in plain needlework or dressmaking, the fee is about eight guineas; but a further course, at the same fee, must be taken by the student who aspires to teach the higher branches of either subject. For the millinery diploma a short course at an inclusive fee of £3 13s. 6d. suffices. For students not residing in the city or neighbourhood, the boarding-house fee of fifteen guineas a term must, of course, be reckoned. It may be added that the demand for certificated teachers in all branches is well in excess of the supply, while former students at the Gloucester Training Centre are now filling well-paid posts in all parts of Great Britain and her colonies.

Though certain purely scientific subjects, such as chemistry and hygiene, are taken at the Gloucester School of Science, the bulk of the students' training is carried on at the Technical School in the Barrack Square. This is a plain and unpretentious building, for the most part of one storey only, forming, with the adjoining Dairy School, two sides of a square. Its situation is distinctly official, for it stands on territory owned by the County authorities, and is flanked on the one hand by the barracks (of which it at one time formed a part), and on the other by the high walls of the county gaol. Close at hand flows the River Severn, and beyond are the green meadows of the open country.

VIEW OF THE SMALLER KITCHEN WITH STUDENTS AT WORK.

UPHOLSTERING.

Wishing to see something of the equipments and methods of the Training Centre, we made a tour of inspection, not long since, under the guidance of the Organising Lady Superintendent, Miss Florence Baddeley, to whose active endeavours and businesslike management during the past nine years the school owes not a little of its present prosperity and distinction.

Passing through the simply appointed dining-room, in which a midday dinner (the result of the morning's work) is served every day to the fifty-six students, housewifery pupils and County Council scholars, and their teachers, we entered the larger of the two kitchens, where the members of an "outside" class followed, from their post of observation on a slightly raised platform, the movements and explanations of a teacher who was deftly putting the finishing touches to a tempting batch of cakes. The centre of this kitchen is occupied by a large demonstration table, while along the walls are ranged the little compartments at which the students do their practical work. All the appointments are simple and inexpensive, but the place possesses the charm of absolute purity and order, every shelf, cupboard, and drawer exhibiting the perfection of neatness. A notable feature is the variety of the cooking apparatus, into the mysteries of which all students are duly initiated. The older method of cooking with a coal fire is represented by the regulation kitchen-range, and an American covered-in stove; there are three gas-cookers, the smallest of which is supplied on the "penny-in-the-slot" principle; while a prominent place in the adjoining scullery is occupied by two oil-stoves, one constructed on a modern American principle, which dispenses with wicks; the other of an older pattern, the complicated parts of which the students are taught how properly to clean and adjust. No one is allowed to shirk the prosaic but essential business of saucepan and sink cleaning, and the brightness of the array of pots, pans, and china does credit to the methods and muscles of the busy workers.

In the smaller kitchen we were able to witness part of a demonstration to a house-wifery class on the cleaning of brass and copper vessels. The majority of the students, who wore a pretty uniform of dark blue cotton, with the regulation apron and sleeves, took notes of the lecture, a few of their number having been told off for the practical work.

From the kitchens we passed to the laundry—a long, airy room, well and sensibly fitted up with all the labour-saving appliances that human ingenuity has devised for the lightening of the most arduous of domestic occupations. Here, it being Friday afternoon, the week's work was nearly ended, but ironing was still briskly in progress, several students, under the direction of a teacher, mastering cheerfully, in spite of the very hot weather, the art of turning out shirts, collars, and dainty table linen in a state of immaculate perfection. The irons were being heated on a professional looking "tree"; but in view of the fact that this elaborate and cumbrous device rarely finds a place in the average home laundry, the students are also taught the best method of heating their irons on the ordinary range or stove.

A LESSON IN IRONING.

Having reached the limit of the ground floor of the school, we ascended to the cheerful, well-ventilated room occupied by the needlework, dressmaking, and upholstery students. Every branch of useful needlework is thoroughly taught, the homely arts of darning and patching receiving due attention, as well as the cutting-out and making of all kinds of garments. Part of the diploma work consists of miniature models of costumes, gowns, and blouses, scientifically fashioned and daintily stitched; while the upholstery class also turns out beautifully finished model work for examination purposes. The use of the sewing-machine, both hand and treadle, of course forms a feature of the courses of instruction in this department.

All candidates for the diploma are required to devote a certain number of hours to the practical work of instructing classes of elementary school children; and the little maidens of Gloucester are fortunate in possessing so enthusiastic and painstaking a band of teachers. Cookery and laundry-work are the subjects most generally taught in elementary schools; but household management is also a recognised school subject; and in order to render the children's lessons as complete and practical as possible, three rooms have been specially furnished for their use at Crypt House—one of those delightful old-world houses which, next to its noble cathedral, constitute the principal charm of the ancient city. The largest of these rooms is fitted up as the kitchen, with accommodation for eighteen pupils. On the occasion of our visit it was occupied by a class of little maids, all demurely arrayed in business-like sleeves and aprons, who were recapitulating, under their young teacher's direction, the main points of a lesson on the initial mysteries of pastry-making. The smaller rooms are furnished respectively as the sitting-room and bedroom of the miniature establishment, each article of furniture having been carefully selected with a view to the initiation of the young housewives in some special principle of house-cleaning or household management. During the past year nearly three hundred children were taught in classes held in connection with the Training School, either at Crypt House or at such of their own schools as have the necessary accommodation.

MISS FLORENCE BADDELEY.

There are no drones in the busy little hive in the Barrack Square. Hard work, both mental and manual, is necessary to enable the most brilliant candidate to attain the high standard of theoretical knowledge and practical dexterity required by the Examining Boards. Therefore it is a matter of no small importance that the residence at Belsize House, in the shady neighbourhood of the public park, shared by the training students and housewifery pupils, is a veritable haven of rest for the tired workers, furnished in a cosy, homelike fashion, and well ordered, according to a few broad and by no means exacting rules, under the direction of a capable and sympathetic lady superintendent. Numerous indoor and outdoor recreations are provided; and Saturday excursions, by train or bicycle, to interesting places in the neighbourhood, are a feature of the summer term.

A LESSON IN SPRING-CLEANING.

Not far from Belsize House is the Scholars' House, or, to designate the unassuming little establishment in Park Road by its official title, the County Council's Girls' Hostel. This important branch of the school's work is carried on in direct association with the Gloucestershire and Worcestershire County Councils and the Gloucester City Council, who offer free scholarships, tenable for three or six months, with residence at the hostel, to girls between the ages of fourteen and eighteen, who have been distinguished for diligence and capability in the cookery classes of their own districts. These fortunate little women not only enjoy the privilege of instruction at the school in Barrack Square, but also receive an even more practical training in domestic economy under the roof of their own hostel, where three of the twelve girls in residence are told off in rotation to serve the rest of the household for a fortnight in the respective capacities of cook, housemaid, and parlour-maid. The work of these budding domestics is performed under the watchful eye of a resident matron, and any task which may have been inadequately performed is gone over again and again until the requisite degree of perfection is attained. Every corner of the house, from the highest floor to the basement, is a model of order and cleanliness; while it would be difficult to find a healthier or happier looking group of girls than those whom we saw assembled round the large table of their cheerful dining-room, busily engaged in the pleasant weekly task of "writing home." Many former scholarship girls are reported as doing excellently in various domestic situations; and there can be no doubt that this very successful experiment of the Gloucestershire and Worcestershire Councils points one of the ways to a practical solution of the "servant problem," by recognising domestic service as an occupation demanding special gifts, special training, and adequate remuneration.

KEEPING UTENSILS CLEAN.

Space will permit only a brief allusion to a new departure which has recently been made by the establishment, in the neighbouring town of Cheltenham, of a residential training centre for girls who wish to qualify for posts as children's nurses, housekeepers, or matrons—all of which occupations offer abundant scope to the well-educated and domesticated woman whose abilities lie in the direction of organisation and management rather than of teaching.

HER GRACE

A Complete Story by E. Burrowes.

I.

THE choir had just finished their evening practice, and the new curate, who had presided with efficiency at the organ, put away the music, and forsook the high organ loft with a sigh. He was tired, both mentally and physically, and the determination of some of the boys to sing out of tune and out of time had proved more than usually trying. The hymns had all been tried over, and the boys clattered out of the church, followed more slowly by choirmaster and curate, into the cold night air, crisp with sharp frost, and a promise of snow, which lurked in the heavily banked clouds.

"Went fairly well, sir," said the former, as they stepped side by side down the narrow path; "want a bit more practice, but they'll do all right when the time comes. Church will be full, sir. Her Grace returns to-morrow, to the Castle. The late Duke died abroad, and her Grace has not been here since. It's made a difference to the place, having the Castle empty; not but what there's always been kindnesses done by her Grace all the time—treat to the youngsters and the aged, you know, sir—but it's not the same as having the family on the spot. There's to be a great welcoming to them both—the child and his mother—their Graces, I should say."

Geoffrey Dering nodded, said good-night with some abruptness to the choirmaster, and turned down the narrow lane which led to the cottage in which he and his little daughter Myrtle lived.

In summer it was an idyllic place, bowered with honeysuckle and wreathed with crimson and white garlands of roses; even now that winter's iron hand was on all the world it looked cosy and homelike. Through an uncurtained window a bright, warm light shone out, with a gleam of a fire and a glimpse of an anxious little face pressed close against the glass. As the gate clicked and the new curate walked quickly up the path it vanished, to appear a moment later framed in the open doorway.

"Not in bed yet, little woman?" said Dering, as he stepped inside, shut the door, and took the small curly-headed girl into his arms. "Why is this, eh? It's quite time all such little birds should be in bed and fast asleep, Myrtle."

"I simply couldn't go to bed, daddy, till you came in," said Myrtle, with her arms clasped round his neck and her soft pink cheek pressed close to his, "'cos I've something to tell you. Something, oh!—wonderful, daddy. You'll never guess!"

"Then suppose you tell me what it is," said Dering gaily, "only let me get out of my coat first. That's it—now, then, come along and let me hear all about this wonderful thing."

"I'm to present a bouquet to-morrow to the Duchess."

Myrtle nodded her golden head at every word, till she looked like a nodding mandarin. Her dark eyes, fixed on her father's face, were dancing with excitement. At seven years of age the idea of a Duchess may be wonderful and intensely interesting, but it conveys with it no sense of awe.

Dering started slightly, and his brows contracted for a moment.

"You are to present the bouquet!" he repeated. "But I understood, dear, that Cicely Ferrers was to do it."

"She's got a bad cold, and Mrs. Ferrers came this evening and asked me if I would like to do it, and of course I said yes. Why, I'll see her so nicely, daddy, and—his Grace—that's what they call him—too."

The curate nodded. His dark eyes were fixed on the fire, as if he saw in those leaping flames old memories—past regrets—vanished joys. Presently he roused himself, kissed his little daughter, and sent her off to bed; then turned to his writing-table, and looked over the notes he had made for next Sunday's sermon.

The curate was busy. Not that the parish was a very populous one, but it lay in a scattered district, and the inclemency of the weather rendered the performance of the numerous duties comprised in the daily round of a country clergyman and his colleague doubly difficult. Just at present, too, there was an increase of work, for the impending arrival of the Duke of Wraysbury and his mother had thrown the entire village into a state of excitement. The Castle on the distant hillside had been empty and closed for more than two years, and the advent of the new Duke was awaited with the greatest interest, for he was a mere child—barely eight years old—and the family was held in much respect by the villagers, who had had good reason to bless the name of Wraysbury when times of distress and sickness had come upon them, and brought with them alleviations from her Grace in the shape of money for the poor, nurses for the sick, and pleasures for the young.

All this Dering knew well, for the story had been poured into his ears by his vicar before he had been a week in the parish, but it was not that which brought a cloud to his brow and a new sadness to his eyes as he sat at his littered bureau and tried to concentrate his wandering attention on the outlines of a sermon lying before him. It was that a spectre from out of the past would persist in rising up and torturing him; it was that a flood of recollections and tender memories would sweep upon him with relentless force, until in despair he gave up his sermon, and sat long after midnight had sounded from the old church clock, with his face hidden in his hands, and his thoughts far, far away from Wraysbury.

Mere chance had thrown Geoffrey Dering and Lady Philippa Erskine together. They had met first at Oxford, and then later in London, when, being asked to preach in a certain fashionable West-End church, the curate had speedily discovered her among the congregation. He was a good preacher, and had been spoken of as a rising young man, and somehow he and Lady Philippa found many tastes in common, and managed in one way or another to see a good deal of each other. Perhaps she found him different from the more worldly men with whom she was in the habit of associating; he found her altogether gracious, an ideal of lovely womanhood. Of course the inevitable happened, for although she was the daughter of one of the proudest peers of the realm, she was nevertheless a very human woman, and she fell honestly, deeply in love with the curate.

But the Earl of Mundham had other views for his only daughter's future, and he told Geoffrey Dering so point-blank.

"I shall be most happy to present you to a living," he said stiffly, though kindly, "but I cannot give you my daughter. You will pardon me, Mr. Dering, if I speak quite frankly: it is not at all that I do not like you, but—you are no fit mate for my daughter. You understand me? Even if you were a bishop, I should still consider you a perfectly unsuitable partner in life for Lady Philippa."

He said a good deal more, for Dering would not give up his life's happiness easily, but it was all in vain. Lord Mundham promptly went abroad, taking with him a daughter who was popularly reported to be breaking her heart for Geoffrey Dering's sake, and a year or two later the marriage was announced of the Duke of Wraysbury—an elderly widower—to Lady Philippa Erskine, only daughter of the Earl of Mundham.

With that curt announcement which he duly read in the morning papers, the curate's hopes died, and his love story ended, as he thought. It was not long afterwards that he too, married. It was a marriage of pity rather than love: the girl was totally destitute, and unfitted both by reason of her prettiness and her indifferent health to fight her own way in the world alone. Geoffrey Dering married her, putting the truth plainly before her, but she was quite satisfied, for she loved him with a blind, faithful adoration which filled her frail body to the last. A year later she faded out of his life, quietly and painlessly, leaving behind her an infant daughter.

Another chance brought him to Wraysbury: he knew the Duchess—now a widow—and her only son were abroad: he hoped and yet feared to see her again, and now in a few hours almost they must meet.

He set his teeth hard, as he thought of her—his Phil, as he had called her. His Phil, with her sweet grey eyes and dimpled cheek, pink as an English rose; her curling dark hair, and delicious smile. But he must not forget that he was still only a curate and she was a Duchess.

All along the hard frost-bound road the people were cheering and curtseying as the carriage drove from the station to the village. Flags flew merrily in the crisp winter wind, from church tower and windows; bells pealed joyously, and in the carriage as it swept onward, a woman in black, with a softly feathered hat on her pretty head, bowed and smiled, and a small boy beside her, in a sailor suit and cap, looked about him and chattered gaily, taking off his cap now and then with a courteous little manner which delighted the onlookers.

His Grace was a bonny child, they said to each other as the carriage swept on its way, and at last drew up at the vicarage gate, where a little group was gathered to welcome home the Duchess and her little son.

It consisted of the vicar and his comely wife, their grown-up daughter and son, the two churchwardens, and, in the background, the new curate. At the vicar's side was a radiant little figure in red cap and coat, armed with a loose posy of Christmas roses, and bright-berried holly, and the Duchess took the proffered flowers with a smile and quick glance of admiration at the child's lovely flushed face.

"Is this one of yours, Mrs. Ferrers?" she asked graciously.

"No, this is Myrtle Dering, the daughter of our curate. Mr. Dering is here. May I present him to your Grace?"

The Duchess started: a light flashed into her lovely eyes, and the vicar thought her voice was not quite steady as she said:

"Mr. Dering? I believe, yes, I am certain we are old friends."

It had happened.

Dering held her hand for a moment—no more—looked again into the face of the woman he had loved—nay, still loved so hopelessly—saw her colour rise as she stooped and kissed his child with a sort of lingering tenderness, and then turned to her son.

"Alan," she said, "this is an old friend of mine, Mr. Dering, and his little girl. Isn't it nice to find friends waiting for us everywhere?"

The lad nodded, and held out his hand to the curate and the child. The two children looked at each other solemnly after the manner of children, and his Grace thought he had never seen anything quite so pretty as little Myrtle Dering's earnest face and pansy blue eyes.

"It's jolly to be home again," he said frankly, lifting his shining eyes to the vicar, while the Duchess inquired after old friends in the neighbourhood, and chatted to Mrs. Ferrers. "I'm awfully glad we've got back. I shall have a party at the Castle, and—you'll come, won't you? What is your name?"

The boy looked at Myrtle.

"Myrtle," she said shyly. "I'd like to come to your party very much."

"We'll have a Christmas tree," he said, "and a bran pie and all sorts of jolly things, and I'll take you out tobogganning if there's snow. Mayn't I, mother?"

"What's that, Alan? Tobogganing? Of course, if the snow comes; and we must see a great deal of our kind friends at the vicarage, you know. There is so much to be done and thought of all at once, isn't there? And now we must get home, with many, many thanks for your welcome, and remembrance of us both, dear Mrs. Ferrers. Come, Alan."

They shook hands all round, and Dering held the hand of the Duchess again for a brief moment, and then the carriage drove off to the Castle, and the great event was over.

His Grace was safely home.

"Why, there are tears in your eyes, mother," said the Duke, as they swept up the steep approach to the Castle gates. "Are you sorry to come home, after all?"

The Duchess smiled through her tears, and pressed the boy's hand.

"No, dearest—only very glad," she said; but his Grace could never guess how glad she really was. Only her own heart knew that.

II.

THE snow had come and the toboggan had been taken out. Shrieks of delight told of the fun on the steep slope down which the young Duke and the children from the vicarage, not forgetting Myrtle Dering, sped in that wonderful thing —half sleigh, half toboggan. The Duchess herself was always present, to applaud, to encourage, and to comfort when someone came with a heavy plump into a snowdrift; there was a great tea afterwards at the Castle, where dry shoes and stockings were laid out ready for the guests.

Ten days had passed since the home-coming of the young Duke and his mother. Dering had been thrown—almost against his will, so it seemed to the Duchess—into all the preparations in which she took a leading part: the tree for the school children, the tea for the aged poor, the mothers' treat, and a dozen other charities with which the name of the Duchess of Wraysbury was ever associated in the parish. It was not possible that he had forgotten—so she told herself as she sat alone in her magnificent library listening to the moan of the wind and the crackle of the logs in the fire—for she had seen vivid remembrance in his eyes and his manner, and though he masked it all with a punctilious courtesy, an icy coldness, she knew that deep down the old love slumbered. She never thought of the difference which still lay like a fixed gulf between them; a gulf made deeper and broader since her marriage with the Duke of Wraysbury, and the possession of great wealth; she never thought somehow that he would look on her as far, far removed from him; she only knew that—nothing had altered; for love is eternal.

"'I'm to present a bouquet to-morrow to the Duchess.'"—p. 410.

Myrtle was constantly at the Castle. His Grace was devoted to her, and the Duchess watched with a strange tenderness the friendship which grew up between the two children. The child had been with her all that afternoon; first out tobogganing, and then at tea; now she and the young Duke came in together to say good-night, for a maid had come for her and the clocks were striking six.

"Are you warm enough, dear?" said the Duchess, wrapping the child in her red cloak. "You have a little cold, I am afraid. We mustn't let you get ill just now, you know. How is your father, Myrtle?"

Myrtle's bright face clouded.

"I don't think he is velly well," she said; "he looks so sad, and sometimes he sits looking at the fire and not even speaking to me!"

"He is busy, I expect," said the Duchess hurriedly, "and perhaps a little worried with all his work. We shall see you to-morrow, darling. Good-night."

When the children had gone and she was left alone in her magnificence, surrounded on every side by evidences of her exalted rank and her vast wealth, the Duchess remained sunk in reverie; her eyes grew sad and misty, and then hope stretched her fair wings above her head, and she rose from her chair with a happy smile touching her lips.

"Oh!" she breathed. "He still cares—and some day it will come all right."

She did not see Dering for several days; then she met him hurrying through the village with worn face and haggard eyes. She stopped him.

"Is anything wrong with Myrtle?" she asked gently, "for we have not seen her for three days, and Alan is getting uneasy about her. They are such friends, those two!"

"I know," he said in low hurried tones, "you have been goodness itself to her; she is ill, nothing more, I trust, than a severe bronchial cold, but it is bad enough to keep her in bed, poor mite. She says she can't stay in bed; but I am afraid she must, unless she shakes the cough off speedily."

"I am so sorry; is there anything I can do for her—or—or you?"

Their eyes met, but it was hers that fell before his earnest glance.

"You have done much already," he said. "I can never repay you——"

"Don't talk of payment," she said quickly, "are we not—old friends? I will bring some books and fruit to her this afternoon—and give her my love. Alan will be distracted when he hears of her illness."

Dering went about his work that day with a heavy heart; he was afraid when he looked on his child's flushed face and heard her laboured breathing, that she had inherited some of her young mother's delicacy; he feared to lose her—the only thing he had to love; the only thing he might love. For Myrtle grew hourly worse.

Up at the Castle some guests had assembled; amongst them a famous London physician who had been an intimate friend of Lady Philippa Erskine and her people years ago, and as the house party was sitting in the billiard-room after dinner, a message was brought by a groom, who had been despatched for the latest news of the sick child.

"Myrtle is dangerously ill," were the few hurriedly pencilled lines in the curate's hand. writing; "should she be spared till the morning, I must telegraph for a second opinion. A thousand thanks for your goodness to her—and me."

The Duchess got up quickly and crossed the room to where the great doctor was sitting smoking a cigar by the blazing fire, and looking on lazily at an exciting game which was just at its climax.

"Sir James," she said, "would you do me a kindness?"

Sir James Lankester rose promptly.

"I am now and ever at your command," he said. "What is it?"

"Will you come with me now—this very moment—to the village to see a sick child who is dangerously ill with, I fear, congestion of the lungs? I know it is a strange hour to take you out and a strange request, but——"

"If you will wait five minutes while I get a coat, I shall be at your service, Duchess," said the doctor, and vanished, while the Duchess gave rapid orders for the brougham at once, and sent for her cloak and hat, explaining in a few words to her other guests that she must leave them for half an hour on an errand of the most urgent importance.

Ten minutes later they were driving swiftly down the frost-bound avenue, to the village, and in a few words the Duchess explained the case. As he listened, Sir James frowned slightly; he was trying to remember where he had heard the name of Dering, a clergyman, before, and in what connection. Then after a swift glance at the pale face beside him, he suddenly remembered.

"It was the man she loved!" he muttered to himself, and fell to wondering what chance had brought them together again under these strange circumstances.

Down in the curate's cottage, Myrtle tossed to and fro on her fevered couch; her pansy blue eyes were wide and staring; babbling words broke from her parched lips, and the fever which had consumed her for three days was swiftly and surely sapping her little life away. The village doctor sat beside her with a finger on the flying pulse, and a settled gravity in his face. Dering knew that the worst must be impending; he sat downstairs, with bowed head, the doctor having implored him to take a little rest before the weary night watching became his portion, for he and the nurse divided the night between them. Life, indeed, had its blackest outlook for him, and he did not hear the stopping wheels outside nor the entry of someone into the narrow hall, and it was with dazed eyes that he looked up suddenly, and sprang to his feet confronting the Duchess. Behind her loomed the tall figure of a man with a clever, distinguished face.

He steadied himself with a chair; this was no dream—no dream.

"Mr. Dering," said the Duchess, "I have brought Sir James Lankester with me—let me introduce him to you—Mr. Dering, an old friend of mine, Sir James. You know who he is, Mr. Dering, without my telling you, and he has come to see Myrtle. Believe me, if God wills he will save her. May he go up to her at once?"

Dering bowed, and led the way upstairs, not trusting himself to speak. The name of James Lankester was one familiar to all the world, as one of the most famous of physicians. There was no need indeed for the Duchess to explain his identity, and Dering watched him eagerly, as he bent over the child, after exchanging a few words in a low tone with the village doctor.

It was as if in a dream that he found himself downstairs again, the doctors having told him to leave the child in their care, and rest below. He did not see that the Duchess followed him after speaking to Sir James, and receiving an assuring nod of the head which sent her hopes flying upwards. The events of the last weeks had worn him out, body and spirit, and his head sank on his folded arms with something like a groan, as he dropped into a chair in the silent room where only the fire flickered and cracked on the hearth; and from the distance floated the faint strains of a song being sung in some house further down the road.

The Duchess cautiously opened the door and peeped at the bowed figure. Then she shut it again, and sat down quietly on the stairs, and waited. The house was very still, only now and then she heard that faint voice babbling upstairs, and the deeper tones of the doctors. Then for a while all was still.

The hours went by, and still she did not move: her head rested against the wall, the rippling hair shining with golden brown lights under the subdued glow from the lamp above. Then the door opened suddenly and Dering came out into the hall. His heart leapt as he saw her sitting there, a slim dark figure, her soft eyes fixed on him with a tenderness he had known—years ago. He steadied his voice with an effort, but the mask of coldness was gone from him as he spoke.

"Duchess, I beg of you to come into the dining-room. I had no idea you were there. It was unpardonable of me to have neglected you, but—you will forgive me if I was strange and distrait; I hardly knew whether I was dreaming or not, and I've never even had the common civility to say 'Thank you.'"

"You shall say it presently," she said gently, and got up and went into the room, where the fire was dying on the hearth.

Dering went down on his knees and blew it into a little flame, and the Duchess watched him. There were grey hairs showing on his temples; he was worn and thin and worried, and a great tenderness swept over her as he got up and pulled forward an armchair for her.

"You will be tired," he said abruptly.

"No; I must wait for Sir James—I wish to do so. The child will pull through—he told me as much, but of course it means skill and care. Listen! No. It is nothing—I thought I heard him coming down. He is the cleverest man in England for that sort of thing."

"I know; it was only another instance of your goodness to bring him down here. If Myrtle lives—it will be thanks to you. I'm a poor hand at saying what I really think, Duchess, but——"

"I was 'Phil' once," said the Duchess softly, and yet boldly. There was the light of a great resolve in her face, and a smile in her eyes. Oh! she was resolved not to lose her life's happiness.

He stared at her half wonderingly, half fearfully. What he read in her face startled him out of his self-possession.

"You forget!" he said hoarsely, "you forget—what I am, and what you are yourself. I'd never dare——"

"No, you'd never dare!" she said, dashing the tears from her eyes with a superb gesture, "that's why I am being forced to—to—Geoffrey, don't make it so hard for me! My poor Geoff!"

Her arms were round his neck, her face hidden on his shoulder, and he wondered if

"His heart leapt as he saw her sitting there."—p. 415.

this too was a dream—a hopeless, impossible dream, as it had been in the past. But the touch of her soft pink cheek, and the clasp of her arms, they were no dream.

And Dering awoke.

"My dear—my dearest and best," he said brokenly. "You can't mean it! It isn't right, I won't allow you to spoil your life—to lose all that power which you have used so well and nobly, and——"

She raised her head and looked him in the face with a fearless smile.

"I'll do as I like," she said, "I always do—now. Why, I've nearly asked you to marry me, and if I can do that—oh! surely I can brave anything else the world may hold. Geoffrey, listen!"

A distant clock struck midnight.

The door opened, and Sir James Lankester appeared on the threshold.

"The corner is safely turned," he said, "the child is asleep."

* * * * *

So Philippa, Duchess of Wraysbury, married the man of whom the world said, with scornful wonder, "Only a curate!" and his Grace has had one of his many wishes fulfilled, for Myrtle is really his sister and constant playmate now. And the Duchess has at last found something which she never possessed before, notwithstanding her great wealth and power, and that something is love. It seems superfluous to add that Dering is supremely happy.

SCRIPTURE ILLUSTRATIONS AND ANECDOTES.

BASED ON THE INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

FEBRUARY 21ST.—Jesus and the Sabbath.

Passage for Reading.—St. Matt. xii. 1—13.

POINTS.—THINGS LAWFUL ON THE SABBATH.

1. Works of necessity.
2. Religious observances.
3. Works of mercy.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Six Days to Labour. It is well to take special notice of the words, "Six days shalt thou labour, and do all thy work," in the fourth commandment. They are concerned both with the week-days and the day of rest. Surely God means the work by which we get our living, which may alone be properly called "our work." Yet there are general works which must be done on all days, the Sabbath day included. These works are eating and drinking, clothing ourselves, feeding cattle, lighting fires in winter, cooking food, and so on, which are necessary, as by them we are strengthened and enabled to do our proper work on the other six days. And special works of necessity may be done on special occasions, such as the putting out of a fire, the care of sick persons. For religion is emphatically a thing of common-sense.

Sabbath Worship in the Sandwich Isles. The Sabbath here is a most interesting day to the Christian and missionary. The numbers of decently dressed natives, only lately emerged from heathenism, who flock to the temple of the only true God; the attention and seriousness with which they listen to the words of eternal life; the praises of God sung in their own tongue; all these things produce a lively and joyful impression on a visitor. Of this I saw a pleasing instance lately. A godly officer from one of the British ships in the harbour spent the interval between the English and native services with me at the mission house. As the native congregation began to assemble he accompanied me to the door of the church, intending to take leave when the service began, as he did not understand the language. But as he stood there and saw hundreds of natives assembling, and all looking so glad and happy, he suddenly exclaimed, with a tear glistening in his eye, "No; this is too much! I cannot go till I have worshipped with these native Christians."

Sabbath Works of Mercy. For a few years I was a country rector of a small Hampshire parish. I started a "Pleasant Sunday Afternoon." After the short children's service all who had been present came over to the rectory garden. The old people sat on easy seats on the lawn, and the children ran about the orchard, old-fashioned beech-walk, and garden generally. As the clock struck four we gathered round the great oak-tree and sang, "Praise God from Whom all blessings flow," and then all dispersed for tea. One Sunday I cut a lettuce, and gave it to an old woman over eighty to eat with her tea. A few days after I was taken to task by a godly old man for having "done some work on the Sabbath." So I turned to the passage where our Lord says, "It is lawful to do good on the Sabbath," and he expressed himself as quite satisfied.

FEBRUARY 28TH.—Hearers and Doers of the Word.

Passage for Reading.—St. Matt. vii. 21—29.

POINTS.—1. Good lives better than mere professions.
2. Hypocrites will be condemned.
3. Good works will last.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Profession and Practice. A French prisoner in Algiers said to a Moor, "Why do you hate us so much?" He replied by asking, "Why do you come to our country?" "Because you are infidels." "Indeed," said the Moor, "we worship Allah, and you often see us pray; but we never see you pray. We think you are the infidels."

Hypocrites Found Out. How many are like that famous painting of the olden time, in which the artist depicted what seemed in the distance a holy friar with a book before him, and his hands crossed in devotion, looking like a saint indeed; but when you came close to the venerable impostor, you found that his hands, though clasped, enclosed a lemon, while instead of a book, there was a punch-bowl, into which he was squeezing the juice. To seem to be upright answers men's purposes so well that it is little marvel if hypocrites swarm like the flies in the plagues of Egypt; yet if they would remember that the last great day is coming, when the secrets of all hearts shall be disclosed, men would abhor hypocrisy. (Spurgeon.)

Good Deeds will Last. During the Civil Wars in the time of Charles I. a group of anxious women sat watching in an old house hard by the high road. A night attack was going on a few miles away, in which their relatives on King Charles' side were engaged. The window was wide open, and they listened with eagerness for any sound. At last some distant shots were heard, and then after a time the sound of horses' hoofs, which came closer and closer, till half-a-dozen Roundhead horsemen came past at full gallop. Just as they passed the house the horse of one stumbled and fell, throwing its rider headlong on the hard road. His companions rode on, but the ladies, calling a couple of labourers to their aid, rushed out and carried him indoors. For long he lay senseless, but at last he revived. Just then in came the Cavalier son of the family, flushed with success. Drawing his sword, he would have attacked or made prisoner the Puritan soldier, but his mother interposed. "Never shall the man whom accident has made my guest be attacked in my house. Let him go free." Sullenly the Puritan, still half dazed with his fall, withdrew, and mounting his horse, rode away. Many years passed away, and the royal cause was utterly ruined. Cromwell was in power, and a last effort made to raise again the King's standard ended in failure, and many of those who had taken part in it were sentenced to death. Among them was the Royalist soldier who had been prevented from slaying his mother's guest. In the hope of saving his life his aged mother travelled to London and threw herself at Cromwell's feet, and told her story. "A wounded soldier fell at my door; I took him in, attended to his wounds, and saved his life from the sword of my son. That soldier I now see raised to power, and for his sake I implore pardon for my son." Cromwell recognised his preserver, accepted her plea, and signed an order of release for her son.

MARCH 7TH.—Jesus Calms the Storm.

Passage for Reading.—St. Mark iv. 35—41.

POINTS.—1. Danger on the Lake
2. Distress of the Disciples.
3. Deliverance by the Saviour.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Danger. Two young men, on a visit to Devonshire, started off one afternoon on a walk to Dartmoor. After a few miles had been passed a dense white fog arose, common in those parts; all landmarks were blotted out, and it was impossible to see more than a few feet in any direction. The two friends felt helpless, but decided after consultation to walk in a certain direction. They hurried on for several miles, and then, to their dismay, found themselves at the same place where they had held their consultation. They were cold, wet through with the damp mist, and very weary, but felt they must go on. At last they came to a little stream. "Let us follow it," they said; "it must flow downwards, and sooner or later lead us down from this fog on the hills into the flat country below." So along the stream they walked, and at last came out into the sunshine of an early summer morning below the belt of mist.

Fear without Cowardice. Two French officers were once riding at the head of a party to capture some guns. It was a desperate service, for they expected every moment that the battery would open fire upon them. One officer remarked insultingly to the other, "You are afraid, sir." He replied, "Yes, sir, I am; and if you were half as much afraid you would have turned tail long ago." The apostles were afraid, but they did not desert their posts. They continued toiling in rowing.

Opportune Deliverance. One dark and stormy night a vessel was wrecked on a rocky island off the coast of Scotland. The sailors climbed into the rigging and prayed as they never had before that God would have compassion upon them. The angry waves drove the vessel on and on to the very foot of the awful cliff. Oh! if they could only reach its top there would be safety. Just as they struck the rock they espied on the face of the cliff a rope-ladder. Their despair was changed to joy. They sprang from the rigging and climbed the ropes as rapidly as their benumbed fingers would permit. All were saved, and in a few minutes more the vessel went to pieces. The presence of the ladder was easily explained. It was used by the quarrymen to climb up and down to their work. They generally drew the ladder up when they left, but the suddenness of the storm that evening caused them to hasten home without removing it.

MARCH 14TH.—Death of St. John the Baptist.

Passage for Reading.—St. Matt. xiv. 1—12.

POINTS.—1. A faithful and bold preacher.
2. A martyred prophet.
3. A sympathising Saviour.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Ministerial Faithfulness. The Rev. John Howe, having preached before Cromwell, so pleased the Protector that he was appointed his domestic chaplain. To some of Cromwell's peculiar notions Mr. Howe could not assent, and in one instance had the boldness to preach against them in his presence. His friends were alarmed, thinking that he would find it difficult to regain the Protector's favour; but Mr. Howe said, "I have discharged my conscience, and the event must be left to God."

God's Dealings with Martyrs. "Soul of mine, what is it that troubles thee?" "I have been thinking," said the soul, "of the martyr spirits of all ages who have lost their lives for God and the truth. Is there anything that can throw a light on this seeming carelessness of God as to the fate of His own best children?" "Certainly, soul of mine, there is. I stood on the lighthouse tower with the watchman there, and far away on the land we saw the dogs chasing his favourite birds. And I said, 'Why allow this?' to the keeper. But he only smiled and answered, 'Let them alone; the birds will only fly home all the quicker, and I want them.'" So does God want His best children.

The Power of Sympathy. When the Queen beheld Columbus approach, and thought on all he had deserved and all he had suffered, for he had been sent back to Spain in irons, she was moved to tears. Columbus had borne up bravely, but he possessed strong and quick sensibilities. When he found himself thus kindly received his long-suppressed feelings burst forth; he threw himself on his knees, and for some time could not utter a word for the violence of his tears and sobbings. Jesus wept at the grave of Lazarus, and I think He and John's disciples must have mingled their tears together over the grave of the brave martyr.

A ROMANCE OF OLD FRANCE.

By Christopher Hare, Author of "Dreams to Sell," Etc.

SYNOPSIS OF CHAPTERS I.–VIII.

The story opens in the reign of Louis XIV. Yvonne de la Féronniere, a young Huguenot girl, is being educated at the famous Abbaye aux Bois. Her great friend, Gabrielle de Beaumanoir, is married to the Duc de Maillebois, and Yvonne, who is invited to the wedding, meets the brother of her friend, the young Chevalier Réné de Beaumanoir. He is greatly attracted by her. After the wedding the girl-bride Gabrielle returns to the convent school with Yvonne, and the Duke, her husband, goes on an embassy to Rome and takes Réné with him.

CHAPTER IX.

BY a curious coincidence, it happened only the next day after hearing from Réné, that Mademoiselle de la Féronniere received a letter from the Marquis de Vaudreuil. The young girl had looked upon it as great good fortune that he should have been absent from Paris for many months past, having been appointed Deputy-Governor of Blois. In those days of difficult, even dangerous travelling, there had been no question of joining him at Blois, and she had been suffered to remain unmolested at the convent. Her guardian now wrote to announce that his Gracious Majesty, the King, had promised him an appointment for a time in the Royal household. His exile would, therefore, soon be tempered by this pleasing alleviation, and he hoped next summer to be established once more, with all his family, at the Hotel Vaudreuil, in the Faubourg St. Germain. Then the formal letter continued:

"When we return to Paris you will leave the Abbaye aux Bois and take up your abode with us, to become, indeed, a daughter of the house. You will then have reached the discreet age of seventeen, and will, I trust, have outgrown all your childish folly and prejudice. I may promise that your cousin Adolphe is quite willing to overlook your past wilfulness and want of appreciation.

"But as you are aware, my dear niece, it will be needful before your marriage for you to make open and solemn renunciation of your former mistaken faith, and that you be admitted into the fold of our Catholic Church. I cannot doubt that the years which you have spent in the convent under the teaching of ces dames and your director, have shown you the accursed errors of the Huguenots, and that you are quite ready, of your own accord, to renounce them. I may add that his most Christian Majesty proposes to take very strong measures against the so-called Reformers, who have wearied out his royal patience by their contumacy. He has issued a commission against them in this province and others, to urge on their conversion by all means. Adolphe hopes to gain great favour at Court, by his zeal and personal devotion to the matter in hand.

"You are not wanting in common-sense, my dear niece, and will, I doubt not, see where your true interest lies. Your aunt and Louise send you greeting.—Ever your loving uncle and well-wisher,

"RICHARD-ÉMILE DE VAUDREUIL."

If for one brief hour the young girl had dreamed of peace and joy, here, indeed, was a rude awakening! What fawning hypocrisy was this, that he should dare to call her "my dear niece"?

True, alas! and sadly too true, Monsieur de Vaudreuil was the half-brother of her dear father, whom he had hated and done his best to ruin. Then, by an act of cruel tyranny, he had gained possession of the orphan child as his ward, and now, to grasp her fortune, he would compel her to give up her faith and to marry his son.

"But that shall never be!" cried Yvonne, with passionate earnestness. "Men and women, aye young girls and children too, have died ere now, rather than deny their God; and even I, with His grace, may be worthy to join the 'noble army of martyrs.'"

She bowed her head in silent prayer, for too well she knew what was before her. Not the one sharp stroke of death, the triumphant confession of faith, and then the sword or the lions! No, her trial would be long and lingering, and it would come to her in smoother and subtler guise.

Hers would be the daily, hourly pricks of refined domestic persecution—the insidious temptations, the petty worry and mocking ridicule which would for ever irritate her temper, and lower her sense of right. It would be like the continual dropping of water, which in time will wear away the hardest stone.

With a sighing breath, she remembered that there was a respite before her. What might not happen in those months? There was the ever-lurking fever, the pestilence which smiteth in the noonday; and she, too, like dear little Alix, might be taken in mercy from the evil to come

In the dark days which followed, it was not the gay, adorable Gabrielle, taking life and all its problems with such easy cheerfulness, who was of the greatest help and comfort to her, but the old Huguenot servant. Madelon it was whose simple faith and courage nerved her to play her part from day to day, and leave the unknown future to take care of itself.

"As thy day so shall thy strength be," was her brave motto.

But there must be no tampering with evil, no uncertain note to echo back the clarion call of duty. This was the young girl's reply to her guardian:

"MONSIEUR DE VAUDREUIL,—I would not have you led astray with false hopes in regard to me. It is with all seemly respect that I make my solemn declaration. A Protestant was I born and bred, and in that faith, by God's help, will I live and die.

"I send all friendly greeting to Madame de Vaudreuil and my cousin Louise, and I rejoice in your advancement to the King's household.

"I pray you accept the dutiful service of

"YVONNE ELISABETH DE LA FÉRONNIERE."

These few words had caused her much anxious thought, and in the silent watches of the night dark misgivings would assail her that she had tempted fate and gone half-way to meet wrath and tribulation. But the event proved that in some cases boldness is wisdom.

The Marquis saw that he had made a false move. The girl came of a gallant race; she might be led, but not driven. Until every means of persuasion had been tried in vain, he felt that it was worse than folly to hint at threats So he wrote again in a very different tone, and spoke with honied sweetness of the affection which would greet her, and dwelt upon all the delights of the King's Court, which awaited her under the wing of the Marquise de Vaudreuil.

Thus, for awhile, the cloud was lifted, but the young girl knew her guardian too well to believe that it had passed away. Whether by accident or design, the same milder spirit seemed to rule her life in the convent.

Mademoiselle de la Féronniere now found herself placed in the Library, where it now fell to her duty to examine and catalogue the choice old illuminated manuscripts. It was a most congenial task, for she worked under Madame Sainte Géneviève, a nun of much learning, with the hand and eye of an artist. She could fill in a missing word, or with a delicate touch repaint a faded picture on the margin of some ancient missal.

Yvonne soon grew to love those quiet hours in the old library, where the afternoon sunshine poured in through the stained glass on the bowed head of her gentle companion. Here she could forget all her anxious thought, in earnest talk over some saintly life of devotion and self-sacrifice, from the quaint records of the past. So full of rest and soothing was it, that at times the thought would arise in her heart whether this might not be the haven of peace for which her spirit craved, where she would be safe from the troublesome waves of the cruel world without ?

Was it possible that the same thought had moved Madame l'Abbesse in her choice of a helper for the much-beloved Madame Sainte Géneviève ?

Meantime the winter passed away, and once more the spring-tide came, with glad sunshine and bird and blossom.

CHAPTER X.

RÉNÉ DE BEAUMANOIR'S first letter from Rome to his sister was followed by others, and in all of them he spoke of Mademoiselle de la Féronnière, often with a playful hint or a passing lament, that she had never sent him a line of her own handwriting.

He saw everything through the medium of his own sunny nature, and delighted in Rome and her people. He loved to visit the ancient churches and listen to the legends of their patron saints, and to watch the stately processions ; he wandered through the crowded Ghetto by the Tiber side, and through the narrow streets, where strange, many-coloured wares hung for sale in the low, dark stalls ; he was a welcome guest in the palaces of the great, sat at their banquets, and beheld their treasures of art ; and everywhere, alike with high and low, he was full of sympathy and interest.

His letters were always fresh and delightful. He told the story of the Befana, the great festival which began on the eve of the Epiphany, when the Piazza Navona was the scene of a noisy fair, where the people piped and whistled and blew horns, and bought and sold mysterious toys, all night beneath the wintry sky. He, too, had laid in a store of presents, like his companions, and Gabrielle and her friend would make merry at the sight of them when he came home.

" Is he not charming ? " cried his sister, as she read this aloud. " And each time the post messenger arrives, I also receive a long epistle from Monsieur le Duc ; but, ah, that is very different. He writes many pages to tell me of some dry old manuscript which he has unearthed in the Vatican library, or he sends me miles of argument to prove that some lately discovered foundation is not that of the temple of Mars or some other Pagan god! Oh, Yvonne, how shall I ever live up to him?"

"Madelon it was whose simple faith and courage nerved her to play her part."

She spoke with such a comical accent of despair, that her friend could not restrain a smile.

"Well, at least, he will do his best to spoil you," said she. "Nothing is too rare or too costly to lay at your feet. What of all the wonderful collection of tapestries and bronzes and marble statues, which he is bringing home for you?"

"Enough to fill a museum at least!" exclaimed the little Duchess airily. "Look you, one cannot enjoy on such a vast scale. I am sure that we shall have much more pleasure with Réné's twopenny toys from the Befana! But I must read you the end of my brother's letter before we are disturbed," she added in haste.

"We have news just come to us that the Doge of Genoa set forth for his journey to Paris on the 29th day of March. As you know, the King will grant peace to Genoa on no other terms than that the Doge himself and four great Senators of the State shall do homage in person, at the Palace of Versailles. It will be a great and imposing ceremony, for which Monsieur de Maillebois and I purpose to return at once. His interest will secure that Mademoiselle de la Féronniere shall be a guest at Court, as well as you and Héloise; and, remember that the King's invitation is a command! I live in hope of our joyful meeting on that eventful day."

"Do you hear, that is all settled, and the time must now be close at hand!" cried Gabrielle in delight. "I will speak to Madame l'Abbesse this very day, and remind her of her promise that you are to go with me."

"I fear that you will fail, dear," said Yvonne sadly. "Much water has gone under the bridge since she gave her consent."

"I will not fail," was the proud reply. "Remember that 'the King's invitation is a command' she repeated. "And see, here is the printed broad-sheet with the whole story of the expedition against Genoa. It looks dull, but I suppose we must read it, now that the Doge is actually on his way."

Mademoiselle de la Féronniere took it in silence. Dull? Ah, could anything fail to have the deepest interest for her in which Réné was concerned? And this was his last expedition, and one in which he had distinguished himself, alike for his valour and the chivalrous pity which he had shown in the hour of victory; so the dear old Admiral had told her.

This was what she read in that meagre newspaper of the seventeenth century:

"Whereas the State of Genoa hath sold powder and bombs to the Dey of Algiers to use against our seamen, and hath built four galleys for the King of Spain, at that time our enemy, therefore his most Christian Majesty King Louis sent M. de St. Olan to make complaint and threaten chastisement. The Doge of Genoa would give no reply nor satisfaction, whereupon a fleet was made ready, under the command of our great Admiral the Sieur du Quesne, the conqueror of Ruyter and the Dutch.

"The Duc de Mortemart, Lieutenant-General, was commander of the galleys. The fleet consisted of twenty galleys, ten galliots—carrying two mortar pieces for bombs, according to the most ingenious invention of M. Petit Renau, the engineer—next six fly-boats, eighteen tartanes, twenty chaloupes, and forty fisher boats.

"These all set sail from our Port of Toulon on the 6th day of May, 1684, and cast anchor on the 16th of May in the Port of Vade, near to Savona, depending on the Republic of Genoa. On the 17th the troops disembarked, and the fleet remained anchored. The Genoese in haste chose Don Carlo Tasso as the Governor of their armed forces. The two sides played vigorously upon each other, and the French cast their bombs and granadoes with such success, that on the third day the Doge's palace was on fire. Also two convents of nuns were burnt, those of St. Andrew and of St. Sebastian, from which the nuns escaped in the night.

"Certain Spanish ships gave much help to the enemy. On the 24th of May, in the morning, the galliots attempted two descents, one on the side of Bisagno and the other by St. Peter de Arena, loaded with bombs, granadoes, petards, faggots, scaling ladders, and all things needful for a siege. Here was killed the captain of a man-of-war, the Sieur de la Mothe, and our men were forced to retreat, leaving behind pickaxes, mattocks, spades, and sundry other implements.

"On the 25th, 26th, and the 27th we went on casting bombs with all possible fury. Then Don Basilio Marini, the Lieutenant-General of the Artillery of Milan, having viewed the order of the galliots, whence by the device of Petit Renau our men cast the bombs with such good effect, considered how he could annoy us. He resolved to make some artificial fireworks, and on the 28th of May came down towards the sea, where he thought he could best catch us with his culverins, and he sped so well that he sunk one of the said galliots of the bombs, and obliged the rest to make off to sea, and also did some damage to the galleys.

"It was about noon on the 28th when we ceased firing and sent a chaloupe to shore, which was met by the commander of the vessels of Genoa, also in a chaloupe, who found there a trumpeter with a letter, asking whether the Sieur de la Mothe were alive or a prisoner.

"After this the success was all with us, and the Republic of Genoa was humbled to the dust and compelled to sue for peace, which is no marvel, when rumour saith that 13,300 bombs were found later in their city.

"These are the conditions of peace:

"That the Doge of Genoa and four senators shall come in person and make submission to his most Christian Majesty, Louis XIV., by the Grace of God, King of France.

"That the Republic of Genoa shall disarm all her galleys but six, and shall arm no more without the consent of his most Christian Majesty.

"That all the French King's subjects that are forced from their goods and estates shall be reimbursed," etc.

Mademoiselle had begun with eager interest the story of the fight with Genoa, but in the end she folded it up with a little sigh. It seemed scarce worth while for a great nation like France to overwhelm the small, gallant Republic for so meagre a cause. As she mused on it, she called to mind the new fable of M. de la Fontaine, concerning the wolf and the lamb.

Had his most Christian Majesty no nobler work than to destroy a flourishing city, and burn down convents? She knew how René, at the risk of his own life, had hurried to the rescue of the fugitive nuns, and had been able to save the poor, terror-stricken creatures. Though loyalty held him silent, he was full of pity for the Doge, Francesco Imperiale Lescaro, even now on his weary, humiliating journey, against all the traditions and the laws of the State, which forbade the head of the Republic to leave Genoa.

Yes, it was a pity. And yet the girl could not restrain a mutinous thrill of delight, every time her thoughts rested on that stately ceremony, to which she was an invited guest.

The news tarried long. Easter had come and gone, when on a certain day the young Duchesse de Maillebois received a letter, and casting all etiquette to the winds, broke unannounced, with her light dancing step, into the dim seclusion of the convent library. In this retreat of learning, where long, straight rows of ancient brown volumes and yellow folios looked down approvingly, Madame de Sainte Géneviève was delicately beating out gold leaf to replace a faded initial letter, a glorified "M," while her young companion sat with bowed head over a black-letter missal.

"Yvonne, Yvonne!" cried the new-comer, breathless with eagerness. "I have a message from Héloise. The Doge reached Paris on the 16th day of April, and the audience at Versailles is fixed for May the 15th. She is coming to fetch us next week, and has gorgeous dreams of toilette for us. Pardon, Madame," she added, turning with a sunny smile and a profound curtsey to the gentle nun, who looked up at her with mild amazement; "but an invitation, nay a command, from his Majesty the King is a great event for two little school girls!"

There was a pause for one breathing space; then Madame de Sainte Géneviève fixed her near-sighted eyes on first one girl, then the other, with the wistful, questioning gaze of one who would read the hidden future. She laid her thin, transparent fingers on Yvonne's slim wrist.

"Dear child," she began dreamily, "I have watched you day by day, and for me it is plainly written, that God has chosen you to serve Him in the religious life. Do not be lured away by the vain pomps of the world. I had almost said, do not stoop to be the guest of an earthly king, when you have been chosen by the King of kings to abide and dwell for ever in His presence."

She spoke in a low, earnest tone, thrilled with emotion, and her hands were clasped in supplication. But it was Gabrielle who sprang forward to answer, and in her voice was the ring of battle.

"Nay, Madame. But this is a sacred promise, which Mademoiselle de la Féronniere may not break Trust me, she will come back to you unscathed. One swallow does not make a summer," she cried.

Then as her glance swept round the shelves laden with those musty old leather books, she added, with a sudden inspiration:

"Ah, you live here in the midst of the past, dear Madame. The echoes of bygone battles, the lives of departed heroes, saints, and sinners; deeds of glory, deeds of shame, all alike murmur softly to you from these walls, and well-nigh soothe you to sleep. But we who are young, we would be in the thick of the fight, we crave to see history in the making—aye, to look with our own eyes on the Doge of Genoa, when he does obeisance to the King of France" who knows whether her shining example may not guide you to the better way, and bring blessing to your soul from the golden gates of Paradise?"

The young girls readily promised, and, indeed, needed no persuasion to be present on that occasion. They were full of sympathy

"She laid her thin, transparent fingers on Yvonne's slim wrist."—p. 423.

The old nun smiled, for the girl's eager, burning words recalled half-forgotten instincts, buried deep down in her nature She was vanquished, but she would make one last appeal.

"Ah, my children, you have not yet learnt that all is vanity. But I would claim a promise from you. At least, you will join us to-morrow, when Mademoiselle de la Roche-Aymon makes her profession and takes the veil? Dear Mademoiselle de la Féronniere, for their bright, popular school-fellow, who was on the eve of that irrevocable step—Adèle de la Roche-Aymon, the eldest of three sisters who were all to enter the convent of l'Abbaye aux Bois, in order that the small patrimony of their brother, the head of the family, might not be reduced by finding them dowries.

On the morning of the eventful day there was an atmosphere of excitement, which reminded Gabrielle of her wedding day. The courtyard was filled with grand chariots, for all the novice's relations, who were of the oldest aristocracy in France, crowded to be present at the sacrifice.

The gorgeous, fashionable company had already half filled the convent chapel when Adèle entered, pale as death, but looking very lovely in her white crape dress, embroidered with silver and spangled with shining stars.

Her godmother, the Duchesse d'Aubusson, a big, gaunt woman in stiff brocade, walked by her side, bearing a tall, lighted wax taper. The young girl, on whom all eyes were fixed, took her place in a great carved chair in the choir, and the service began. Gabrielle and Yvonne, unobserved in the crowd, had found a place where they could be together, half hidden in the shadow of a pillar, and where they could see everything. Not far off, sitting with their class, of the white ribbons, were the two younger sisters, Lucille and Henriette, gazing with open-eyed awe and terror.

"Poor children! It will be their turn next." And the young Duchess gave a little shiver at the thought of what she herself had so narrowly escaped. "Look," she added, "the Archbishop has risen. He is to preach to-day."

The sermon which followed was a triumph of suave eloquence, and beseemed the august congregation. Monseigneur began with the past history of the great Cistercian order, from its earliest foundation. He pointed to the splendid copper tomb of Jean de Nesle and his wife Anne d'Entragues, famous benefactors of the Order, in the reign of Louis le Gros: then he dwelt with unction on the holy life of Sainte Hourbelle, the mother of St. Bernard, one of their most ancient saints. He lightly touched on the changing fortunes of this special branch of the Cistercians, and told how they had at length taken up their abode here, thirty years before, in the convent of the Dix Vertus, which the Annonciades of Bourges had just left.

Then the preacher launched forth boldly into admiration of the splendid work of education, undertaken with so much success at the Abbaye aux Bois by the holy ladies, themselves of the best blood in France, the very elect of the kingdom. Under their fostering care, every virtue, every talent, every grace was brought to perfection.

Would the world ever see again such wives and mothers, such brilliant ornaments of society, such saintly women, as the pupils of these Cistercian nuns? After a pause, he turned from the community at large to the individual, and the tender personal note in his address held the audience with a breathless spell.

"My sisters—for it is to you I would speak—a certain maiden who once joined the religious life is reported to have said, 'I was not good enough for man, so I was given to God.' But, my sisters, what shall we say of her, the peerless young girl who this day offers herself, her beauty, her purity, her talents, on the altar of her God? Ah, my sweet child, surely yours is the crowning merit, that you should thus forsake and renounce a world which you would adorn by your grace, and glorify by your virtue, of which you would have been the most radiant ornament!"

The prelate's voice had as many modulations as a delicate musical instrument; but here it broke and melted into a long, sighing breath. He was overcome by his own pathetic eloquence.

There was a hush of awe; then a low, thrilling murmur of sympathy, interrupted by sobs, as all eyes were turned towards the shrinking Adèle, who flushed scarlet for one brief moment, then grew pale as death.

Lucille and Henriette wept aloud. Every heart was touched, and many tears were shed; but the young creature herself stood in the midst, dry-eyed and statue-like. Had she wept out her soul while hope still lingered?

Resplendent in her bridal dress, like a victim adorned for the sacrifice, she was led to the cloister gate, which was loudly shut and bolted behind her. Then, as she stood within the grating of the choir, pale and trembling, more dead than alive, two of the nuns took off the wedding garments, and tore away her ornaments. Then they cut off the long, fair hair, which fell in shining tresses below her waist, and laid it on a silver dish, which was placed in front of the altar. After this, the novice was solemnly clothed in the habit of the Cistercian Order, above her veil was placed a crown of white roses, and she knelt before the abbess to make her vows.

"I make my vow to God, at your hands, Madame—of poverty, of humility, of obedience, of chastity, and of a cloistered life, according to the rule of St. Benedict, observance of St. Bernard, order of Citeaux, filiation of Clairvaux."

Mademoiselle Adèle de la Roche-Aymon, who had taken the name in religion of Madame Sainte Petronille, then advanced to the middle of the choir, when she was laid prostrate, and a mortuary pall was spread over her. Then the solemn "Miserere" was chanted by the sweet voices of the nuns, followed by the long service of prayer for the dead, and as the sad lament of the "Dies Iræ" echoed through the convent chapel, each wailing note was the heart-throb of a funeral dirge.

CHAPTER XI.

THE King's guests were arriving. The magnificent Palace of Versailles, above which the lilies of France floated on the wind, seemed to have just risen from the ground, at the touch of an enchanter's wand.

It was the latest whim of his Majesty Louis XIV., on which he had already lavished untold wealth, in carrying out the marvellous designs of the architect Mansard; while the unrivalled gardens, with their terraces and parterres and alleys, their profusion of statues and fountains, were the chef-d'œuvre of Le Nôtre. In the great park beyond, forest trees had been newly transplanted, at a fabulous cost, from the woods of Fontainebleau and Marly, and even now an immense army of labourers was slaving at the Herculean task of attempting to turn the course of the river Eure, and convey it by an aqueduct, that it might water the Royal pleasaunce of Versailles.

Through the Place des Armes, gorgeous equipages, drawn by six horses, with postilions and outriders, seemed to form an endless procession to the great gateway. White statues gleamed through a leafy screen of exotic plants, in the inner courtyard, gay with the resplendent uniform of the King's household guards. Here the favoured visitors alighted at the foot of the massive steps, where their names were proclaimed aloud and shouted on from one obsequious official to another, up the lofty staircase, till they reached the presence of the monarch.

Here, within the antechamber of the great salon, stood a group of young nobles, idly lounging about with easy assurance, while they made comments in an under-tone on the new arrivals.

"There goes the Duc de Maillebois, with his young Duchesse, fresh from the convent but yesterday! I was at her wedding last year, but they sent her back to the nuns till she was seventeen," said one.

"On my faith, a dainty little lady! With a will of her own, too, if those flashing eyes speak truth!" rejoined another. "Pity that 'tis a case of May and December! But, see how gracious the King is to her. After such a début her success is assured. And who are those who follow close behind?"

"Oh, that is her sister, the Marquise de Chamans, with her husband. A right good companion is Jean de Chamans—plays high at lansquenet, and knows how to lose! As for Madame, her salon is the last mode."

"Why, all the family is here. That young officer is Réné de Beaumanoir, her brother. By the bye, he distinguished himself in the Genoese expedition, so of course he would be invited to see the Doge's submission."

"And who is that tall, fair girl with them? Did I catch the name aright? Mademoiselle de la Féronniere? I seem to know the name of that family. Surely they were Huguenots of Poitou."

"You are right. The Comte, her father, is dead, and she is an only child and a great heiress, brought up in the same convent as the little Duchesse de Maillebois. Do you see that lean, sallow youth in the blue casaque, lined with red, standing in attendance, a little way behind the King?"

"Yes, I see his scowling face! Don't I know him?"

"Of course you do. He is Adolphe de Vaudreuil, one of his Majesty's écuyers, and a pushing sycophant. Well, he is a cousin of the Huguenot girl, and no doubt an aspirant to her hand. He may well look black, to see the smile which passed between Beaumanoir and the young beauty as they moved on, side by side, into the Audience Chamber. It looks like a spoke in his wheel. Come, de Polignac, we two had best be moving if we desire a good place."

The young men passed on arm-in-arm through the crowd, a very galaxy of fashion, into the splendid Hall of Peace, with its marvellous ceiling, painted by Le Brun and Mignaud, representing so many gods and goddesses that it seemed like a whole mythological world.

There was a raised amphitheatre on either side, the seats covered with crimson velvet, to which the ladies of the Court were conducted, with much rustling of silk and brocade, all smiling and whispering to each other. At their feet all the nobles took place, according to precedence, standing side by side, in a double row.

They had not long to wait before the King, in his gorgeous dress, covered with jewels, entered from a side door, followed by the Royal princes. He ascended the gilt throne at the end of the great gallery, over which his emblem was hung in triumph, the sun sending forth golden rays over all the globe, with the motto, "Nec Pluribus Impar."

Ranged around him, in dazzling array, were the Dauphin, the Duc de Chartres, son of the Duc d'Orléans, the Duc de Bourbon, the Duc de Condé, the Duc du Maine, and the Comte de Toulouse.

When the august company was all assembled, there was a hush of expectation, and all eyes were turned towards the great door, which was thrown open with a flourish of trumpets as "The most potent Signor Françesco Imperiale Lescaro, his Sereneness the Doge of Genoa" was announced. He was followed by the four chosen senators—Signori Lonelino, Garebardo, Durazza, and Salvago—all resplendent in their picturesque Venetian costume.

In slow and stately order, they passed through the double line of nobles, until they reached the open space in front of the throne. The Doge uncovered and did obeisance, then at the King's request replaced his cap of embroidered crimson velvet. According to formal etiquette, the Princes of the Blood also resumed their plumed hats, but the Genoese senators remained bare-headed.

Then the Act of Submission was dictated by Monseigneur de Seignelay, and read aloud by the Doge, who, with special indulgence, was offered a folding stool. The most ignominious clauses in the conditions of peace were the following:

"That the Genoese shall disarm all their gallies but six, and shall arm no more without the consent of his most Christian Majesty.

"That all the French King's subjects that are forced from their good estate shall be reimbursed."

The King listened with the utmost politeness, and then rose from his throne, and gave orders that his presents should be brought forward—a magnificent box with his portrait and a suite of tapestry from the Gobelins. When these had been duly accepted, with courteous thanks, his most Christian Majesty probably thought that he had sufficiently asserted his dignity, for he left the Audience Chamber with the Doge, like an honoured guest, walking at his right hand.

Thus the great ceremony came to an end, and the guests lost no time in dispersing, to wander at their pleasure through the gilded salons and courts and gardens, which at that date had all the charm of novelty. This would give them a breathing space before the great banquet, which was to be followed by a ball.

Once more the Chevalier de Beaumanoir found himself by the side of Mademoiselle de la Féronniere, and together they passed forth, unnoticed amid the gay crowd, which flaunted and bowed low, and twittered around them. As they stepped out on the broad terrace into the sunshine and the balmy air of May, they turned aside, half unconsciously, and their steps led them down an alley belted with palms to the orangery, a perfect tropical grove. Before them was a fountain of Ganeymede, with upraised arms, from whose urn the gleaming waters trickled into a marble basin of goldfish.

"Mademoiselle, how I have longed for this hour!" cried Réné.

"It was a splendid pageant," said Yvonne simply; "but my heart ached for the stately Doge, humbled and put to shame in the midst of his triumphant enemies."

He gave no heed to her words. What were King and Doge to him, now that once again he could look upon the face which had haunted his waking dreams, through those long months of absence? He had so much to say, and only these few brief stolen minutes in which to pour forth the pent-up thoughts of a lifetime! He did not pause to consider what marvellous witchcraft had placed in the hands of this young girl the key to his heart; he only knew that as the flower turns to the sun, so his waiting eyes looked towards her, as the guide of his conscience and the arbiter of his destiny.

He longed to tear asunder the veil which must ever hide one human soul from another, to lay bare the most intimate recesses of his life, with its struggles, its failures, its aspirations! But words failed him to touch upon a subject so vast, with issues so tremendous, high as Heaven, deep as Hell. When at length he broke silence, in answer to Yvonne's wondering glance, it was but to skim lightly on the surface of that infinite ocean whose depths, for a moment, had been dimly and vaguely revealed to him.

"What a change this brilliant scene must be from your quiet convent life! I always think of you in that atmosphere of calm and peace!" he exclaimed. "When I was in Rome I would go day after day to the Vesper service of the Blue Nuns of the Perpetual Adoration; and as I listened to the sweet voices, rising and falling in soft cadence, your image was ever before me; but, alas! so far away, so unattainable. I was of the earth, merely one of the common herd who throng the market-place, while you stood alone, at the gate of Heaven."

"Ah, you little know!" replied the girl, eager to disclaim such rare pre-eminence. "We are all very human. I doubt if you would find anywhere such a wilful, high-spirited set as my companions—more worthy of their fighting, marauding ancestors than of their convent training.

"But tell me more about Rome. There is so much that I would know. You were in the very stronghold of your faith, on the soil where the martyrs lived and died. Did you find it, indeed, a holy city, flooded with spiritual life?"

He shook his head sadly. "Rome had no such aspect for me. I saw all the magnificence which wealth and luxury could flaunt, side by side with the most pitiful wretchedness and poverty. I saw great religious pageants and processions, in which figured princes of the Church, whom, perhaps, I had met at some banquet the night before, and shrunk from their worldliness and corruption. I have seen a prostrate multitude in the great church of St. Peter's, and have been less moved to heartfelt prayer than on board ship, with a few sailors by my side, and sea and sky around me."

The young man paused for a moment, and Yvonne made no answer. Her heart was too full for words. What if this craving for a simpler worship might be the first awakening of his soul, his earliest protest against the errors and the overladen ritual of the Church of Rome?

She remembered that already he had a leaning towards Jansenist views, and had no love for those formal outward acts, the use of the rosary, the daily repetition of the breviary, and the constant confession to the priest before the Sacrament.

The girl had been too much absorbed in the delight of Réné's company to take much notice of the world around. But now that his voice was silent, she became suddenly aware that they were no longer alone, for the King's guests seemed to be streaming towards the tropical garden. Scraps of merry talk were borne to her on the breeze, the sounds of laughter echoed in her ears, and more than once she caught the curious glance of a passer-by fixed upon her and her companion.

"Monsieur le Chevalier, shall we return to the palace, and meet your sisters?" she asked, looking up with a quiet smile.

"Not yet, I pray you; not yet, Mademoiselle!" he pleaded. "We have had no time. I have told you nothing. You remember the ring which I promised you—the ancient gem dug up in a vineyard on the Palatine?"

As he spoke, he drew it from his finger, and held it towards her.

"You see that delicate girlish figure cut in a carnelian? I am told by those learned in antiquities that this is Egeria, the nymph who inspired the noble life and deeds of Numa. Will you accept the jewel for my sake, and be my Egeria?"

In that dazzling moment of sudden illumination, when Yvonne realised that her shadowy dream was a reality, she was amazed at her own calmness. It seemed so natural, so inevitable; surely she had known it from all eternity. Réné loved her, and the whole world was flooded with joy and sunshine.

Yet her clear vision was undimmed. Not for one moment did she forget that an impassable barrier rose between them, and that this meeting, snatched from adverse fate, might well be the prelude to an eternal farewell!

She took the ring, and raised it to her lips.

"You think too highly of me, Monsieur. I can admire noble deeds, but not inspire them. I will keep this gem for your sake, but my future is dim. I cannot pierce the cloud which hangs over it."

Réné understood, for he, too, shared her forebodings. A sudden impulse shot through his soul.

"Ah, Mademoiselle! Trouble may come to you, and if ever you are in need of help, you will send me that ring? I will come to you from the ends of the earth, and lay my life at your feet. Promise me, Yvonne!"

As his voice rested lovingly on the soft, liquid, long-drawn note of the double consonant, the girl thought that never before had her name sounded so beautiful; but ere she could make that solemn promise, and speak the words which trembled on her lips, the thunderbolt fell, and the airy fabric of her dreams had faded away into the shadowy land of might-have-been.

"Mademoiselle de la Féronniere! How is it that I find you unattended, my cousin?

"Yvonne gave a start of dismay."—p. 430.

And here with the Court at Versailles, when we believed you safe in the convent ?"

The words were spoken in a tone of icy politeness, but Yvonne gave a start of dismay, for the voice was that of Adolphe de Vaudreuil. She had not seen him for more than a year ; but there was no mistaking that narrow, foxy face, the shifty eyes, and cruel mouth. With the air of a dandy, he wore the resplendent costume which the King had chosen for his favourites—the blue velvet casaque, lined with red silk ; a red vest, fantastically embroidered with gold and silver ; a cravat, and cuffs of rich lace.

At one glance the girl read his fierce anger and vindictive purpose, and knew that he was unchanged. He must have seen her when she was presented to the King, and relentlessly pursued her the moment he was free. Her courage rose to meet the occasion. With unruffled temper, she made a sedate curtsey.

"Monsieur de Vaudreuil, permit me to present you to the brother of my dearest friend, the Duchesse de Maillebois—Monsieur le Chevalier Réné Gaston de Beaumanoir. You cannot have been aware of his presence."

If a glance of hatred could have killed Réné he would have died then and there ; but young de Vaudreuil remembered in time that a brawl with the Beaumanoirs would be no recommendation to the favour of the haughty, self-willed girl whom he meant to make his wife. He controlled himself with an effort, and remarked in a drawling tone ;

"Ah, Monsieur, I have heard of you. Shall we try our fortune in the tennis court this afternoon ?"

"With pleasure, Monsieur de Vaudreuil. Fame speaks of you as an expert," replied the young officer, with ready courtesy.

He fully realised the dangerous strain of the situation. One hasty word, and a duel, with all its scandal, would be the inevitable consequence. It struck him as a humorous suggestion that he and his rival should fight their battle on another field—the tennis court, where he too hoped to hold his own.

"Mademoiselle, my cousin, you may not have heard that my father and mother have returned from Poitou, and are now here with the Court ? Allow me to conduct you to them, that you may account for your presence here."

There was a covert menace in the tone, which the girl's quick ear could not fail to catch. But she turned with a brave smile, and there was no tremor, no faltering in her light reply.

"This is news indeed, Monsieur de Vaudreuil. We will accept your escort with pleasure, and lose no time in paying our respects."

Yvonne came of a gallant race, and to the last she would show a fearless front, though she had learnt that already the enemy was at the gate, and knew in her inmost soul that captivity and the bread of affliction awaited her.

[END OF CHAPTER ELEVEN.

THE VOICES OF ANGELS.

A Sermon Preached at Balmoral Castle on October 30th, 1892, in the presence of the late Queen, the Royal Family and Household, by the Rev. W. W. Tulloch, D.D.

"And I heard the voice of many angels."—REVELATION v. 11.

WE do not keep saints' days in the Church of Scotland. But some days are dearer to Scottish people than others. They have associations which we are unwilling to part with; customs are connected with them which we delight to retain. To-morrow evening sees a popular Scottish festival come round once again. It is what is known as Hallowe'en or All Hallows Eve, and the leading idea in regard to it is that it is the time of all others when supernatural influences prevail. And if the festival is of pagan origin, as is believed, it is a somewhat singular coincidence that it should fall on the eve of a day on which in the Church of England are commemorated the saints or the holy ones of God, the pure and triumphant ones who have gone hence.

In any case, it cannot fail to do us good to think at such a season of the year as this, when the natural year is waning and another winter season of desolation and death has to be faced, of some of the pure, life-giving, upward-leading influences to which we may be subject, to listen to the voices of some of the many angels on earth and in heaven which may be heard by the bending and attentive ear of faith.

Is it not true that everywhere, and at all times, we are surrounded by spiritual influences, and may hear even in this life the voices of ministering spirits—of many angels? Do not such influences dwell in the forces of Nature? Is it not their office to wean us from what is degrading and debasing, to make us seek after what is elevating and ennobling, to lead us from Nature up to Nature's God? "What, when the sun rises, do you not see a disc of fire somewhat like a guinea?" asked someone of the poet Blake. "Ah! no," he answered, "I see an innumerable company of the Heavenly Host, crying 'Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty'"; and perhaps it was some such feeling as this which made the beautiful hymn which has these words for its refrain such a favourite with our dear dead Laureate, whose own clear note has indeed been as the voice of an angel to many of us throughout our lives. And many a time, I am sure, at sunrise, or in the pageant which possesses the western horizon at the evening hour, we have beheld Blake's vision and seen angel figures, with sweet fresh young faces and golden hair, harping upon their harps of gold. We have seen them bending towards us from the blue sky in the sweet sunlight. They have stretched out hands to us from waving trees and bending bracken and lovely little flowers. We have heard their voices in the whispering wind, in the notes of birds, in the laughter of the white waves upon the yellow sands, and in the music of a burn as it trotted gaily through a glen.

We have had a vision of angels, too, in moonlight and starlight nights, and those who have lost little children might, as they gazed at the beautiful stars, almost believe in the truth of the old legend which told of the moon being a kind goddess taking to herself the souls of the little ones who had died These are the stars, and she their kind nurse Many mothers know that children never die. The well-remembered faces shine out in the dark nights, and they still hear the music of their voices, though none hear or see but themselves.

And the children who, thanks to the good Father, are alive and with us—do they not exercise the best influence over us? For their sakes, we try to keep a good name. We are often kept from evil by the thought of them. "In old days," says George Eliot, "there were angels who came and took men away from the City of Destruction. We see no white-winged angels now. But yet men are led away from the threatening destruction; a hand is put in theirs, which leads them away gently into a calm, bright land, so that they look no more backwards, and the hand may be a little child's."

And we know that it is not only our children's goodness and innocence that minister to us, but also their fretfulness, their waywardness, the anxiety they give us. These also minister. They deepen our nature. They make us more self-sacrificing, more able, like the good angels, to succour and defend others. And a good mother, a pure sister, a helpful wife, a kind and wise husband, even if only a blessed memory, are such not angels? Do they not exercise saintly influences to encourage us in all goodness—of a truth, angels now perchance in very reality drawing our thoughts upwards and onwards, "on and always on," and sometimes stealing very close to us, touching us with the old touch of love, bidding us be of good heart, to live and work a little longer for their dear sakes, and whispering hopefully of meeting once again.

We must not then say there are no angels in the world; all who minister to others, all who help to succour and defend those in any weakness or darkness, are such. As a doctor or a minister goes his sad rounds among the sick, the sorrowful, the dying, he sees them:

"I have seen angels by the sick one's pillow,
Theirs' the soft sound and noiseless tread;
Where smitten hearts were drooping like the willow,
They stood between the dying and the dead."

And the dead, the blessed dead, the innocent lives taken before their souls were touched by any stain of sin; those who have kept themselves unspotted from the world; those who have fought temptation and conquered, overcoming the evil in their nature; those who have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb, which is the spirit of self-sacrifice; those who now carry the palm branch of triumph, who have come out of great tribulation, who have dared and fought and suffered for God and truth and right, who have lived and given themselves away for others—yea, died for others; who have filled the world with noble inventions and beautiful thoughts, who have put new songs into our mouths to enable us to attune our steps the better to the melody of "the everlasting chime," do we not see them still clothed in robes of virgin white? Do we not hear their voices sounding all the more melodious and imperative now that they are numbered with the saints in glory everlasting? Do we not hear the voices of many angels, bidding us "on and always on"?

And how many are the voices of such that poor mortals who live long in the world have to listen to with hearts nigh breaking because the loss is so recent and so hard to bear, the voices of little children, of pure maidens and high-souled young men, of mothers who had to leave their little ones, of wives torn from protecting, sheltering arms of husbands who were not allowed to remain, though needed so very much; of some whom we hoped would have laid us to rest, and now we have to lay them in the vigour of full manhood low in the grave, as was the case a few days ago with a noble lady dear to our Queen and revered and loved by many from the highest to the humblest. Ah! yes, the voices are many which call us from earth to heaven; the forms which bend out of the skies to us are almost more than we can number: "wherefore seeing we also are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race that is set before us, looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith; Who for the joy that was set before Him endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God."

And so running what remains to us of the race of life, we need not dread so much when there comes near us, when we hear the voice of the shrouded Angel Azrael, the Angel of Death, and listen to the flapping of his wings; for we know the Angel of Death is also the Angel of Life, and that, if death divides, it also reunites, and in a scene which may not be so unfamiliar after all, not unlike what we hoped for, but inexpressibly more beautiful, the love, the old love found again, but inexpressibly more dear, more tender beyond words to express, the life more angelic than anything we had dreamt of, and where all are as the angels of God in heaven.

That we may reach that happy land, and hear once again the voices of those whom we have loved and lost (then in deed and in truth the voices of many angels) let us say at the hour of our death:

"Angels, ever bright and fair,
Take, oh! take me, to your care
Speed to your own courts my flight,
Clad in robes of virgin white!
Take, oh! take me, to your care."

Let this be our prayer, as also the beautiful words of the dying Laureate:

"When the dumb hour, clothed in black,
Brings the dreams about my bed,
Call me not so often back,
Silent voices of the dead,
Towards the lowland ways behind me,
And the sunlight that is gone.
Call me, rather, silent voices,
Forward to the starry track,
Glimmering up the heights beyond me,
On and always on."

OUR SINGER OF THE SNOWS.

SINGER and banqueter at life's spent hearth,
Delightful Robin! in thy small red breast
The glory of the winter is expreſt—
The hope that triumphs o'er the season's dearth
And sings its spring-songs to the ice-bound earth,
Thy sympathy with man, thy spirit brave,
Thy tireless song, sweet haunter of the grave,
Prove thee Love's minstrel, and of heavenly birth.

My heart leaps up to see thy ruddy flame,
A fire of beauty in the wintry cold,
As once up-leaped the poet's to behold
The enclouded rainbow. Well did old acclaim
Hail thee God's bird. Might we, 'mid frost and snow,
Like thee, dear Robin, keep love's fire aglow!

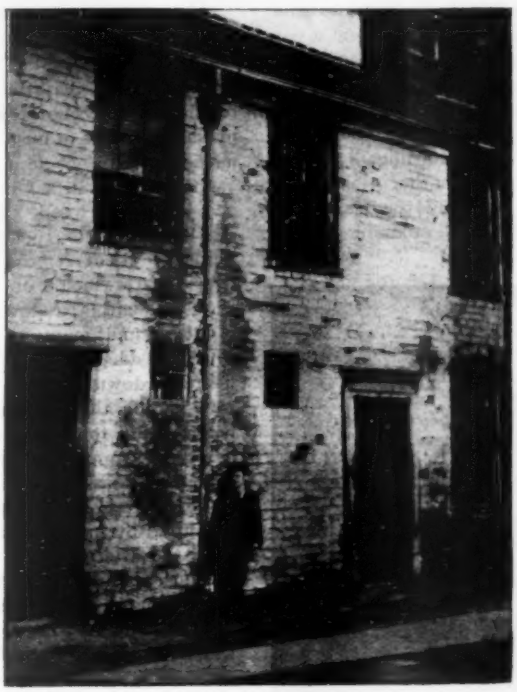
PAULINE W. ROOSE.

A DARK SPOT IN A GREAT CITY.

CHANCE led me some time ago into a district the very opposite in every way to that "Industrial Paradise"—of which we have had the pleasure of reading so much recently—designed by Mr. George Cadbury, not only to house his workpeople, but also to raise them from the demoralising and unhealthy life to which the overwhelming majority of factory workers and unskilled labourers are so hopelessly condemned to-day.

A very direct contrast to healthy, rural Bourneville is the parish of St. Laurence, situated on the northern side of Birmingham. For general squalor, misery, and criminal capabilities, this district is unequalled in the rest of the city, and rivals many of its contemporary London rookeries. To give a description of its network of mean streets and rabbit-warren of courts, with their horrible, unwholesome, two-roomed houses, mostly built on the back-to-back system—which, of course, absolutely excludes all possibilities of ventilation—would be impossible; it will suffice to say that the parish contains all those qualities which make slum-life horrible, in a superlative degree; consists of 8,000 inhabitants, and extends over fifteen acres of ground; and that the whole area was officially condemned rather more than two years ago. But with the exception of closing a few impossibly bad courts and a certain amount of pharisaical outward cleansing of some of the worst houses in the worst streets, the condemned area remains in much the same condition as it did before it was declared to be unfit for human habitation.

My first impression of St. Laurence was a sensation of shadow. The dark, heavy smoke from many factory chimneys seemed to hang over the long, grey streets like a pall; open doors of some of the dingy houses showed dim, gloomy interiors, and the very demeanour of the untidy, slatternly women, who hung about the entrances of courts and houses, slunk into dirty beershops, or went listlessly about such work as they had to perform, added to the feeling of depression. Inertia was in the very atmosphere; mental, moral, and physical inertia showed itself on every side, in the pallid, ill-kept children, who in their turn idled in the gutters, too languid to play with their companions, in the absolutely hopeless attitudes of the women, many of whom were entirely supporting their large families as best they could, and in the dirty rooms in which they lived.



Those are, indeed, typical of the district. A panelling of battered, painted wood, about thirty inches high, runs round the room; above it, on the walls, a paper which leaves on the retina an impression of blurred yellowish brown, is pealing away, the crumbling plaster beneath showing a multitude of holes; the quarries on the floors are in many cases cracked and set in at precarious angles, and frequently allow damp to ooze through their joints, and over all an indescribable odour prevails.

In the furniture one sees much variety. There may be a table and chairs of a sort, but it is probable that a broken stool or two, an empty box, the ubiquitous paraffin lamp (that prominent weapon of defence and assault), and a bundle of rags will complete the whole inventory of the inmates' household gods.

The genius loci of this district is the vicar, the Rev. T. J. Bass. His staff consists of two Church Army nurses and a typist. For all the numerical smallness of the workers, many institutions have been organised by the vicar, and are carried on successfully. Thrift societies, holiday funds, mothers' meetings, men's clubs, the social meetings of which are very largely attended, and—most important of all and most difficult of all to manage—the Girls' Club. Here the girls are entertained as much as possible, taught to sew, and encouraged to sing and amuse themselves; but, most popular, and probably what attracts the majority of recruits in the first instance, are the physical drill and the simpler forms of gymnasium work in which they are instructed. For all that, recruits are hard to find—as, indeed, they are for any of the above-mentioned societies—and when obtained, are at first difficult to keep. It forms a heavy addition to the nurses' duties to persuade the girls to give up harmful acquaintances, and to keep them away from the doubtful amusements of the streets. When they first come to the Club they are the undiluted essence of the modern factory girl—unkempt, untidy, their everyday language of a lurid type, perilously quick to take offence, and, when roused, as primitive in their passions and as ready with their fists and tongues as the proverbial bargee. But, for all that, they rise—and so do the elder men and women who can be persuaded to awaken their self-respect, and who can be encouraged to practise thrifty and cleanly habits—but, as surely as they do improve, so equally surely do they shake themselves entirely free from the Slough of Despond, and leave the parish, their places being immediately filled by the perpetually out-of-work class. For the parish of St. Laurence is recognised by the people themselves to be the outward sign of having reached the bedrock of their descent; they know that, living in [illegible], they can go no lower down the social scale, until death or the workhouse claims them for their own; and to anyone knowing the inner workings of their lives, either of those contingencies is a certain amelioration of their lot.

The notes of a single day's observations amongst these people may prove instructive as well as interesting reading. Having started at about 9.30 a.m., I was, first of all, present at an inspection of the school children for the purpose of detecting eye troubles. Amongst 250 children twenty-six cases of ophthalmia, convergent squints, and other troubles, were picked out in under five minutes. This prevalence of ophthalmic disorders is attributed largely to the presence of a chemical factory, which at times gives off such tremendously strong fumes that people unaccustomed to the neighbourhood find their eyes running and are seized with uncontrollable coughing. À propos of this same factory, I was once told by the chief of the City Fire Brigade that during a rather severe fire on the premises twenty of his men on duty had their boots absolutely eaten off their feet, and their uniforms totally ruined by the action of an acid manufactured there.

HOUSES IN THE ROOKERY.

After eye inspection, I visited with the vicar twenty houses at different parts of the parish; and in these, four women, whose husbands were out of work, were supporting their families, One was "closing" curtain hooks (joining the hook on to the pin), being paid at the rate of threepence for twelve gross, and had kept herself, husband, and one child for twelve weeks by her work. Two others, one having four children, and the other three, were engaged in sewing hooks and eyes on cards. One of them, two of whose small children were able to help her a little, told me, "We sit at it all day sometimes, and then can only do twenty-four gross" —for which they received ninepence, but had to find their own needles and thread. I have since heard of many cases where the women who collect the finished cards for the factories from these home-workers, demand from them a percentage on each gross, which, small as it may be, is a serious item to a woman who earns under a shilling for a long day's work, and has to keep herself and four children. One family only, out of those seen that morning, did not require help in some form or another—dispensary notes, coal, or groceries—and the responsible head of that was a woman who took in washing, and whose small household belongings, including the mangle on which her young family practically depended for their daily bread, had a week before been seized for the debt of three shillings and threepence, one week's rent. At the crucial moment the vicar had heard of what was going on, and had come to the rescue.

A PARTLY DEMOLISHED HOUSE, SHOWING CONSTRUCTION.

Amongst other small trades followed by the women and girls of the district are button-carding, for which much the same rate of payment prevails—twenty-four gross sewn on cards bringing in from 8d. to 10d.—and salt-hawking. I only met or heard of one girl who had tried domestic service. Her experience had, I fancy, been a very short one, and she showed a marked disinclination to return to it, for she said she "couldn't do without having her evenings free."

Wood-chopping and selling is also a popular trade, but mostly followed by men, though the female members of the family generally assist by making up the sticks into bundles of the required size. The largest profit that can be made in this line of business is 6d. a load, and it usually takes a whole day to dispose of one.

After these visits I inspected a court which had just been closed. The yard ran down hill at a marked angle; pools of stagnant water and mud lay about it, the slime actually oozing over the thresholds of the houses situated at the lower end; windows were nearly destitute of glass, and many of the doors would not shut. Inside, the damp oozed up through the floor and down through the roof; the ceilings were so low that anyone even below average height could touch them. The plaster was in a more than usually appalling condition, and sanitation was practically non-existent; but up to quite recently these hovels had been inhabited by human beings.

In the afternoon we made more visits, and amongst others were asked to see some people said to have been ill for several days. We found a man, his wife, and child, lying in a room which left barely space to walk round the bed. All were in a state of high fever, and their complaints were highly suggestive of that scourge of slum life, typhoid. Such it proved to be, and after much trouble and many delaying formalities they were removed to a hospital, the man declaring that all his family had died in hospital and that he should, too. Strangely enough, his prediction proved true.

Owing to what I will only call exceedingly defective sanitary arrangements, an enormous number of typhoid cases were subsequently removed from that same court.

After visiting up to 6.30, the dispensary notes, coal tickets, etc., had to be made out, and we started to deliver them. We visited other houses besides, and had many more cases to report for investigation on the following day.

THE ONLY GROUP THAT WOULD FACE THE CAMERA.

In many of the houses I saw men who were known to be under police supervision; at others we heard of husbands who were what they described as "away" or "inside," nearly all these cases being burglars in what we may call a small line of business; and some few were absent on account of wife assaults, which, unfortunately, are most painfully common in this district. When I was on the point of leaving the parish at about 10.30 I saw one of these occurrences, without which no evening's work in St. Laurence would be complete, for "Might is right" is one of the unwritten laws of the district as far as the settlement of domestic affairs goes. Sometimes a few words of judicious advice may nip the quarrel in the bud, but only if one comes on the scene in time to prevent the neighbours from giving their advice, which mostly consists of pointing out the most vulnerable spot to place a blow.

Such were the observations in one day of a casual visitor. I must have been into at least sixty houses in the course of that day, and have since systematically explored the parish without finding in it a single better-housed or better-off person than those I encountered on my first visit. It is the sort of work that a lay worker might do day after day, without ever coming to the end of the distress and illness that fill the parish. The tiny staff struggles with it from early morning till late at night. Five a.m. till 11.30 p.m. are quite usual hours; and though the parish is without resources in itself, what is required even more than monetary help is personal assistance. Mr. Bass is trying to form a woman's settlement, for much work lies in the parish that can only be done by women for women, and many souls and bodies are being hopelessly wrecked for want of helpers. Volunteers, should they only be able to give a few hours weekly, would be most welcome. Much might be done by them in reporting cases of sickness alone. It is no uncommon thing for illness to go unnoticed by other members of a family. In fact, infectious cases have been known to be wilfully concealed. The spread of an epidemic in these crowded courts and houses is both rapid and terrible in its effects. It is no uncommon thing either, whilst doing this kind of work, when making inquiries about people of whom one has lost sight for a month or two, to be told "Wot? Them as used ter live in that 'ouse? Oh, they're both dead, miss."

But the real source of all the evil, of the drunkenness, and of all the vices that are so terribly rampant in this district, is the way in which these poor people are housed, for none of them have homes. Certainly, there is a roof over their heads, shared by perhaps ten or twelve people—two small rooms! You cannot expect people to have any idea of decent living if they are herded together like cattle; you cannot expect them to work hard when they are being slowly poisoned by escaping sewer gas or decimated by diseases bred by defective sanitation; but a terrible point about the question is that all attempts to force landlords to improve insanitary property only react against the unfortunate people themselves, inasmuch as the rent is at once put up, and they are forced either to move or else add another lodger or two to their already overcrowded household.

The housing question is one which demands most urgently, and at once, a solution at the hands of the men and women of England. An American author tells us, very truly:

"You cannot let men live like pigs when you need their votes as free men; it is not safe. . . . You cannot rob a child of its childhood, of its home, its play, its freedom from care, and expect to appeal to the grown-up voters' manhood. The children are our to-morrow, and as we mould them to-day so they will deal with us then."

The children are being robbed of their home, their play, and all the softer influences that should surround childhood and form that character of which we shall reap in the to-morrow which will come. What can we expect of the race which has been moulded by influences such as abound in St. Laurence's parish, which is, after all, only one of very many?

The housing question is no longer a matter to be played with by wrangling Town Councils and shirked by landlords, for it is a national menace, a cloud already bigger than a man's hand.

A TYPICAL STREET.

TEMPERANCE NOTES AND NEWS.

By a Leading Temperance Advocate.

A TRIP ROUND THE WORLD.

MISS FLORENCE BALGARNIE is at present engaged on a Temperance tour round the world. She left London some two years ago, and after a prolonged stay in Australia, New Zealand, and Japan, proceeded to India. Since last November

(Photo: W. V. Amey, Landport.)

MISS FLORENCE BALGARNIE.

she has been travelling through India on a mission organised by the secretaries of the Anglo-Indian Temperance Association, and meetings have been held in Ceylon, Tinnevelly, Trichinopoly, Madras, Calcutta, Benares, Cawnpore, Lucknow, Lahore, Delhi, and this month (February) Miss Balgarnie is due in Bombay, and further meetings will be held next month. From first to last the tour has been specially planned with the view of stirring up an increased interest in the Temperance cause. Miss Balgarnie is exceptionally fitted for deputational work. She is a daughter of the late Rev. Robert Balgarnie, of Scarborough, and was educated in London and Germany. She has taken a deep interest in the Cambridge University Extension lectures, and was for some time a member of the Scarborough School Board. She signed the total abstinence pledge in 1877, and has visited America with the special object of studying the prohibition laws. Miss Balgarnie has been for many years a constant contributor to the press, and her little book, "A Plea for the Appointment of Police Matrons," attracted considerable attention in philanthropic circles. She is a powerful speaker, and is very apt in her quick-witted replies to interruptions. Persons fond of asking questions with the view of disconcerting the lecturer generally come off second best in their encounters with this gifted lady. Recent letters from India report that her meetings have been thoroughly successful, and have done much to arouse an enthusiastic interest in the work of the Anglo-Indian Temperance Association, which our readers will remember was founded by the lamented W. S. Caine, M.P.

PROGRESS IN THE ARMY.

The Royal Army Temperance Association in India reports a membership of 21,726, made up of 21,489 military members, in 183 branches in India and Ceylon; and 237 members in eight Volunteer and civil branches. There are also 5,688 honorary members, and 164 juvenile members. The average membership for the year 1903 showed a decrease of 1,073. The Rev. J. H. Bateson, the general secretary, remarks: "The simple meaning of these figures is that we have had larger accessions to our ranks from among the men new to India, and very considerable losses, due to our old members who have left the colours." The military authorities have given frequent testimony to the excellent work done by this association.

SOME STARTLING FIGURES.

Mr. J. H. Whiteley, M.P., recently gave a striking speech on "Temperance Reform from the Business Point of View." He remarked that "he was in a business—that of cotton—where they dealt in sixty-fourths of a penny, and where 1 per cent. of waste which was unnecessary was enough to turn what ought to have been a profit into a loss. In many businesses the men who had made, and who are making, success, were those who kept their eyes on the waste. Taking the last two years they had been spending as a people just over £180,000,000 per year on intoxicating liquor. That worked out at £4 5s. 6d. per head, and per head included women, children, and babies in arms. He estimated that no less a sum than £60,000,000 per annum was spent on excessive drinking. That excess was sheer waste. It was money that ought to have gone in expenditure on clothes, on the house, on travel, and on everything that tended to make for the healthy life of the community. And there was a further dark side to the picture, for this drink waste had to be classed under 'Poverty and the Poor Rate,' 'Police, Crime, and Prisons,' 'Insanity and the cost of Asylums,' and 'the Physical Deterioration of generations yet to come.' When he took a walk through the slums of London and saw the shoeless and ragged children, and thought of the warehouses packed full of goods, and looms not running because of over-production, he realised that what was wanted was power to consume, and that the power to consume had gone in the wrong direction. It had gone to waste instead of going in good things."

A WOMAN'S WORK.

For many years past one of the most earnest and capable Temperance workers in North London has been Mrs. Bailhache, of Crouch End. With a quiet, persuasive persistence, this excellent lady has been a leading spirit in many and well-considered projects for rescuing poor girls and women from the evil influences of intemperance. In opposing licences, in vigilantly watching the due enforcement of the existing licensing laws, and in strenuously pressing forward much-needed reforms, Mrs. Bailhache has rendered conspicuous service. The poor and downtrodden of her sex have long found in her a loving Christian friend, overflowing with sympathy for them in their troubles; and, moreover, willing to spend and be spent in their service. She is a living example of how much good one whole-hearted woman can accomplish when thoroughly in earnest, and her cheerful, sunny disposition leads her to take a courageous view of the ultimate triumph of Temperance principles, despite her intimate knowledge of the seamy side of London life.

(Photo: A. J. Chapman, Crouch End, N.)

MRS. BAILHACHE.

A HINT TO LADY SPEAKERS.

Now that the cause has the benefit of the powerful advocacy of so many gifted lady speakers, may a mere male humbly suggest that much good might be done in working-class neighbourhoods if a few plain, practical suggestions were given by a woman to women-folk in the Temperance meetings as to the making of a good cup of tea, cup of coffee, or cup of cocoa? Talk about a chemical lecture, or a blackboard address, or a magic lantern display, why, a lady speaker who carried a teapot on to the platform, with a kettle and lamp, and made a cup of tea there and then, and let the women "taste and try," would strike out quite a new line, and do a real service to many a working man whose tea, coffee, and cocoa is often spoilt in the brewing.

A TEMPERANCE EXHIBITION.

This month a Temperance Exhibition is to be held in St. Andrew's Hall, Norwich. Canon Humphreys, who has been identified with the work of the Church of England Temperance Society for so many years, has been appealing for the loan of pictures, models, diagrams, old curios, and objects of interest connected with the history of the Temperance movement. Let us hope that the project will be thoroughly successful. Some years ago the Hackney and East Middlesex Band of Hope Union had a splendid exhibition of the kind, and managed to secure the original teetotal pledge in the handwriting of Joseph Livesey of Preston, Thomas Whittaker's historic rattle, one of Father Mathew's medals, an immense collection of portraits of early workers, valuable autographs, and many of the early books of the movement. One interesting feature of the Hackney exhibition was a display of old pledge cards. When one remembers the splendid record which East Anglia has in Temperance story, the Norwich Exhibition should certainly be of exceptional interest.

THE NEW SESSION OF PARLIAMENT.

What has Parliament in store for us? Rumour has been very busy, and party politicians have not been slow to throw out many sagacious hints as to coming legislation. One thing is quite clear. Temperance folk must keep a vigorous look out on their representatives at St. Stephen's. Members of Parliament are not quite independent of the Temperance vote, and if there is a chance of any liquor legislation coming along, those of us outside the House must make the most of our opportunities to tone up the Temperance work of our representatives inside the House. Candidates and would-be candidates for Parliament should be publicly challenged in their meetings to give a clear expression of their opinions on the Temperance question. It is easier to reform a candidate than to reform a member. Energetic voters outside the House may do much to direct the votes of their representatives inside the House.

By the Author of "Colonel Kit."

DAN lifted the baby a little higher, leaning against the projecting woodwork of the window to ease the weight. Not that she was a heavy baby, for she was thin and wasted; but, then, so was Dan himself, and his shoulder blades showed edge-like through his ragged shirt.

"Ain't it prime?" he said, smacking his lips and sniffing. "Extry good to-day."

Baby's face wrinkled in enjoyment as through the ventilator above came a pleasant steam and odour of cooked food. The window was steamy, yet through it could be seen a man in white linen coat and hat busily carving joints and serving dinners.

"Which'll you choose, baby?" asked Dan.

Baby's claw-like fingers patted the pane, and Dan withdrew them hastily, rubbing off with a bit of her frock the marks they had made.

"Bit o' that pie with the gravy a-runnin' down—my, ain't it d'licious! And we'll have taters and marrer with it. I'll choose some of that currant pudden, and we'll have ginger beer to drink. Feed like lords, don't we? Come on then."

He hitched up the baby again, and walked off, a little parcel wrapped in dirty newspaper dangling from his waist by a bit of string. He went staggeringly, bending backwards, so that it was no wonder he often ran against people, especially as baby's frock had a way of flapping across his face and so impeding his vision.

"Hi, where are you going with that prize baby?" said one man against whom Dan collided. "Think you're going to drop that ton weight on my toe?"

"You've got enough to carry without," Dan retorted quickly, and the man, who had just come out of a public-house, laughed and felt in his pocket for a loose copper. He had only a farthing there, for farthings are not easily spent by men, but Dan grasped it eagerly with a "Thanky, sir."

"We'll get a sucker," he said, and went into a little shop, from which he emerged, bearing a stick on which was stuck a small apple, covered with something brown and sweet.

He let baby touch it with her little pink tongue, then carried it carefully out of her reach. "We'll soon have our dinners," he assured her, "and it'll come in lovely."

Dan staggered on till he came to the Embankment before St. Thomas's Hospital. Then he made his way painfully down the steps till he came near the water. There he sat baby on a step warmed by the sun, and stretched out his own tired limbs. The river shone and danced in the sunshine, and steamers passed to and fro, while behind the children reached the great hospital that has healed and helped so many sufferers.

Dan untied his parcel, and showed some pieces of stale bread, dark and unwholesome looking. His face fell a little, and he muttered, "She might have put in a bit of relish; but there, we've got the sucker."

Gravely he spread the newspaper on the stones, then with his two forefingers stuck out, made motions as though cutting something.

"Here's your bit of pie," he said, handing a crust to the baby, "and mind you don't spill the gravy down your pinny."

Baby sucked at the crust, listening solemnly to Dan's talk of the good things they were having; but all the time he kept a watchful eye on her, and when a bit of the crust proved too hard for her, he took it down to the water and dipped it in. When the bread was finished they took turns at the sucker, till there was nothing left on the stick but a brown smear; then baby had the stick to herself, and appeared to derive much enjoyment from it.

That was how Dan and the baby got their dinners most days. Father had died before baby was born, and Mother was not like most mothers. Often she lay in their one room, taking no notice of her children, who had to fare as best they could. Dan was used to her coming in at all hours of the night—sometimes so mad with drink that he lay shivering in his corner, hoping she would not see them. The neighbours said it was a wonder baby had lived, but they were all too much afraid of "thirsty Sue" to interfere. Dan had been to school irregularly, and could read and write after a fashion; but since baby came he had not been to school at all, and had not been troubled by the attendance officer. For one thing, he was not a desirable scholar, and for another his mother so constantly shifted her quarters that it was not easy to find them.

From the time of baby's birth Dan had looked after, washed and dressed her as well as he could, and carried her about, learning how to still her crying, and teaching her to talk. She was two years old now, but her rickety little legs refused to carry her more than a few steps, and only those when she was clinging to her brother. He talked to her so much that she seemed quite to understand, and day by day they went through the pitiful little farce of choosing their dinners at the cook-shop window.

That autumn was very hot, and baby drooped so visibly that one day Dan called his mother's attention to her; but thirsty Sue was not in a condition to understand much, though she gave him a few coppers, and bade him get a bottle of medicine. Instead of getting the medicine Dan bought milk, which baby tasted eagerly, but soon refused, seeming too tired even to care for drink. Then the mother disappeared; but as she shared the room with another woman who did not object to the children's company, they were not molested and were allowed to go there when they liked.

"Come and choose nice dinner, darlin' baby," Dan said one morning, as he toiled along in the sun. All he had for food was a bit of very dry bread which the man downstairs had thrown away. Perhaps if he dipped it in the water and made it soft baby would be able to take some of it.

"There's lovely pies—and my, ain't that a bit o' meat," he said, pressing against the window. "And look at them little puddens with the juice running out. What'll we have, baby?"

Baby turned her head, and even tried to point; yet she did not trouble to look in the window, and Dan's heart sank. "Try and choose, do ducky," he urged; but the little hand fell back, and her head drooped against his shoulder, and the boy moved away.

"Leetle one seeck?" said a voice close by, and Dan wheeled round to see the friendly face of an Italian ice-cream seller. "She feel sun hot—eh?"

"I s'pose so," said Dan miserably.

"She like this," said the man, kindly handing Dan a little glass of ice-cream.

Baby sucked at it, and liked the cold sweetness, but she could not finish it, and the man filled the glass again and gave it to Dan.

"Leetle one want pheesick," he said. "Where her mother?"

"Dunno," said Dan.

Some customers appeared then, and Dan went on his way, comforted by the sympathy and ice-cream.

Baby's head seemed to have grown very heavy against his shoulder, and when he sat on the Embankment steps he was startled by the curious look on her face.

There was no one to help him, and some great tears rolled down Dan's face, making light tracks in the grime. Then as he looked round despairingly, he saw some of the sick from the hospital near, who had been brought outside on their beds, and lay enjoying the air, while nurses moved in and out.

"I'll take baby there," said Dan with the courage of despair. "Perhaps they'll make her well."

It was not the right hour for taking patients, but Dan came across a nurse who was touched by his appeal, and brought him and his burden to a doctor.

The doctor was kind, but rather sharp-spoken, and after looking at the baby he said some words to the nurse which Dan could not understand.

"Where's your mother?" the doctor asked, and Dan had to say he didn't know, but hastened to assure him that she was not likely to be back for some time.

"Well, you had better leave your little sister here. We will do what we can for her," the doctor said.

"Please shall you make her well?" Dan asked.

The doctor looked at the sad, eager face, and answered gently, "We will do what we can; but, my boy, she ought to have been here before. Now Nurse will look after her, and you may come back and see her in an hour or two."

Baby did not seem to notice that Dan had given her to strangers, and the boy walked away with a queer choking feeling in his throat. He remembered the kind Italian, and wandered back to find him still busy with his barrow. He noticed Dan, but there was a rush of customers, and he could not talk to him then; but when they had gone he turned to him, asking:

"The leetle one—eh?"

Then Dan told his story, and the Italian was very kind. When he heard that Dan had no friends he said, "I come to the hospital with you. My name Vincenti Polli. I leave my barrow, for everything is sold, and I come with you; but first you must eat, my friend."

He gave Dan something to eat, then took his barrow away, brushed himself up, and then the two went to the hospital.

Baby was lying in a little white bed, looking so white and cared for that Dan felt afraid to touch her, and paused beside her.

"Speak to her," said the Nurse. "Get her to notice you."

"Baby darling, baby, don't you know your Danny?" cried the boy, and a little fluttering movement came over the quiet face, and baby opened her eyes, looking at Dan with a solemn expression.

"There, she knows her Danny," the boy went on. Nurse stood quietly watching, and the Italian was on his knees murmuring strange prayers. A screen had been drawn round the bed, and the ward was very still. Baby's eyes closed again wearily.

"See, darlin', we'll go and choose our dinners again," Dan said, and a queer little shadowy smile broke up the stillness of the little white face, and baby moved her head.

Nurse looked pleased, and turned to the Italian, who had risen.

"She's best left quiet," she said; "her brother can come again early in the morning."

Vincenti touched the boy's shoulder.

"You come with me. I bring you back in the morning. I take care of you now," and Dan went out with him, finding it a new experience to be looked after.

"I show you to my mother," said Vincenti. "She kind woman. Keep what you call lodging house. You shall sleep with me. In the morning we go find the leetle one is getting on. She soon be quite better. I bring her to my mother. You be good boy, and help me with barrow; then we get plenty money, and open shop with dinners, and the leetle one go to school, and she help my mother when she big—eh?"

It hardly seemed possible that Vincenti was making such kind plans for Dan, but when the boy saw the merry looking old woman, who greeted Vincenti by kissing him on both cheeks, and hearing Dan's troubles, treated him in the same way, it really seemed as if the plans might come to pass. The old woman made Dan eat a hearty supper, and then he went to Vincenti's bed where he slept soundly all night.

"You find your sister better," Vincenti told him in the morning, and his hopefulness infected the boy.

"The baby is better," Nurse told Dan. "You may just look at her, that is all; but who will take care of her when she is able to leave?"

Dan's face was one broad smile as he answered:

"There's a kind lady who is going to mind her, and I'm going to work for her."

"That's well," said Nurse kindly.

"Ah," said Dan, "I didn't know there were so many kind folks in the world. There's you and the hospital, and Mr. Vincenti and his mother; there's heaps and heaps of kind folks, and baby's getting well and all." His eyes were full of tears as he looked at his little sleeping sister.

"'She like this,' said the man."—p. 442.

WORD AND WORK IN THE MASTER'S NAME.

The Language of Heaven.

IT has been the harmless boast of other nations; but the Welsh of the present day, as you may hear in the rural districts, are particularly fond of saying that theirs will be the language we shall all speak in a better world. This may be because they are a small people, and because they love that strange tongue of Wales, which so few know, and because they believe it to be despised. But their quaint fancy may remind us that the "language" we we shall really speak will be the language we all know and love best—the communion of soul with soul. Here

> "Imperfect utterance is our saddest taint,
> And when the heart is full the lips grow faint.'

A Copy of a Copy.

If a clever painter, in the first flush of his enthusiasm, makes a copy of one of the world's masterpieces in an Italian gallery, it is likely that his endeavour will reflect a glimmer of the genius, a few of the ineffable touches of the original. But let another artist (say in England) make a replica of this copy, and the resemblance to the ideal will be far fainter; and the second work runs a risk of becoming a feeble, commonplace affair. Thus it is with us when we merely imitate the best man we know, who has tried to model his life upon the life of Christ. The result is sure to be a failure. We must follow the divine example which the four evangelists portray. Our copy will be imperfect enough even then, but it is thus only that we can come "unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ."

The Word of Mr. Jones.

ENGLISH honesty, among people of false religions, and in other lands, is a marvellous testimony to the stability of our national character, and to the practical value of Christianity. A dweller in Jerusalem lately told us about a British merchant, upon whose goods the Turkish authorities, by some most unusual oversight, had not levied sufficient duty in one particular year. To "dodge" the duties to the fullest extent possible seems in certain regions of Turkey to be almost an unwritten law among the adherents of Islam. But our compatriot voluntarily sent up a fair and square statement, and paid his big deficits smiling. The impression produced by this unique act upon the surrounding Mohammedan population was amusingly intense. The assessors of taxes have ever since taken this merchant's bare word as to the amount of goods on which duty may be due, and no investigation is made. In the native bazaar, our informant assured us, when the disciple of Mohammed is specially desirous of clinching the veracity of any statement, his favourite asseveration is not now as formerly, "By the beard of the prophet!" but, "By the word of Mr. Jones!"

"The Quiver" Postcards.

UNDER the title of "Fair Flowers of British Womanhood," Messrs. Cassell have just issued, for the benefit of readers of THE QUIVER, a sixpenny packet of fifteen pictorial postcards, each of which reproduces a pleasing face and an appropriate poetical quotation. We are proud to have so charming and attractive a series associated with the name of THE QUIVER.

The Care of the Feeble-minded.

WEAKNESS and wickedness are very close neighbours, because weakness is so easily influenced and led into temptation by wickedness, and a vast proportion of the criminals in our prisons, and the badly disposed in our reformatories and workhouses, are simply the feeble-minded, who are led into trouble and mischief, and launched on downward careers by people who make them the tools of their passions and the catspaws of their nefarious schemes. They often escape, but the poor weakling bears the stigma and the punishment, and costs the country a good deal of money. The attention of the School Boards was first called to mentally defective children in 1889, and special classes were formed for them in Leicester and London, and gradually in other large towns, but not till 1897 was public attention called to them by a committee appointed by the Board of Education, which resulted in a Bill being passed through Parliament that enabled school authorities to draw an increased grant from the State for their benefit, and raised their period of tutelage from fourteen to sixteen. But even at sixteen they are but little fitted to take care of themselves, though they may be capable of earning wages, and the Association for Promoting the Welfare of the Feeble-minded was incorporated in 1901 for the care of such as cannot stand alone, without danger of harm to themselves and others. Small industrial homes, which are practically colonies, have been established both for boys and girls, with the best possible results, the pioneer of the former being Upshire Bury, in Essex, where the boys do gardening and rear poultry, and their services are much in demand for "odd jobs," and occasionally as auxiliary postal messengers, and they earn money that contributes considerably towards their expenses. They are all gentle and their conduct good under discipline that is as firm as it is kind. Among the homes for girls one is devoted to young mothers and their babes when discharged from Workhouse Infirmaries, well known in those establishments as "ins and outs." They are taught to care for their infants properly, and helped to support them by house, laundry, and needle work, so that they may not be exposed to the temptation of falling again. Other homes aim simply at training and developing deficient girls, and obtaining situations for them in families where they are carefully guarded and helped. There is always a percentage of employers who are widows or spinsters, glad of the services of such girls, for whom high wages are not asked, and willing to take kindly charge of them. The only difficulty is to bring them together.

A Fine Art.

"WHAT a blessing it would be," wrote in a letter Sir Henry Stanley, the great traveller, "if we cultivated the art of imparting pleasure to others." This can be easily done by resolving with God's help each morning when we awake to help forward the life of at least one human being by an encouraging word or an uplifting deed.

Earth's Last Evening Service.

REV. B. APPLEYARD, who ministers to a composite Sunday congregation of Anglicans, Presbyterians, Methodists, Greek Church folk, Lutherans, and Plymouth Brethren, at Port Essington, British Columbia, has recently been telling friends in the Old Country that he considers it is his distinction to hold, on Sunday evenings, the last service of prayer and praise in Christendom. To illustrate this interesting contention, Mr. Appleyard kindly pencilled a rough map for us, which we are sorry not to be able to reproduce. He makes out, however, that the sun, rising from Japan and traversing the whole world, finds its most western point at a few miles across the water from Port Essington, where his service is held at about 1 a.m., London time. The fact, he says, that their voices are probably the last of those of all Christians to uplift that Sabbath sacrifice of supplication and of thanksgiving, which now, following the sun in his march, girdles the whole round earth, is a continued help and inspiration to himself and to his little isolated band of heterogeneous fellow-worshippers. They are fond of concluding their service with the beautiful hymn in which this verse occurs:

> "We thank Thee that Thy Church unsleeping,
> While earth rolls onward into light,
> Through all the world her watch is keeping,
> And rests not now by day or night."

For the Little Ones.

VARIED, healthy, and bright reading for the little ones was never more wanted in our homes than it is to-day, and we heartily commend to our readers the monthly numbers of "Little Folks," issued by the proprietors of THE QUIVER. At present the magazine is giving its young readers two serial stories, one by Mrs. L. T. Meade, and the other by Mr. E. S. Ellis; and little boys, as well as girls, will find plenty of harmless fun in the many excellent items which fill the pages of this ever-fresh favourite. "Tiny Tots," which is also published by Messrs. Cassell, is for the benefit of very young denizens of the nursery who may not have reached the stage of reading for themselves, but clamour for something new to be read to them.

A "Drudgery Divine."

ON a rock-bound, well-nigh desert island of the South Seas was encamped a numerous company of lepers, exiled from a more populous island by Government order. Little provision was made for their necessities, and many must have starved but for the energetic benevolence of the members of a native Christian Endeavour Society, who carried to these poor creatures, from time to time boatloads of food. After two years of such hardship it was announced that another and less desolate island-home was appointed to the hapless sufferers, the chief of the district receiving orders to convey them thither; but in his repugnance to their terrible malady he refused the use of his boat for their convoy, his people generally following his example. Again the brave Endeavourers came forward. Far distances they travelled in quest of the needed boat, to meet with constant refusals; at last a small cutter was lent them, in which they sailed to the leper island. Difficult and arduous indeed was their task of embarking their maimed and crippled passengers; but these loyal young Christians carried the feeblest in their arms, and one by one they were liberated from their rocky prison. A long voyage against contrary winds, and the sad company was safely landed at Lifu and comfortably housed. Then their benefactors bathed in the sea and burnt every garment they had worn during their labour of love.

Secrets of Perfection.

The diverse methods of two well-known artists who have recently died in England are not without their spiritual application. "You demand two hundred guineas for two days' work?" once asked the Attorney-General of the first, who was a rapid painter. "No," was the answer; "for the knowledge of a lifetime." And thus it is from the patiently and prayerfully built up strength of moral character that the great heroic and sudden effort comes. Of the second artist, at whose humorous depictions of London life we have often smiled, it was the peculiar characteristic that he could convey a powerful and definite impression in a sketch with extraordinarily few strokes. But friends who knew his plan of work said that this apparently simple effect was the result of infinite previous pains. He would draw line after line, to be rubbed out; add a light here, take out a shade there, and leave only exactly as much as he wanted for his final impression. And so, it is a long and complex moral training, the culture of what is noble in our humanity, the elimination of what is base, which produces that grand simplicity, the mark of the best and saintliest of our kind.

"The heights by great men won and kept
Were not attained by sudden flight;
But they, while their companions slept,
Were toiling upwards through the night."

Poor, but Righteous.

Between good and evil, as between Michael and Satan, the battle is always being waged; and in the humbler conflicts goodness is sometimes pathetic in its power. There is a village, hidden away in South Wales, where the local blacksmith—an infidel, a scoffer, a blasphemer, a man of lax life—seemed the incarnation of petty wickedness. He was a sort of pinchbeck hero with the young men of the place, and on summer evenings they would gather round his forge, and each listener was likely to go home worse than when he came. And in the same Welsh village there was an aged labourer, infirm and friendless, and in receipt of parish pay. He had not the remotest title to influence, beyond the mere fact that he was known to be good. The old fellow would wander occasionally to the outskirts of the company outside the forge. He never spoke, as he stood for a little with the setting sun shining on his white and scanty hair; but from the moment of his approach the foul word faltered upon each young fool's tongue, and even the blacksmith's braggart voice was still. Nor was it long before the group began to slink away. Here, surely, in the humblest and homeliest form, we have a proof of the purifying virtue of that "salt of the earth" which our Lord said His disciples were to be, and which is alone saving our race from corruption.

"Wonderful in Counsel."

"Are you an Englishman?" inquired the landlord of a hotel at Buda-Pesth of a passing stranger; "two English travellers are in my house, one very ill, the other dying, and I know not what to do." This passer-by, himself on the point of leaving the country, interested two English ladies staying in the city in this sad case. The names on the travellers' luggage disclosed that these were Dr. Keith and Dr. Black, distinguished Scottish divines and authors, now visiting, on their return journey from Palestine, various European countries with a view to organising Christian mission work among the Jews. They had determined to avoid the Austrian Empire, where despotic Romish sway seemed to preclude all opening for their scheme; but, worn out by their travels through the desert and Holy Land, they had felt compelled to return to Scotland by the Danube as their quickest route, staying a night only at Buda-Pesth. On the point of leaving that place, however, Dr. Keith was seized with a dangerous illness, while his comrade was also so ailing that though occupying adjoining rooms, the friends did not meet for six weeks. By a remarkable coincidence, they had received, before starting from home, an introduction from one of the ladies above mentioned to some Turkish dignitary. She therefore at once understood who the strangers were and the object of their journey. No less remarkably, this Miss Pardoe had also received from the Archduke Joseph, Viceroy of Hungary, then absent at Presburg, a note to his Archduchess at Buda-Pesth, and had already seen that lady. At once, therefore, she went on behalf of the suffering strangers to that noble-hearted Christian princess, who ordered that every possible care and attention should be devoted to them both; feeling the stronger interest in their sad case because a copy of Dr. Keith's well-known "Evidence of Prophecy" had previously come under her notice and deeply interested her. To the amazement of all, the sick man recovered. "There is nothing to be done but order his coffin," one standing beside his bed had remarked. "We all thought you were dead," exclaimed his physician at the first sign he gave of returning vitality. As soon as his strength permitted, the Archduchess visited him. She expressed deep interest in the cause these Christian travellers had at heart, and many an hour of spiritual converse they enjoyed with her. Thus in a very stronghold of Austrian rule were found that protection and zeal for mission work among the Jews which led to its establishment by the Church of Scotland in 1841. Its success was as remarkable as its origination, and this not among the Jewish residents alone; many leading Roman Catholics were affected by the movement, which also did much to revive the life of Protestant churches at that time steeped in rationalism. Although after some years these Scottish missionaries had to leave the country in consequence of the crushing of Hungarian liberties, religious and political, yet the revival of spiritual life wrought throughout the land by the Pesth mission has left rich and abiding and abundant fruit. The list of those converted from Judaism to Christ between the years 1843 and 1851 is most noteworthy, not only as regards number, but intellectual distinction and spiritual influence: it included three such widely known and honoured ministers of the Gospel as Alfred Edersheim, Adolph Saphir, and Alexander Tomory, for many years missionary to the Jews in Constantinople.

"THE QUIVER" FUNDS.

THE following is a list of contributions received from December 2nd, 1903, up to and including December 30th, 1903. Subscriptions received after this date will be acknowledged next month:—

For "The Quiver" Waifs' Fund: Readers of "The Christian," per Messrs. Morgan and Scott, £2; Colin B. Ellison. (Blundellsands), £1 1s.; Mrs. Gooddy (Barnsley), £1; M. T. F., 10s.; "A Friend" (Kilburn), 10s.; "A Farmer's Wife" (Blackpool), 5s.; A. E., 2s 6d.

For Dr. Barnardo's Homes: R. C. (Falkirk), £10; "Bradford," £1 10s., £1 10s., £1 10s., £1, 10s. 6d., 5s.; Colin B. Ellison (Blundellsands), £1 1s.; L. R. (Newcastle), 5s.; "Rauceby," 5s.; "A Constant Reader of THE QUIVER" (Brighton), 4s.; X. (Sheffield), 2s 6d. The following amounts have been sent direct:—"Reta," £1; B. P., 10s.; A. W. (Cambridge), 2s.

For The Children's Country Holidays Fund: M. T. F., 10s.

For The Ragged School Union ("Robin" Dinners): Tom A. Reed (Gateshead), 5s.; E. Reid (Longsight), 5s.; "Thank Offering," 4s.; A. Bishop (Ealing), 2s. 6d.

For The London City Mission: "A Well-Wisher (Weymouth), £1.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

BASED ON THE INTERNATIONAL SERIES OF LESSONS.

QUESTIONS.

37. Upon what ground did the Pharisees charge our Lord's disciples with breaking the Sabbath?

38. What do we learn from the disciples eating the corn as they passed through the cornfield?

39. By what miracle did our Lord show us that all works of mercy are lawful on the Sabbath day?

40. What is essentially necessary to make one's work acceptable in God's sight?

41. In what way does Jesus illustrate the lasting effect of good works?

42. What was a constant source of danger to fishermen on the Sea of Galilee?

43. On what occasion were the disciples so frightened that they spake harshly to Jesus?

44. In what way did Jesus save His disciples on the Sea of Galilee?

45. Where is the country of the Gergesenes, where Jesus and His disciples landed?

46. By whose order was St. John the Baptist put to death?

47. Had St. John the Baptist any great influence over the Jewish people?

48. What was Herod's opinion of St. John the Baptist?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 352.

25. Because he considered that Jesus was so much greater and holier than himself. (St. Matt. iii. 14; St. John i. 27.)

26. As "the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life." (St. Matt. iv. 1–9; 1 John ii. 16.)

27. The King's Gallery of Herod's tower, of which Josephus says, "From the top of which if anyone looked down he would grow dizzy, his eyes not being able to reach so vast a depth." (St. Matt. iv. 5; Josephus, "Ant." b. xv. c. 14.)

28. By the example He sets us of attending the synagogue every Sabbath day at Nazareth. (St. Luke iv. 16.)

29. The people of His own city, Nazareth, sought to cast Him down headlong from the brow of the hill on which the city was built. (St. Luke iv. 29.)

30. They were partners in the same fishing boats on the Sea of Galilee. (St. Luke v. 10.)

31. When Jesus called St. Peter and others to be His disciples He gave them a proof of His divine power by a miraculous draught of fishes. A similar miracle took place when, after His resurrection, Jesus recalled His disciples to Him. (St. Luke v. 4–7; St. John xxi. 6–9.)

32. Jesus and His disciples were together in the synagogue when a man cried out, "What have we to do with Thee, Jesus of Nazareth? I know Thee who Thou art, the Holy One of God." (St. Mark i. 24.)

33. By casting out an evil spirit from the man in the presence of the whole congregation. (St. Mark i. 25 26.)

34. He would not allow the people possessed with devils to speak, because they knew Him. (St. Mark i. 34 and 44, 45.)

35. The efforts which our Lord made to obtain time for prayer and meditation. (St. Mark i. 35; St. Matt. xiv. 23; St. Luke vi. 12.)

36. At the healing of the paralytic, and when dining at the Pharisee's house He forgave the woman who was a sinner. (St. Mark ii. 5; St. Luke vii. 47, 48.)

XUM

UNIV.
OF MICH.

AID FROM THE FISHERMEN

(From the Painting by Bernard F. Gribble.)

STIRRING SCENES IN TEMPERANCE WORK.

By Hugh B. Philpott.

"PEACE hath her victories no less renowned than War," and among the victories of Peace few are more notable or more inspiring than those that belong to the warfare against intemperance. Not that the story of the great fight is one of uniform success. At one time we see the embattled hosts of Temperance sweeping forward to their end like an invincible army; at another they can barely hold the field against their foes, and the story of the campaign is one of quiet preparation, of cautious reconnaissances, and of forlorn hopes. Let us glance at a few notable scenes, not forgetting that the real importance of an event is not always proportionate to the pomp and circumstance by which it is surrounded.

A trivial and insignificant event in the eyes of most of the people of Cork was a meeting held in a certain schoolroom in that town on April 10th, 1838. Yet it was big with consequences for the whole Irish people and for the cause of Temperance throughout the world. The room, though of no great size, is but sparsely filled, and even those who have taken the trouble to attend the meeting are by no means unanimously friendly to its object, that object being the starting of a Temperance society. Many of them are surprised and perhaps a little angry that their beloved Father Mathew, who has summoned the meeting, should take up with this teetotal fanaticism and seek to deprive them of their most cherished indulgence.

But there is one little group of men whose hearts are filled with joy and thankfulness; they are Protestants and Temperance reformers, and they feel that the cause they have at heart is that day to receive a great impetus, though how great the issues of that little meeting will be, not the most sanguine and imaginative among them can possibly foresee. A notable figure in this little group is an old Quaker merchant, one William Martin, a man much respected by his fellow townsmen of all creeds and parties. For some years he, with a few earnest fellow-workers, has been trying to stem the tide of intemperance in the city. But little success has attended these efforts, and Martin has long felt that the cause can only be immediately commended to the people of this Roman Catholic community by one of their own faith. The man above all others who has the ear of the people, and whom he hopes to enlist in the good cause, is Father Mathew. The two men have been colleagues in the management of the Cork Workhouse, and have learned to love and respect each other, for both are men of active benevolence and of a large and tolerant spirit. They have both seen much of the sad results of alcoholic excess, and more than once the Quaker has said to the priest: "Oh, Theobald Mathew, if thou wouldst but take the cause in hand, what good thou wouldst do for these poor people!"

SIR WILFRID LAWSON AND DR. TEMPLE ASSAILED AT EXETER.

The words have not fallen on deaf ears, and after long and anxious thought and much earnest prayer, the path of duty has become clear, and a day or two before the meeting in the little schoolroom, Father Mathew has called at William Martin's office to announce his conversion to the cause of total abstinence. "Friend William," he says, "I have come to tell you a piece of news. I mean to join your Temperance society." Overwhelmed with emotion, the good old man can say little more than "Thank God, thank God," as he flings his arm round his friend's neck and kisses him like a child.

Father Mathew, "a handsome, honest-looking man," as Thackeray afterwards described him, opens the historic meeting with an address in which he explains why he has called his friends together. He speaks of the many applications which have been made to him by gentlemen differing from himself in religion, but known and respected for their worth and benevolence, and though he thinks they overrate his powers, he cannot refuse to listen to their appeals. "If through any humble instrumentality of mine," he continues, "I can do good to my fellow-creatures and give glory to God, I feel I am bound as a minister of the Gospel to throw all personal considerations aside, and try and give a helping hand to gentlemen who have afforded me so excellent an example. Indeed, if only one poor soul can be rescued from destruction by what we are now attempting, it would be giving glory to God, and well worth all the trouble we could take." He then takes a pen in his hand, and saying in a loud voice, "Here goes, in the name of God," signs his name in a pledge-book lying on the table.

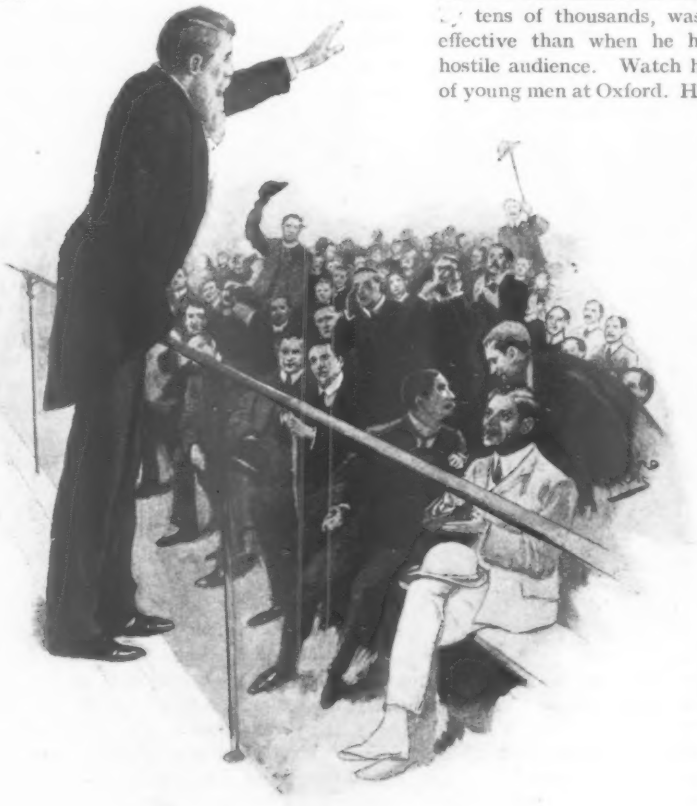
Sixty others follow his example, and then old William Martin speaks out of a full heart the gratitude he feels. "If it should please the Almighty," he says, "to take me out of the world soon, I think I would go with more satisfaction than if I had been taken some years before, because I feel a weight going off my shoulders and (laying his hand on Father Mathew's shoulder) falling here."

Thus began one of the most wonderful crusades of which history has any record. Father Mathew's journeying through the country, winning recruits for the teetotal army, has been compared, not inaptly, to the preaching of the first Crusade by Peter the Hermit. Everywhere he was received with boundless enthusiasm. Wherever he went the people flocked in thousands to receive the pledge at his hands, until his adherents were numbered literally by the million; thousands of drink shops closed their doors, the revenue from excise duties fell off enormously, and the deposits in savings banks steadily increased.

One great scene we may glance at by way of contrast with that just referred to. It is Easter Monday, 1842, and the scene is still the city of Cork. The day is to be celebrated by a great Temperance demonstration, which is to take the form of a parade through the principal streets by the Temperance societies of the district. From an early hour in the morning all the roads leading to the city have been black with the crowds of men, women, and children, on foot and in all kinds of vehicles, who are coming to take part in the great procession or to be spectators of it. Many of them have come from places thirty or forty miles distant, but in their eagerness and enthusiasm they reck little of fatigue. The procession is to be a big thing in its way. Ten thousand people, representing fifty-seven societies, will take part in it; there are to be forty-one bands, and banners innumerable. But it is not to hear the bands or see the banners that the thousands of excited people are crowding on to the line of route. They have eyes for only two figures in the procession, those of the two best beloved and most famous men in Ireland—Theobald Mathew and Daniel O'Connell. O'Connell, who at this time is Lord Mayor of Dublin, has joined the ranks of the total abstainers, and has intimated his intention of taking part in the procession. The warm-hearted, imaginative people are full of excited anticipation at the prospect of seeing the great "Liberator" and the great "Apostle of Temperance" walking together in the same procession.

XUM

From the Corn Market, where all the contingents assemble, the procession starts at about eleven o'clock and moves slowly through the crowded streets. The offices of the Temperance societies and some of the other houses on the route are beflagged and garlanded; every window is occupied by eager sightseers, and many find a place of vantage on the roofs The procession has not gone far before the great event of the day happens. The Lord Mayor of Dublin meets the demonstrators, and "Liberator" and "Apostle" greet each other. Perhaps Father Mathew is not altogether pleased at this public association of the great political leader with his work, for one of his great aims has been to avoid identifying the cause of temperance reform with any political movement. Yet he cannot be indifferent to the help that may be given to the cause by one so powerful and popular as Daniel O'Connell. Of either man it might be said with truth that he was the idol of the Irish people, and as they meet, greeting each other with cordiality and affection, a great shout goes up from the thousands of onlookers, handkerchiefs are waved, men and women crane forward, and children are held shoulder high that they may catch a glimpse of the central figures. No monarch on a great state occasion, no conqueror returning from the war, could have had a more splendid reception than that accorded to the political and the moral emancipators—the champions of liberty and of sobriety.



"SOME ARE OPENLY HOSTILE, OTHERS COLDLY INDIFFERENT."

Here is a story of the beginning of Temperance work in Scotland. The scene is a Glasgow lecture hall, the time a certain Monday evening in September, 1829. A tall, benevolent-looking man, of dignified aspect, stands on the rostrum, nervously facing a curious crowd which completely fills the hall; it is not a hostile crowd, but certainly not a sympathetic one; curiosity is the prevailing feeling, for the subject of the lecture is "Temperance Societies," a novel, and to most people rather ridiculous idea. The lecturer is John Dunlop, a man of shy and retiring disposition, who has had no training in the art of addressing a popular audience, and is painfully conscious of his own lack of the gifts and graces of the orator. Only by a strong effort of will has he forced himself to stand in his present position, and the condition of nervous depression, amounting almost to physical illness, with which he approaches his task has not been lessened by overhearing at the door of the lecture hall the hearty peals of laughter with which half a dozen divinity students were discussing the subject of his discourse.

Why does John Dunlop undertake a task for which he is so obviously ill-equipped? Simply because no one else will do it. To him it is as clear as the day that the best remedy for the intemperance which is working such havoc among his fellow-countrymen, lies in the establishment of Temperance societies on the lines of those which are already working successfully in the New England states. Again and again he has urged these views upon the ministers and other leading people in Glasgow and elsewhere. Some are openly hostile, others coldly indifferent; all regard him as a man with a bee in his bonnet. The nearest approach to sympathy he has received has been the suggestion that he should explain his proposals in a public address, and the present meeting is the outcome of that suggestion.

John Dunlop goes through with his irksome task, like the moral hero that he is, and finds the mountains of difficulty dwindling to molehills as he proceeds. The audience, indifferent or even hostile at the outset of his address, are soon listening with rapt attention. The simple, earnest utterance wins a respectful hearing which might have been denied to a more florid and artificial oratory, and at the close many of the audience, including the hilarious divinity students, express themselves willing to join a Temperance society as soon as one should be formed.

"I HAVE A PROPOSITION TO MAKE."

The Temperance reformer must be prepared for some hard knocks, for the forces arrayed against him are many and strong. Even Father Mathew, whose progress in Ireland was one of almost miraculous success, encountered serious opposition when he came to London. There was a wild scene one day in Bermondsey, where he was addressing an open-air meeting. Sixty or seventy men, decorated from head to foot with hop leaves and brandishing quart pots in their hands, attempted to storm the platform; while others even tried to cut the ropes fastening the supports of the platform—a wicked design which, had it succeeded, must have led to a serious accident.

Besides such gross outrages, the subtler forms of opposition, which consist in banter and ridicule, have to be faced by nearly all Temperance reformers. J. B. Gough, the great Temperance orator, whose wonderfully eloquent orations were listened to with unbounded delight by tens of thousands, was never more really effective than when he had to deal with a hostile audience. Watch him face a gathering of young men at Oxford. He has been warned to expect a hostile demonstration, and has been unable to get any prominent local man to take the chair. When he stands up to speak, the lecture hall resounds with a confused hubbub of shouts and laughter. There is no malice in it, but a spirit of boyish fun seems to have seized the audience. Gough stands calmly waiting for the noise to subside. He is rather amused than perturbed, for he has the good fortune to be endowed with a keen sense of the ridiculous. Whenever the demonstrators give him a chance he interjects a sentence of his address. "What is the cause," he asks, "of the intemperance of Great Britain?" In reply a thin, squeakish voice lisps out, "Temperanth thothietieth," and there is a roar of laughter. Catching the exact tone of the speaker, Gough, who has been an actor and is an admirable mimic, replies, "I beg your pardon, sir, but it is not temperanth thothietieth at all," at which there is another laugh, this time at the expense of the interrupter. Then the uproar begins again; some whistle, some sing, some crow, some bray.

At last the lecturer shouts, "Gentlemen, I have a proposition to make." "Proposition!" "Let's hear it!" cry some of the audience, and there is a lull in the tumult. "What I propose is," says Gough, "that you shall choose your champion, and he and I shall take the platform for ten minutes each, turn and turn about; and the audience shall judge who is the victor in this contest, he or I. That's fair." "Yes, that's fair," they assent, and at once begin in a spirit of fun to suggest champions. No champion, however, is forthcoming, and at length Gough is permitted to continue with very slight opposition, and is loudly cheered at the end.

Even that most genial and popular of Temperance advocates, Sir Wilfrid Lawson, has had to meet some fierce storms of opposition. On one occasion at a Temperance meeting at Exeter the opposition developed into a perfect riot, which even the presence of the Bishop, the late Dr. Temple, in the chair was not able to restrain. The rioters broke the chairs and used the fragments as weapons of offence. The Bishop kept his seat, perfectly calm and collected; while Sir Wilfrid vainly essayed to make himself heard. They were bombarded with missiles which included onions and little balls of flour. One of the onions, which passed close to the Bishop's face, was afterwards picked up and grown by a gentleman who witnessed the strange scene. When the bombardment ceased, the publicans and their friends attempted to storm the platform. As the police declined to interfere, the meeting had to be abandoned, and the lecturer and chairman emerged from the contest uninjured but smothered with flour.

Perhaps there never was a more exciting Temperance meeting than one which was held on June 6th, 1871, in the London Guildhall. In the eyes of some of the City Fathers there was something almost impious in the very idea of a Temperance meeting in the historic home of revelry and feasting, and they were ready to endorse the remonstrances of "the trade" when it became known that the Lord Mayor had granted the use of the Guildhall to Sir Wilfrid Lawson and his friends for a meeting in support of the Permissive Prohibitory Liquor Bill then before the House of Commons. In a spirit of compromise the Lord Mayor imposed upon the promoters of the meeting the conditions that half the platform tickets should be given to the licensed victuallers and half the time of the meeting should be at their disposal for submitting an amendment to the resolution. Here was promise of a lively encounter. The hall was filled long before the time for beginning the meeting, and the courtyard was thronged with partisans of the rival causes and with curious onlookers attracted by the prospect of exciting developments. A line of tall City policemen were ranged along each side of the hall, their official impassiveness contrasting curiously with the excited condition of many of the audience.

The Lord Mayor, who presided, briefly explained the order of proceedings. Sir Wilfrid Lawson was to move a resolution in favour of the Bill, which was to be seconded by Mr. Samuel Pope, after which Mr. Alderman Gibbon would propose and Mr. Lawley, a member of the Common Council, would second an amendment. Sir Wilfrid, on rising to speak, was greeted with a babel of sounds, applause mingling with opposition, but the opposition prevailing sufficiently to prevent his being heard. The genial baronet adopted an expedient which has proved useful to many a speaker in similar case: he delivered an animated discourse to the reporters' table. Mr. Pope did the same, and even Mr. Alderman Gibbon, the champion of the liquor interest, fared no better—perhaps because the shouters at the back of the hall were unable to distinguish friend from foe. The Lord Mayor then decided that a vote should be taken, but amidst such a hubbub it was not easy to get an intelligible expression of opinion. The publicans on the platform raised great posters bearing the words, "Vote for the amendment," but in spite of their efforts the amendment was declared lost. The Lord Mayor then retired to his private room, the partisans of Bung trooped out of the hall, and Gog and Magog looked down upon a calmer scene. Some of the more zealous of the Temperance party remained singing hymns, and with speeches of mutual encouragement strengthening each other's hands for the conflict.

XUM

IN THE STRAITS OF TIME

A ROMANCE OF OLD FRANCE.

By Christopher Hare, Author of "Dreams to Sell," Etc.

SYNOPSIS OF CHAPTERS I.–XI.

The story opens in the reign of Louis XIV. Yvonne de la Féronniere, a Huguenot girl, is being educated at the famous Abbaye-aux-Bois. Her school friend, Gabrielle de Beaumanoir, is married to the Duc de Maillebois, and at the wedding Yvonne meets the young Chevalier Réné de Beaumanoir, and they are mutually attracted to each other. After the wedding, the girl-bride Gabrielle returns to the convent school with Yvonne, and the Duke her husband goes on an embassy to Rome, and takes Réné with him. Yvonne meets Réné again at the Palace of Versailles, when King Louis receives the Doge of Genoa. There she also meets her guardian, the Marquis de Vaudreuil, who abruptly removes her from the Abbaye-aux-Bois to his house.

CHAPTER XII.

"OH, how you weary me! You are so slow, Rosalie. There, put Zozo on my lap and give me my chocolate."

It was the Marquise de Vaudreuil who spoke, in fretful complaint, as she leant back languidly amongst her silken cushions, to recover from the fatigue of her endless, elaborate toilette. She was wrapped in the soft folds of a rose-coloured satin gown, whose delicate tints were repeated in the hangings of the wall. In the long mirror opposite, she could see the reflection of a face whose age it would have been impossible to define, so skilful and laborious was the art with which it had been enamelled and painted and powdered. Her hair, dyed of a wonderful golden hue, was elaborately dressed in a mass of little curls on each side of the forehead, and as she gazed on her own image, with ever-increasing inward satisfaction, the lady's good-humour returned.

"After all, you were right, Rosalie. I did well not to have my own hair cut shorter, for the fashion of these ringlets may change."

"But they are ravishing, Madame; the coiffure suits you perfectly. Monsieur Binet, the King's perruquier, could not have excelled this," murmured Rosalie, with a rapt expression, as she admired her own handiwork.

At that moment, there came a sharp, imperative rap at the chamber door.

"Does Madame receive so early?" asked the discreet waiting maid.

Her mistress gave one quick glance around at the stately bed, with its brocaded hangings, the toilet table with its glitter of silver ornaments, the attractive disorder of silk and lace. She smiled at herself in the glass, and gave a nod of assent.

"Monsieur le Marquis de Vaudreuil" was solemnly announced. There was a moment of strained silence, but Rosalie could scarcely hide her amusement, as she thought to herself:

"Only her husband. What a disappointment for Madame."

With a sniff of disgust at the heavy, perfumed atmosphere, Monsieur came forward abruptly, and slightly bowed over his wife's outstretched hand, laden with jewelled rings.

"You did not expect me, Olympe; but I have serious matters to discuss. Can you give me your full attention?" And he looked meaningly in the direction of the maid.

"You can go, Rosalie; and remember that I do not receive for the next half-hour," said Madame, with admirable self-control, for the blow was severe. "Lie still, my sweet Zozo; no one shall hurt you," she added, stroking the long, silken hair of her little Blenheim spaniel, who had begun to bark at the intruder.

When the maid had demurely left the room, she looked up at the Marquis, who was pacing backwards and forwards on the parqueted floor.

"Sit down, I pray you. My nerves cannot stand the noise of your tramping feet. It is about that girl, I presume?"

"Your discernment does you credit," he replied impatiently, as he flung himself into a deep, brocaded chair. "The time has come for decided action with regard to Yvonne. The lucky accident of meeting her at Versailles yesterday solved the question of taking her from the convent at once. Now the game is in our own hands, if we play it well."

"Which means that you want my help. What am I to do?" was the plaintive inquiry. "If you had followed my advice, you would have married her to Adolphe years ago, and sent her to the convent afterwards. Now you see what has happened. She is as much of a heretic as ever, and the wedding no nearer."

"But I tell you, Olympe, it was impossible. She was my ward, and known to be a Huguenot. All the world would have cried out against me then, and, as you know, a breath of scandal would have ruined me with the King."

"Talk of scandal, what will happen when our debts can be hidden no longer?" she sneered. "You are bad enough, but Adolphe is a mad gambler. And all my fortune is eaten up already. It is fortunate that poor little Louison will never want a dowry."

"What about your jeweller and your dressmaker, Madame?" asked her husband, with irritating calmness, as he lightly waved his hands, with an air of detachment, which took in the whole luxurious chamber, and then let his eyes rest on the pink satin garment.

"Oh, Madame Dio must wait. I bring her so much custom," was the somewhat uneasy reply. "Well, after all, our interests are the same. Tell me, what part do you wish me to play?"

"At length, Olympe, you understand reason. I cannot by force compel this wilful girl to renounce her religion and marry Adolphe; but she is young and attractive, and therefore open to flattery. We must win her over, and for that I look chiefly to you, Madame, though, of course, Adolphe must be ever in attendance. You will take her out constantly into the society of Court and fashionable life, of which you are so brilliant an ornament. Yvonne will soon learn to love it, and then she must be made to understand that her marriage will be the only key to all that makes life worth having."

Mollified by the unexpected compliment to herself, the Marquise de Vaudreuil remarked in a more amiable mood:

"Ah, but all this will cost money?"

"And money will be forthcoming. I manage the property of my ward, and a large income for her expenses will be legally at our service. You shall have a letter of credit for Madame Dio, of any sum you like to name."

The bribe was irresistible, and Madame la Marquise forgot all about her nerves and vapours, and smilingly consented to everything. When her husband left her, it was with the comfortable assurance that he had done a good morning's work, and secured an invaluable ally.

Madame de Vaudreuil tinkled a silver bell for her maid, who must have been suspiciously near the door, for she came in at once, with a startled air.

"Rosalie, quick, give me my tablets," cried her mistress, with eager alertness. "What are my coming engagements? Send Antoine to fetch the last Gazette and a print of the Mercure Galant, if it is to be had anywhere. I would make sure that I have invitations for every fête and every reception. Ah, I remember, the great carrousel of Monsieur le Dauphin at Versailles is on the fourth of June. Listen, I must have a new gown for that. Tell me, how much time is there?" The maid consulted the calendar of saints' days, hung above the desk, and with some trouble made it out.

"Madame, to-day is Thursday, the seventeenth of May; that will leave a fortnight from next Monday."

"No time to lose! Then there is the picnic which the King gives at Marly on the 15th of June. Something pastoral and Arcadian would suit me for that, quite the shepherdess. What do you think, Rosalie? We will consult Madame Dio at once"

"But, Madame," stammered the maid, opening her eyes wide in wonder, "you wished to economise. You remember what a scene she made last time, and you vowed——"

"Ah, but all that is changed, you stupid creature!" exclaimed the Marquise, starting to her feet and dropping Zozo, who began whining at this sudden and undeserved neglect. "No one fits me as she does. And I tell you I am going to pay her. I am going to order as many dresses as I like. Send Antoine to the Rue de Grenelles, or, better still, go yourself. Tell her to bring brocades and gold and silver tissue—everything of the newest and most costly. And Rosalie, I forgot. Where is Mademoiselle de la Féronniere?"

"She is with Mademoiselle Louise, who is merry as I have not seen her for many a day. They are chattering together like two children; 'tis a wonder to see."

"Yes, the girl has a good temper, and will be easy to manage," was the half aside. "By-the-bye, what is that maid of Mademoiselle's like? Is she any good?" asked the mistress abruptly.

"A quiet old frump, Madame; only fit to look after the shabby black gowns her mistress brought from the convent."

"But you must be friends with her, Rosalie, and find out all her secrets. We must leave no stone unturned."

"Ah well, Madame, that will be easy enough, for this Madelon is a good sort of body. She has given me a recipe for the famous water of the Queen of Hungary, and she sat up last night by the bedside of the scullion who lies sick with fever. There are not many of her kind in this household," she added, with a shrug of her shoulders.

"No, indeed. You are all a worthless, insolent pack, who care for no one but yourselves!" exclaimed the Marquise haughtily.

"And whose fault is that?" asked the maid, with sudden pertness. "True, we may have some freedom; but then our wages are never paid, save to M. Richard, the cook, who would not stay without them."

"Rosalie, how dare you!" was the first indignant cry; but a moment's thought convinced the injured lady that there was nothing to be gained by violence. She must have an ally for the task before her, and never grudge to pay the price.

"One forgets these trifles. Tell me, how much do I owe you?"

"Oh, Madame! For one whole year—twenty crowns!" gasped the tire-woman, scarcely able to believe her ears, and not knowing if her mistress had taken leave of her senses, or had come into a fortune.

"Why do you stare at me like that? Do as I bid you, and you shall be paid to-morrow."

"Do you mean it? Am I dreaming?" said Rosalie, under her breath. But the words which followed had a ring of truth in them.

"Now listen, my good girl. You can help me. You must make friends with this Madelon, and get her to tell you everything. You know that Monsieur Adolphe is to marry Mademoiselle de la Féronniere, his cousin? Well, she must be happy with us, she must meet with smiling faces on all sides, she must be the spoiled child of the house—and on the day of her wedding I will give you fifty crowns."

"Fifty crowns! Why, 'tis a dowry for me!" murmured the maid, with her thoughts full of that tempting, fabulous bait.

"Then we understand each other, Rosalie; so lose no more time," said her mistress, with feverish eagerness. "Go yourself and fetch Madame Dio here at once; promise her anything. And as you descend, ask Mademoiselle Yvonne to give me the pleasure of a visit in my chamber."

The maid obeyed, with joyful alacrity; and Madame la Marquise had scarcely time to mould her plans into working shape, before a gentle knock at the door announced the arrival of the young heroine in the forthcoming drama. She was welcomed with effusion.

"My sweet child! Come and sit by my side, and tell me all about yourself. I have scarcely had time to speak to you yet. How glad you must be to leave that dull convent!"

"Ah, Madame, I was very happy there," said the girl, in the loyalty of her heart.

"But you will be far happier with us, my Yvonne. And you must not call me 'Madame,' so coldly; say 'My dear aunt.' We must be the best of friends; for, indeed, I am more like an elder sister—the same colouring, the same complexion." And she shook out her fair curls, with a simpering glance of recognition at her face in the mirror.

Yvonne was silent, in sheer amazement. She looked round the gorgeous, over-decorated boudoir, where luxury and self-indulgence glared at her from every side, while she could scarcely breathe in the stifling, perfumed atmosphere. Then, with clear youthful vision, keen to detect falseness and artifice, she felt how all centred round and matched the painted doll before her. Well might her heart sink at the thought that henceforth, this would be her guide and companion.

Madame read the girl's expression according to her own nature. Surely she must be full of envy and longing at the sight of all these beautiful things.

XUM

"'You did not expect me, Olympe; but I have serious matters to discuss.'"—p. 454.

"My poor child. You have had a hard life, with no pleasures; but now all is changed. Fie, that horrid little convent frock! What is your maid thinking of? You must never wear it again, my beauty. I have sent for my modish dressmaker, and your toilettes shall be a dream. I can fancy you in a soft, shimmering green of Venetian silk, with water-lilies, and again in a heavenly blue tabbinet, worked with silver thread. Ah, but Madame Dio will be in ecstasy to adorn such a face and figure. And your hair, child—goodness! what liquid gold!"

As she spoke she playfully loosened the comb which held up the coiled mass, and Yvonne's long tresses fell like a veil round her shoulders.

"Yes; it must be dressed in the last mode—little curls like mine—and it will be adorable!"

But this was more than the girl could endure. "Ah, Madame, I pray you leave me as I am!" she exclaimed, and there was such a note of real alarm in her voice that her aunt replied soothingly:

"Well, well; we will make no change at present. It must be called 'the bashful maid,' which will be piquante; or, better still, 'Madonna like,' for that will please Madame de Maintenon. She affects simplicity, and is pious beyond expression. That reminds me, you must become one of Madame's 'Ladies of the Office of Charity,' which I joined when she started it last year. And when we are with the Court at Versailles, you shall go with me every day to Vespers in chapel, and carry your little taper, to make sure that the King recognises you. You shall have my Director, Dom Orson, or the Abbé de Sainte Croix—with him confession is a delight. He has so much knowledge of the world.

"But indeed, Madame, I have no need of a Director, and I do not go to Confession, for I am a Huguenot——"

"Oh, I knew what you would say; but that will come all right!" interrupted her aunt impatiently. "Now find Madelon to dress your hair, and bid her bring down the dresses you had for Versailles, to await the coming of Madame Dio."

Yvonne needed no second telling. With a sigh of relief she made her escape, and scarce drew breath till she had reached the quiet haven of her own chamber. Once there, with closed door, she threw herself on a low stool by her bedside, and buried her face in her hands.

Oh, the shame, the indignity of it all! To think that all her high hopes and aspirations should dwindle down to this. That she should grow earthwards, and become in time such another as that painted woman, with no soul above the choosing of a silken gown and the fondling of a lap-dog. She shivered at the thought; surely it was impossible.

Then before her troubled spirit, there rose up the crowded story of the last few days. Was she indeed the same Yvonne whose horizon had so lately been bounded by the convent walls; who had passed thence to a world of enchantment, of which the very memory made her eye flash and the warm blood mantle to her cheek?

She saw herself back at Versailles, in those stately gardens where joy had kept tryst with her, and echoed back the secret of her heart. Then had come the sharp awakening, when all her happy dreams had melted away. Her guardian's voice, pompous and honied, still echoed in her ears, like the trump of doom.

"My child, we have neglected you too long. You will abide in the convent no longer—nay, this very day you shall return with us to our home, and take your rightful place as a daughter of our house."

Yet for all her despair, the young girl's eyes grew luminous, and a dreamy smile played round her lips, as she remembered that game of tennis in the Royal court, where Réné had been the conqueror and the King himself had applauded, and her foolish heart had accepted it as omen for the future. Nor was this all, for the Chevalier de Beaumanoir had dared to claim her as his partner in the final contre-danse at the great Court ball that night!

But the radiant flash of a moment faded away, and dark shadows closed in around her. Too well she knew that ere daybreak he had set off on his long ride southwards to join his ship at Toulon, and that every minute the distance which severed them grew apace.

Would they ever meet again?

CHAPTER XIII.

IT was high noon of a cloudy June day, when a great painted coach, drawn by six horses, with postilions in green and white, lumbered into the courtyard of the Hôtel Vaudreuil. A couple of lacqueys, in the same livery, swung themselves down from the back of the chariot, and threw open the door. One on each side, they supported

Madame la Marquise, muffled up in the many folds of her long pink mantle, down the wooden steps placed there to assist her descent. She had scarcely touched the rough paving stones before a young girl lightly sprang, unaided, to the ground by her side, and at the same moment there came a fretful cry from an open lattice window above.

"Yvonne, Yvonne! Come and tell me all about it!"

"Truly that child becomes intolerable!" exclaimed her mother impatiently. "What is Bichon thinking of, to suffer such misconduct? She must be punished——"

"No, no, Madame," interrupted a fresh young voice, in eager pleading. "Poor Louise had so few pleasures; let me go to her."

And without waiting for an answer, the girl tripped swiftly up the polished staircase, with a light tapping of her dainty, high-heeled shoes. She never paused until she had crossed a dark passage and entered a long narrow room, where she was welcomed with a cry of delight.

"Dear Yvonne! I knew you would come. Now, quick, take off that loose dress, that I may see your Court gown. Ah, how lovely!" and her cousin's voice died away in a long-drawn sigh, as Mademoiselle de la Féronniere unloosed her silken cloak, which dropped with a soft rustle to the ground.

There could scarcely have been a greater contrast than the two cousins. The tall, slight girl, with her lovely face and rich glowing colour, her golden hair dressed high above her brow, in her clinging gown of palest blue taffetas, richly embroidered with silver thread—a delicate picture of radiant beauty.

And the other? Alas, poor Louise Éléonore de Vaudreuil! A hunch-backed cripple, with a thin, white face, already deeply lined, not with age but suffering; whose pinched features bore the sad record of her twelve long years of hopeless endurance. This was no meek, patient creature; the ministry of pain had brought no shrouded blessing, no healing touch to this ungentle nature; only peevish complaining and bitter rebellion against a cruel fate.

But for one brief moment, she forgot everything in a girlish delight at the sight of pretty clothes. "Now turn round; let me see you from every side," was the eager demand. "'Tis a dream of beauty! Madame Dio has surpassed herself, for I never saw the like."

The child's voice broke off in a long gasp of admiration, which was perilously near a sob. Yvonne, who was watching her with yearning pity, was quick to perceive that the excitement was too much for her, and that her sharp, piercing eyes were suddenly dimmed with tears. In another moment she had covered up her finery, and taking a seat by her cousin's side, she began her story in low, eager tones.

"Yes, Louise, dear, the carrousel was a wonderful sight, and you shall hear all about it. We had the Wars of Granada, with the most splendid Moors, the most stately Spaniard hidalgos! How I wish you could have seen those wonderful costumes. It was a gorgeous pageant. There were eight quadrilles, of which the first was led by Monseigneur le Dauphin, and the second by the Duc de Bourbon. Then the great procession defiled in order round the camp, to the sound of trumpets and tymbals, and spirited martial music, till they reached the amphitheatre where the King sat in state."

"And where was your place, Yvonne? Did you sit on a balcony where everyone could see you?" asked Louise, looking up at her with admiring eyes.

"Yes, dear; we were on the raised seats, with the rest of the Court, and had a fine view of the Tournament. It was most exciting to look down on the gallant knights in armour, jousting on horseback with lance and spear, and shooting with crossbows and arrows. Prince Camille de Lorraine carried off the prize on the first day, but the Marquis of Plumartin was the winner in the end. How I wish you could have been there with us, dear Louise! You would have enjoyed it more than anyone."

She broke off with a tremulous chord of sympathy in her voice; but the unwonted touch of kindness seemed to sting the cripple's sensitive passionate nature.

"Do not lie to me, Cousin Yvonne; I will have none of your pity!" she cried. "You would be ashamed to have me by your side, in the midst of your fine company, like a death's head at the feast!" And she looked up with fierce defiance, into the gentle face bent down to her.

"Believe me, if it would give you pleasure I should be proud to attend you to the King's Court, with the noblest of the land. Will you not accept my friendship and trust my sincerity, dear?"

The grave words were spoken with such an accent of truth and love, that the girl's angry spirit was hushed and soothed.

"Yes; I know that I am a wicked girl," she sighed, "and sometimes jealousy seems to well-nigh drive me mad. But there is some excuse. See what a glorious world this is for other girls, and then look at me, a wretched hunchback, a thing to shun with horror. Think of it, Yvonne. Here am I, no cold saint like you, but a warm-blooded human creature, with the keenest craving for life and joy—so young too, yet a prisoner for all the weary years in this deformed body. 'Tis a very death in life."

There was something so terrible in this self-revelation of a soul in agony, that for a moment Yvonne was dumb; but with her instinctive longing to speak some word of comfort, presently she murmured:

"Try to look upon it as the will of God, for your good in some way that we cannot see now."

"Ah, you are like all the rest with your tame platitudes. Is it for my good that I am fed on bitterness until I hate the very name of a God who can be so cruel, so unjust? What have I done to deserve this awful punishment?" she demanded, in sullen despair.

Yvonne was silent. Who was she that she should justify the ways of God to man? But she stooped forward and kissed the flushed, burning cheek.

"Listen to me," continued Louise. "You shall hear my story, and then talk to me of God and religion, if you can. Picture to yourself a sweet little girl-child, the darling of the household, petted and spoiled by all—why, even my mother was proud of me, for I was an added charm to the attraction of her salon.

"One day my father carried me off in his arms to the ante-chamber, to show me, and make his boast, with happy pride, to some boon companions. He tossed me up to the ceiling, as he had so often done before. They tell me that I was brave and full of spirit for a babe, that I loved the rapid movement, and crowed aloud with delight. But this time, by some unknown trick of fate, he failed to catch me in his outstretched arms; I fell heavily on a marble pedestal, and in a moment my whole life was wrecked. When the slow mischief revealed itself, no cost was spared. Heaven and earth were appealed to, in vain. Not a chirurgeon of repute but tried his hand on me, from the Docteur Passerat to the Capucins du Louvre. Not a gruesome remedy or a blood-curdling charm was I spared. Bichon will tell you all about them by the hour together.

"When there was no hope from mortal man, then Heaven was assailed, with lavish alms and weary pilgrimages, but all alike was of no avail. The petted darling became a cripple, a hunchback, a thing of terror and loathing."

"Dear Louise! Ah, the pity of it!" murmured Yvonne. Her gaze rested with wistful tenderness on the eager face, so distorted with rage and yet so keen and vivid, with the piercing eyes that shone like stars. Then a sudden thought struck her, and some happy instinct bid her give it expression. Almost unconsciously she exclaimed:

"How clever you are, ma cousine. What a gift you have for telling a story. As I listened to you, I saw it all acted before me like a moving picture. You would make a marvellous story teller."

The chance arrow pierced the mark. The poor girl looked up with a new light on her countenance.

"Do you think so, indeed? Sometimes I have wondered. Ah yes, I am clever, I know it. I hear all that is said, I never forget anything, I read the people about me like a book. As an instance, I can see through my mother's powder and paint, and her false golden hair, and she hates me for it. I am a reproach and disgrace to her."

"Hush, hush, dear!" interrupted her cousin, startled once more at the violence and bitterness of her tone. "Let us talk about yourself. Women do write sometimes. There was Louise Labé, and Dame Pernette, and La Reine Marguérite, not so long ago. They say, too, that Madame de Sévigné's letters are charming, and the King himself is delighted to be allowed to read one. Then there is Mademoiselle de Scudéry; have you read her "Conversations Nouvelles?"

"Oh yes, my father buys me books. But what will you say if I tell you that I love the dramas of Monsieur Racine, and that I too have tried my hand at verse? I will show you a new couplet of mine, if you promise not to betray me. I am supposed to be for ever working at this eternal tapestry, but I have my tablets and inkhorn always at hand.

"Hark! who is that riding into the courtyard?" she cried, turning towards a small mirror placed at right angles to the window, where she could see reflected all that happened below. "Ah, it is Adolphe. Dear Yvonne, you are ever good to me. Now listen and I will repay you. You must not marry him," she hissed out in a fierce whisper. "He is cruel, he only wants your fortune. I am sure there is some plot, but I will be on the watch and warn you. Now, quick, talk of other things; be bright and gay, for he will steal in upon us unawares."

It was as she said. A few minutes later the door opened noiselessly, and Louise, much daring, exclaimed with a light laugh: "So you see, dear, he admires you more than ever, and, for my part, I look upon you as my sister already." Then she turned, and gave a well-acted start of surprise at the sight of her brother.

He was in wondrous good temper. Plainly all had gone well with him at the great Court fête, and the words which he had overheard seemed to him of good omen. He came forward with a gallant bow.

"Ah, my fair cousin, I find you, as usual, engaged in good works. Now that you have cheered the solitude of my little sister, will you not make me happy too, and join me in long-promised game of mail? We have the whole afternoon before us, and I am sure you will soon learn to play."

A quick meaning look passed between the two girls, and Yvonne, prompt to take the hint she received, replied:

"I shall be glad, my cousin, if it will give you pleasure, and you have the patience to teach me."

So it was arranged that they were to drive to the ground immediately after the middle day meal, and she withdrew to put on an appropriate costume. Mademoiselle de la Féronniere had only yielded to her cousin's request as a matter of diplomacy, and to please Louise; but, contrary to all her expectations, she enjoyed the game of mail very much, and proved herself a most apt pupil.

To a young girl of her simple tastes, it was delightful to be freed for a time from elaborate toilettes, and to take wholesome exercise in the open air, such as she had been accustomed to at the Abbaye-aux-Bois; and never before had Adolphe de Vaudreuil been so courteous and attentive, and appeared to her in such a favourable light as when he was seriously teaching her the game he delighted in. On that June afternoon there were other players on the ground, which was a fashionable resort just out of Paris. De Vaudreuil made the most of his opportunity in flaunting his intimacy with this beautiful companion, of whom report already spoke as his promised bride.

In many respects this game of mail was much like our golf; but it was played with balls made of box-tree root, and one of the clubs was like a shovel—flat, thin, and broad—while another was hammer-shaped, like our croquet mallets. Yvonne was taught how to put out her left foot in starting; how to "slow back," not raising the club too high.

"Now look at me," cried her teacher. "You

"She threw herself on a low stool by her bedside, and buried her face in her hands."—p. 458.

see that the swing is the thing. The wider the curve you make with the club the better, but you must never lose sight of the ball."

"Ah, that was a splendid stroke!" she cried in admiration, as his ball shot straight out into the distance and was lost to sight.

"You should see Louis Brun, of Provence," he replied, in a self-deprecating tone. "Why, they say that he can drive four hundred yards! But that passes my credit. Down there in the south they are not allowed to mettre la boule en beau ["tee" it], for each stroke, as we do in Paris. Now try again, Yvonne. No; you must not raise the left elbow, in the style of fat Madame de St. Quentin yonder!

"You must take the ball boldly. You observe that we have arrived at la passe," he said, and pointed to a raised iron circle. "I must show you what to do. We take the lofter, and with a light touch lift it over." He first showed her the stroke, and then handed her a lofting iron, with much solemnity, that she might follow his example.

By this time the girl was too much in earnest herself to smile at his eagerness, and she did not notice even that quite a group of spectators had gathered around them. She had never looked more beautiful—her eyes bright with excitement, a delicate colour on her cheeks, and her radiant golden hair escaping in vagrant curls from her little velvet cap. Adolphe could not fail to see the admiring glances turned towards her. He valued her accordingly, and his pulses quickened at the thought of his coming victory.

He knew her to be, so far, an obstinate heretic; he more than divined her deep prejudice against him; and yet he registered an inward vow that, in spite of everything, he would win this lovely creature, cold and pure as a snowdrift, for his bride. He would use every art, every subtle wile, to conquer her proud will; and Louise should be his tool and accomplice. Hitherto his cousin's great fortune had been the main attraction, but now other feelings awoke. It was Yvonne herself that he wanted, and with new zest he set himself to strain every nerve in the exciting pursuit.

The girl was young and fresh enough to love air and movement, gay sights, and pleasant games. She should have them. He would study her tastes; bring all his cunning wit and cleverness into the contest. Her days should be one round of gaiety and excitement; and when all this had become indispensable to her, she should learn the unflinching truth, that marriage with him was the only "open sesame" to happiness.

CHAPTER XIV.

A NEW era had begun for Yvonne. She was so full of life and spirit, so radiant in her perfect health and vigour, that it was little wonder her physical nature should rebel against its long suppression, and crave for mere earthly enjoyment. The temptations which surrounded her were most insidious, for the girl was no pale saint, with languid pulse and ascetic instincts, but a very human creature, who rejoiced in her youth. To her the game of mail was an ever fresh delight, whilst a long ride on a spirited Arab carried her back in memory to the careless country joys of her childhood, when horses and dogs were her cherished companions.

Even the gay and frivolous society of the Court, from which at first she had been disposed to shrink with vague misgivings, now gave her more pleasure than she cared to own. The ceaseless round of fêtes at Versailles, the royal picnics in the forest of Marly and Fontainebleau, the fashionable and literary gatherings in Paris itself, where all was so bright and vivid, could not fail to charm her, when beyond the devoted attentions of her cousin she found herself courted, and admired, and surrounded on all sides by a subtle atmosphere of flattery.

Adolphe de Vaudreuil was wise in his generation. He soon learnt that this girl, whose attractions grew upon him day by day, must be taken on her own terms, and treated simply as a comrade; one touch of sentiment would ruin all. Thus it was that in the eagerness of his new pursuit, he spared no time, nor labour, nor expense, to crowd the young girl's days with every varied form of amusement.

His father looked on in crafty silence at the little drama acted before him, well pleased, and yet at the same time not without a touch of contempt, for even the heiress was scarcely worth all this unwearied devotion from an egoist like Adolphe. But one element was left out of his account, for if ever the Marquis de Vaudreuil himself had indulged in the passing weakness of love, it was so long ago that he had forgotten all about it.

As for little crippled Louise, from whose keen eyes nothing was hid, she was inscrutable, and gave no sign, but bore with stolid patience the inevitable loneliness and neglect. It may be that she foresaw a catastrophe, and simply bided her time.

Meantime, Yvonne's hours of waking life were so full and absorbing that she had no time for more serious thought. Even at night, when old Madelon lingered about her chamber, full of wistful longing to warn and counsel, her mistress was too sleepy and tired after the day's pleasure to take much notice. But a sharp awakening was at hand for the slumbering soul.

On a certain Monday, July 16th, the Vaudreuils were all to be favoured guests at one of the most magnificent fêtes ever known, even in that age of luxury. It was given by the Marquis de Seignelay, Secretary of State, in his splendid gardens at Sceaux, some miles south of Paris, and was a special compliment to the King in honour of the coming marriage—the fulfilment of his heart's desire—that of the Duc de Bourbon and Mademoiselle de Nantes.

The great painted State chariot, with its six Flemish horses, lumbered round to the doorway of the hotel betimes, and after awhile Madame de Vaudreuil and Yvonne, in gorgeous dresses, mounted the steps and took their places, in leisurely fashion, with due attendance of obsequious lacqueys. Lastly, Adolphe joined them, resplendent in a casaque of peacock blue velvet, richly braided with gold, worn outside a waistcoat trimmed with ribbons; while his new wig, with its long curls, was an elaborate work of art, of which he was justly proud.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil had preceded them, as he was in attendance on the King, and would form part of his suite from Versailles. His fortunate position ensured for his family the most exclusive seats on this great occasion.

"We are much flattered that you honour us with your company, instead of riding alone, Adolphe," hazarded his mother, looking up at him with a furtive side glance, as she rustled her brocades in a nervous, fidgety manner.

If there was one person in the world whom she feared more than her husband, it was her cold, sarcastic son; and she could not grow accustomed to this new phase of behaviour—this amazing show of respect and courtly devotion.

"The honour is on my side, Madame ma mère. Ah, you ladies dazzle me with your splendour!" was his suave reply, as he made a low bow to his cousin, placing the three-cornered hat, with sweeping plumes, on the seat by his side.

The young man was in the best of tempers, he was satisfied with his appearance, and felt that all was going well with his suit. During the slow, tedious drive, for the poor horses never achieved so much as a trot with their ponderous burden, he set himself to beguile and entertain his companions by his witty conversation. There were difficulties even here, as he well knew; pitfalls to be avoided in the way of Court scandal, unseemly jests, or ill-natured comments; so he fell back on the never-failing resource of the skilled talker—his own personal experiences.

"Did I ever tell you, my dear cousin, how once, when M. Bontems was suddenly taken ill, I was for one whole day in personal attendance on his Majesty?"

"It must have been a very serious charge, to judge from your solemn tone," said Yvonne, with a light laugh.

"Hush, you foolish girl!" interposed Madame. "It is almost high treason to treat the King's service with such scant respect."

"Indeed, I assure you it was no light matter; the etiquette is most strict," continued Adolphe, taking no notice of the interruption. "I will begin, then, at dawn, with the story of the King's day. I went on duty at eight of the clock, walking delicately without my boots, not to disturb the royal slumber. A trusted lacquey of experience followed me, to bring in a basket of wood into the chamber, and replenish the stove, if needed. He then carried away on a silver tray the collation—a cold fowl and other delicacies—placed within reach at night, in case the King might awake and feel hungry; for, indeed, our liege hath a regal appetite. Moreover, he has a way of rising at midnight to feed his dogs.

"Next, the attendant took away the mortar, a silver vessel filled with water, in which floated a half-pound mould of yellow wax, with cotton wick in the centre. Besides this, there was a waxen taper in a silver candlestick on the floor, placed for safety in a silver basin, and burning all the night."

"Ah, did he indeed?" exclaimed his mother. "What waste! And may I ask was all this a perquisite of the valet?"

"Ah, who knows?" Adolphe shrugged his shoulders. "Shall I continue my tale? Next, the watch-bed, occupied by the head valet de chambre, was removed noiselessly by the servants, and my duty was to stand alone and in silence by the couch, until the inlaid clock should strike the half-hour. Think how I was trusted. Consider the responsibility of gazing thus on sleeping Majesty! But now there fell upon me the awful duty of awaking a Monarch!"

"What did you do?" asked Yvonne, much amused. "Did you shake him?"

"Shade of Cæsar, forbid it! No; I discreetly sighed and murmured, and made a few deferential sounds, until the royal sleeper roused himself, when I hastened to the door of the ante-chamber and announced pompously, 'His Most Christian Majesty no longer sleeps!'"

"It must have been a trying moment."

"Yes, indeed; and it left me breathless with agitation. Well, after an interval came the first entrée, when the King, seated in a great tapestried chair, received a few favoured guests to his toilette.

"Then came the royal breakfast—a small white loaf on an enamelled salver, and a little wine and water in a vase of gold enamel. Next your expectations, my cousin. But I hope I have not wearied you with my long story?"

"Oh, no; the ways of a King are full of interest. But if it is the same every day, it must become tedious."

"It is not for us to criticise such an exalted personage, my niece. I have already had occasion to reprove your levity," said Madame, in an aggrieved tone.

"'The honour is on my side.'"—p. 463.

followed the grande entrée, when the toilette was complete, and all the visitors whom the King delighted to honour were suffered to pass within the balustrade. Later, the King dined alone.

"The afternoon is given to pleasure. His Majesty has a craving for the fresh air, and also a talent for receptions. That is why so many picnics in the forests of Marly and Fontainebleau have become State functions in the summer time, when there is no hunting, which is his greatest passion."

"Ah, yes!" cried Mademoiselle de la Féronniere, with kindling eyes. "To hunt the stag in the forest of Fontainebleau—it must be a pastime indeed, worthy of a King's delight."

"And of his invited guests!" added Adolphe, with a smile. "You will find it surpass all

The silence which followed was most welcome to the young girl, for she was thrilling with eager excitement. At this coming fête, which rumour said was to surpass all that had ever been known in the way of magnificence, what might not be in store for her?

Yvonne scarcely dared to dwell upon the radiant hopes which flashed through her mind. Yet was it not more than possible that the Duc and Duchesse de Maillebois would be amongst the invited guests; and that, meeting her dear Gabrielle, she might have news of Réné?

Nay; was it even too wild a dream to imagine that some happy chance might have brought hither the young Chevalier himself, in attendance upon the King?

[END OF CHAPTER FOURTEEN.]

The Beauty of God.

By the Rev. Joseph Woodhouse, Chaplain to Horton Asylum, Epsom.

"The beauty of the Lord our God."—PSALM xc. 17.

IF the inscription of this old-time pilgrim song be accurate, it is Moses who brings the stately poem to a conclusion with the prayer that God's beauty may be upon His people Israel.

A brief study of the beauty of God will give to it no small amount of interest and inspiration.

Has the reader ever seen the beauty of God? I wish he could have seen it as I did when I saw God give to the world a new day!

1. It all comes back to me most vividly as I write. I was on board a steamer crossing the Channel. It had been a grand night, the sea perfectly calm. The sentinel stars had kept their silent watch throughout the darkness. There had been scarcely a fugitive puff of wind to ruffle the bosom of the sea, scarcely a fleck of cloud in the star-lit heavens. I watched, and I saw God give to the world a new day.

Away in the far east the soft light began to appear. The faint glow of the rising sun tinted ever so slightly at first the day's awakening. Little by little the kindly light spread, radiating softly above the horizon. Presently there shot up towards the high heavens, gleaming arrows of light—pink, amber, orange.

As I still watched, the rich glow deepened, the radiance widened, broadened. Farther and farther the rays spread, higher and higher the glory ascended. But a mist obscured the line in the far distance where sky and sea ever seem to meet.

Yet all the time the light was growing brighter, and the radiance more beautiful. The stars began to lose their lustre, and the night to yield her sovereignty to the coming day. Another moment—Yes!—there is the glowing edge of the sun, a burst of molten fire.

I watched intensely. While I gazed, it became larger and fuller. Higher still it rose, till the round disc of the sun's face fair blazed across the heavens. And God blessed His creatures with the gift of a new day. Indeed, I saw Him give the blessing! An intense rapture thrilled me, and I was conscious of receiving, while standing upon the steamer's deck, the wonderful gift as from God's own hand.

IT WAS THE BEAUTY OF GOD IN THE MIRACLE OF DAYBREAK!

2. Yet how quietly God did it! I could not hear the flight of one arrow of light through the thin air and up the dome of sky. I listened attentively, almost anxiously. I could not catch the faintest sound of the breaking of the day. I heard nothing of the drawing of the bolts as the gates of the morning were flung wide open. No sound was perceptible save the hiss and dash of the salt wavelets as they broke upon the steamer's iron sides while she ploughed her way resolutely forward.

And how many years, how many cycles of years God has been doing the same wonderful thing! Day by day He continues the miracle just as easily and as gloriously as when the first day was born in the remote beginning of things. "The beauty of the Lord our God" is in the daily marvel of daybreak.

3. Is it not also in a thousand common things that make the world so splendid where God's sons and daughters live and move and have their being?

It is seen in midday lustre, in twilight softening gleam, in midnight flicker of countless stars, and in silvery glow of the silent moon. It is in springtime loveliness, in summer's wealth of glory, in autumn's bounty, and in winter's frost and snow. It is in the flowers that carpet the earth; in flickering shadows of forest and glade; in the mountain crevasse; in the flashing river, the April shower, the scudding cloud. Everywhere—east and west, in city and hamlet, on the everlasting hills and hoary rocks, filling heaven and earth, belting the whole round world—God's infinite beauty clothes all His works.

4. How beautiful God HIMSELF must be to make the world so wondrously fair! Behind all the lavish loveliness of the works of His hands there are the precious thoughts of God whence all the beauty has sprung. And every divine thought is a beautiful idea that will clothe itself in some gracious ministry for man's welfare. And so many thoughts too! "If I could count them, they are more in number than the sand."

But are not the glories of rock and sky and sea, glen and forest and flower, only Nature's reflections of the moral and spiritual beauty of God's pure self? So beautiful is He that at the best Nature's marvellous works are but hints and suggestions of His real and glorious nature. What thrill was in the pilgrim song when the glades and rocks of the wilderness echoed with the chorus of the pilgrim host as they followed the moving cloud-pillar, singing as they went:

"Lord, Thou has been our dwelling place in all generations.
Before the mountains were brought forth,
Or ever Thou hadst formed the earth and the world,
Even from everlasting to everlasting, Thou art God! . . .
And let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us:
And establish Thou the work of our hands upon us;
Yea, the work of our hands establish Thou it!"

5. But what does it all signify? Does it not mean that the beauty of God is not gathered up and focussed in the glories of the material universe? Nature, in her vastness, and in her fairest mood, is not the complete revelation of God. Nature is not spiritual enough to reflect the whole beauty of God. The Lord Jesus Christ is "the brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of His person." "God is Spirit," and behind all material illustrations of God there are His moral excellencies. These constitute His supreme beauty, and they are manifest to the world in "His only begotten and well-beloved Son." "He that hath seen Me," is the Lord's own testimony, "hath seen the Father."

6. And is not the prayer of the pilgrim song "Let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us," a legacy for devout hearts in all the ages to appropriate? Surely the open secret of Christ's gospel for to-day is that wherever spiritual union with the Lord Jesus is a reality it is possible to recover the blurred image and likeness of God. God's moral beauty can pervade the human soul by the indwelling of the Holy Spirit. According to the measure of His capacity, by the might and mystery of faith, a man may be as full of God's beauty as God is full of it Himself. Notwithstanding all the limitations of life in the flesh, the believer in Christ may have "God dwelling in Him, the hope of glory." The truth is, God's spiritual beauty is unveiled before the whole universe in the unblemished character and scatheless life of the Son of God and Son of Man. And being rooted and grounded in Christ, whosoever will may grow up into Him in all things.

Hence it comes to pass that the beauty of Christ's strength to do right; the beauty of His meekness, gentleness, charity, unselfishness; the beauty of His conspicuous goodness and holiness, may clothe and adorn the soul of the man of faith to-day. In this way he may translate the prayer of the divine poem into his own redeemed and sanctified life. "The beauty of the Lord our God" may transfigure the life now lived in the flesh so that it may be a living epistle for God, known and read of all men.

Indeed, this divine beauty in man is not the baseless fabric of a dream. In the power of the Holy Spirit, and as silently as the breaking of the day, the transfigured life may show forth the praises of the Lord.

I have made it prominent because the beauty of character in the Lord Jesus Christ is the human representation of the moral and spiritual beauty of the invisible God. And the more we grow like Christ the more nearly we regain the lost image of God.

"LET THE BEAUTY OF THE LORD OUR GOD BE UPON US."

THE WHITE ENSIGN.

A Complete Story by E. Reid-Matheson.

EVERY morning without fail, since their marriage, Irene had waved her handkerchief to her husband as he turned the corner on his way to the station—every morning until to-day.

But this morning, though Adrian looked back as usual, the "White Ensign," as he called it, was not visible.

To think a little miss like that should make everything go wrong all day for two grown people!

Yet, however it may be in another world, in this it is precisely the small, trivial things which matter.

Adrian's face was blank, as he turned the corner to catch his train. How could he guess that Irene, the "White Ensign" crumpled in her small fist, was peeping from their bedroom window to see the last of him—but cautiously, from behind the lace curtain, that he might not know?

It was all the fault of that bicycle—if we may speak so of a bicycle that never existed.

Here, indeed, was the gist of the quarrel.

Irene considered that the bicycle could, should, and ought to exist; everybody cycled nowadays but herself.

Her two unmarried sisters had machines, and spent half their time in delightful excursion rides with friends. Why, why might not she take lessons and have a bicycle too?

Adrian had several objections, and in stating them he, man-like, made the fatal tactical blunder of mentioning his least objection, the £ s. d. aspect, first.

Irene had taken him up passionately. Not afford it, not afford it! What about his scheme to go for a week's trout-fishing in Hampshire with Jack Dayrell, at a pound a day per rod? Of course, that was another matter—that was for himself!

She had laughed a little dry laugh; and when Adrian, keeping his patience, went on to tell her that his chief reason for objection was fear of an accident, there was so much traffic on these suburban roads; and then the tram-lines—if he could always be with her—the little dry, disagreeable laugh came again.

Oh, really, he was most kind and thoughtful. What a pity she could not see his consideration in the right light!

At that point Adrian had risen from the breakfast table, and gone out, muttering under his breath.

Irene heard him in the hall brushing his hat. It was a thing she had never known him do before, because she always did it for him. Every morning she would say, as she gave it to him, "There now, isn't that a work of art?" and he would swear it looked better than new.

But that morning the hat came off with scant attention—a few short, sharp twists of the brush round its sleek black sides and top, and never a word of admiration.

For the little woman who tended it so deftly sat glued to her place at the breakfast table, one finger in her mouth and an angry light in her pretty eyes.

And then the slam of the front door, and the little woman, already an ache in her heart, had rushed upstairs to see Adrian out of sight.

Perhaps he would not look back; in any case there would be no white ensign for him to-day.

But he did look back, and the white ensign seemed to struggle to get free and wave; but small fingers held it tight.

Would Adrian really care?

Ah, well! it would never do for him to think she had forgotten her anger—her righteous anger—so soon.

If he did mind a little, he had certainly deserved it. So Irene, thrusting the crumpled handkerchief into her pocket, went downstairs, and took out the pretty silk shirt she was making for herself.

When she had bought the silk it had troubled her conscience a little that it had come to twice what she had reckoned it should; but when she told Adrian he only laughed and said all the better, nothing could be too good for her; some day she should have not only all the silk shirts she could manage to wear, but everything to correspond.

Adrian was confidential clerk to Brown and Mortimer, the well-known house and land agents, and as neither had a son to succeed him, Adrian had certain castles in the air.

Irene sewed for a few minutes in rather feverish haste; then pushed the work suddenly from her, and sat with a troubled frown, thinking.

Ten o'clock! And Adrian would not be home until half-past six. More than eight mortal hours to get through with that shadow between them. They had never parted so before. Tiffs

"Adrian had several objections,"—p. 467.

there had been, of course; and it came upon her now that she had done quite her share in beginning them, but they had never before parted without making it up.

"The butcher, please M'm."

"No order." Irene spoke sharply in her inward discomfort. "Stop, Mary"—the maid was closing the door—"tell him three lamb chops, nice ones."

True, there was still plenty of the cold beef; but to-night there should be chops. Adrian was fond of them.

Irene went into her neat little kitchen to finish ordering. There should be new potatoes for the lamb, and a gooseberry tart.

Gooseberries were very small yet, Mary said, and very dear.

"It is I who have to pay for them, Mary," said her mistress with unusual asperity, and in the same breath added an order for cream.

Mary stared, but said nothing; but, of course, she "'ad 'er thoughts."

Irene went back to her sewing, her troubled spirit for the moment soothed by the thought of having ordered Adrian's favourite dinner; but the relief was short-lived, and the prospect of those long hours before Adrian could know about her thought of him loomed longer and more dreary as the minutes dragged by. Irene sighed a hundred sighs in one, and put away the pretty silk shirt; it had less than no interest for her to-day. Then she remembered a pair of Adrian's gloves which lay holey and buttonless in the hall table drawer, and, upstairs, some shirts with the neck-band stud-holes sadly needing attention. Adrian had mentioned the things once or twice, and Irene had really meant to mend them, but somehow it had not got done. That morning saw all of them mended; remorse guided the needle, and upon one or two of the garments a hot, shining teardrop fell.

Irene strained her imagination to remember Adrian's face when he had looked back and seen no white ensign waving, and her distress urged her to misgivings which intensified as she harboured them. What if Adrian had taken her petulant words to heart, and——. She dared not formulate her thought.

If only she could see Adrian for a moment. How could she endure this suspense until half-past six? A wild idea came to her of taking train to town and going to her husband. It was gone in a moment. Adrian had no private room, but sat in the main office amongst half a dozen junior clerks. How could she say what she would want to say—that it was all her fault, and that she had never meant the unkind things she said? Or how could she tell but that he was sore and angry still, and might not listen? Or, worse still, that he had heeded the matter so little that he would wonder why she came? No, for every reason it would never do; there was nothing for it but to wait.

Then another wild idea came to her: she would telegraph. Irene seized pencil and paper:

"Please forgive your wife; she is sorry. Wire reply."

But supposing Adrian should be absent or engaged, and that a fellow-clerk should open the telegram? Irene's cheek burned at the notion. Perhaps the whole affair had passed from Adrian's mind, and he would come back to her, his own affectionate, companionable self. In any case the telegram was impossible. With another sigh, fathoms deep, Irene laid down her pencil and worked on at the shirts till they were finished, though the modest little cold luncheon which Mary had set at one end of the table had been ready an hour ago.

Before Irene had eaten—it went against the grain to-day—a loud peal at the door bell set her a-tremble.

A telegram? Bad news of Adrian? Her heart stood still.

A loud, cheerful female voice asked if Mrs. Blunt were in. Irene remembered. It was Margaret Seeley, calling for her to go to the local tennis tournament.

"What, still feeding?" cried a lively young matron, who, entering, administered a hasty peck to Irene's cheek without lifting her veil, and subsided rather heavily into an arm-chair.

Irene said something about having been busy. She was trembling still from the shock of the bell-ring, and the knowledge that nothing escaped Mrs. Seeley's roving eye did not help her to composure.

"Seedy, aren't you, Irene? Well, you look it, at any rate. What, then—squabbling with the beloved? Oh come, don't pretend you're such angels! I know of old that Adrian isn't."

Mrs. Seeley laughed a malicious, tantalising laugh. Irene's heart grew sicker; Margaret Seeley was quite the last person whom to-day she could bear to see.

That lady had known Adrian years before Irene and he had ever met; nor was she sparing in hints of a former tender understanding, and insinuations that—well, that it was her own doing that her name was not Mrs. Adrian Blunt.

Irene had never felt able to ask Adrian the straight question which would have set her foolish jealousy at rest; and Mrs. Seeley fed her pet myth with allusion and insinuation till at times the poor child hardly knew how to bear her society. But never, never should Margaret think she feared to associate with her on Adrian's account; and, besides, jealousy is a ravenous demon, and compels those whose breasts he inhabits to feed him, at whatever cost to themselves.

"Come, child, get on your hat, or we shall miss a lot of play; it will take us half an hour to get there, and if you pretend you must be back by six——"

Oh yes, she must be back quite by then, Irene said quickly.

Part of the way they walked, taking a tram when it served. It was a balmy day in late May; light dazzling clouds sailed by overhead in the blue, the breath of flowering shrubs was in the air, and the glamour of full spring-tide overlay even the monotony of respectable middle-class Suburbia. But to-day the scent of lilac and hawthorn came faint and sickly to Irene's nostrils, and the sunshine might as well have been darkness, because of that foolish, tender signal omitted; and all that bright afternoon at the tennis tournament, among the pretty frocks and flutter of fresh spring millinery, the gay hum of voices and outbursts of applause, Irene was lonelier than alone because of the undefined foreboding at her heart.

Margaret, sparkling with vivacity, looked here and there, bowing to casual acquaintances with a sort of exuberant graciousness, born of consciousness of a new and becoming hat. Possibly it should not count against Margaret Seeley that she was not cast in womanhood's nobler mould; but, instead, was of that much-abounding type which sees in every other woman a rival, and construes another woman's discomfiture as its own triumph. It had tickled Margaret's feminine littleness to play upon the obvious uneasiness of Adrian's wife with regard to those mythical tender relations of former days; perhaps she considered this was but fair compensation for the fact that her readiness to become Mrs. Adrian Blunt had not met with the success she could have wished.

The young matron's roving glances presently collected around her a little knot of men, whom, though her acquaintance with most of them was casual, she played off one against another with an audacious coquetry which appeared to afford them and herself equal satisfaction. Some slight attempt was made to include Mrs. Blunt in the vivacious fooling; but Irene's smiles were conjured with effort, and, left in peace, she sat chin in hand, staring at the tennis players, but thinking of Adrian and that miserable quarrel. Stealthily, now and then, she stole a glance at her watch, and when half-past five came she escaped on easier terms than she had hoped, thanks to Margaret's preoccupation. Arrived at home, Irene put on her prettiest blouse, and took up a book to beguile the last ten minutes of waiting; but the clock-dial got more attention than the book.

Half-past six! He was rarely later. Irene ran upstairs quickly, that she might not miss a second of him if he came in time, peeping from her window to see him turn the corner.

No sign of him. She went downstairs and took up her book to prove to herself that she was not in the least anxious.

Seven o'clock! The book was thrown aside with a heart-wrung sigh. What could be keeping him? She paced the room, stopped, listened, paced again.

Half-past seven! Mary appeared at the door. Hadn't she better bring in dinner before it spoiled? But dinner was negatived in a voice in which Irene heard her own unshed tears. Restrained, those same tears, only until the door closed; then she sobbed out the day's accumulation of anxiety and remorse.

The evening sunlight, pouring in at the window of the small, cosy dining-room, mellowed to its richest gold, paled, faded into greyness; and still Adrian did not come.

Irene's eyes were dry now, but beneath them dark, sorrowful shadows. All evening she listened, paced the room, listened again. The ticking of the clock fell upon her racked nerves like red-hot rain, and the faint sound of Mary moving in the kitchen irritated her past bearing; every rattle of wheels outside meant Adrian brought back injured—dead.

Nine o'clock! Mary once more. Surely her mistress had better have something to eat.

Irene's farce of cheerfulness was played out. "I can't eat whilst I'm anxious about Mr. Blunt, Mary," she said. Mary, with the well-meant pessimism of her class which sometimes has to do duty for sympathy, closed the door with the remark that "It was to be 'oped nothing 'adn't 'appened" to her master.

These tactless words were but the echoes of Irene's secret fears; no dreadful dénouement of that silly squabble did her imagination spare her. Her heart throbbed in loud unison with her beating brain; better almost any certainty than this killing doubt. The hall clock leisurely thudded out ten strokes, and the French time-piece chimed a belated silvery echo.

Irene, her white face set in resolve, put on hat and coat in feverish haste, counted the money in her purse, and took her latch-key.

"Mary," she called, "I am going to London; you can go to bed. Leave the lights downstairs."

The hall-door closed behind Irene, the night breeze met her tear-burnt face, and blew in her ears with nameless omen. The road to the station was dark but for the dull yellow gleam of isolated gas lamps. Foot passengers passed Irene—knots of young men with loud cheerful voices, married couples returning from some mild social festivity, street-boys whistling the latest music-hall ditty. Now and then a cab rumbled by, into which, eagerly fearful, she tried to peer. The station gained, she flew up the steps, and at the cry of "Victoria train," flung herself breathless, ticketless, into the first open compartment. The five men of sorts and conditions who sat within smoking, surveyed the late comer with interest aroused by the fortuitious combination of a pretty, sad face and the late hour.

Irene heeded nothing of it. How this train crawled! She could have done the journey quicker on her own fear-winged feet. As the train slowed into Victoria, Irene jumped out and hurried along the platform, pushing her way in devouring impatience of each momentary obstruction. Outside she got into a hansom.

"Where to, Miss?" came the driver's voice down the trap-door.

Irene began to give Adrian's office address, but pulled herself up suddenly. The office would have been closed for hours.

"Wait—wait a moment till I think," she cried.

Despair surged over her in hot waves. Where? She had never given it a thought; her one impulse had been to fly to her husband, to save him possibly from—she knew not what. Helpless unit that she was in that vast, teeming Babylon. A cry went up from her dumb lips, "Oh God, help me!"

Moments like these are like long years. Cabby waited above his trap-door. Something queer, no doubt, he thought; but in his quality of hansom driver he caught passing glimpses of many life-tragedies, and took them as all in the day's work—or night's.

"Irene!"

She looked up with dazed eyes.

"Irene! Child, what are you doing here?"

Adrian Blunt lifted his wife from the hansom; she clung to his arm tightly, but did not speak.

"Look 'ere," began the hansom driver in injured expostulation; but the couple had disappeared through the booking-office, and he walked his cab off grumbling.

The train got into motion; husband and wife looked into each other's eyes.

"Oh, Adrian, it was cruel of you; you don't know what I have suffered."

Then it came out that on his arrival at the office he had been sent into Oxfordshire to inspect a property for a client of the firm, and the trains had been all wrong for the return journey.

"I never got to Paddington till after ten," he said.

"But you could have telegraphed me, Adrian."

"I could," he said; "I ought. I did think of it, but somehow I thought—I thought——"

"You thought I shouldn't care," she sobbed; "but I've been miserable ever since you went this morning, and——"

"I'm a brute," he said; "it was all my fault."

And so forth, and so forth. Don't we know it all by heart? The ridiculous, needless little squabbles, in which each of us is so surely in the right; the heart-ache, the remorse, finally the reconciliations, which cancel bitterness and draw closer bonds already close and dear.

After that dreadful day, if ever the white ensign missed waving in the morning there was a satisfactory reason for it, and no hearts were sore; and—in case anyone should care to know it—Adrian invented an excuse to get out of that fishing-trip with Jack Dayrell, which sacrifice bore fruit in a certain delightful surprise for Irene on her birthday morning.

"Wait—wait a moment till I think."—p. 470.

THE MAKERS OF MODERN CHRISTIANITY.

BASIL: THE ORGANISER.

In Two Parts. Part the Second.

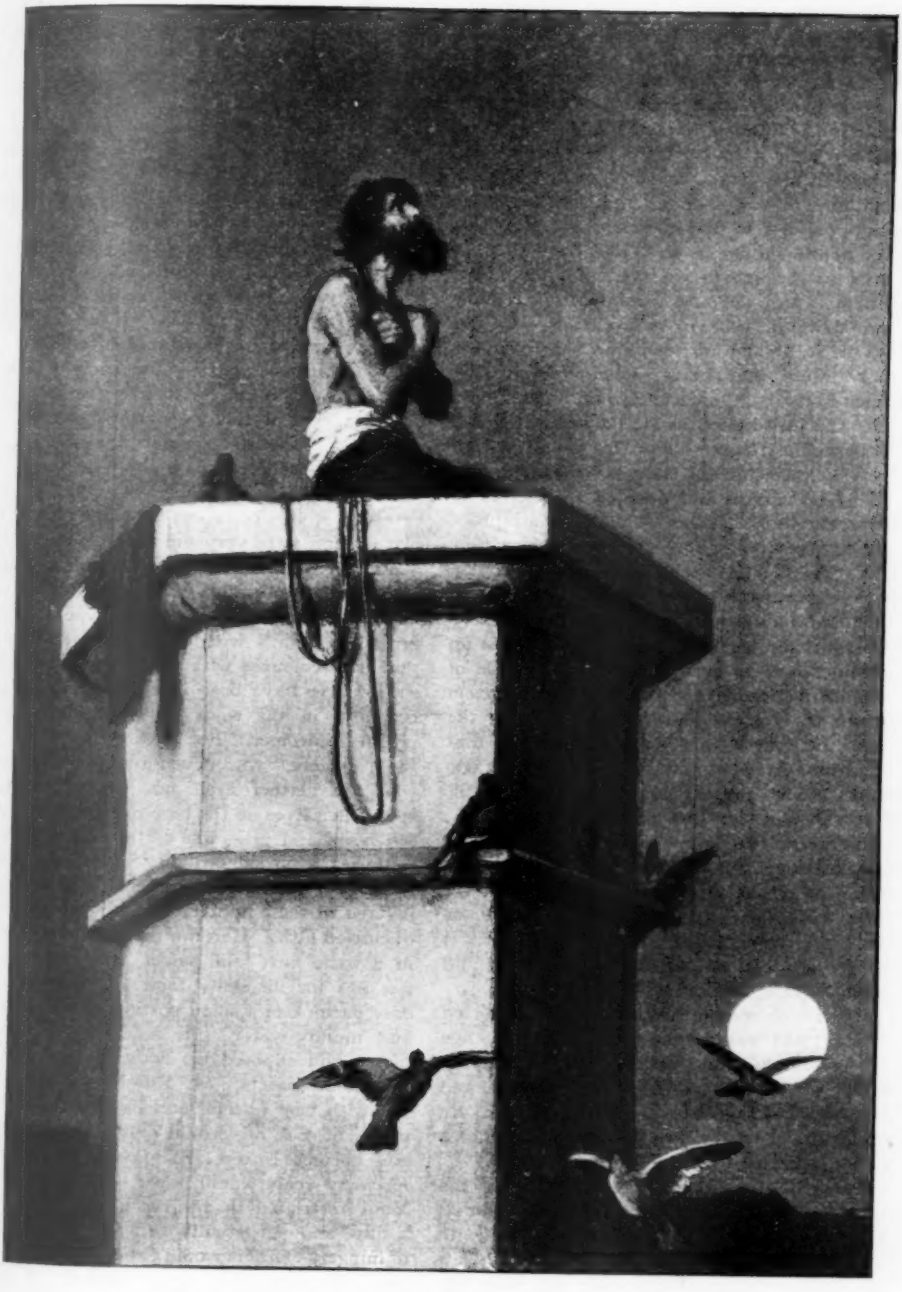
By the Very Rev. H. Donald M. Spence, D.D., Dean of Gloucester.

ONE of the great pieces of work—perhaps the most important in its far-reaching consequences—with which the name of Basil of Cæsarea will be for ever connected, was the introduction into the world of Eastern solitaries and monks,* system, order, obedience, work. At the period of Basil's most far-reaching influence, this vast company of Christians were very numerous, often powerful, and increasing in numbers every day. They as a rule acknowledged no chief. Each individual, or at most each little company of individuals, followed their own customs. Wild, undisciplined, often fanatical, they constituted, on the whole, a danger, rather than a strength, to the Church. Basil, while conscious of their power, saw how grave a danger the presence, the mighty and ever-growing influence, of these men, often lawless and undisciplined, was to the still struggling Christianity of the East. To a large degree his wise measures warded off the peril, and brought into obedience and subjection these wild and enthusiastic "free lances" (to use a later expression) of Christianity.

Briefly we will sketch the rise and progress of monasticism, which for good and for evil for many centuries exercised so vast, so far-reaching an influence over the Eastern and Western Churches.

For the first two centuries of the Church's existence monasticism, either in its "solitary" or "cœnobitic" † form, was virtually unknown. The central conception of the monastic life was celibacy, and an entire renunciation of the world, its joys, its pursuits, its aims.

In the first instance, persecution of the Christians on the part of the Pagan world, which after the first 200 or 250 years had grown in intensity, drove not a few Christians from the homes and haunts of men into desert and inhospitable regions, where, by the sacrifice of all that men hold dear and love, they might still serve their God and His Christ. The burning enthusiasm which drove men to subject themselves to this hard life, survived persecution and the earlier reasons which induced them to become wanderers and renouncers of all life's joys and ordinary pursuits.



Nor is this survival difficult to understand. For the first 250 or 300 years the Christian community was necessarily separated from the ordinary world; their hopes, fears, interests, joys, even sorrows, were absolutely their own. They were—and they gloried in the thought—separated from the ordinary world around them. When, however, the triumph of the Church threw the bulk of Christians into active political, military, and commercial life, they were no longer a separate and distinct people. How natural, then, that many of the more earnest and devout should have endeavoured to imitate the separation from the world which, in the days of persecution, was necessarily the common condition of all Christians. This separation could alone be carried out in the adoption of the austere monastic conditions of life.

Such a persuasion that only thus could they be really separate from the careless world around would largely account for the rapid spread of what has been termed "the ascetic epidemic" after the triumph of Christianity. Other causes, too, were at work. The luxurious existence led by so many in Rome and the chief provincial cities, perhaps, in the fourth century had become more marked than in any previous age. The asceticism of the monks and solitaries may be looked upon partly as a reaction produced among earnest souls by this extreme luxury and love of pleasure.

But another and still more powerful incentive to the strange and feverish passion for the hard life of the solitary and the monk existed in the miserable and hopeless condition of the Empire. Within, disorder and disorganisation, a terribly oppressive and corrupt Government, the burthen of an enormous and unbearable weight of imperial taxes. Without, the barbarian invasions and perpetual raids, bringing in their train unheard-of misery and desolation. Many a harassed and despairing citizen sought a refuge from the woes of the Empire in the monastic state, which offered something of a refuge in this life, and the promise of a rich reward when the fret and fever of life should be over and done with.

* Lecky does not hesitate in styling the monks and solitaries in the last half of the fourth century "A Mighty Nation."

† Cœnobitic—the term signifies a company, large or small, of men and women who were banded together to lead a "common life." The solitary or anchorite lived alone. The monk lived with others—the same austere, self-denying life.

"On the last pillar he remained for some thirty years."—p. 475.

And so it came to pass that a great army of these strange devotees arose in an incredibly short space of time in many lands. In the days of St. Jerome we read how nearly 50,000 monks were sometimes assembled at the Easter festivals; how some 7,000 monks lived under the jurisdiction of St. Pachomius, under St. Serapion 10,000; how in the Egyptian city of Oxyrinchus as many as 10,000 monks and 20,000 virgins had devoted themselves to the ascetic life. These vast numbers are probably exaggerated; but, still, it is clear that before the fourth century had run its course there was scarcely any Christian country in which the monastic movement had not taken firm root, and included among its votaries an enormous and an ever-increasing multitude of all ranks and orders. In the West, monasticism became the vogue somewhat later than in the East. St. Martin, of Tours, founded the first monastery in Gaul, and we read how 2,000 monks were present at his funeral. (St. Martin died at the close of the fourth century.) Egypt seems to have been the land where monasticism first appeared; and in Egypt, where, as it has been well observed, "everything excessive and extravagant found its birth, and ripened with unexampled vigour," it rapidly attained its extreme development and its most austere severity."

For various reasons it was ardently supported by the great writers and teachers of that age of great thinkers and writers, and the undying names of Jerome and Basil, of Ambrose and Augustine, of Epiphanius and Chrysostom, are among the more fervid advocates of this strange development of Christianity.

Advisedly we style it "strange," for the monastic ideal, whether in its solitary or in its cœnobitic phase, had absolutely nothing in common with the ideal life painted in the New Testament. Nothing that ever fell from the lips of the Divine Author of Christianity suggested that His disciples should order their lives upon the austere pattern favoured by an Antony or a Pachomius, by a Serapion or a Jerome. The burden of the Lord Jesus' prayer for His own was "not that they should be taken out of the world, but that they should be kept from the evil."

Monasticism was a purely human ideal. The vehemence and ardour with which those really great ones among the Master's servants, whose names we have just quoted, advocated it, was no doubt owing to the stress and storm of the iron age in which they lived. They deemed it, if not needful, certainly helpful, for that terrible time. It is uncertain if they looked forward to it becoming, as it did, an important and powerful factor in Christianity.

The strangest, and at the same time the most extraordinary, as it was the most unnatural, form of this wonderful "epidemic of austerity" was the passion for self-torture, which was the great characteristic feature of "the solitary." These saints, for in this category their countless admirers loved to place them, were very numerous. We possess a number of their biographies—wild and grotesque, certainly, but without doubt in the main true and authentic; and we read the gruesome details with a pained astonishment that lives coloured with such awful self-torture should ever have been regarded as lovely and beautiful in the sight of the all-loving and pitiful Redeemer. For instance, we read of the "grazers," who never lived under a roof, who ate neither flesh nor bread; but who spent their lives on the bare mountain-side, and ate herbs and grass like cattle. Most of these solitaries regarded ordinary cleanliness of the body as a pollution of the soul, and the most revered of their number had become one mass of clotted filth. Here we read of one who lived in a little cave and never ate more than a few figs for his daily food; of another who only partook of a small portion of barley bread and muddy water. St. Macarius slept in a marsh and exposed his body to the stings of venomous insects. St. Eusebius loaded himself with iron fetters, and lived in a dried-up well. St. Sabinus would only touch corn that had become rotten. St Bessarion, we read, for forty years would never lie down to sleep. Many restricted themselves to one small meal a day, and perpetually suffered the gnawings of hunger. Others would eat only every second day. Perhaps the most famous of these curious saints was St. Simeon Stylites, who built in succession three pillars, the last being sixty feet high. On the last pillar he remained, incredible as it seems, for some thirty years exposed to every change of climate in heat and cold, constantly bending his body in prayer. Round him he had bound a rope, which became imbedded in his flesh, and which must have given him ceaseless torture. We omit other and terrible details supplied us by his too-faithful biographer. From all parts of the world pilgrims of different ranks and orders came to do him honour, and to listen to his hoarse prayers. Over this pillar of long torture a brilliant star is said to have shone, and he was generally acclaimed, even in far-distant lands, as the highest model of a Christian saint; and when that sad and sombre existence at last came to an end, a crowd of devout men, some of them of the highest rank, followed Simeon the Stylite to his honoured grave.

Not a few of the solitaries of that age imitated, or tried to imitate, his awful life of suffering! It was to the high honour of Basil that he discouraged this strange ideal of solitary sanctity, and lent the weight of his great influence to support another and healthier form of monasticism.

The great Bishop of Cæsarea, in common with the other eminent leaders of thought in the fourth century, from Athanasius to Chrysostom, was convinced that the monastic theory was one great safeguard of the harassed Church, but he was too real a statesman not to be fully conscious that the disorganised condition of monasticism, as it existed in his day, would effectually prevent the ideal, conceived by the loftiest spirits of the age, ever being realised. So he set himself, as one of his life tasks, to work out the reformation and reorganisation of this monasticism. He was well equipped for the task, having visited and carefully examined the ways of living in the principal centres of ascetic life in Palestine and Syria, and more especially in Egypt, the great home of the solitaries and the cœnobites.

After careful examination, he became convinced that the life of the solitary, with its wild excesses, its strange and exaggerated austerities, must be discouraged. Basil was not blind to the great influence exercised by the more conspicuous examples of the solitary life, but he felt that the evil which would surely result from these unnatural existences would far outbalance the good. So with rare wisdom, risking the unpopularity which he was conscious would result from such teaching, he pointed out with great force the danger of the caprices of human pride being mistaken for the calling of the Holy Spirit, emphatically declaring that the monastic life led in common (the cœnobitic) was the better way.

In three master-works he set out an elaborate and well-thought-out scheme for the regulation of monastic societies, under the titles of (1) the greater rules, fifty-five in number (with an introduction), in the form of answers to the questions of the monks themselves; (2) the lesser rules, 313 in number, in the same form of question and answer; and (3) the monastic institutions.

The thought that underlay all these regulations was that in the self-denying life (1) obedience to authority must be accepted—obedience unquestioned and unswerving; and (2) that work, not merely idle, dreamy contemplation, must be the aim of every true monk.

Basil, the Archbishop of Cæsarea in Cappadocia, possessed sufficient influence in his own great diocese, and in the neighbouring districts of Asia Minor which more or less acknowledged the supremacy of Cæsarea, to enforce the reception of his stern, grave, though at the same time kindly, rule; and from his own immediate province his rule rapidly spread, and was accepted throughout the larger portion of the East. Its power and far-sighted wisdom was very generally acknowledged; fervid, and even enthusiastic, advocates of asceticism whose renown and far-reaching influence were unquestioned—men of the type of Ephrem, the Syrian Deacon, and Epiphanius, Bishop of Salamis—accepted for their followers and disciples the rule of Basil, and at the same time eagerly courted his friendship and deferred to his judgment.

It is not too much to say that Basil must be considered the founder of the great system of monasticism which gradually spread over the whole East and West. Before him monastics were largely made up of a wild and fanatical horde of impulsive men and women, many of them, while intensely in earnest, yet at the same time grossly ignorant, generally, though not universally, without discipline and without order, each striving after an ideal of their own imagination. After him, they were, more or less, a great army, disciplined and obedient, with a rule of life set before them to which they were compelled by the most solemn vows to submit themselves; and in this rule work and earnest striving * occupied the prominent place. Basil was the real creator of monasticism.

* Subsequently so successfully developed by Benedict in the West.

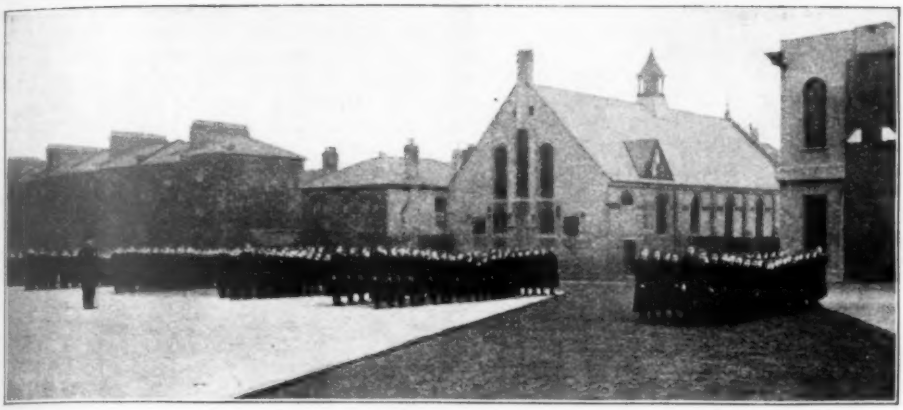
In our sketch of this great figure, which stands out so prominently in that group of the intellectual giants of the fourth century, we have necessarily touched at some length upon that wonderful and widespread outburst of asceticism, soon developing into that vast network of monasticism which so powerfully affected Christian life during many centuries—that monasticism with which the name of Basil will be for ever connected as its real founder. We would add just a few obvious reflections on the character and influence of this somewhat strange feature of Christianity.

It is hard to be just here. Monasticism has its bitter foes, as well as its devoted and ardent friends. Men of the school of Gibbon are unsparing in their sneers and bitter scorning; on the other hand, men of the school of Montalembert * and Ozanam can only see the beauty of the system, and are unmeasured in their lofty estimate of the blessings conferred on the world and Christianity by the lives and labours of the monks and the nuns. Writers like Lecky, or even Dean Milman, with all their noble efforts to be fair and just, paint their picture here with colours ever grey and sombre, and do scant justice to the splendid strivings after the higher life on the part of the great monastics.

But when all is said and done, it must be confessed that the teaching of monasticism is a sublime selfishness. The ideal monk, the perfect monastic, isolated from his brothers and sisters, is secluded from the trials and the cares, as well as from the duties, of common life. The principle and object of the life of the monk and nun is the purification, the elevation, of the individual soul. "Let the world perish, so that the single soul can escape on its solitary plank," is the groundwork of the ascetic teaching. Centuries later, in a little volume—perhaps the most popular and widely read (after the Bible) book in the world—the spirit of monastic Christianity is exquisitely expressed in short and quivering sentences, which have gone home to a thousand thousand hearts. But this incarnation of the spirit of monasticism, the "Imitation of Christ," as the work is curiously misnamed, begins in self, ends in self. Of feeding the hungry, of clothing the naked, of comforting the sorrowful, of bringing up smiles on faces where smiles are rare, not a word is found in any of its eloquent heart-stirring pages. To all devout students of the "Imitation," the popular gospel of monasticism, the world is dead. This was not the teaching of Christ.

Thoughtful men have dwelt with some insistence on the evil effect upon society caused by the withdrawal from the active into the monastic life of so many of the noblest and most enthusiastic souls, and have attributed to this cause "the conspicuous failure of the Church for so long a period to effect any more considerable amelioration in the moral condition of Europe," and have not scrupled to assert that the fact of the ablest men in the community inculcating as the highest form of duty the abandonment of social ties and all domestic affections, engendered a decadence of all patriotism and a serious deterioration of the home life.

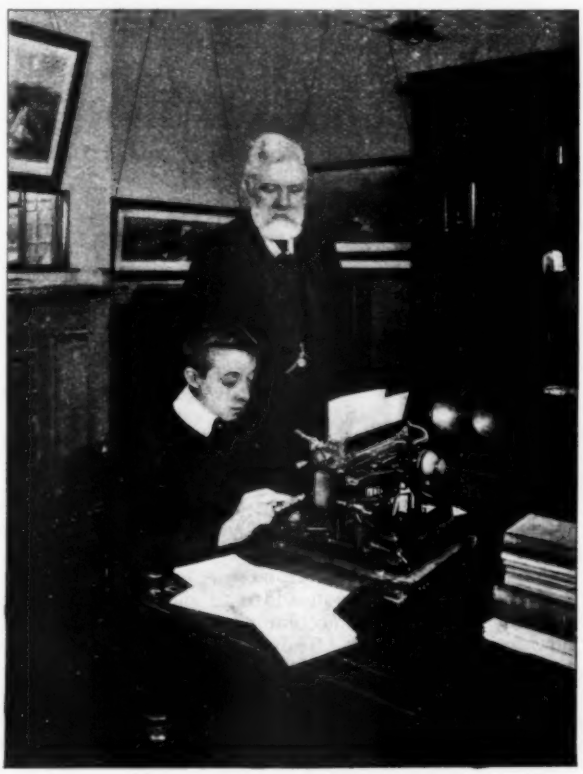


On the other side, the historian and the moralist cannot lose sight of the effect which the many acts of magnificent self-sacrifice, even if coloured with that sublime spiritual selfishness we have dwelt upon, had on a thoughtless, careless world. Imperfect and distorted as was the ideal of the solitary, still the example of many thousands who, in obedience to what they believed to be right, voluntarily gave up everything that men hold dear, was not wholly lost.† Multitudes, we read, of barbarians were converted to Christianity by the sight of St. Simeon Stylites praying and suffering on his lonely pillar.

It would be impossible, of course, to discuss here the broader question involving the benefits almost infinite in their variety and extent, conferred upon society during the long dark middle age by the monastic orders.

* I refer, of course, to that wonderful and winning "Epic of Monasticism" contained in the charming pages of the seven volumes of the "Monks of the West," but the fair critic, while ungrudgingly admiring the beautiful story, reluctantly acknowledges the exaggerations into which Montalembert is too often betrayed.

† Lecky's "History of European Monks," chap iv.



OUR OLDEST ORPHANAGE.

AT DRILL: PLAYGROUND OF SENIOR SCHOOL.

THE number of orphanages in the United Kingdom is now so large that it is difficult to realise that they are entirely the product of the last century and a half, and that prior to 1758 orphans as a class were ignored. If children had the misfortune to lose one or both parents, friends usually contrived to take one or two into their own families, and the rest had to go to the poorhouse, as it was then called. The system of the day allowed boys who had attained the age of fourteen to be apprenticed, and the fees for this included their board and lodging, such as it was, while they were learning a trade, and domestic service swallowed up the girls at a general wage of one shilling a week, and poor little drudges the majority of them were.

But about the middle of the eighteenth century there came a stirring of men's consciences and a universal impulse to redress the wrongs of the poor. The Spirit of the Lord moved upon the face of the waters. The fact that so many respectably born yet friendless children became beggars and grew up to be criminals, and had little chance of being anything else, weighed with fourteen thoughtful, and fortunately wealthy, London men who originally met at the George Inn, Ironmonger Lane, Cheapside, to discuss the situation in 1758. They resolved to befriend twenty orphan working-class boys, to take them away from bad influences, bringing them up from seven years of age decently, in pure air, and to teach them to earn an honest living by the work of their hands.

HIS LAST TERM.

Hoxton was then a village, not too far from the city, but a healthy, breezy spot where a suitable house and grounds could be obtained at very moderate rental. So twenty orphan boys were chosen by the committee, lodged, fed, and clothed, and instructed diligently for eight hours daily in making nets, list carpets, and shoes. Those who were inclined to learn were also taught to read—after a fashion.

EXTERIOR OF THE SENIOR SCHOOL AT HAVERSTOCK HILL.

Twenty girls were soon added to the boy orphans, and all were accommodated somehow for several years. The name given to the institution was "The Orphan Working School," and it exactly fitted the effort that was being made. Its value was fully recognised, and funds came in so rapidly that the committee soon felt able to enlarge their borders and afford the privileges of a home and training to a much larger number of children. Meanwhile, some of them began to think that a little more education would be desirable, and in January, 1764, it was proposed and carried that the children should be taught to cipher before leaving the house—at least so far as the rule of addition. This was considered a great advance.

In 1773 there was enough money in hand to justify the governors and committee in building a place suitable for their purpose, and they chose a freehold site in the then airy and little occupied City Road, close to the old Turnpike. Here they erected halls and dormitories for seventy children, and also a chapel, in which many well-known ministers and laymen officiated from time to time, for the institution was and always has been unsectarian. After settling down in the new house, the three R's were taught pretty regularly, though not by a qualified teacher, as the shoemaker of the establishment was considered quite clever enough to impart all the desirable knowledge, and it certainly served as a stepping-stone from which many boys rose to good business and even professional positions.

All this time the children were very quaintly dressed in drab coats and waistcoats, leather breeches, and white shirts with turnover collars open at the neck, speckled worsted stockings, and low buckled shoes. The girls had drab frocks, white caps and aprons, buckled shoes (which for some reason or other were always bought at Reading Fair), blue stockings, and straw bonnets and white tippets out-of-doors. It is only within the memory of the present generation that dress of this kind has been tabooed, and the children of charitable and other institutions have been attired neatly in clothing that bears no stamp.

INTRODUCING A NEW BOY TO TEACHER AND CLASS.

London was rapidly increasing, and the premises in the City Road were within measurable distance of being built in. Moreover, that site was rising in solid value, so the committee was able to buy the estate of Maitland Park, Haverstock Hill, and in 1847 they built the main portion of the present rather imposing edifice so as to provide for 240 orphans, and fifteen years later the wings were added to enable them to raise the number to 400, the funds being subscribed in commemoration of the fact that the school was just a century old.

The educational changes that have now been at work for many years past have caused the schools to be very largely developed and brought into line with the requirements of the day, and the pupils now hold their own well in the various examinations, and the teachers have received many compliments on their success. Such educational advantages have borne good fruit in enabling boys who have left at the regulation age of fourteen, or in some instances fifteen, to mount the social ladder and take substantial positions in life. Indeed, the committee and governors of the institution have in many instances been trained and educated within its walls, and it is able to account altogether for a total of 6,000 children, at least 90 per cent. of whom have done well in later life.

For many years it was felt that orphans not being admissible till the age of seven was a drawback. During those early years a little child whose friends can barely find it food and clothes undergoes a good deal of knocking about, and the seeds of many bad habits and tendencies are too often sown. This led to the foundation of the Alexandra Orphanage in 1864, of which the then Prince and Princess of Wales became patrons. It is at Hornsey Rise, and is conducted on the cottage system, twenty-five little ones being under the care of a "mother" and two nurses in each cottage, and they are admitted from infancy. In 1877 this was formally amalgamated with the establishment at Haverstock Hill, and at the present time 200 little inmates form Junior boys' and girls' schools, and are drafted to the Senior school at Maitland Park when nine years of age.

Among so many children there must from time to time be illness, and in order to assist recovery a convalescent home has been built and equipped at Margate which accommodates twenty-five at a time, and most useful it has proved.

Visitors to this institution frequently remark on the absolutely healthy appearance of the children, and there is, indeed, a total absence of "weediness." So much of the charity of the present day is concentrated on the weak, who are very much to be pitied, but will never grow up to be robust members of society, that it is quite refreshing to come across a bevy of well-grown, apple-cheeked, sturdy young people who are physically fit for hard work and plenty of it. This is greatly on account of the care exercised by the Committee in selecting candidates for admission. No child in delicate health is admitted, nor any that are suffering from infectious disease, nor who have any mental or physical defect. This tends to keep up the standard of physique, and it very much simplifies the task of the teachers, as healthy children can work together as a flock, and exceptions need not be made of delicate and easily tired or very dull units. From the very first they are trained to regular habits—early rising, an abundance of good, wholesome food, and plenty of exercise and fresh air. All this fits them for the strenuous life of the world's workers, and, their lives being arranged on the principle that change of work is as good as play, there is no pandering to the craze for perpetual amusement that is one of the most evil signs of modern times. Play in play hours is by no means ignored, but the habit of work is laid and strengthened as the years go on, and thus the Orphan Working School has always remained true to its name and its original purpose, and it does teach the children to work. The girls make and mend for one another and the tinies under the superintendence of their teachers and the matron. Frocks and knickerbockers, table-cloths and sheets, servants' dresses and caps, are only a few of the items that pass through their busy fingers; and in the kitchens they are taught to cook, and in the laundry to wash and get up clothes. This plan is so very good because it is entirely homely and simulates as nearly as can be the training of a wise mother, who makes her elder daughters care for the little ones, take pride in sewing for them, and making even old clothes look "amaist as weel as new," as Robert Burns said of the cottar's wife in his well-known "Saturday Night." The mending of household linen, again, fits those who marry for keeping their own household goods in order, and teaches those who ultimately go out to service an accomplishment which the majority of mistresses require at their hands. The house-proud lady of a generation or two ago mended her fine linen and napery with her own hands; but very few now know how to do it, even if they have any taste in that direction, and the house-parlourmaid has the keeping of the bed and table linen, and is expected to mend it, though the mistress in purchasing may buy it ready made. The cookery taught in the Working School kitchens includes instruction in the why and because of every operation, and the girls therefore learn how to extract every ounce of nourishment out of the food materials entrusted to them. Again, in laundry work, which has become one of the bugbears of the modern housewife, the girls are properly and systematically instructed, and shown that there is a right and a wrong way of doing everything, and how very much easier the right way is than the wrong when it is only understood. Starching and ironing are no mysteries to them, and, as laundries are among the best paying industries, the openings for skilled employment after they leave the orphanage are many and very fairly lucrative. Nor is domestic manual labour alone taught, for the Working School marches with the times, and within the last year or two shorthand and typewriting have been taught to those who have an aptitude for such pursuits, and thus the range of occupations open to the orphans is very much enlarged. Places are found for them before they leave, so that they have no chance of drifting into idle ways in the interval between quitting the school and entering a paid situation.

CANDIDATES FOR ADMISSION.

GIRL LEAVING: PACKING HER BOX.

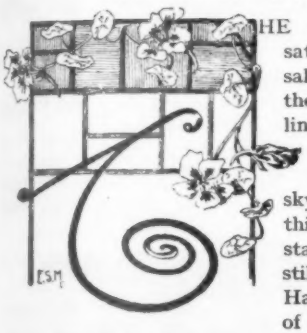
Every girl receives three guineas for an outfit of clothes when she goes out into the world, and during the first seven years after leaving the school has the chance of receiving small sums varying from five shillings to a guinea on producing certificates of good conduct from her employers.

Boys are even more handsomely treated, for £2 is handed to each when he leaves and £3 more at the end of a year if he can produce a satisfactory testimonial from his master. A distinct sum of money is useful in helping a boy forward, but it is equally beneficial to a girl to be kept in touch with the institution in which she was brought up for the seven years that carry her over from girl to womanhood.

Whenever a great catastrophe occurs by which whole families are orphaned the Working School manages to accommodate a considerable number. When the Exeter Theatre was burned down some years ago a contingent of twenty boys and girls was received at Haverstock Hill, and when the ill-fated Princess Alice went down in the Thames several children found a home and friends there; while after the South African War every nerve was strained to take in as many desolate orphans as possible. Like other charitable institutions, the Orphan Working School has had its ups and downs, and sometimes feels the pressure of hard times, but the Governors are not frightened by passing clouds. They have never gone in for sensationalism or made a great noise, but the work has been done diligently and unobtrusively with the least possible number of officials over and above the working staff, and year after year proves that in quietness and confidence is their true strength.



ALEXANDRA ORPHANAGE: JUNIOR PLAYGROUND.

XUM

FOUR DAYS IN HER LIFETIME.

By Harry Davies.

THE FIRST DAY.

THE woman who sat apart on the saloon deck of the big southern liner, with her face uplifted towards the sky, saw many things in the stars. It was a still, sultry night. Hardly a breath of air was stirring. The darkening ocean spread like a vast somnolent plain towards the last pale glint of the after-glow—a big daub of blackness against a phantom glimmer. The great heart of the vessel pulsated with a steady throbbing like the life-beat of some mighty animal. The peaceful swell of the waters sped past her with scarce more than a swish and a gurgle. From the chairs scattered on deck rose and fell the subdued hum of conversation, varied by occasional laughter. Faintly, from the saloon below came a woman's voice singing a familiar song. All the sounds seemed to blend harmoniously with the wonderful peace of the night. Above, the stars glowed and quivered like the fierce eyes of a furnace; and this woman, who sat in her lounge chair, in the shadow of her quiet corner, saw many things in them.

She saw, to begin with, along the vista of the past years, two days that stood out in her life above and distinct from aught else. The first was a day in July, fifteen years ago. It was in the west country, where the hills, bleak and barren, tower above their wooded valleys like some aged giants, keeping guard over the puny affairs of men. A lad and a girl stood by a stile that led from the field-path on the hillside to the woods above. Below them the roofs of the village peeped forth amongst the foliage. The summer sun was setting over the western heights, and the peace of evening was stealing softly from copse to copse. At intervals, rendered musical by the distance, came the tinkle, tinkle of colliery trams as they performed their last journey for the day down the steep incline from the pits to the railway siding. The girl had heard that distant sound many a time since then, but never without a sweet rushing of the blood through her veins.

Fifteen years ago! Yet she could remember it all as though it had happened only yesterday. It is strange how, in the great moments of life, whether of joy or suffering or calamity, the mind picks up and records the most trivial things. Every word that was said on that July evening; every sound that floated on the air; every object that met the eye; they were engraved on the palimpsest of her brain for ever; and it was her pleasure to recall them all to-night as she looked at the stars. From the rank ground which bordered the wood had come the odour of wild mustard, from the trees behind the twittering of many birds. On the bank at her feet grew a star of Bethlehem, which she had swayed to and fro gently with her parasol. Far over to the west faint tints of orange and crimson were shooting up the sky, and they seemed to speak to her full heart of the glory that had come into her life. Yet the marvel was not that she remembered all this. The marvel would have been that she should forget. For had she not thought of it day and night, night and day, for fifteen years? Had she not treasured it up in the innermost depths of her soul—a perfumed memory, a secret casket of purest gold, a radiant star, shining for herself, for herself alone, amongst the clear glory of the heavens?

The girl who stood by the stile was slim and lissome, and fair to look upon. Without the slightest trace of conceit, even with a feeling of detachment, the woman on deck allowed that fact. She knew that the gift of comeliness had been vouchsafed to her in more than an ordinary degree, and she had been glad of it, as any healthy-minded girl would be, but never so glad as when she realised that it had caused her to find favour in the eyes of the lad who stood with her by the stile. As for him, he was tall, sunburnt, brown-haired, frank-eyed. As she looked into the stars, she could see his face as she saw it on that day, fifteen years ago—eager, strenuous ardent. She put up her hand to the locket at her breast, and fingered it lovingly. And then she fell to thinking of the words he had said. They were still like the sweetest music to her ears. She smiled to think that at thirty-six she could be so sentimental. She could remember the whole conversation, word for word, in the exact order in which it had been spoken. So often had she gone over it all during these fifteen long years.

For it was at the stile he had said that which was the crown and guerdon of her life. So long, so long, even then, had she loved him—even from the days when, as boy and girl, they had trod the same lanes to the same school. To have the heart's dearest desire, to hear the words which were craved more than anything in the wide world, to be yearned for by the one most beloved—is there did not know? Do you think she was not waiting too?"

"Ah, now you've floored me," he retorted. "I am too happy to argue seriously. I expect the young lady wasn't blind, if the truth were known. And besides, you know, she might have been told all about it."

"Whether she was told or not, she knew. A woman always knows."

"Oh, wise little philosopher! I like to hear you. Philosophy suits that hat."

"Now you're laughing at me."

"I feel so jubilant, I could laugh at anything. But, dearest, to be serious, do you know what "Wondered how they could all shout and laugh as they did."

anything that can bring greater perfume and sweetness to a woman's life than this? For a brief space she could not trust herself to speak, lest her happiness should seem unwomanly.

"And you will wait for me, Ruth?" he said joyously.

"Dear, I will wait for you, if needs be, even as Rachel waited for Jacob."

"But it was the other way about," he replied laughingly.

"According to the words of Scripture it was," she said; "but do you suppose she waiting means? Do you know what weary years may go by before I am able to send for you? Supposing it were seven or eight? Supposing it were ten?"

"If it were fifteen—if it were twenty—it would make no difference to me," she answered.

He gently took her hands in his.

"A woman's love is a marvellous thing," he said. "It is something divine. What I face with dread, you seem to think nothing of. For I do dread it, Ruth. The long years of waiting are more than I can bear to contemplate. Yet there was something I dreaded more, and that was the thought that, if I did not speak to you, another fellow would be picking my rose before I was able to do so myself. Wasn't that mean? Wasn't it the very essence of dog-in-the-manger? Yet I could no more help it than I could help breathing."

She looked into his eyes with a smile. How little he knew!

"Make your mind easy on that score," she said. "There would not be anyone else. And even if you were never able to send for me I would rather have waited for you, even in vain, knowing that you loved me, than have married any other man in the world."

There was a short pause. His voice was husky when at last he replied.

"Dearest, I am satisfied," he said. "No man could wish for greater proof of love than that. I am not worthy of it; but with God's help I will try to be so. At least, I can promise this: as far as human power and will can go, you shall never have one moment's regret that you trusted your dear life to me."

A robin had broken into song in the hedge. The last rays of the setting sun had sent a shimmer of gold athwart the odorous wild mustard. From some mountain farm on the hill behind them had come the cadence of a woman's voice, long drawn and melodious, calling the cows.

THE SECOND DAY.

ITH a sudden revulsion of feeling, her thoughts sped onward to another day, four months later. The transition was like a drop from a height. A rush downward, a mental shock, and she found herself fallen from ethereal summits into the dull places of earth. Never could there have been two days more widely diverse in any woman's experience. A sad, dreary day, this second. The morning had opened dark and sombre, a melancholy mist hanging over the mountain slopes, a drizzling rain falling steadily down the valley. The barren hilltops loomed hazily through the fog, the grey-white wreaths of which hung with brooding heaviness over the woods. A desolate, depressing scene, in fit accord, as it seemed to her, with the dull aching at her heart. For this was the day of parting, the day when her lover went forth to the other ends of the earth. Please God, they were to meet in a far-distant continent when he had made a home for her, but there was a long, weary struggle before him ere this would be accomplished—for he went out throwing down his cap to Fortune with nothing but sturdy limbs and a stout heart to aid him. Whether the years would be few or many, he knew not; but years it would certainly be ere they would be able to commence life together. A sickening dread tugged at her heart—a terror of the blank desolation which would possess her when he was gone—an empty gnawing of apprehension at the passing of his face from out her lonely life; yet for his sake she would not let him see how she was suffering.

His friends and relatives came to the little valley station to see him off, but she had arranged to accompany him to the junction some twelve miles away. She sat back in the corner of the carriage as he leant out for a last hand-grip, and wondered how they could all shout and laugh as they did. The fussy, asthmatic little engine started, a cheer was raised. It came home to her with sudden force that the parting had really commenced, and a wild impulse possessed her to throw herself on her knees before him. The effort of self-control left her flaccid and depressed. There was so much she had wanted to say, but language was denied her. She realised that the precious moments were slipping away. Each moment was a tug at her heart. Never would she forget that ride. She was on the platform at the junction. . . . He was leading her to the waiting-room. . . . There were only a few minutes to go ere the great express came thundering in. . . . Yet she seemed to have said nothing—nothing. The waiting-room was empty. Of that she was glad. He took her hand in his.

"Dearest, you will be true to me?"

She looked up into his eyes and met his gaze.

"Until my dying day," she said.

"I shall never rest until I have made a nest for you," he said, bending down towards her. "Week in, week out, my aim will be towards that one object. It will be my first thought at morning, the subject of my last prayer at night. It will be my star towards which my eyes shall ever be directed. And I will reach the star. Dearest, I give you my word that, granted health and strength, I will reach it. Keep a brave heart, dear love. There is no obstacle that can stand before a man when he has a light to his path such as I have."

Her heart was well-nigh bursting; she would have given all she possessed to have been able to tell him what she felt, yet the utmost she could do was to look up into his face and say:

"Whether the time be far or distant, dear, you will always find me waiting."

From without there came the clanging of a bell. Her heart seemed to have stopped beating. He took her in his arms.

"Good-bye, dear, and may God watch over you and protect you until we meet again."

She was very pale. She tried to answer, but something in her throat prevented her speaking. She could but cling to him and whisper: "Good-bye."

He had begged her not to come to the carriage door. "A carriage-door parting would be more than I could stand," he said. And when it came to the last moment she felt he was right. So she crept forlornly to the door of the waiting-room after he had gone, and there caught a last look of his face as in a blur.

How she lived through that day she knew not. The memory of it was softened by time, yet even now it brought a poignant sense of misery to her heart. To go back alone up the dismal fog-laden valley, to have to face the long, dreary afternoon teaching in the village school, just as though nothing had happened—it was desolation indescribable. How she went through it all she knew not; but somehow it came to an end, and somehow the days went by, and somehow at last life shaped itself into the old groove again.

In her little school-house on the hillside she learned to discipline her heart and to wait in quiet. It was a hard, bitter lesson, but she was the happier for learning it. Who, indeed, is not? She had her interests in life, and in them she found her solace. She was the support of her widowed mother, and she found a keener pleasure in that. There was her school to look after, her backward scholars to bring up to the standard, her own domestic arrangements to think of, with the hundred and one little happenings that always attach thereto. For the rest, Nature was a friend to her. From the little house on the hillside she looked forth on a dense wood of larches. Above them towered the rugged mountain-tops. Below rippled the stream among its boulders. They all had a new language for her, a deeper note of melody and peace than she had ever found in them before. Whether it was the great west wind crashing among the branches, or his gentle sister from the south humming among the bracken, or the stars shining above the rugged bluff, the message always seemed to be the same to her. "Have patience a little while. The years will soon pass. He is working for you. Have patience."

And sometimes came another friendly sound when the breeze set from the south-west—the far-off tinkling of the trams as they ran down the inclne. They always caused her heart to throb for the memory of a certain July evening, and they always spoke the same message as the wind and the stars, only in a still kindlier voice.

The years went by, bringing their changes. Her mother died, and henceforth she was left alone in the school-house, save for Margaret, the elderly servant, who had been with them for a quarter of a century. Margaret was gaunt and angular, a confirmed man-hater, and a hopeless pessimist. She contrived to hide the depths of affection which abided in her gnarled old heart under great asperity of manner. On the subject of the engagement she was especially acrid, yet she referred to the subject with strange insistence. "However you could have anything to do with them men I don' know," she would say, with a snap. "They're all a poor lot. No more thought or sense than a lump of dough. I warrant you he won't have a proper kitchen set for you!" Dear old Margaret! Her company was not exactly inspiriting, but it had been an unspeakable consolation to Ruth.

She thought over those years one by one as she lay in her chair. As she traced them in order, she felt again with inexpressible poignancy the old familiar dreariness of longing and waiting. That they had been very hard to live she could not deny to her own heart. Hope deferred—hope deferred—that had been the tale almost from the beginning. He had always been an optimist, and, like all optimists, was apt to see things in a glamour. At first he was confident that in five years he would be sufficiently established to send for her. The five years went by, and he had still failed to reach the goal. He had had the worst of ill-fortune, and was practically obliged to start over again. But in another two years he thought he saw his way clear—in fact, he was quite certain. And so the years had gone on, and still he had been unable to send for her, and people had long ago taken to shaking their heads pityingly as they looked after her. She saw them not, nor would she have heeded them had she seen. "If it were fifteen years—if it were twenty," she had said to him that evening by the stile, "it would make no difference to me." Well, it had been fifteen, and she could claim to have been faithful to her word. The only difference which Time had wrought had not been in her love for him, or her loyalty, or her patience, but in those changes of form and face which the years must ever bring to us all—a change imperceptible to herself, but none the less pronounced. The sun and the wind had been kind to her; her quiet, regular life had kept the lines away from her forehead; her skin was as clear, her colour as fresh, as when she was a girl of twenty. But her face had grown fuller and older-looking, and more staid; the light of youth had gone out of her eyes; her figure had rounded into proportions almost matronly; threads of silver were showing plentifully amongst her wealth of dark hair. She looked unmistakably what she was—a woman of thirty-six. Comely of feature, as she must ever be, but still palpably middle-aged.

XUM

Ah, well! the waiting was over. The years had been leaden-footed, but at last her long probation was at an end. Success had come to her lover, and with it, happiness to her. The home was ready and waiting far away on the quiet uplands of Queensland. God had been very good to her. Her heart surged with deep gratitude as she looked at the stars.

THE THIRD DAY.

She stood on the crowded, bustling quay, and looked around her with a great expectancy. Her heart leapt as her eyes fell upon him. She would have known him anywhere, despite his beard. How well he looked, how bronzed, how manly! He had altered scarcely at all, save that he was stouter and manifestly older. He was looking away from her, scanning faces eagerly. She went to him quickly, and touched him on the arm.

"Frank!"

"A chill fell upon her."—p. 488.

In that one word was compressed all the longing, all the loneliness and anticipation and pent-up love of fifteen years.

He turned swiftly, and they met each other's gaze. In her eyes the light softened as she saw the deep lines on his forehead. In his it suddenly, unmistakably died away. The smile faded from his mouth. He had always had a most expressive face, and, whether he would or no, his feelings were always writ large upon it. The change that came over it when his gaze fell upon her was quite involuntary on his part, yet withal so marked that even she, in the height of her joy, could not help seeing it. A chill fell upon her—a chill that seemed to numb the very pulsations of her heart, and to spread like the touch of ice through her whole being. Her smile, like his, died away. He had immediately recovered himself, and was welcoming her with great heartiness, holding both her hands as he spoke. But to her it seemed that his tone was forced, his enthusiasm laboured, as of one who is trying to hide a feeling of dismay. She could not respond. The humiliation was almost too great to bear. This was the golden moment to which she had looked forward with such unspeakable eagerness! His face had fallen on beholding her! She tried to smile; and to speak cheerfully, but it was a forlorn attempt. He seemed to see that something was wrong.

"You are very much changed," he said lamely. "I should hardly have known you."

"One does change in fifteen years," she replied, with a mirthless little laugh. "You, too, are changed, but I should have known you anywhere."

"Come along," he said, taking her arm, with another attempt at cheerfulness. "As I told you, I have arranged for you to stay with the Wingroves until we—are married. They have been very good friends of mine, and I want you to like them very much."

Part of her luggage collected, and the rest arranged for, he called a cab. Despite their efforts, there was a constraint between them as they sat side by side. She could not repress the bitterness of her disappointment. In the place where her heart had been there seemed to be a stone. She had expected so much, and—his face had fallen when he looked at her! The thought continued to torture her the while she strove to appear natural and collected. He put his arm around her, and, raising her face to his, kissed her. She sat quite still.

"Haven't you a kiss for me after all these years?" he said.

She looked up into his face with a grave smile and kissed him.

He released her, and again the constraint seemed to rise between them.

He began to talk—of the home he had prepared for her, of the spot he had selected for their honeymoon, of the Wingroves. She tried to listen intelligently, the while her brain tortured her beyond expression.

"I do want you to like the Wingroves," he said. "I simply cannot tell you how much they have done for me. Had it not been for their kindness and help and encouragement, I should have given up the struggle long ago."

"I am sure I shall like them," she said.

"I feel pretty confident you will not be able to help yourself," he replied laughingly. "Of all the hospitable, warm-hearted people you ever could imagine—but in two minutes you will see them."

Again there was silence between them.

"You are really very much changed, you know," he said, with a half smile.

The words were uttered involuntarily, and in half-nervous attempt to make conversation, but the repetition somehow stung her to the quick. She grew pale to the lips.

"Ah, here we are!" he said cheerily, as they pulled up before a well-kept residence.

She sat at the window of her room. The air was hot as it blew in, but it seemed like the laving of cool water compared with her burning forehead. Her brain was in a whirl, her head aching furiously. She tried to think, but the effort caused her temples to throb and the lights of the city to dance before her eyes. She sat perfectly still for a while, and then tried again. How had she got through the evening? What had they talked about? She had not the faintest idea. She only knew that she had answered questions mechanically, that she had nodded her head when remarks were made, without hearing a word; that she had smiled when the others smiled, and laughed when they laughed. What did they think of her? What could they think, save that she was absolutely colourless and empty-headed? And what did it matter? Her castle seemed to have fallen to the ground like a pack of cards, and she sat amongst the ruins as one bewildered. It could matter very little what people thought.

She tried to argue out the whole question with herself. She had come out after fifteen solitary years of waiting, not doubting for one moment but that things would be the same as in the old days, that she would be to him the Ruth of fifteen years ago. She walked over to the mirror. Oh, poor fool that she had been! The Ruth of fifteen years ago was gone for ever, and in her place was a round-figured, middle-aged woman with grey hairs. With brutal force the cruel truth burst upon her. It was the Ruth of fifteen years ago he had expected to see, and she—she was old, old, old! She threw herself on the bed, and burst into a flood of weeping. The humiliation was too bitter to bear. What wonder that he was disappointed, that his face fell when he beheld her? What wonder that she was weighed in the balance and found wanting when such a girl as Patty Wingrove—young, trim-figured, bright-eyed—was so friendly with him, laughed at and chaffed him, hung upon every word he said? She had noted it all with a dull aching at her heart. How could she have expected that she would find him the same Frank as of old? Time had changed him as it had changed her; he had settled down into a new life wherein she had only been a figure in the background, a memory, an indefinite personality, to whom he had once spoken words of love. The gulf of time and habit had opened up wide and staring between them. She was no longer necessary to his happiness or his welfare. She had not been there to help him in his long struggle, and he had fought it without her. Even the affection which comes of daily association was an absent quantity. Small wonder that he looked at her critically, and that his face had fallen when he beheld her. She sat at her window as the dawn crept over the city, and told herself the bitter truth. And ere the sun rose her mind was made up. Her pride would permit of no other way.

XUM

"She turned towards him with a sudden movement."—p. 492.

Fortunately, she had only brought to the house a valise for immediate necessaries. All her luggage was to follow. She had more than sufficient money in her purse for the return journey. She had been thrifty all these years. What she would do after she reached home she did not know and did not care. Her foolish dream was over; her life was practically finished. She had staked it all on one chance. She smiled bitterly as she rose from the window. On one thing she was determined—she would go back. She had heard somebody say that a boat was leaving on this very day. Frank was going to ride up country on business, and would be starting before breakfast. He would not know she had gone until he returned. She would leave a sealed note for him, so that even the Wingroves would be in ignorance as to what had happened until the evening. By that time the boat would have left. The arrangement could not have suited her purpose better had it been specially planned. She would go back. That much was due to her pride. She would marry no man on sufferance; no, not even if she had waited thirty years for him. Hurriedly, feverishly, she got out paper and pencil, and wrote in the grey light. This done, she put her things together, stole softly down the stairs, opened the great doors, closed them softly after her, and went out, all unknown to the sleeping house.

Yet again she was sitting on the deck of an ocean liner, looking up at the stars, but there was nothing to see in them now. She could hardly realise that it was she who a short time ago had found in their glow such kindly glimmerings of hope and promise for the future. It was not she; it was someone else—someone very vain and very foolish. The stars were not kindly at all; they were cold and hard, and they glittered like evil eyes upon the dark night.

She had passed through much torture and agony of mind. The little imp of doubt which so often sits upon our shoulders after some great decision is taken had whispered his wavering queries in her ear morning, noon, and night. Had she done rightly? Had she acted hastily? Had she misjudged him? But ever she ended by shaking herself free from her tormentor. No; she had made no mistake. She had simply done what she would do again had she to pass through the same experience. She had not fallen so low as to marry a man simply because he felt in honour bound to fulfil his promise. He would be the happier for her action. He would marry Patty Wingrove. And as for her, well, she would, at any rate, preserve her self-respect.

The fierce battle which she had fought with herself had left her wretchedly ill in body and spirit, and she felt that she could bear no more. She must shut the door upon the whole subject, must shut it hard, and throw herself against it, and turn the key and have done with it. She set herself steadily to plan out the future. What was she to do? She would only have a modest sum of money left when she got back. Would they have appointed a new mistress? Even if they had not, the school-house would be empty. She had given nearly all her furniture to Margaret before leaving. The rest she had sold. Where should she go? Where, but to Margaret? She had good friends in the quiet valley, but she could not face any one of them just yet. Margaret had taken a cottage on the hillside, not far from the school-house, and was living on her thrifty savings, combined with her poultry and her garden. Dear, true-hearted Margaret! She would welcome her open-armed. She could live with her at least for a time, and surely she would be able to find something to do before her money was all gone. She had enough to last her, with care, for three months. And, besides, there was her trousseau. A lump came into her throat when she thought of selling her trousseau, but she fiercely repressed it.

Her thoughts went off at a tangent. What was he thinking, she wondered. What had he felt and said when he read her note? She was glad she had not put one bitter word in it. Was he wholly relieved at what she had done, or was he a little bit sorry? Perhaps, if she had waited—perhaps he had not been so disappointed as his looks indicated when he met her—perhaps——She sprang to her feet. The little imp was on her shoulder again. She must not, would not, think of it. She had done the only thing it was possible to do.

She threw out her hands wildly to the night.

"Oh," she said, "however old, or ugly, or disfigured you had grown, it would have made no difference to me! I would have loved you all the more! It was cruel of you—cruel!"

THE FOURTH DAY.

THE snow lay thick on the mountains. It had fallen with a blinding whirl for two days, but had now ceased, and the leaden clouds had dispersed. In their place reigned a sky of winter blue—pale, lucent, delicate as porcelain. The laggard sun, keeping down low to his southern path, seemed to waken to a sense of his duty, and shone upon the white world with a marvellous radiance. The snow gave back the light from every glittering crystal in its wide expanse, from every sparkling bough, from every rugged bluff that raised its hoary head to the heavens. Ruth came to the door of Margaret's cottage and looked upon the scene. She was so blinded by its dazzling beauty that for a time she was unable to open her eyes.

Snow everywhere, from the lane in the valley to the topmost height. A wonderful network of it on the larches in the woods, a delicate tracery of it upon the hedges, deep drifts of it piled up in odd corners, a vast mantle of it upon the bare hill summit. A solemn peace reigned upon the scene—a vast quiet, like the sleep of Death, broken only by the crackling of twigs, the occasional twitter of a bird. Able at last to bear the strong light, Ruth looked out upon the mountain summits, which rolled like billows, white and sparkling, to the west, and her heart surged with emotion at the grandeur of God's handiwork. "I will lift up my eyes unto the hills, from whence cometh my help." The words seemed to echo in her ears as plainly as though the light breeze, soughing in the mountain-ash tree above her, had whispered them. The peace of the scene stole somehow into her aching heart. Love, friendship, constancy, all these things might fail, and become as Dead Sea fruit to the taste, but the hills would never fail her. They were always kind, always steadfast, always full of comfort, like God's own love.

Only Margaret as yet knew the real reason of her return, and even from Margaret would she hear no ill word concerning Frank. When Margaret had begun to storm against him in a fury of indignation, she had stopped her in a tone which Margaret well knew of old.

"That will do, Margaret. If you say another word, I shall be annoyed. It was my fault, and mine alone."

"Well, I'll warrant you he hadn't got a proper kitchen set for you!" said Margaret, stubbornly, and Ruth was obliged to smile. She could not be angry with Margaret, who only a short time since had sobbed at the delight of seeing her.

"Poor dear! She's vexing sore," thought Margaret, and thereafter she was humbly fond and studiously avoided the subject.

Ruth's plans for the future were all arranged. Everything was to be exactly as before. The teacher who had taken her place had only been engaged temporarily, and the vicar had given Ruth to understand that the appointment would again be open to her if she cared to take it. At first she was doubtful whether she could endure existence in the old place, where every person and item in her surroundings was a continual reminder and probing of the wound. But gradually she grew to realise that she would not be happier elsewhere—perhaps not so happy And she finally had decided that she would return to the school-house.

"So I shall live and die in the old spot after all," she said, with a half-smile, as she looked at the roof of the gabled little house showing among the white-laden trees in a turn of the valley. It was a strange ending to her life's romance. To look forward to the heart's desire for fifteen years, to have it within the grasp, and then to be obliged to put it away and turn back to the old life. Would it not be a shock to anybody? She felt a great dreariness despite her strength of will. There was nothing to look forward to now save drudgery and loneliness to the end of her life. Work she did not mind—but—to be old and lonely!

To hide her tears from Margaret, who was ever hanging about near her in a dumbly faithful way, she opened the wicket-gate of the cottage, and walked along the lane. When she came within sight of the village she stood by the gate which led into the cornfield. The knoll behind her sheltered her from the icy touch of the breeze. The winter sun shone full in her face, and hence she did not see a man walking at a smart pace up the lane towards her. The snow deadened the sound of his footsteps, and it was not until he was full upon her that she became aware of his presence.

"Ruth!"

She stood as one stupefied. Her face was ashen-grey. Mechanically she laid her hand on the gate for support.

"Ruth, dear, won't you speak to me?"

She was breathing hard. He started forward as she swayed against the gate; but she motioned him away. With a great effort she recovered herself.

"Oh, why have you come here?" she moaned.

"I have come after you, Ruth. Why else? Do you suppose I could take your note as final, and let you go like that after fifteen years of waiting?"

She turned and faced him, her eyes kindling.

"Yes, that is just it," she said, with repressed intensity. "After fifteen years of waiting you felt obliged to ask me out. After fifteen years of waiting you have felt obliged to come after me. It is the years of waiting, and nothing else, that weigh with you. I am grateful for your consideration, but I decline it with thanks."

"Ruth, listen to me. It is not the years of waiting that weigh with me. I asked you out because I wanted you. I have come after you for the same reason."

She shook her head sadly.

"You asked the old Ruth out, not the present one. You were disappointed in me because I have grown old and faded, and——"

"Ruth!"

"But you were—you were!" she cried, hot anguish in her insistence. "It was written in your face, in your manner, in every tone of your voice——No, I must say what I have to say. It was the old Ruth you were in love with, not with me. I am in your eyes a different woman. It is in the waiting for you that I have grown old, but that does not matter. To have kept your love it was necessary that I should have performed the miracle of remaining young all my lifetime. I cannot fulfil your requirements, and I will leave you to find someone who can. Perhaps Miss Patty Wingrove can do it. If so you are welcome to go to her."

She could no more have prevented the bitter words from escaping her than she could have prevented the wind from blowing. Yet when she saw the pain in his eyes, the whiteness of his face, she was as swiftly overcome with remorse.

"Oh, Frank, forgive me—forgive me! I did not know what I was saying. It was mean—despicable of me. I wish you every happiness, dear, indeed I do, whomever you may marry."

"That will be you or nobody, Ruth."

"No, dear, it will not be me," she answered gently. "Things are all changed since the day we promised each other. We have drifted apart, and I am no longer necessary to your happiness. I am still sentimental enough, despite my age, to demand that any man marrying me should love me for what I am, not for what I look."

"Ruth, you are judging before you hear the defence. Is that fair? Is it like you? You have been judging ever since the first moment of meeting. You were judging when you wrote that cruel note—no, not cruel in its wording, but cruel in the message it conveyed. You were judging all the way home. And you are judging still, although the very fact that I am here must show you that there is a possibility of your being mistaken. Surely I have earned the right to be heard! If you have waited fifteen years, so have I. When I met you after all that long separation, I must frankly confess I was surprised and a bit taken aback. You see, it was the image of Ruth as I left her that was always locked up in my heart. I found you changed, but if you think that changed my love for you in the slightest degree, you are absolutely and hopelessly mistaken. You seemed cold, a shadow appeared to spring up between us, and do what I would, I was not able to remove it; but I put it down to your being tired, and I thought everything would come right in a day or two. Oh, it was hard, Ruth, after working and waiting so long! It was all for you—and when the reward was nearly within my grasp, you, of all people, snatched it away from me. Ruth, I have come after you. There is no other woman on the face of the earth for me. If you don't marry me—well, my life is over, that is all——"

His voice broke. It only needed that to vanquish her completely. At every sentence he had spoken the frost in her heart had been thawing, thawing. And now the hot tide of tumultuous joy had burst in and swept everything before it. She turned towards him with a sudden movement. She uttered no word, but he saw that she was blinded by the tears which were coursing down her face.

"I cannot go without Margaret this time," she said, as they walked up the lane. "I won't leave her behind again."

"Dearest, you shall bring her with you. You shall bring the whole village if you want them."

Her eyes danced with happiness.

"Margaret will say 'No' and 'No' and 'No' most stubbornly, until I put my arms round her neck and say, 'But, Margaret, you must come, if it is only to see that we have a proper kitchen set.' And then she will relent."

"A proper kitchen set? What do you mean?"

"Never mind. It is a secret between us. You must allow me one secret before I begin telling you everything. Oh, Frank, don't let us go in just yet. I am too happy to face anyone else."

They turned and looked back upon the white world. The rays of the sinking sun were aslant upon the distant hilltops, and touched up their snowy summits as with fire. Through the clear air came floating a far-away sound—the musical tinkle, tinkle of the colliery trams. She pressed his arm. He returned the pressure.

"Do you hear it, Frank?"

"Yes, dear."

"Do you remember?"

"Remember, sweetheart? Could I ever forget? Tinkle, tinkle. It brings back one of the happiest moments of the past. I remember every sound, almost every word of that evening."

She was satisfied.

"There have been four memorable days in my lifetime," she said softly; "two very happy and two very wretched. But the happy days have more than atoned for the others."

PLEASURES OF THE POOR.

A FRIENDLY LEAD.

By the Rev. H. B. Freeman, M.A., Vicar of Burton-on-Trent.

"THREE CHEERS FOR SAMMY!"

"THREE cheers for Sammy! He ain't missed a lead since he's bin in these 'ere parts." Never did the broad and good-humoured countenance of Sammy the coster light up with so genuine a thrill of pride as when he heard these words, accompanied by a thunderous slap upon the shoulder, at a benefit concert at the "Duck and Green Peas" public-house, somewhere in the East End of London. Let us say "somewhere," and stick to it; for in this attempt to describe, in its comedy and tragedy, one particular way in which poor people take their pleasures, our geography had better be vague and our names fictitious, but the facts may be trusted as tolerably true to life. Sammy, I said, grinned with gratification, for there is no compliment which a man of his class appreciates more than such a spontaneous tribute from his rough comrades to his "jolly good-fellowship." This inspiring eulogy was started by the pianist in Sammy's honour, and roared forth by the jovial party to the accompaniment of thumps which tested the stability of the beer-stained tables of the "Duck and Green Peas." Sammy was a bachelor; I never clearly made out whether there was any truth in the occasional chaff, which he bore with great philosophy, concerning his early rejection by a donah, the daughter of a tripe merchant, a young lady always spoken of as possessing black eyes (natural ones) and with a partiality for the wearing of red feathers in her hat. He had a soft corner beneath his corduroy jacket for any pal down on his luck, and was very good to children. It was the two elder girls of his sister 'Liza who first brought him to the Mission Hall, which he got quite fond of attending when his winkle trade was a bit slack, and where his powerful bass practically drowned the third-hand harmonium in "Showers of Blessing." Sammy, a mixture, like most of us, of faults and virtues, was quite the most attractive type of the man whom every town parson knows, a fellow never, or rarely, to be found in a state of complete intoxication, but who, on every day when money "ran to it," would take just too much beer to be safe. It is such men who (as doctors have told me) are the despair of the medical profession. When any serious disease grips them after forty, they are next to impossible to cure. Power of vital resistance has been rotted away by incessant alcohol. The soaker is the worst patient of all. But poor old Sammy looks healthy enough, as he shows us a card which runs something like this:

"A Friendly Meeting will take place at the 'Duck and Green Peas' on Thursday night, June 10th, at nine o'clock, for the benefit of Bob Dropmore, whose wife has died and left him with four children totally unprovided for. The following old pals have promised to rally round him: Sandpiper, Tommy the Teaser, Danny the Dancer, The Doctor, Tubby Turner, Irish Mike, etc., etc. A first-rate programme, including songs by Bob's youngsters."

It is one of the nuances of our subject, that what is spoken of as a Friendly Lead is nearly always put down upon the card of invitation as "A Friendly Meeting." Nor is the card we have instanced typical. The average grammar may be worse, but as a rule cards are less grotesque. Let us give a usual specimen:—

"'Leg of Mutton,' Ryder's Yard, Whitechapel. Proprietor, Mr. Tompkins. A Friendly Meeting will be held in the above House on Saturday, December 11th, for the benefit of Mrs. Jackson, whose husband is in the London Hospital and lost the use of his leg. Chairman, Mr. Smith; Vice-Chairman, Mr. Brown. Commence at eight o'clock."

"TOM BOWLING."

Here is one of the humbler sorts of Leads. This poor woman, Mrs. Jackson, would pay about one and ninepence for the printing of such cards; she would also put down one shilling for two pots of beer to open the proceedings. For each sixpence contributed fourpence would be spent upon refreshments, and twopence would be given to the case. Quite possibly as much as £5 would be collected, of which the widow would only receive a small portion. Even under much more rational and generous circumstances drink is bound to absorb much of the proceeds. A clerical friend of mine, who has had opportunities of seeing the system in most of its bearings in the East End of London, calls it "this thriftless, extravagant, and intemperate method of relieving distress." The verdict is strong, but I do not question its substantial justice. If, however, we wish to be interested, and possibly even a trifle amused, by the pictures which we are going to present of these pleasures of the poor, we had better think rather of the real, if perverted, sense of human brotherhood, which is at the root of all these undesirable manifestations of goodwill.

For all this time my friend Sammy has been waiting to take us to the afflicted Bob Dropmore's Benefit in the big upstairs room of the "Duck and Green Peas." Let us follow his burly form, and try to be not more shocked than we can help. But, frankly, we are not prepossessed by what we know of the character of Bob. While he had never done a day's work if he could help it, his poor wife had toiled like a slave, kept the home together, and provided for the 'bacca and other trifling luxuries beloved by your true loafer. It was unlikely that the card of invitation romanced in averring that Bob's children were "totally unprovided for." Sammy informs us that the popular sympathy for Mr. Dropmore's domestic bereavement is so great that it has been proposed to rig him out with a hot-potato barrow, to be purchased from the wife of a baked-potato merchant, who has recently had a little difference with a dock labourer, and who is at this moment stranded in "'orspital." By this time Sammy has piloted us into the long club room of a rather good-class "pub." Perhaps we are known to many present; at any rate, Sammy is, and we get a hearty welcome from the assembled pals. We are further honoured by an invitation to sit by the chairman at a table which is already well garnished with pots and glasses. This functionary is a local vendor of the toothsome trotter. He has a large mouth, the elongation of which is much exaggerated by a deficiency of bridge about his nose. Though it wants at least fifteen minutes to the appointed hour, more than half of the company have had quite as much as is good for them, and the rank tobacco smoke hangs like a dense cloud over an apartment seriously lacking in ventilation.

THE COMBATANTS PAUSE.

"Now we shan't be long!" yells the chairman genially, as Bob is seen in the doorway, leading in his four children, together with Auntie Kate, a stalwart Irishwoman. When they are seated, and Auntie has been accommodated with an 'arf o' porter, the chairman says he hopes "as how everybody present who 'as a 'art in his chest will give liberally to them pore orphans as yer see afore yer." He then himself passes round the plate, or rather two plates, one on the top of the other. The contribution of each benefactor is placed in the top plate, and is immediately emptied by the collector into the under plate. If this procedure strikes us (who may not be totally inexperienced in collections) as curious, Sammy will whisper hoarsely, "Why, yer see, guvnor, we can all spot what's give, and there ain't no chance o' some on 'em pinching a bit." A tall, rakish-looking youth, who has entered the room during the cheery jingle of the coins, sits down before the piano. He takes his pipe from his mouth, and fortifies himself by a long pull at the large pot of bitter with which he is supplied. Then the chairman calls on "The Doctor," who has a small chandler's shop in the next alley, to oblige the company with a song. With some difficulty the vocalist, a little person with pale whiskers, pushes his way to the piano, and rather sheepishly announces, "Tom Bowling." The manifest lack of compass of the singer's voice suggests certain obvious jokes among the audience as to the difficulty some folks have in "goin' aloft." What with the pianist being unacquainted with the tune, and "The Doctor" being uncertain as to both tune and words, a misunderstanding arises between the two artists which threatens to terminate the evening's harmony; the pianist, in fact, going so far as to assert roundly that he is "not here to be made a bloomin' fool of." We are reminded what a medley of sense and nonsense, of qualified good and evil, friendly leads are, when the grotesque chairman, really kindly, and not without tact, soothes the irate musician by another reference to "them pore orphans." Peace is restored with honour; and Irish Mike, who is wonderfully like the conventional stage Irishman, rolls out "Rory O'More" uncommonly well. Mike is enthusiastically encored, and obliges with a "comic," of which memory (fortunately, perhaps) only allows us to recall one verse, and it is this:

"He owned a rat tan terrier dorg,
Which stood but one foot three,
And the way that critter chawed up rats,
'Twas gorgeous for ter see."

"'THAT'S TOM CATER'S GAL.'"

After another hour or more of weary turns, when our eyes are smarting terribly from the thick and acrid fumes of strong tobacco, the chairman suggests that Mr. Dropmore might like to say a few words. To undergo this ordeal, Bob nerves himself with a liberal draught from his replenished quart. He is, he hiccoughs, most thankful for the kind support of all his good ole pals here present. He has lost a good ole "dooman," etc. For here we must sacrifice verisimilitude to reverence. We cannot bring ourselves to do more than hint at the maudlin piety, apparently relished by his hearers, with which the idle, feckless fellow compares his neglected dead drudge of a wife with a "nangel." After the stricken Bob has subsided, with his head upon the table, there are calls for Auntie Kate. The blowsy, good-tempered-looking woman requests that before her bit the four children should sing, "'ome sweet 'ome." This the forlorn little things really do prettily, and it is the one moving and human item of the otherwise vacuous show. Most of the men among the fuddled listeners are quite unable to restrain their visible emotion. Auntie Kate, on rising, is most sympathetically received. It is her intention, she gasps and jerks, to be good to Bob and to be a mother to his children. Instead of the frantic applause, with rattling of jugs and glasses, which greets her promise, it would be well if the unfortunate Aunt could hear a warning whisper of the catastrophe only too likely to follow her words. "When she looks," she says, "at them angels there, the very heart of her is being ripped out wid grief." Midnight is approaching, and the appearance of the landlord will probably finish the lead. In any case, we have had quite enough of it, and Sammy guards us by a short, but not very savoury cut, to our belated tram.

Friendly Leads, so popular in the poorer districts of London, are singularly partial in their hold over the provinces. In towns like Wolverhampton and Burton-on-Trent the name seems absolutely unknown. In the latter place, not long ago, a friendly concert was given in the Town Hall, where, of course, drinking and smoking were not allowed, for the widow of the foreman in a brewery, who had suddenly died. A good deal is also done in this direction on temperate, but not teetotal lines, by the societies of Oddfellows. Nottingham, as I happen to be aware, is a favourite winter stronghold for benefit concerts; but they are mostly of a higher and more lucrative type than those London Leads which we are describing. The public-house entertainments bring in far less money. The miners in Nottingham are particularly clever in organising benefits on a big scale, and in pushing tickets. Sometimes hundreds more tickets will be disposed of than the hall will hold, if all the purchasers turned up. At a concert given after the war for a Scots' Fusilier, who had lost his arm at Paardeberg, the takings, after deducting expenses, amounted to nearly £50.

But it is back into the greatest of cities that we must go if we would survey the horrors and humours of the Friendly Lead at their worst or best. Here is a specimen of a not uncommon form of Lead in rough neighbourhoods. A dock labourer has lost a leg at his work, and a boxing match has been arranged between, say, the "Stepney Slogger" and the "Billingsgate Bantam." After a few rounds the combatants pause for liquid refreshment, which they imbibe copiously at the expense of nearly every man in the room. The exhilarated "Bantam" begins to crow a bit over a previous exploit, in which he badly mauled the "Slogger." The "Slogger," whose honour apparently feels a stain like a wound, expresses his fixed intention of "moppin' the floor" with his rival. On the particular occasion of which we are thinking, the "Bantam," lunging out wildly at the "Slogger," hit inadvertently a gigantic navvy, who was not in an intellectual condition to overlook even so trifling a mistake. The navvy seized a quart pot off the table and brought it down, with its contents, upon the face of his assailant, "makin' 'is mouth a bit wider," to quote the potman's delicate but expressive phrase. Then ensues a general scrimmage, which is ended by the entrance of the police.

"SHE STRUGGLED TO HER FEET TO RETURN THANKS" (p. 498).

There must be a sordid sameness in the attempted descriptions of these Leads; but they afford a field for the observation of many lights and shades in the lives of the poor. "I was asked," said a friend of mine, a layman who has laboured among them for many years, and who has an unusual gift for getting into touch with the working classes, "by a jovial greengrocer, as I was walking down Mile End Road, one New Year's Night, to take a ticket for a benefit concert for the widow of a canal boat driver. As it was a woman for whom the lead was organised, ladies were admitted. The large red-headed chairman, whom I knew well, indicated the widow with a jerk of his thumb. 'That's Tom Cater's gal; we shall give 'er a proper evenin' when they all comes.' She was a really comely woman, not more than thirty years of age, and she was holding a very pretty girl of about nine close to her breast. It was pitiful to see the flushed child's eyes blinking in the foul smoke already beginning to gather.

When the room was pretty well crowded up, the orchestra, comprising a pianist and two violins, got into position, and the chairman, banging on the table with a broken drum-stick, gave out that the 'band' would play a solo. A boy with a cracked voice then obliged the assembly with some well-meant squeaks. Such effect as this effort might have produced was somewhat spoilt by a commotion at the door, caused by the entrance of a young fellow in a very smart overcoat. 'That's the Squire,' cackled the chairman to me; 'just wait till he takes a hand, to hear what singin's like.' The Squire was evidently an important personage, and well known; for he was vociferously cheered as he stood up to sing. Taking off his coat, he sighed very deeply as he deposited it on the back of his chair. In a most sentimental voice, with looks to match, he informed the company that he would give them that beautiful song entitled 'Mingle your eyebrows with mine, Love.' A more doleful performance I never heard. By this time the company seemed to think that they had enjoyed enough of the masculine element, and there were loud calls for 'Daisy.' To my considerable surprise, a damsel whom I had not previously noticed, came forward with a shamefaced mien, much unlike her usual confident and dashing air. The fact was, Daisy and I recognised each other. She was now a handsome girl (with a tinge of Hebrew blood), and I had known her, on and off, for ten out of her seventeen years of life. Daisy's was a curious history. In the earlier days, when I lived near Charing Cross, Daisy was a motherless child, brought up by an unmarried aunt, herself little more than a girl, who gained a good wage by dancing at a variety theatre. This girl's devotion to her little niece was really beautiful; though I never saw her at a place of worship, save once or twice at a midnight service, with some of her stage paint still on her cheeks, she paid for Daisy regularly at a Church school. The youthful aunt died from a sharp attack of pleurisy, brought on, it was said, by tramping home, heated from her work, in the wet, with thin shoes. Daisy, who had finished her education, joined some friends and migrated east as a tailoress, and I had not set eyes on her for over eighteen months till this eventful night. 'Now, Daisy, my dear, give us something lively,' called out the chairman; but Daisy, presumably because of our unexpected meeting, attempted none of the jovial ditties for which she was evidently famous, and was even more off colour than the Squire. Her choice of 'The Vacant Chair' as a song was singularly unhappy, for 'we shall meet, but we shall miss him' affected the widow to tears, and caused the refilling of her glass with gin. The poor woman, in fact, had certainly taken more than was desirable when she struggled to her feet to return thanks for the £4 which had been handed up to her as the net proceeds. She spoke of the deceased Tom as 'a good boy, never blacked me eyes, treated me to whelks and porter Saturday nights; but now he's gone, etc. etc.' 'God bless the little gal,' was an ejaculation from one of the audience. As I departed, some of the ladies were proposing a dance; but this idea having been vetoed, perhaps from considerations of the licence, the Lead, with a few more harmless songs of the type of 'The Old Folks at Home,' dwindled to its rather melancholy midnight close."

The writer has thought that he would better fulfil his object by giving specimens of Friendly Leads in, so far as is possible, their unadorned vulgarity, than by moralising elaborately about resultant evils, which are sufficiently plain. Their one big asset is, we repeat, their underlying spirit of goodwill. Their unquestionable curse, as at present most frequently conducted, is their undue patronage of the public-house, and their mischievous alcoholic indulgence and excess. Their removal or reform appears to us to depend on the much wider problem of the education, as to the drink question, of the conscience of the community. In the more "classy" East End Leads non-intoxicating drinks, such as lemonade, are already provided as alternatives, and this may be a hopeful sign. But while the multitude of well-to-do Englishmen still regard the consumption of strong drink as almost inseparable from good-fellowship, it is absurd to expect much in the way of regeneration to start from the bottom of the social scale. That Leads do impart a certain amount of pleasure into the dull, drab lives of the poor is undoubted, and the pleasure, apart from the drinking, is not all wicked. At any rate, while we good church and chapel folks are so arbitrary, so partial, so unsystematic, so sentimental, in our own charities, when money, of which there is desperate need for the Almighty's work, has to be coaxed out of our pockets by baits such as bazaars, with their attendant fooleries, I do not think that, with all our holy horror of the crude philanthropic efforts of poor Sammy and Daisy, we are quite the fit people to cast the first stone.

XUM

"O God, that madest Earth and Sky."

Words by BISHOP HEBER.

Music by WALTER G. ALCOCK, Mus.B.
(Organist of His Majesty's Chapel Royal, St. James's.)

2. The Cross our Master bore for us, for Him we fain would bear;
But mortal strength to weakness turns, and courage to despair:
Then mercy on our failings, Lord! our sinking faith renew!
And when Thy sorrows visit us, O send Thy patience too.

(Photo: A. E. Hogg, Belfast.)

THE WISHING CHAIR, GIANT'S CAUSEWAY, COUNTY ANTRIM

By the Rev. T. Cruddas Porteus, B.A.

A FEELING of solemn awe steals over one who stands for the first time amid the grandeur and wonder of the Giant's Causeway. These thousands of stone columns, massive and many-sided, wedged together so as to form a natural pier, reaching out towards the Scottish coast in the dim distance, look as if they had been carven by sculptor's chisel, and put in position by mighty machinery. One can hardly believe that they have been fashioned without the aid of man, by the great forces of nature and of nature's God. In presence of such visible and tangible wonders, for the moment one can almost fancy the romantic legend true, and believe that at one time the columns really formed a causeway across the "Sea of Moyle," uniting the land of the shamrock and the land of brown heath and shaggy wood. Tradition says that a Scottish giant sent an insulting message to the Irish giant, Fin MacCoul, to the effect that only for fear of wetting his feet he would come over the sea and give him a beating. On hearing this Fin constructed a causeway over the briny, along which the braggart came, only to get a sound thrashing from his rival. After this the road sank into the sea. Staffa, in Scotland, is very similar in cliff formation to the Causeway, and these, according to the legend, were the extreme ends of Fin's road across the water. Ruthless science has discountenanced this popular legend by telling us that the formations are caused by volcanic action.

At the Causeway there are many marvels to be seen. The Giant's Head is a huge rock, jutting out into the sea and visible from afar, on which one may see the outline of a massive but benignant looking face. Then there is the Giant's Organ, the magnificent pipes of which are 120 feet high. The natives say that the organ plays twice in seven years, and then only two tunes—one for the Orange and one for the Green. Thus the spirits of the lofty race of long ago wisely steer a middle course in party politics, and keep the peace with both sides. To sit on the cliffs beneath this colossal structure on a perfect summer day is very delightful. The sky overhead is one vast sapphire, cloudless and serene, the soap-stone rocks of brown sepia tint and fantastic shape stand clearly marked against the shimmering heavens, or the matchless blue of the ocean. The grassy slopes of the cliff beneath are white with large ox-eyed daisies, basking in the hot sunshine, and filling the air with their fragrance. Above tower the mystic pipes of the organ, surmounted by huge masses of overhanging rock. There is no organ recital proceeding; the grey, weather-worn pipes are mute. Neither the merry lilt of "St. Patrick's Day" nor the weird strains of "Boyne Water" steal across the bay. But there is music far below, where the waves that roll in from the great Atlantic boom among the hollow rocks, with their deep majestic bass, and break among the jutting crags in showers of feathery foam.

Another object of interest is the Wishing Chair. In a part of the Causeway called the Honeycomb, there is a cushionless but comfortable seat in the rock, the columns below leading up to it like steps to a king's throne. Local tradition says that whoever frames a wish while seated there will be sure to have the desire granted, provided you "hould your whisht" and never tell the wish to anybody. The condition is by no means always kept. Many a merry maiden sits in the chair and proclaims her wish in tones that wake silvery echoes among the old grey rocks. Sometimes a trio of little ones compel papa to take the "giant's throne," and then tease him to tell them what he thought of. Requests that are "large petitions" indeed are sometimes made to the shades of the departed giants, and they would need to be remarkably clever ghosts to answer some of the appeals that are made to them. So the old and very persistent superstition is turned into a subject of merriment, and often there is great fun around the rocky seat.

A Wishing Chair! Have we not, every one of us, a magic seat of this kind to which we often resort? Our hearts are wonderfully full of wistful hopes and longings. Our golden age is ever in the future. We are certain that we should be perfectly happy if only we had something which now we lack. And perhaps our deepest desires are never communicated even to our dearest. About the things which touch us most closely we naturally "hould our whisht." A strange reserve seals our lips; our most cherished ambitions are locked in the secret place of the heart. One of the first things to remember in regard to our Wishing Chair is the morality of wishing. The nature of our desires is the index of our character. What we want shows what we are, for "as a man thinketh in his heart, so is he." There are wishes that tell of the ape and tiger nature, desires that betoken that the man is led not by the conscience and the spirit, but by the base hungers of the flesh. There are wishes that suggest discontent and envy. You are not where you would be; you have not what you would like to have. You want to climb; you want to own. "Oh, that another's place and possessions were mine!" is the cry of your heart. You have not mastered the great secret of the converted Rabbi and "learned to be content." There are nobler wishes than these—aspirations that tell of Christlikeness, longings for the perfect heart and the blameless life.

The Wishing Chair is a kind of balance where we may weigh ourselves, and see what manner of people we are. Place yourself now in the magic seat, and ask your heart what is your great wish, your dominant desire. Are you putting it into £ s. d.? Are you thinking of some illicit and prohibited pleasure? Are you framing it in terms of social ambition? If so, write yourself down as a soul of low ideals, one in danger of spiritual apostasy. Or what is your wish? Do you stand on the steep slope of the hill of holiness, looking longingly towards the summit? Is your heart full of yearnings, your days full of strivings after betterment? If so, the desire of your heart is in harmony with God's great plans, and the direction of your life is ever towards a blessedness that is unspeakable. And even if your heavenward yearnings fail of their complete fulfilment in this life, they have not been cherished in vain. To the king who desired to raise a fair temple to God, but was prevented, came the Divine Word, "Thou didst well that it was in thine heart."

But the Wishing Chair suggests another lesson—the beneficence of disappointment. Supposing everyone who sits in the magic seat at the Causeway were to have his wish granted—would he be the happier for it? Not so, in many cases. Fortunes suddenly inherited are not always attended with blessing. "Pounds upon pounds" oft bring with them the hard heart; fame sometimes results in the haughty look and the loss of a quiet spirit. We should not find it such a pleasant thing to be princes or premiers or millionaires, as we sometimes imagine it would be. It would not do for us to have every idle and extravagant wish of ours gratified; and the kindness of God may often be traced in the frustration of many of our hopes and wants. This is the secret of our unanswered prayers. Our Father, knowing our many longings, has opened to our approach His throne of grace. "Prayer is the soul's sincere desire," and if the desire be for our good and His glory, it will surely be gratified. Let us not be bewildered if something we ask for through many years, and with many tears, is denied. It would be cruel to give the knife to the little child that cries for it, attracted by the bright glitter of the steel. Many of our requests in praye are very childish; and looking back across the years, we know now that they were not gratified because God knew best. God's kindness is manifest not only in His giving, but in His withholding; His wisdom and power are revealed not only in His responses, but in His silence. It is a good thing for us that our Father orders our lives, not according to our foolish whims, but according to His infinite love and knowledge.

There is another thought of which the Wishing Chair reminds us, and that is, as to the true condition of achievement. If our wish be honest and earnest, we shall link desire to endeavour; we shall not only wish but work. The prevalence of wishing wells and wishing stones suggests that men are ready to make use of any road to acquisition and success except the royal road of labour. They are willing to use every kind of magic except the magic of work. It is the Divine Will that many things we want and need should be acquired. Any other method would be ridiculous and wrong. If wishing alone made people learned, many a dunce would soon be a philosopher. If wishing made men successful, many a ne'er-do-well would be a thriving citizen. If desires only made us good, many a scapegrace would be a saint. There is an imperative condition to be fulfilled before our hopes and wants can be satisfied. "One thing have I desired," said David; "that will I seek after." Many a fervent desire would be speedily realised if men recognised the need for practical toil. When wishes furnish compelling motives for persevering endeavour, they are almost sure to "come true."

Apply this to the highest things. We desire that men should be holy and happy. We want sin to be beaten down. We want the kingdom of God to come. What are we doing to fulfil our own desires? Are we wielding the power of a consistent life? Are we opposing a determined front to the host of evil forces that surround us? Is any soul the better for our influence and our prayers? Let us join our longings to a little doing, translate our fervour into practice, help to fulfil our ideals by some useful service.

The best wishes are desires after goodness and usefulness; and these are certain to come true. Is the unspotted life your purpose and your prayer? Then "ye, therefore, shall be perfect, as your heavenly Father is perfect."

Do you long to wield a Christlike influence, to uplift and bless your fellows? "Follow Me," says Christ, "and I will make you fishers of men." Happy are those whose hearts are ever in glad harmony with the old words, wedded to sweet, familiar music, "O rest in the Lord; wait patiently for Him; and He shall give thee thy heart's desire."

A SERIAL STORY.

CHAPTER XV.

A MASTER-MARINER.

JUDY had left Stannington behind her, and was haunted by a memory of Maurice Evelyn's manner to herself, a manner in which there was a subtle difference. He was not angry nor estranged; if anything, he was kinder than before. Yet his kindness hurt Judy.

She felt that he was glad she was going away. A day or two ago he would have stormed at the suggestion; he would have swept down on Judy's mother and asked her to prevent it, with that manner of his towards Mrs. Evelyn which was debonairly certain of her powerlessness to refuse him anything in reason. Judy felt in a vague trouble that Maurice had washed his hands of her. When she came back he would be gone.

His quiet speech—"Cousin Judy, I wish you very much joy. You should have told me before, and told me yourself, Cousin Judy"—sounded in her ears through the clank of the metals and the grinding of the wheels of the train; made her plainly so absorbed in her thoughts that Miss Meredith, with a deep spot of excitement in each cheek, forbore to disturb her by conversation.

Judy was received with open arms by the Duchess. Her little room was ready, and a chair bedstead had been set up in it for Miss Meredith. The settlement was not likely to be embarrassed by the addition of another inmate, since the Duke and his young Duchess had presented the Dowager Duchess with a row of empty houses in the street for the extension of her work.

A day or two later Judy and Miss Meredith made their fateful expedition into Essex.

Cadgwith-on-Nevern lies at the junction of the River Nevern with the sea. It is a small, clean, pebbly, sandy place, with the smell of seaweed always in the air. The population consists mainly of fishermen and old retired sailors.

To one of these worthies Judy addressed herself, asking the way to Captain Kennet's cottage. Poor Miss Meredith was far too nervous by this time to assume any part in the control of the expedition, out of which she would have scurried at the last moment, if Judy had not held her fast to it.

"Cap'en Kennet—Wullie Kennet. Why, I sailed with him in the Aurora. Take the first turn to the right and second to the left, and there you are. Ye'll read 'Good Luck' writ in the pebbles of the path to the house-door. 'Tis the 'Look Out' he calls it. I've heard Cap'en Willyum say as how the good luck o' comin' was for them that came, but the good luck o' goin' was for him that sped them. He was always one for his joke was Cap'en Kennet."

Judy pressed a coin into his hand, for which he did not thank her, being engaged in recovering his breath after the series of chuckles and gurgles he had emitted as a tribute to Captain Kennet's cynicism.

They had no difficulty in finding the place, nor the owner, who sat on his lawn under the flag-staff, with a red handkerchief over his head to keep it from the flies, and himself fast asleep.

"Willie is quite fifteen years older than I am," Miss Meredith explained hurriedly, as she caught sight of the sleeping figure; "and, dear me, how he has aged! I suppose it's the hard life and the exposure and all that. Oh, Judy dear, I think we'd better steal away quietly. It can't be Willie really, now I see him closer. He never could have grown so old-looking in the time. And so stout! Oh, Judy dear, let us go before he wakes. I can write to him. I am sure it will be the better way."

Judy was not sure that it would not be the better way, now that Miss Meredith had laid eyes on her lover of old days. Captain Kennet was in his shirt-sleeves. His coat, with fine brass buttons, lay on a garden chair. He had a clay pipe, half-dropping from his fingers. His mouth lolled open. As they began to retrace their footsteps he snored, a tremendous ear-piercing, far-reaching snore which had turns and twists in it and went off into all manner of unexpected high notes.

"Let us run, Judy," whispered poor Miss Meredith, looking as though she would sink into the earth.

But at that moment a little white dog, with a black spot over its eye and its tail standing at attention, rushed from the cottage with a prodigious barking. The sleeper sprang to his feet; his clay pipe clattered down on a white stone that formed part of the boundary of a flower bed and was smashed into atoms. Captain Kennet turned sharply round and perceived them.

"Why, bless my soul," he said, hastily getting into his coat, "I must have fallen asleep. It must have been the heat of the sun. Won't you step inside, ladies? Why, bless me, Jeanie, Jeanie Meredith, you aren't a day older. And pretty as ever, my lass, pretty as ever."

Judy almost felt Miss Meredith tremble by her side. She glanced at her, hoping she was going to rise to the occasion. Now that she saw Captain Kennet nearer and without the red handkerchief his face attracted her. She could see in the elderly, ruddy, weather-beaten face the pink and white, blue-eyed Willie of the locket. She hoped Miss Meredith would not let him see how changed he was in her eyes

To her relief she perceived that her quiet dignity of nature had come to Miss Meredith's relief. Her face showed no more perturbation than one might expect. Her pale lips wore even a little flickering smile.

"I am very glad to see you again, Cousin Willie," she said. "This young lady is one of my pupils, Miss Judy Evelyn. What a very pleasant place you live in, Cousin Willie."

"Aye, indeed; you couldn't find a pleasanter port after seas than Cadgwith. It is my fault, Cousin Jeanie, that you haven't been here before now. But better late than never; and you and the young lady are heartily welcome. You'll step in out of the sun and drink a cup of tea with me?"

They went up the path paved with a mosaic of coloured stones, in which the words "Good Luck," were framed. Each side of the path flowers grew in profusion. There was every possible variety of the old-fashioned sort—sweet peas, pinks, snapdragons, sweet williams, phlox, stocks, mignonette, all growing so thickly that it was a perfect kaleidoscope of colour. There seemed a great many arbours and arches, and devices of all sorts in the small domain, and through an opening in a hedge of sweet-brier and crimson ramblers Judy caught sight of a little vegetable garden, as chockful to all appearance as the flower garden.

There was a trellised porch over the door, and the house-walls were trellised. A very fine Gloire de Dijon covered porch and house-walls, the roses looking in at the little many-paned, old-fashioned windows. These were all wide open, and bore not a trace of a curtain except that afforded by the rose tree outside, and that was so carefully nailed up that not a branch of it was allowed to trail.

The little hall was very light and bright. There was a model of a sailing vessel all in a snowy cloud of canvas on a table, and there were many shells about, and some old-fashioned prints of Hood and Nelson and other naval heroes.

From the hall four doors opened, and standing between them Judy could catch a glimpse of four snowy walls.

At the first door on the right-hand side of the hall Captain Kennet stood back, and with a bow invited the ladies to enter.

Judy thought she had never seen so white a room; and could not refrain from an expression of delight, at which the old sailor looked pleased.

"The decks are swabbed down every morning," he said; "and since I'm captain and crew there's no fear that the work won't be done to my liking."

On the walls was a master's certificate from the Board of Trade, a picture of the flags of all nations, a picture of the death of Nelson, and something else which Judy went up to and examined. She found it to be a document setting forth how Captain William Kennet had saved his ship the Aurora, with all her passengers and crew, when she had run aground on a dangerous reef, and had shown great personal gallantry, for which he had been awarded a binocular by the Board of Trade. Another framed document was an address from the passengers who had been saved; a third was an acknowledgment of Captain Kennet's courage and seamanship from the owners of the Aurora.

Having glanced at these, Judy turned round and smiled at Captain Kennet. She was thinking now how blue his eyes were, how firm and handsome his mouth, how honest and kindly his expression.

He smiled back at her, and there was modest deprecation in the glance.

"'Twasn't much to do, young lady," he said. "Any man that's worth his salt 'll save his ship or go down with her. 'Tis a sight easier to save her than to drown. The passengers made no end of a fuss, being landsmen. They presented me with this here watch."

"They had no difficulty in finding the place nor the owner."

He drew out a massive gold watch, and, detaching it from a chain like a cable, laid it in Judy's hand.

"Yonder's the binocular," he said. "And the owners, they gave me fifty pun'."

About the walls stood brass-bound chests and such ship's furniture, which filled Judy with delight. She looked round on the curious glass cases, containing birds' eggs, fishes, stuffed birds, bits of ivory and coral—all manner of strange, suggestive treasure-trove, and her eyes brightened.

"I should love to look at them all," she said.

"So you shall, missy; so you shall. I could tell you stories about them which would keep you amused many a winter's night. But 'tis time to give you ladies your tea. Maybe you'll excuse me stepping down to the kitchen to make it."

"Please may I come and help you?" asked Judy, who had forgotten what her friend might be enduring in her own pleasure at all she saw.

"And welcome, missy," he said cheerfully. "Dear, dear, 'tis long since a woman's made my tea."

"I thought you had children, Willie," said Miss Meredith nervously.

"Two—a boy and a girl. The boy's got a craft of his own. The girl, she married a year ago, and keeps house at Southampton. Her husband's a mate on an Atlantic liner. It was a blow to me when my Susy married. It seems lonely here without her! Perhaps you'd make the tea, Cousin Jeanie?"

"With pleasure," Miss Meredith said, but with a certain faltering in her tones.

As they passed through the little hall, Judy caught sight through one open door of a small wooden bed, with a shelf above it as like a ship's bunk as possible, and a room lined with lockers.

Through the other open door she saw what filled her with amazement. There was a small brass bedstead, with flowing curtains of white muslin, edged with lace and tied up with blue ribbon. A couple of pretty rugs were on the floor. There were pictures on the wall, and chintz-covered chairs, and a pretty blue-and-white wardrobe, and—for this one room—muslin curtains at the windows.

"That was my Susy's state-room," the father explained with a sigh that was like the wind in the cordage of the sails. "She needn't have left me because she weren't comfortable. But they will go; it's what we rear 'em for."

The kitchen was as snowy white as the rest of the house. There was a snowy dresser, and white shelves ran all round the walls; and such utensils as were in sight outside the many cupboards all twinkled as they caught every ray of light that was going.

A tea-tray was set out on the well-scrubbed table, and the captain, going to a stove of copper that shone like gold, lit a range of gas jets in it and set the kettle to boil.

"The kitchen's prettiest of all," cried Judy, clapping her hands.

The window looked on the kitchen garden, and a couple of great hollyhocks peeped in with their blowsed country-girl faces. The place was full of the scent of thyme and musk and various sweet-smelling herbs.

"Let us have tea in the kitchen," said Judy; "and then I'll help you to wash up."

She was as pleased as a child. With her ready receptiveness of the impressions of the moment she had forgotten everything but the delightful house, which seemed too good for real life, and could only, she thought, have been imagined in a book.

"I generally do have my tea in the kitchen of afternoons," Captain Kennet said. "As long as Susy was at home she kept me up to the parlour. She was like her mother before her, very genteel and ladylike in her ways. These are Susan's cups and saucers."

It was the first reference he had made to his wife, the woman who had supplanted his earlier love long ago; and Judy thought he made it with difficulty, but as a thing that had to be done, like the saving of a ship.

Miss Meredith turned quite red, and bent to look at the tea-cups, which were delicate things, with bands of roses and true lover's knots of blue ribbon upon them.

"Do let me cut the bread-and-butter," cried Judy, as Captain Kennet brought out that with many dainty things from one locker and another. "And oh, what delightful-looking things you have there—with such quaint, foreign names. What is this?" taking a bottle and holding it to the light.

"That's a fruit you won't get here, young lady, not for love or money—the mangosteen from Burmah. It hasn't found its way over here yet, not even preserved; but my shipmates bring me a jar now and again. Susy used to like 'em. These are guavas," indicating another jar, "and here are cumquats and preserved ginger. Have what you like for your tea, and carry away whatever you can carry afterwards."

"Oh, you are too kind," said Judy. "Please may I look? I never was in such a fairy-story house before in my life."

"Look wherever you like," Captain Kennet said, heartily. "Being my own crew and captain as well, you won't find no dirt shoved away in corners."

Before Judy had finished her peeps into the fascinating cupboards the tea was made and ready. Never had she so enjoyed a tea, and Captain Kennet's hospitality was magnificent. Judy laughed outright once as she recalled the playful bit of cynicism reported by the old sailor. She rose to the occasion, and did full justice to the strange dainties with which Captain Kennet heaped her plate.

Miss Meredith ate nothing, to the captain's great concern.

At last Judy had finished, and after she had washed her hands in Susy's pretty room, where nothing had been forgotten—not even a cake of scented soap—she proposed to take Roarer, as the small dog was called—she suspected a corruption of "Aurora"—for a walk round the premises.

Captain Kennet was hospitably ready to accompany her, but this Judy declined.

"You old friends and kinsfolk will have plenty to talk about without me," she said audaciously, and ran off, aware of the despairing reproach in Miss Meredith's eyes.

"She ought to rise to it," she said to herself. "What if he is stout and rather bald, and talks ungrammatically, he is a beautiful old dear for all that. What did that Susy girl mean by leaving him? She must have been a spoilt, selfish pig"

She spent a delightful half-hour in exploring the garden Never were so many delightful things packed in little. There was a tiny pond for gold-fish, a double hedge, a little maze, a flight of steps leading to a look-out tower cut through a great hollow tree and swathed in ivy.

Presently the other two came and joined her. Judy gave one rapid look at Miss Meredith's face. It was disturbed, and Captain Kennet's had a shadow on it.

"She has not risen," Judy said sorrowfully to herself.

CHAPTER XVI.

WORKS OF MERCY.

CAPTAIN KENNET saw them into the train, and at the last laid beside Judy a little basket he had been carrying, in which some of his choicest and strangest preserves were hidden in roses and pinks. How he had found time to put them up was a matter that excited Judy's wonder, since he had hardly left them for a second.

Before Judy could thank him the train carried them off, and the last thing they saw was his face smiling at them as he stood with his bald head bare in the strong sun and the sea wind.

"I am in love with your Cousin Willie," said Judy, turning to Miss Meredith. "He is the finest of gentlemen. And his house is simply unique. I don't know how that Susy could ever have left it and him."

"He showed me her picture," said Miss Meredith guiltily. "She has a very refined face. Willie has become very homely. I suppose it is the rough sailor's life. I should never have known him."

"What did you say to him?"

Miss Meredith jumped at the sudden question. They were alone in the railway carriage, and the train was carrying them on through the flat fields, with now and again a little church and a graveyard and a few scattered houses. Often the houses had a faint suggestion of the one they had left behind—little gardens, with the beds set in borders of shells and round white stones, sometimes a flag-staff or a telescope at an open window. Judy supposed that many retired sea-captains must live down this way.

"You shouldn't have left me, Judy," said Miss Meredith reproachfully. "I never thought you would have done such a thing."

"I thought you wanted to answer his letter. Of course, you were bound to answer it in one way or another. You don't mean to say you've refused him?"

"Why, you knew I should, Judy," said Miss Meredith in a tone of dismay. "I knew quite well beforehand that I shouldn't leave the Red House and your dear mother. How could I go from her to Willie, as he is now? How could you have supposed it? He was so different, Judy. Why, I remember the time he used to read poetry. He was very fond of Byron."

"He lives his poetry now," said Judy, "and I think himself and his house beautiful. I'm surprised at you, Merry, that you don't see it. I confess I looked for better things from you."

"Judy!" cried poor Miss Meredith, almost in tears, "I thought you understood me so well when I told you all my misgivings. Of course, it is a sweet little house, and Willie was very kind. He was always a kind fellow. But then—he has grown so stout. I remember the time when he was quite slender. And he is bald, Judy!"

"Oh, I know, I know," said Judy impatiently; "but he's just a beautiful Willie, despite the baldness and stoutness. I should have thought you'd have found it out, Merry."

Miss Meredith's eyes filled with tears; yet her face wore a gratified air.

"I've got used to the Red House and the

"'If I die to-night, Martha Driscoll,' she kept calling out, 'you'll hang for it'"—(p. 510).

Red House's ways," she said ; " and I suppose I've learned to be very particular. When Willie's letter came, my first thought was, as you know, that I couldn't bear to have a man making everything untidy. Of course, I see now Willie wouldn't do that. The house is extremely neat. And he said, poor fellow, that I'd have nothing at all to do only sit and look pretty—those were his exact words "—she blushed prettily over repeating the speech —" that he'd do everything and wait on me hand and foot. As though I should permit that if I were to marry a man ! And he told me about his marriage, dear. Since you know so much about it, I ought to tell you that Willie really wasn't to blame at all—in fact, he behaved very romantically ; and he seems to have been rewarded by his marriage being a happy one, after all. He said, though, that old lovers were ever the best, and that since his girl had left him——"

She broke off with a smile and a sigh.

" It's no use telling you the many things he said. I was glad to find that he had the same kind, faithful heart as of old. But to marry Willie is out of the question. Indeed, I believe I have grown confirmed in spinster ways. The Red House has spoilt me, Judy. I believe I shall stay at the Red House till I die, as your dear mother has often told me I must."

" I don't want you to leave the Red House," said Judy " We'd all be miserable without you. Still, somehow, I thought you wouldn't have seen that Captain Kennet was stout and bald-headed—at least, after the first. I am rather disappointed in you, Merry."

" I am so sorry," Miss Meredith said, looking as though she felt the rebuke very much ; " but I can't be expected to be as romantic as you, Judy."

" Never mind," Judy said, with an air of finishing the discussion. " I should have said you were quite as romantic. There are other eyes than the eyes of the body to see with ; but it's no use making you look so unhappy. You can go back to-morrow to mother and your beloved Red House, and forget everything about that enchanting little paradise of a house where poor Willie is so lonely."

Miss Meredith returned to Stannington next day, wearing an air to the last of being under a cloud with Judy ; and Judy set herself to be so busy for some weeks to come that she should not have over-much time for thinking.

"Gently, gently," the Duchess said at first, when Judy showed her eagerness to be up and doing. "You must not do too much, or you will be so tired after a little while that you will not be able to do anything."

But after a day or two of quiet, tender observation of Judy the Duchess assented to her desire for constant occupation, urged her no more to rest in her room with a book for an hour or two in the afternoon, as the other girls who were in her charge did.

"She has grown to be a woman too suddenly," she said, noticing the gravity of Judy's face, that used to be all smiles and dimples. "A happy love-affair never made a girl grow up so suddenly. She looks as if she were fighting a battle out all by herself."

Day after day Judy had enough strange experiences to help her to push her own anxieties away from her, and to sleep for the most part dreamlessly.

The Duchess had, as she said, handed her over to Martha Driscoll, the Irish dressmaker, the most capable of all the working women who helped the Duchess's work and adored her.

Many a squalid room, many a squalid trouble she made acquaintance with under Martha's wing, and to many a one she helped to give comfort and ease, while Martha did the practical thing.

One of the duties of the Duchess's mission was the cleansing and beautifying of the homes of the forlorn poor who were unable or unwilling to do such work for themselves. This the Duchess used to call playfully the Apostolate of the Scrubbing Brush: and it was sorely needed among Martha's compatriots, whom she visited chiefly.

Judy would listen with delight to Martha's half-cajoling, half-bullying of her countrywomen, whose reception of her was often an ungrateful one.

"Sure, here ye are again, Martha Driscoll," one would say, with her arms akimbo in the doorway in a vain attempt to keep Martha out. "Sure it isn't but a week a-Wensda' that you destroyed my little place before flingin' wet soapsuds all around it. Pat's been bothered wid the rheumatics ever since, and the sight o' me two eyes is not the same since ye wint whitewashin' the walls last spring. If it wasn't for the young lady, the sorra fut I'd let ye pass."

Or another: "Wisha, Martha woman, tell me, how did we get on at all at home in Ballydrisheen? Sure 'tis terrible proud ye are, woman. It wasn't much rowlin o' buckets o' water we wor doin' there. But sure, we wor happy an' comfortable, an' the could never seemed to strike to yer bones as it does here. We wor hot in winter an' cool in summer, glory be to goodness, an' no talk of all that washin' at all."

"'Twas clane dirt in Ballydrisheen," Martha would reply, "an' it's dirty dirt here. Not that I hould wid dirt, clane or dirty."

"Sure, people that wants so much washin' must be terrible dirty in themselves," a third woman would remark. "My old grandfather now. I often heard him sayin' that he hadn't been washed since his mother washed him, except the rub o' the towel he got when he went to the penny barber a-Saturday night; yet he was the clanest-skinned man ever I saw, an' had a complexion like a babby whin he died at eighty-four."

"True for you, Mrs. Mack," a gossip standing by would remark. "Sure, everywan knows it destroys the complexion to be always sloppin' soap an' water over it. There's Mick, his skin is that soft and tender that he'd take a could in his face if he washed. Glory be, woman! think what people goes through that washes all over!"

Martha treated these remonstrances with imperturbable good humour. Only once did Judy see her really put out, and that was when an assailant was unfair enough to call her "a meddlesome old maid."

"If I'd had a husband, and had brought childher into the world, it isn't keepin' them in misery I'd be, as you do, you unfortunate slattern of a woman!" Martha replied so fiercely that the enemy was quite routed and slunk off, muttering a half-apology.

Judy discovered in time that it was as much by fear as by love that Martha carried on her apostolate with such vigour.

"Sure, I wouldn't be bringin' the woman's tongue on me," one woman whispered aside to Judy. "Look at the red head of her. 'Tis only the grace of God keeps her tongue quiet. She's a terrible viper when she's angry."

However, Judy never saw, except for that one little outburst, anything but the most marvellous patience on Martha's part; and as she watched her scrubbing and whitewashing, and changing the clothes on beds, she wondered at what the grace of God could do.

Once it was an old woman—a very querulous invalid—whom Martha had discovered living in great squalor.

Martha and a neighbouring woman—for there were things Judy was not permitted to do—carried the old woman into an adjoining room, and made her comfortable on a sofa while the other room was put to-rights.

Judy was left to distract the old lady while Martha made the bed in the next room, replacing the grimy coverings with white sheets and fine woollen blankets, to say nothing of a new straw mattress. When that was done and the rubbish removed, Martha proceeded to clean the grate, light a bright fire in it, and then to scrub out the room thoroughly. The door between the two rooms would not altogether shut, and the sound of the sluicing of water in the next room disturbed the old lady dreadfully.

"If I die to-night, Martha Driscoll," she kept calling out, "you'll hang for it. Is it more water I hear you peltin', an' me that bad with asthma I never slept a wink all night? Yerra, are ye thryin' to drown some wan? The room must be like a say by this time."

She was answered only by soothing murmurs from the next room, mingled with the swishing of waters and the steady sound of the scrubbing brush.

"I liked me own ould bed best," the old lady said ungratefully, when she was introduced to the transformed room and Martha displayed the blankets to her with pardonable pride. "An' I'll tell ye what I think of yer clanin' up when I know whether I'm goin' to be kilt wid a could or not."

When Judy became acquainted with Martha's sister, Mary, she thought she understood better the meaning of Martha's wonderful patience.

Mary was the younger of the sisters, although by reason of continued bad health she looked the older of the two.

She was tall and thin, with a suggestion of a weak spine which was only too well founded. She ought to have been plain-looking, with her long horse features and her sparse sandy hair, looped in curtains each side her face. But instead she was beautiful. It was as though God had said, "Here is a vessel which I shall fill with My light" The light was so visible behind the plain, heavenly face, that Judy felt almost awe-stricken.

Mary, too, was a dressmaker, and though she lived in an East End street, one of considerable skill. She loved the work, and was a born artist in the delight she took in the silks and satins and chiffons and in the making them into garments that should enhance the beauty of the wearer. She had arrived at her present state of invalidism, she told Judy, through the fact that when she worked at her business long ago in the Irish village where she was born, and had had to finish a piece of work in time, she had sat on the stone floor so that the discomfort of it should keep her awake.

"Sure I knew no better—God forgive me," she said to Judy, "or I wouldn't have misused the poor body He gave me."

Martha and Mary had a couple of rooms now at the top of one of the houses belonging to the Duchess. They looked across the chimney pots and caught the river breeze and saw a great expanse of sky. There was a canary in the window of the sitting-room that sang incessantly, and a small rough dog which Martha had picked up as a stray and brought to Mary to keep her company when she was out.

Mary had plenty of work to do: the Duchess's friends gave her many things to renovate which their maids would have regarded as perquisites. She was so clever that the Duchess could have procured her permanent work in the West End, but this she would not consent to. Martha was devoted to the Duchess and the Duchess's work, and Mary would not be separated from Martha.

Of course, she, in time, confessed the innermost thoughts of her heart to Judy—most people did that in time.

"The only change we could ever think of making, if it was the will of God," she said, with the heavenly smile coming and going on her plain features, "would be to go back to where we come from. Martha could do a deal of good there now with all she knows; of course, 'tis working among our own people here, but it isn't exactly the same. I do be dreamin' of Kiltrasna lyin' there in the sun under the mountains, an' the pleasant stir of it, an' the homeliness."

Judy repeated the speech to the Duchess, who looked surprised.

"I never should have thought that Mary was home-sick for anywhere but Heaven," she said. "I wonder how you win their confidences, child. They never tell me half so much."

The weeks went round all too soon for Judy. She was out of tune for Eastbourne and its gaieties, but at last the time came when she must go.

Almost the last thing she did when the luggage was already piled on the cab, was to run round and say good-bye to Mary.

When she went in Mary was sitting between her and the window sewing at some filmy stuff. The light seemed to have caught the thin red hair and made it flame like an aureole.

She dropped her work, and stood up to say good-bye to Judy. She took Judy's two hands in hers and looked at her with eyes which seemed to look through her, to fathom her every thought.

"God bless you, dear lamb," she said, "and ease your heart of its burden."

And then she laid a hand on Judy's head.

"I know now," said Judy, "what a real saint is." This was as she thought over the parting with Mary after she had been carried off in the cab to the station. "And oh, I know now how Mary looked when she sat at the feet of Jesus."

CHAPTER XVII.

BAD NEWS.

AUGUST and September were gone by, and the Evelyns were back again at Stannington. Eastbourne, with its melancholy twilights, its music and gaiety, which had seemed to fill Judy's heart with a vague trouble, was a thing of the past. She was glad to be back at Stannington, and for that no one was likely to quarrel with her.

"The real good of a holiday," said Mabel, with unexpected paradox, "is the coming home again."

"I love the winter," said Bertha. "There will be the golf—we are frightfully keen on golfing, Judy—and papa has promised that we shall hunt; and altogether it is going to be a delightful time. Then we shall have Cousin Maurice at Christmas to make everything go so much better than ever it did before. Oh, Judy, you don't know what a dear he is. He is always finding out one's tastes in order to gratify them. He has given us such beautiful golfing sets, and we never had such sweets and flowers and books sent to us before."

"And, of course, mother smiles on it all, because it is Cousin Maurice," put in Mabel.

"I wonder why he leaves you out, Judy," said Bertha again. Bertha was the least astute of the family. "It's rather rough on you, old girl. I suppose you've offended him somehow, for you seemed no end of chums in the summer."

Judy smiled a little wanly.

"Perhaps he thinks engaged girls oughtn't to have those pleasant attentions," she said.

Mabel and Bertha blushed and bridled a little, as though such an idea might possibly affect them in the near future; and Mabel remarked that she thought cousins should always be able to offer little attentions to one another without anyone objecting.

One or two people noticed that Judy and her sisters seemed to have changed places. It was Judy now who was quiet and languid, her sisters who were bright-eyed and energetic and full of the joy of living, and even slangy in a mild way.

One person whom the change in Judy perturbed was Jack Winstanley. He kept sending her wistful glances whenever they met; and having one day drawn her out on one of their old expeditions which used to be so frequent—Jack had a new Irish terrier, Rory by name, who was death on badgers, and so they set out on a badger-hunting expedition which, rather to Judy's relief, proved fruitless—he made a delicate allusion to the subject.

"I'm awfully sorry to see you down on your luck, Ju," he said. "There's hardly anything I wouldn't do for you and give you. Very different from the old days, isn't it, when I used to make you fag for me? If it was a question of punching a fellow's head now—but, of course, I know it isn't. I'll tell you what, Ju. I sometimes wish there wasn't such a thing as love in the world."

Another person who watched Judy with tender, anxious eyes was her father. He was very careful not to let Judy perceive him; and like many excellent people, his loving anxiety made him angry, so that he would go away and lock himself in his study, and frown and fume while he denounced himself for ever having permitted Judy's engagement.

Judy used to take long walks by herself at this time, or with only the company of Rory, whom Jack had left in her charge when he returned to Harrow. Jack had a profound contempt for London, excepting only for the bit of it which is known as Lord's Cricket Ground, and thought that it was no place for a dog of Rory's spirit.

On these long solitary walks Judy's thoughts would recur again and again to how she and Maurice Evelyn would meet when he came at Christmas. She could hardly make another flight. That would be too conspicuous. The thought of his coming would enter her mind like a sudden glow of light and colour, making the grey October skies rosy, hanging the autumn woodlands with another glory than the splendid leafage one.

Then, realising what this involved, she would reprove herself sternly. When Major Lindley came back again she was determined to find out if she had really supplanted Miss Rosamund Lindley in his heart. If she had not, he must know that he was free, however Lady Flora felt about it. On the other hand, if by consenting to an engagement she had made Major Lindley love her, Judy felt there would be no drawing back. While the thing was in doubt she would consent to no treasonable thoughts, however sweetly they allured her.

She could not help the great leap of her heart when Maurice Evelyn's name was mentioned, the wild rush of joy at the thought of seeing him again. Only she would not willingly yield to such forbidden delights. If she could presently, without hurting anyone or her own conscience, think about him as her lover, she would be the happiest girl in the world—that is if Maurice could forgive her and look at her with the eyes of last summer, before he knew. But till then there was no paltering with duty possible to her.

Major Lindley wrote more or less regularly. He was up-country now, and they could never tell when a letter would reach them, so they were prepared for delays.

His letters to Judy were always the same short, kind, tender letters, with a paternal air about them which would not have satisfied Judy if she had been a girl in love.

In the late autumn came a longer interval; and then, somewhat to Judy's surprise, Lady Flora showed signs of uneasiness and perturbation.

She was across the Green every morning to the Red House, even when no African mail was to be expected, to know if Judy had heard, since she had not.

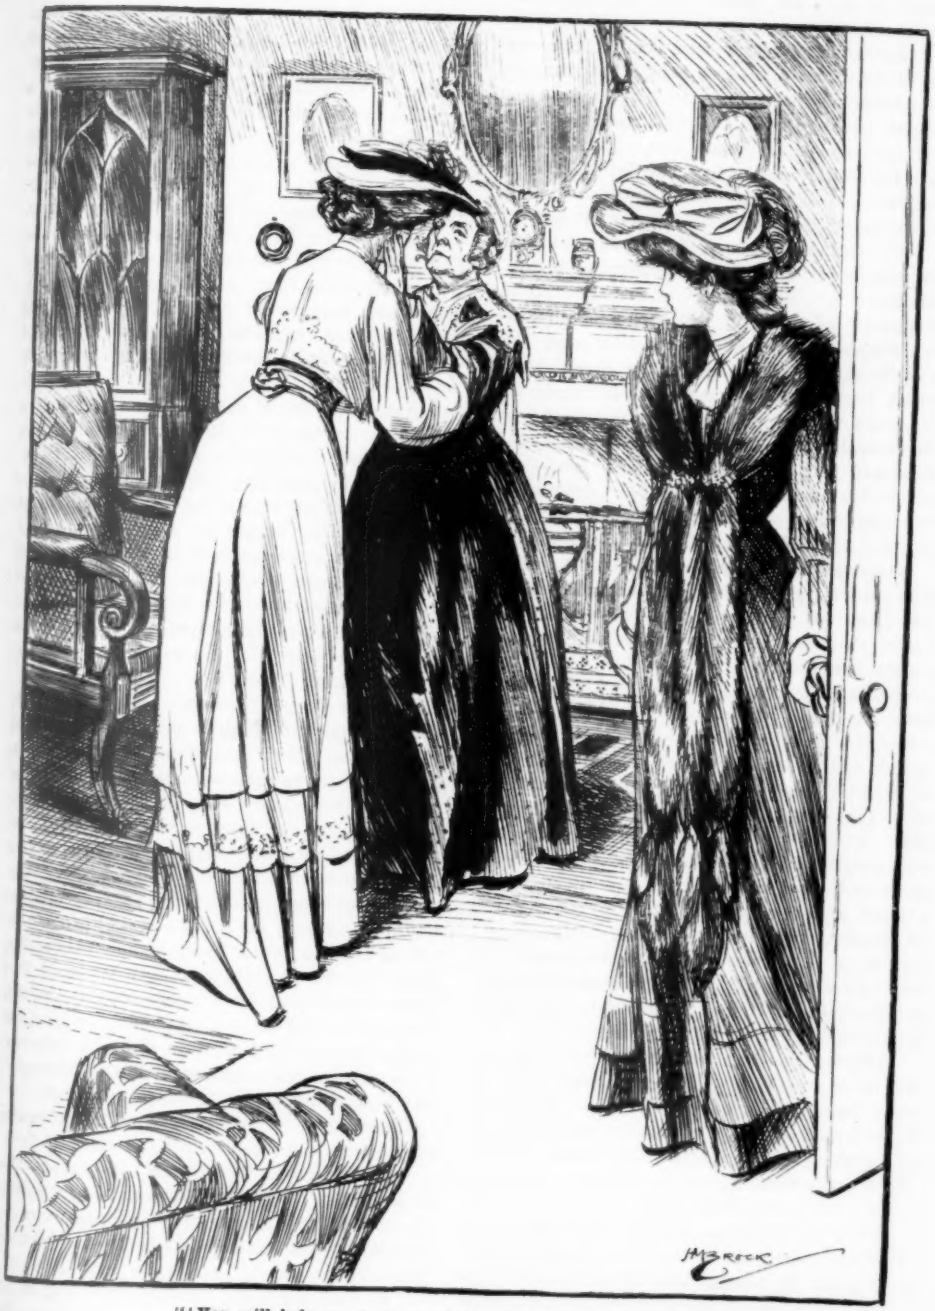
Gradually, as the days passed without a letter and grew to weeks, her uneasiness infected the others. They wrote to the War Office and had the official reply. The authorities there had no news of Major Lindley.

But even before that period of suspense set in it was apparent to everyone that Lady Flora had begun to feel her age. She walked more weakly, leaning on her stick, her eyes became dull; the little network of fine wrinkles on the old ivory face suddenly deepened; her spirit no longer showed itself in her vivacity; she was snappish with Judy because she was not looking her best.

"You ought to be the proudest girl in the world," she said. "When I gave him to you I thought you would be. You are not the same child that I knew. He would give you no thanks for fretting over him."

Judy noticed the oddity of the phrase, "When I gave him to you," with passing wonder.

"Poor old godmamma," she thought tenderly. "The strain has been too much for her. It has broken her down"; and had no resentment for Lady Flora's unjust snappishness.



At last Judy crossed over from the Red House to the cottage to keep Lady Flora company. If it did nothing else, it prevented those incessant pilgrimages. There were three posts a day into Stannington, and the bags were hardly in before Lady Flora would set out across the Green. She did not wait to see if there would be a letter for herself. She did not go to the post-office. She was not one to take her disappointment before the eyes of her humbler neighbours; and day after day the look in her face when her eyes met Judy's and read the answer in them was pitiful to see.

"Let us go back," said Judy once, "and see if there may not be a letter for you. See, Stocks has not reached the Cottage yet. He is only at Pond's End."

Lady Flora did not glance through the window of the Red House by which they were standing with any lively anticipation that there would be a letter for her in Stocks' bag. She did not look at all.

"There will be no letter for me," she said with a hopelessness that struck Judy with wonder and pity. Why should not Philip write to his mother? Why, he had been as careful to write to her as to Judy. The posts all those months had always brought them each a letter.

It was borne in upon her by degrees that there had been a quarrel of some sort between Philip and his mother, and that he had ceased to write to her, or that she did not anticipate a letter from him. Judy shook her head over it sorrowfully. There had always been great divergences between mother and son, but they had seemed to be healed; and no one could doubt Lady Flora's joy in the reconciliation.

"'You will help me to bear whatever it is to be.'"—p. 517.

Judy wondered and was silent. She was not given to very great curiosity, and she had the virtue of discretion.

Just at this time the atmosphere of the Cottage consorted better with Judy's mood than the atmosphere of the Red House. Teddy Parkins had come to the point, and Mabel was an engaged girl, and the happiest of mortals.

Judy rather wondered about it. She had discrimination enough to see beyond Teddy's fat white face and stolid manner, beyond his perpetual sucking of his gold-headed cane, the simple, gentle and chivalrous soul that was Teddy's. She had hardly given Mabel credit for such perception. Yet there was no doubt that Mabel was rapturously in love. She would have married Teddy, she declared, if he had been a crossing-sweeper; and Judy felt that it was true. She had been accustomed to think of her sisters as the least little bit in the world worldly as well as conventional.

It seemed that Teddy and Mrs. Parkinson could not make enough of Mabel. The wedding was fixed for January, but already the bridegroom-elect and his aunt were raining presents on the bride-elect.

And such presents! The very latest and most expensive motor-car; a sable coat which ran into four figures of value; a necklace which had once belonged to an empress.

Yet Mabel was so wrapped up in Teddy that the presents did not overwhelm her as they would have another girl. Mrs. Evelyn was quietly, placidly pleased about everything. Only Mr. Evelyn grumbled and muttered to himself in the secrecy of his den that the rain of presents and their value was "barbarous." But then he had an incessant soreness about what he considered the bad treatment Maurice Evelyn had suffered at their hands, and sometimes his heat ran away with him.

Judy was glad to be out of it all. If only the letter they looked for would come she could have been happy at the Cottage with Lady Flora and Lady Flora's old maid Charlotte, and the dogs. People forgave her when she accepted no invitations in these days. Everyone knew her anxiety about her lover.

It was an afternoon in early December, and the lamps had not yet been lit. There was no visit to the Red House this afternoon, since the whole Evelyn family except herself were spending the afternoon and dining at Battlements. So she had gone across in the morning instead to see them all, and tell them there was no news. By this time they rather shrank from asking Judy; and Mr. Evelyn had begun to grumble at the incessant junketings at Battlements as something indecent; but this was a grumble he kept for his hours alone in his den.

Lady Flora was in her bedroom, where Judy did not intrude upon her except by special invitation. Judy was in the little drawing-room off the hall, sitting on the hearthrug, trying to read by the firelight, while the dogs settled themselves comfortably on her warm red skirt, Rory nestling nearest to her. Rory had transferred himself from the Red House with his mistress, to the indignation of Lady Flora's dogs, who thought his puppyish ways ill-bred.

Suddenly a sharp rat-tat, the knock of a telegraph messenger, sounded through the house. Judy sprang to her feet. At Stannington they had not grown accustomed to telegrams of no importance, and her heart sank heavy as lead with a premonition of ill-news. It was the word they waited for at last. But from whom did it come? What did it announce?

Before Charlotte had come grumbling from her kitchen Judy had received the message. It was for Lady Flora.

She sent Charlotte back calmly, and then stood a second in the hall before she ascended the staircase. If it contained the worst news, ought not she to open it first? But no, that was something Lady Flora would not permit. She began ascending the stairs, hearing her own heart-beats thudding in her ears, saying over and over to herself that she did love Philip, she did love him, and if she had lost him she would never look for happiness any other way.

When she entered Lady Flora's room after being bidden to do so she saw at once that Lady Flora also had heard the telegraph messenger's knock and was ready to hear the worst. She held her hand for the telegram without speaking and opened it fumblingly; but Judy did not dare to offer to help her.

When she read the words of the telegram she turned in a blind way and looked at Judy.

"It is from the War Office," she said. "He is not dead. I thought it was to say he was dead. He is dangerously ill with enteric. Perhaps—who knows?—he may be dead by this time."

"Or out of danger," said Judy, going to her tremulously, and putting an arm about her shoulder.

XUM

Lady Flora turned from her and sat down in a chair as though she could not stand any longer. Then she turned her face to the wall.

"I think he is dead," she said. "The worst always happens; and he has died without forgiving me."

CHAPTER XVIII.

ROSAMUND'S PLACE.

SHE seemed to have forgotten Judy's presence. Her eyes were fixed on something Judy could not see. Her whole form drooped forward as though the muscles of the tense little frame had suddenly become flaccid.

Judy was frightened. What was she to do? She tried to say something of comfort, but could not. Her thoughts flew home for help; and then she remembered that there was no one at the Red House except the servants. "God help me!" she cried, "God help me!" But there was no sound in the room except the ticking of the clock on the mantelpiece, the scratching of a mouse behind the wainscotting, the shudder of a rising wind in the trees outside.

Tears formed in her eyes and remained there as though frozen. She felt the room cold. Lady Flora would never have fires like another woman of her age. She made a little movement towards the desolate old figure in the arm-chair with the telegram still clasped in its hand.

"What could he have to forgive you?" she asked, and the sound of her own voice startled her. "You were the tenderest of mothers."

Lady Flora turned then and looked at her.

"He wrote that he would never forgive me," she said, "because I had turned Rosamund Lindley and her sister out of the Manor House He could forgive me for having wrecked his life, but he could not forgive their being homeless, as he put it. Why, they had the Manor House all those years; while I, his mother, had lived between the almshouses and a labourer's cottage! I thought I had rooted Rosamund Lindley out of his heart and set you up there instead It has been all of no use. He has beaten me at last, and has died without forgiving me."

Judy made a step or two to her side, and dropped on her knees.

"God is too good to take him away without forgiving you," she said. "Where is your spirit? Where is your courage? He will come back. He will forgive you. We shall all be happy again."

"I thought you would satisfy him, after all those years that my plotting and planning and Prim's insane pride had kept him and Rosamund apart. You have never satisfied him. I can see it in his anger against me. She has his heart still, although he would never let you know it."

Judy's two arms went up about her neck.

"He will come back," she said. "And I will give him up. He shall marry the love of his heart. What was I, a foolish little girl, to satisfy a man like that?"

Lady Flora's head dropped on Judy's shoulder.

"If he could only come back," she said, "I would put Rosamund into his arms and bless them. I would go on my knees to him to forgive me all my long life of thwarting him down to the last mean lie with which I kept him back when he would have gone to Rosamund last April; for the letter with which I turned them out of the Manor House. If he would only come back!"

"He will come back, but he will not have his mother on her knees to him," said Judy steadily.

"God has broken my heart," said Lady Flora.

"Not your heart," cried Judy, holding the old head close to her breast, "but only your will to thwart His."

She took Lady Flora's hands then and found them cold. An inspiration came to her so daring that she trembled before it.

"Come to the drawing-room," she said, "and sit by the fire; you are perished. I shall ask Charlotte to make you some nice tea with cream in it. Come, I am going to bring you the one who ought to be with you now, who has loved him almost as long as you have, and as faithfully. If Philip be dead, it is she, not I, who has the best right to grieve for him like a widow. But he lives; I am sure he lives. And don't you think it will help him on the way to recovery if he knows Miss Rosamund is in your house as your daughter?"

For the first time Lady Flora's face softened into hopefulness, or something like it.

"I think he would forgive me then," she said. "But child, child, what is it we are ready to do to you between us all? Are you not to be thought of at all? Philip would never let you suffer, not even to win his own happiness. I have been cruel to you, child, for you love him too."

For a second Judy hesitated. Then she spoke out bravely.

"Godmamma," she said, "you must not be angry with me. For some time past I have doubted that my love for Philip was the right kind. He dazzled me; there was nothing wonderful in that. But love—perhaps I did not know the meaning of love."

Poor Judy, who was trying to be honest and unselfish all round!

Lady Flora listened to her with a growing amazement in her expressive face. Then came coldness, almost disdain.

"Not love Philip?" she said. "Impossible! Why I thought you loved him. I told him that he had won your heart without knowing it. That was how the engagement came about. He has a fanatical sense of honour. For a little while he was pleased, but you could not hold him. His heart went back to her."

"Godmamma!"

Judy was turning paler and paler. Then the blood came back in a great rush to her smooth young cheeks. But Lady Flora had ceased to look at her.

"Bring me Rosamund Lindley," she said. "In this hour her place is beside me. You have no right to mourn for him."

Judy went away with a hanging head. But was it not thus that those who would do good to others were often repaid? It was no time for anger and resentment. She would bring Rosamund Lindley—somehow she never doubted that she would come—and then she would go back to the Red House. Whether Philip lived or died, she was free now by her own confession and his mother's disclosure.

Judy's grief for the lover, to whom at least she was tenderly attached, was held in abeyance by the revelation of how it was that Major Lindley had come to ask her to marry him. Her cheeks burned red as she went across the grass plot of the Green in the moonless dark.

Was it not her own fault, her own folly? Judy asked herself, remembering her childish admiration of the distinguished soldier. And to think that he had felt himself bound to marry the foolish little person who had fallen in love with him! Oh, he must live, he must come back; if only to undo all that wrong. To think she had filched the love that was so precious to Rosamund, and that she had not even needed it after all! If she had been in love with him, there would have been some excuse.

Inarticulate prayers formed themselves on her lips as she hurried along.

Along the high road the village of Stannington straggles for quite a mile. After the last of the houses there is a stretch of road; then beyond a white gate you may see the gabled, steep-roofed house of the Spinney Farm.

There had been great sympathy for the Misses Lindley in the neighbourhood over their change of abode. The Spinney Farm might be picturesque, and Miss Rosamund might have done her best with apple-blossom chintz covers to the chairs, and pretty wall paper, and delicate curtains at the windows; but what a change from the Manor House to the Spinney Farm!

Like many of the picturesque houses in that most charming of villages, the Spinney was airless and dark within. The little diamond-paned windows, opening on one side only, were quite insufficient for purposes of ventilation. It was a modern house built by Squire Lindley, who little thought his own daughters would ever occupy it. The good gentleman had the laudable intention of admitting no new buildings unless they were in harmony with the old.

The white gate gleamed in the darkness. Judy passed within, letting it slam as she went. She passed round the house to the glass porch, which also did duty as a small greenhouse. As she passed the drawing-room she saw Miss Rosamund seated at the piano. She was in white, as usual, and the gleam of lamplight was on her golden hair. She seemed to be singing; but the room was empty of any occupant other than herself, except for her little black Pomeranian, which was curled up on the white rug by the fire.

The room was charming, with its water-colours and books and the tender, gracious figure of the woman at the piano.

Judy could hardly wait to knock, for the little half-glass door within the greenhouse stood open. To find Miss Rosamund alone, that was the great thing. Any moment Miss Prim might come back.

However, she knocked and brought Jemima Appleby, who had been Judy's pupil in the Sunday school, from the kitchen. She smiled all over when she saw the visitor.

"Miss Rosamund's within, Miss Judy," she said; "but Miss Prim is in the village. She won't be home till after six."

"I want Miss Rosamund," Judy said, passing by Jemima Appleby, but not forgetting, despite her preoccupation, to compliment Jemima on her appearance. She left Jemima, who was still feeling the glories of the recently assumed black dress and white cap and apron, beaming all over as she passed into the drawing-room. She had noticed by the white-faced clock in the hall that it was twenty minutes past five. If only she could kidnap Miss Rosamund before Miss Prim should return!

Miss Rosamund played a discord in a startled way, and then, with her hands still on the keys, turned and stared at Judy, her cheeks whitening.

"There is bad news," she said. "He is dead, wounded?"

"He is very ill, Miss Rosamund, and his mother asks for you."

"His mother. Lady Flora Lindley? She was always against us. She cannot want me. Child, child, it is your place to be with her now. I have no right."

Something in the forlorn yet stately way in which she stood up, one hand clinging to her chair as though for support, went to Judy's heart like a sword.

"Poor child, I am very sorry for you," Miss Rosamund said. And the pity in her voice was exquisite.

"Why, so am I sorry for myself," said Judy with a laugh that was like a sob, "for it is not my place to grieve for him at all. I have been standing in another woman's place all these months. Miss Rosamund, he was on his way to you. His heart never ceased to be yours. No woman ever had so faithful a lover. But somehow he was led to believe that you were about to marry Mr. Neville. His heart was broken. And then, because I had been so foolish and paraded my hero worship so openly that it might be mistaken for love, he thought he must make me happy, since he never could be happy himself. And I took him because his glory dazzled me. Miss Rosamund, he is yours, he has always been yours. His mother knows it now. She needs you in this hour."

Miss Rosamund looked at her with eyes like moons, in which wonder strove with delight for mastery.

"And are you not heart-broken, little Judy?"

"I am not heart-broken," said Judy. "I am going home; and you are to take my place with Lady Flora. She will not believe that he can live. But he will live. God is too good to take him from us."

Miss Rosamund bowed her head.

"If he dies now," she said, "I shall have the right to grieve for him. If he lives, and it is true that he loves only me, no one will ever come between us again."

The clock in the hall struck half-past five.

"Come," cried Judy in an agony of impatience, "that poor old woman is waiting. You will have to take a few things just for the night. Your other things can follow to-morrow. Come. Miss Prim will be returning."

"Prim will not oppose me. She would not have opposed me this long time back. She has learned to forgive. She is to marry Mr. Neville. The mistake must have arisen in that way. She is not bitter against nor angry with Lady Flora any longer, so she says."

For all this assurance, Judy was heartily glad when she and Miss Rosamund had left the Spinney Farm behind them, and had taken the path across the Green in the velvety darkness.

"Do you know what I was singing when you came in, Judy?" Miss Rosamund said, with sudden awe. "I was singing:

> 'A wind comes over the sea
> With a moan in its blast;
> But nothing comes home to me,
> Sailing slow, sailing fast.'"

"Ah, but you see you were wrong," said Judy; and then became silent with a thought that never had bad news been received as such tidings of joy. "There will be a happier ship for you one of these days," she added.

But Miss Rosamund did not seem to have heard her.

They were at the Cottage. Charlotte opened the door to them without any surprise.

"Her Ladyship is in the drawing-room, Miss Judy," she said.

Judy went in first, and Rosamund Lindley followed her timidly.

Lady Flora was standing by the fire. As Rosamund came in view she advanced a step or two to meet her.

"Your place is with me now," she said. "Can you forgive me, Rosamund? We will go back to the Manor House together."

She had not a word, not a glance for Judy.

She took Rosamund's face between her two hands.

"You love him," she said. "You will help me to bear whatever is to be."

Then Judy went out and left them together.

[END OF CHAPTER THE EIGHTEENTH.]

AN INDIAN MISSIONARY'S DAY.

A VILLAGE DAY SCHOOL IN INDIA.

UR mission station is a lonely one; it is almost a hundred miles from the great and busy Presidency city. In the town there is but one other European family. The missionary is cut off from very intimate converse with his own countrymen, and necessarily has close relations with the Bengali people. The town is very much like other towns in Bengal. There is a long street, and the houses, which are built chiefly of mud and thatched with straw, are thrown about in hopeless confusion. No building regulations have been observed, and each owner has built as seemed best in his own eyes. Altogether our town has about five thousand inhabitants, and is an important business centre; here is one of the great rice markets of Bengal. We have a large variety of castes, for here are the proud "twice-born," the Brahmin, the cool-headed, successful Kaistha, and all the different grades down to the out-caste sweeper and "dōm."

The mission station is comparatively new, and the Christian missionary as he walks through the busy street is painfully conscious of the need for the proclamation of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. In the whole town, so far as he knows, with the exception of those living immediately under his care, there is not one Christian. But as he looks out over his district the outlook is even more distressing. There are in his district over 400,000 people, and the villages are almost crowded one on to another, the population per square mile being 514. In the whole district, with a population of 902,280, there are but two European missionaries, each with a small staff of native assistants; out of this immense population of over 900,000 people but 819 are Christians.

This viewpoint is decidedly depressing, and yet there is no more thorough optimist in the world than the Christian missionary. Though the odds against the success of the Christian religion in India appear to be terrific, and to the ordinary cool, calculating mind the prospect of India ever becoming a great Christian country is quixotic, yet the Christian worker goes steadily forward, confidently believing, and translating his belief into the language of the people with whom he works,

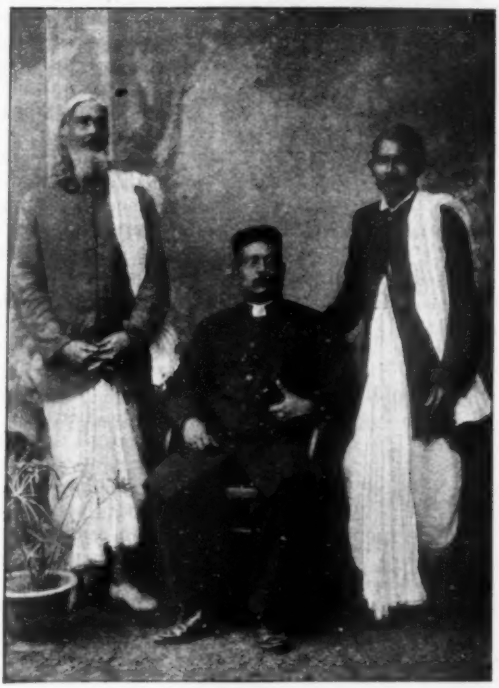
"Jesus shall reign where'er the sun
Doth his successive journeys run."

Not for one moment does he doubt that even in India the day is coming when every tongue shall "confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father."

My day's work begins with an hour's reading in Bengali with a teacher. This teacher is a splendid specimen of the Bengali literary gentleman. He is the teacher of Sanskrit in the high school here, and holds a high degree in Sanskrit learning. As we read we very often get drawn off into earnest argument. One of his questions to me was this: "In what way do you receive forgiveness of your sins?"

My answer was, "We receive forgiveness of our sins when we acknowledge them to God, are without affectation really repentant because of them, and are determined to forsake them."

"This is what we also believe," he replied.



"How can this be true, when you say that the person who bathes in the Ganges is forgiven his sin?"

"Because the Ganges is holy. Sin cannot remain in it. The sins of the persons who bathe in it are expelled from the river, and take refuge in the trees on the banks of the river." And he quoted a Sanskrit passage from one of their scriptures, in proof.

"Surely you do not hold this very material view concerning sin, teacher?"

"Yes, sir, I do. I believe it thoroughly."

This exposition of the virtue of bathing in the Ganges was given in all seriousness, and with apparently a profound conviction of its truth. True conviction of the sinfulness of sin is never felt until one has learnt of the sacrifice of Jesus, and I tried to explain to my teacher the relation of the death of the Saviour to the forgiveness of sin. He shook his head in utter dissent from the possibility of such a relation.

BENGALI PREACHERS.

A MISSIONARY'S WIFE, WITH HELPERS.

We often get into discussions of this kind, and before we are aware of it the hour is up and it is half-past six. After a cup of tea, the work of the day may be said to commence. There have already been one or two callers on me, but they have waited until I should be free. One of those waiting is a pleader, a B.A. and B.L. He is well educated, and eager to cultivate the acquaintance of the missionary. He is ever ready for a discussion on the perennially interesting subject of religion, but there are many duties awaiting us to-day, and we beg to be excused for this morning.

There is an interesting boarding school for boys in our station, and as we step across the garden we hear them singing "grace before meat." There they stand, nearly thirty of them, bright little fellows, with eyes closed and hands clasped, praying God's blessing upon their early breakfast. They have a little cooked rice at this meal. One or two of the boys are not present, so we make inquiries about them, and have them treated by the Bengali doctor in charge of the charitable dispensary. In having him we are very fortunate; in many places the missionary himself must know something of medicine and its use. After these early duties, the boys settle down for school work for three hours, until ten o'clock, when they have their breakfast. All the boys are being trained to work, as well as to learn to read and write. Some of them are first-rate weavers, and make a cloth which is in demand. All the clothes used by the boys in the school are made from this cloth. Some learn one trade, and others another, and in this way we are training them up in habits of industry as well as of study.

As we return from the school one of our workers comes to inform us of a remarkable case of fortitude under very adverse circumstances. A few miles from where we live is an isolated Christian family. The village in which they dwell, with the exception of themselves, is entirely Hindu. They have been tried and persecuted in numberless ways, and among their trials the worst was this: they were taunted with the fact of being Christians, and that their Dēvata (God) Jesus Christ had evidently forsaken them. It seemed very much as though the villagers were right; no one seemed to care for them in the slightest degree. To make matters worse, a crisis in the family life was approaching, and, using this as a lever, their Hindu relatives and acquaintances were making strenuous efforts to cause them to forsake their Christianity. The threats were of no avail. Nothing would induce them to forsake the truth as they had learnt it.

Our Bengali minister had in some indirect way learnt of this case, and he went to see them. When he got to their home, and they learnt that he was a Christian, they were filled with rejoicing. As he listened to their story he realised that the age of miracles was not yet passed. They were grateful to know that they were not utterly forsaken, and that God had heard their cry to Him for help. As the wife told of her confidence in God, and that He would help, the minister could not but have his faith strengthened. She told him her favourite hymn. The idea in it is as follows: "Let the world persecute us to the utmost of its power, give us pain to bear of the severest kind, yet our Lord Jesus we will never forsake."

On his return he reported the interview and situation to us. We felt we must help in this case. So we sent for them to come to the mission station, in order that proper attention might be given. How gladly they came! The husband tells how for fourteen years he was in the service of a good missionary who is now translated, and that while he was there he had learned of Jesus and had learned to love Him. While there he had married one of the girls of the mission school, and they had been happy in their married life. When the missionary left for Scotland, where he died, Bhusan returned to his native village, and had been suffering on account of his faith. For a season it really seemed as though he were forsaken, yet both he and his wife held with a firm hold to their faith in God, and knew that He would in some way come to their rescue.

After we had made our arrangements for sending for these people, I started with other workers to visit two villages, in order to visit day schools and also to hold preaching services. We started out in our bullock tonga. Our bullocks are two splendid animals, and they go along the roads in splendid style. There are four of us, and as we go there is opportunity for laying plans for work, and for the consideration of some theme from the Old or New Testament. This morning we had an earnest conversation about the Apostle Paul. He is the embodiment of the true missionary spirit; he in a special manner is the bright example for the Christian missionary. When he becomes cast down or discouraged, a reading of one of the great missionary's letters has a wonderfully vivifying effect. We talk of St. Paul, discuss his methods, and try to learn of him.

But what a road this is! Our bullocks are very strong, and do not stop for trifles. The unevenness of the road does not seem to affect them, but it affects us—and that seriously. Unless one is watchful, he gets more jars than are good for him. The chief trunk roads in Bengal are remarkably good, but the roads that are away from the great trunk roads are splendid bone-shakers. With all its drawbacks, however, this road is a beautiful one. The magnificent shady mango trees, just now in all their glory of profuse blossom, on each side of the road make an avenue of rare beauty. The birds are to be seen in great variety, and here and there a number of monkeys enjoying themselves in the trees.

It was the village market day, and there was a large number of people present. We took our stand in the shade of a fine tree, and commenced singing. Very soon we had a large crowd around us, and we had the unspeakable joy of preaching glad tidings of peace. The people listened with eagerness to the new story. Many of them had never heard it before, and it came to them with a strange sound. We sold Gospel portions, in order that in the quiet of their homes they might read the life of Him Whom we preach. A few of the more thoughtful waited for a quiet talk with the missionary, and we tried to make clear our message. In this village there are no Christians yet, but we are hopeful that in the near future some will turn to Christ. As we returned home along the same road, though we were thrown about in the tonga most unceremoniously, we could not but be thankful that "unto us, who are less than the least of all saints, was this grace given, to preach unto the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ."

A BENGALI HOUSE.

While we believe in this bazaar preaching, and diligently keep it up, we believe more in following up definite clues. We are to be fishermen, and the fisherman tries to find out where the fish are that are most likely to be caught. We had heard of two women belonging to an aboriginal tribe who were inquirers, and so we sent one of our preachers, who belongs to the same tribe, to look them up. The preacher returned, saying that they were inquirers, but that they were shy and nervous; they could not know that the missionary was not a coolie-hunter, to send them off to Assam or Demerara, or some other distant part, to which people often go from these districts. They wished to take advice from one of their relatives as to the step. The relative proves to be a man who was the first Christian in connection with our mission, and we know that his advice will be in favour of their following Jesus Christ. But they are very timid, very ignorant, very simple, and they need to have confidence in the missionary before they will become followers of his Lord.

A VILLAGE IN BENGAL.

Each afternoon at three o'clock we hold regularly a Bible class for all the workers on the mission station. A systematic study of the Word of God is imperative if we are to be successful wielders of the sword of the Spirit. This study is helpful, and it enables us to get close to each other.

The evenings are usually spent in going to visit or being visited by persons who are anxious to learn concerning the Christian religion; we are also expected to take an interest in all work of a humanitarian character in the town. The charitable dispensary claims attention, also the high school.

We have numbers of snakes during the year in our compound, and all who make it their home are continually on the alert for the first sign of the enemy. On one occasion I wished to put away some tiles carefully, and I ordered them to be placed in a corner of the cow-house. The cowherd remonstrated, and begged me to place them elsewhere. "There was really no room for them there," he expostulated. But when my back was turned the real reason came out. He said to one standing by, "I do not want the cow-house turned into a snakes' nest." It is well known that snakes love to have their retreats in old walls or under a heap of bricks or rubbish. His remark came to my ears, and I laughingly chided him about it. His reply was, "I cannot away with snakes; they just nip you—and you die. There is some satisfaction in being killed by a tiger or a panther. They make a meal of you; but a snake, bah!" And he made a gesture of utter disgust.

The shades of night are now falling fast, and we return to the bungalow tired, but nevertheless strangely triumphant and full of courage, because we are assured that if God be with us none can stand against us. We retire for dinner and a quiet evening with our family, oftentimes to an evening of hard literary labour.

So the missionary works—by preaching, by earnest talk with the Nicodemuses that abound, by visits to the homes of the people, by the preparation of literature, by its sale after it is prepared, by this method and by that, in order that by any means he may "save some."

JOSEPH CULSHAW.

AN UGLY DUCKLING.

A Complete Story by E. Burrowes.

EVERYONE said it was very hard on Jacquetta that she should be such a very ugly duckling, except Jacquetta herself. She had never thought about the matter, being singularly free from vanity or the desire to look at herself in the glass, until the fact of her exceeding want of beauty was brought home to her by the remarks of her friends and the sudden realisation of her sister's loveliness. Even then it did not worry her much, for Jacquetta was of a matter-of-fact, philosophical turn of mind, and moulded her life on the good old adage, "What can't be cured must be endured." So, where other girls might have lamented with secret tears, and made themselves morbidly sensitive on the subject, Jacquetta shrugged her shoulders and went on her way peacefully. She may have felt a little humbled in spirit, but she did not show it to the outer world, for though she was ugly she had some pride, she reflected with an odd humour.

It was when she was about twenty-two, and her younger and surpassingly beautiful sister Iris had taken the fashionable world by storm with her appearance at the King's Court and subsequent festivities, that Jacquetta announced one morning at the breakfast table that she was going away for a couple of months.

She made this announcement in her customary matter-of-fact manner, and helped herself liberally to marmalade with unmoved countenance, while Lady Marcia Langdon regarded her elder daughter with amazement. Iris had not yet appeared from her late slumbers, for the beauty had been up till the small hours of the morning, and must therefore be allowed her sleep out.

"And pray where are you going, Jacquetta?" inquired Lady Marcia disapprovingly. Her elder daughter had always been something of a thorn in the flesh to her.

"I am going down to Bearcot," said Jacquetta composedly. "I've had a letter from Uncle Dick this morning. He says I may stay as long as I like, and the moor is perfect just now."

"Bearcot!" echoed Lady Marcia. "My dear child, you will be buried alive there. No one comes near the place from one year's end to the other but the Vicar, and he is eighty-four! And in the middle of the season, too! Really, Jacquetta, you must have taken leave of your senses!"

"I think not. I don't care a bit about the season, you know, mother; and I do like the country in the summer. Why should I waste the best months in stuffy London, when I can go to the moor? You have Iris to go out with, and you don't want me. It isn't as if I were pretty, like she is, and a credit to you. People only ask me because they think you will be hurt if they leave me out, but they don't want me really. So I shall go to the moor."

Lady Marcia sighed impatiently.

"Oh, very well, my dear; have your own way," she said, with a little temper. "I am thankful that I have one daughter who is content to do the right things and enjoy her life while she can."

"Perhaps, if I had sea-blue eyes and golden hair, and a skin like a ripe peach, I might enjoy the season too," said Jacquetta good-temperedly. "As it is, I haven't, so the country suits me far better."

Lady Marcia looked at her daughter reflectively. She was a large, handsome woman of the milkmaid type. It was obviously from her that Iris had inherited her exquisite colouring and matchless complexion, even as it was equally obvious that Jacquetta's plainness came from her father's side. The fact that it had never worried Jacquetta astonished the mother, and she often wished that she could accept the trial in the same philosophical manner. But it did worry her. It was humiliating to be complimented on her younger child's loveliness, and then to see the only imperfectly concealed surprise when Jacquetta was introduced as the elder daughter. She knew so well what people were thinking and saying to each other about her ugly duckling.

"Well, if you insist upon burying yourself on the moor, where every prospect pleases and man is non-existent," she said suddenly, "I suppose you won't want any more clothes this summer. In that case Iris can have a new blue muslin, as well as a pink one, and a white chiffon gown for Ascot. It's an ill wind that blows nobody good."

"It is, indeed," agreed Jacquetta, getting up from the table with a laugh. "Let Iris have my share of Ascot frocks by all means. I shall live in brown holland and serge for the rest of the summer."

As Jacquetta left the room by one door Iris came in at the other. In her white muslin frock, with a scarf of blue silk twisted round her slender waist, and a bow of the same at her breast, she looked the incarnation of radiant health and loveliness.

"Jacquetta not down?" she queried, lifting her pretty brows. "What next? Has she overslept herself?"

"Nothing of the sort, you lazy child," said Lady Marcia. "Jacquetta has been down and finished her breakfast long ago. She has gone up to write or pack or something."

"To pack?"

"Yes; she is going to Bearcot to your Uncle Dick."

"Now? In the middle of the season?"

"Yes; at once, and for the whole summer."

"Now, isn't she the oddest girl? I don't believe she cares for anything that other girls do. She is difficult, mother."

Lady Marcia looked at her daughter with an odd smile in her eyes blue.

"She is not as frivolous as you, you mean," she said drily. "At any rate, my dear Iris, you will be able to have your two new muslins and a chiffon frock for Ascot. Jacquetta wants nothing but brown holland and serge."

Iris shrugged her shoulders.

"Everyone to their own taste," she said. "I don't know what she sees in miles of heather and absolute loneliness. It doesn't satisfy me!"

But it satisfied Jacquetta.

Three days later she looked out of the train on a vista of distant moors rolling darkly away to the horizon, their purple outline broken only by peaks which she knew were the tors, beloved of her heart. Under their very shadow lay Bearcot, the goal of all her desires.

A fine rain, such as had often wetted her cheeks on the moor, was falling as she got out at the quiet wayside station, where it was to be presumed some sort of vehicle was in waiting to convey her over the five miles or more which lay between Bearcot and the outer civilised world. But there was no sign of the familiar dun-coloured mare and wagonette which had met her on other occasions. Nothing was to be seen in the small station entrance but a smart dogcart with a well-bred bay in the shafts and a man in dark livery standing at its head.

The train had puffed slowly on its way, and Jacquetta and her luggage were apparently the only things deposited on the platform. She turned to the porter who mounted guard over her box and bag.

"Is there no one from Bearcot?" she asked. "Hasn't the cart come in?"

"No, miss; there's no one from Bearcot."

"And no cab, I suppose? There never is one to be had here."

The porter agreed with Jacquetta. There was no cab. Things began to assume a hopeless outlook, for the rain had thickened, and was coming down in white sheets, drifting over the moor and blotting out all the view.

"Needs must when the devil drives," muttered Jacquetta to herself, with a glance at her thick boots and serviceable serge coat and skirt. "Well, I shall walk on," she said aloud to the porter, "on the chance of meeting the cart. You can put my things into the station-master's office, and someone will fetch them before nightfall."

"Very good, miss. You'll not lose your way in the mist, miss?"

"I know every inch of the way," said Jacquetta cheerfully, and started off on her wet walk, passing the dogcart which was still waiting in the station yard, and going out of the road across a short cut which led, she knew, to the higher road, climbing steeply up the opposite height, beyond which lay the open rain-drenched moors and Bearcot.

The road was steep and winding, and the rain drifted down thicker and thicker, in white wreaths, enwrapping the landscape and Jacquetta as she ascended higher and higher towards the open moors. But she did not mind either the rain or the walk. It was exhilarating to her after stuffy London, and she was thinking with sincere pity of Iris, doing the perpetual treadmill of the season, while she was here, free and unfettered by convention or fashion, when the sharp clatter of horses' feet and of wheels sounded behind her on the road.

It could not possibly be the cart from Bearcot coming from that direction, but she looked behind her, and saw as it were a phantom form of a tall horse and a dogcart. In the driver's seat she could just make out a cloaked figure, then she turned and continued her tramp. It was not the Bearcot cart, but probably the one she had seen in the station yard.

It overtook her a few minutes later, and the mist-enveloped driver pulled up. In the fog she saw him lean forward and search the road for a moment. Then he spoke—apparently to her, since there was not another living soul within miles.

"Pardon me; but you cannot walk across the moor in this mist. May I give you a lift?"

"Thank you very much," said Jacquetta with dignity, which must have been completely lost on the driver, since she was only faintly visible to him through the mist; "but I know my way perfectly well, and I like the walk."

The stranger laughed amusedly.

"Tastes differ," he said cheerfully. "I call this fog simply abominable, and really, you know, it's a long tramp to Bearcot. I'm going there myself, so you might as well let me take you there in some small amount of comfort. It's easy to lose oneself on these moors, and a hard matter to get on the right track when once you've lost it. Won't you change your mind?"

Jacquetta hesitated, and thought better of her determination to brave the elements

"Jacquetta and her luggage were apparently the only things deposited on the platform."

and walk those five long miles across the moor.

"It's very kind of you," she said; "and I think—well, it is wet, isn't it?"

"It is. Give me your hand—that's it. Are you comfortable? Phew! what a day. They forgot to send for you, I suppose?"

"I suppose they did," said Jacquetta cheerfully; "but it didn't matter much. They can fetch my things some time to-night from the station."

"There is no need to do that," said the man at her side, flicking the bay mare lightly over the neck, "because I have them here—behind. I thought, if I couldn't pick you up, I might as well take your baggage. As it happens, I've managed both, you see. After all, there must be some slight connection between us, I suppose. Isn't Mr. Ogilvy your uncle?"

"Yes."

"And he is mine, too," said the man. "I must introduce myself to you as Anthony Garnard. I found out your name from your luggage, so I had the advantage of you there."

"Anthony Garnard!" repeated Jacquetta. "Why——"

She bit her lips, and choked back the hasty words which in another moment would have been spoken. Through the mist Garnard could see the wave of hot colour which ran into her cheeks, and his hands tightened on the reins.

"Say it," he said grimly. "I'm accustomed to it. You've heard nothing good of me, have you? But—it's peace now. That's what's taking me to Bearcot. I'm staying at the inn."

"I am glad," said Jacquetta simply. "Perhaps it wasn't altogether your fault?"

"Well, I shouldn't be believed if I said it wasn't," he said. "Still, I think you'll credit me with speaking the truth. It wasn't—altogether. Are you staying long up here? I've often wondered whether you ever came down here. You see, I've heard of you from Uncle Dick."

"I shall stay months, if I can," she said; "but do tell me—what have you been doing with yourself? You have come back to England for good and all, haven't you?"

"I think so. It really depends on circumstances. I can't say for certain yet, but I'm sick of roving. Hullo! why, here we are on the ridge, and Bearcot ought to be in sight, only the mist hides it."

Ten minutes later they pulled up at a grey wall set amidst the dripping heather. A small postern door gave access to the house, which lay snugly hidden inside, with its face turned to the open moors sweeping away to the west.

Garnard jumped down and rang the bell, which pealed long and loudly through the silence.

A man opened the door and looked out.

"Thank God! you've come," he said in an odd hoarse voice. "It's Miss Jacquetta and Mr. Garnard. Oh, miss——"

"What is the matter, Andrew? Why wasn't I met at the station? I wrote and told the master what train I was coming by, and——"

"Miss—he got no letter. He'll never get another. Master died this morning suddenly. We found him dead in his bed."

* * * * * *

"What will you do?"

Jacquetta looked up. Her eyes were red with weeping. She had loved Dick Ogilvy with the kind of doggy faithfulness which she had never been able to bestow on Lady Marcia or Iris. The uncle on the moor had filled her life with happiness—such happiness as the others would never understand—and she mourned him sincerely. Garnard guessed a little of this as he forbore to look at her too searchingly, and turned his attention to the streaming outside world.

"I shall stay here," said Jacquetta forlornly, "till it is—all over. Then I suppose I shall have to go home again. I don't know what else I can do."

"Won't you wire to your people? I can take a message in for you. I must go myself, to send messages to the lawyer and such people."

"Then I ought to send one home, I suppose. But mother won't want to come down here just now, I think."

But Jacquetta was mistaken in that.

Lady Marcia arrived the next day. Garnard had stayed at the inn in the nearest village, and she found Jacquetta alone with the servants. When fully acquainted with the manner of her uncle's death, and the coming of his prodigal nephew, she was oddly excited. She had always had what are commonly called expectations from Mr. Ogilvy, and she made no secret of the fact on her arrival.

"Your poor uncle, my dear Jacquetta, must have been a rich man. He has remembered me, I trust, in his will. What is this I hear of Anthony Garnard? He has come back? What is he doing now?"

"I don't know," said Jacquetta truthfully. "I know nothing about him; but everyone seems devoted to him here, and he has been very kind to me."

"Where the quarry is there will the vultures be gathered together," said Lady Marcia, with unexpected sharpness. "I don't trust that young man, Jacquetta You were quite right to send for me."

Until the funeral was over Lady Marcia hovered uneasily about Bearcot. Garnard came to the ceremony, stood at Jacquetta's side, and once touched her arm as they moved towards the graveside for a last look at Richard Ogilvy's resting-place. Lady Marcia had announced herself far too prostrate to stir from the house. They were the chief mourners.

Somehow the sight of Anthony's kind, sympathetic face sent a warm feeling of gratitude to Jacquetta's heart. She knew that whatever happened they would remain friends—she and Anthony. And the knowledge had a wonderful charm for her; the ugly duckling was so unaccustomed to win even the semblance of friendship from the men who fluttered round Iris like moths round a flame. But somehow she knew that Anthony belonged to a different class altogether.

The will, read by the family lawyer before Lady Marcia, Jacquetta, Garnard, and the servants, was of the briefest; for Richard Ogilvy, after a few legacies, bequeathed Bearcot and all its lands, and all his moneys, to his great-niece Jacquetta Langdon, solely and unconditionally.

The ugly duckling found herself a woman of property where but a few minutes previously she had been a girl of no importance whatever.

* * * * * *

"I shall live at Bearcot," said Jacquetta, with an air of decision.

"At Bearcot? Alone? Nonsense, Jacquetta; it is not to be thought of for a moment."

"I am of age and my own mistress, and I love the place," said Jacquetta placidly; "and so I shall stay here and take care of it, mother. You can get on quite well without me. You have Iris, and you know how I dislike London and society and all that sort of thing."

It was three days later, and Lady Marcia and her daughter were alone in the garden room, as it was called. Outside the summer sun was shining, the mist and rain of the past week had cleared away, on either side the moors rolled darkly purple away to the horizon, and there was a scent of thyme and gorse in the warm air.

Lady Marcia, looking critically at her daughter, discovered a new authority and decision in her face. She was plain enough, in all conscience, she reflected; nothing would ever make her a success in society; she had not even an apt gift of repartee to atone for her ugliness; she was, as Iris had said, difficult. Perhaps this, then, was the solution of the problem which had bothered Lady Marcia ever since she had brought Jacquetta out into the world of fashion, four years ago. There would be, after all, all the more for her beautiful Iris.

"I don't know what everyone will say," she said meditatively; "but if you insist upon doing such a foolish thing, of course I can't stop you, Jacquetta."

Jacquetta smiled. She knew her victory was gained. There was, after all, something in being the ugly duckling. Iris would never have been allowed to follow her own inclinations and bury herself in the country—alone.

So Bearcot settled down under a new régime and a new mistress. Anthony Garnard, who had held himself somewhat aloof since their first meeting, came once to see Jacquetta. It was, he said, to bid her good-bye.

"I've been a rolling stone all these years," he said, with an odd smile, "and it's about time I gathered some moss. I'm going to have a try at it, anyway. Will you wish me success, cousin?"

"With all my heart," she said. "What are you going to do?"

"Whatever I can. I was called to the Bar, but never practised. If that is too hopeless, I'll have a try at the weapon mightier than the sword."

"You mean to write?"

"Yes; I had a craze for it once. Perhaps it'll revive again now that something of the kind is necessary. And when I've made my fortune—I'll come back to Bearcot"

"There will always be a room for you," said Jacquetta simply; "you know I have a sort of feeling that you ought to be master here. I don't believe I have as much right to the place as you have."

Garnard held her hand a trifle longer than was absolutely necessary. There was a new warmth in his eyes and voice.

"My dear cousin, our uncle knew best. He knew that you would be a perfect mistress for the place, and I a very unworthy master.

Bearcot could never be in better hands than —these. And now good-bye. I may really come back again and see you some day?"

"Of course you may. And go and call on mother when you are in London. I should like you to see my pretty sister. Good-bye."

It was not until several months had passed that Jacquetta heard anything of him. Then she came upon a couple of powerful little stories in a monthly magazine, signed "Anthony Garnard," and a letter from Iris gave her more news of the man who had taken a strange hold upon her memory.

"Anthony Garnard comes here sometimes, and we meet him out a good deal. What a nice man he is, and so good-looking! He inquired for you the other day. People speak very highly of his writing, and say he promises brilliant things. Is Bearcot as entrancing to you as ever? I can't think why you are content to bury yourself there."

Jacquetta laid down the letter, and looked out on the sweeping moors rolling away as far as the eye could see in all their glory of autumnal colouring. Entrancing! Why, life had assumed a different aspect since Bearcot had become hers to do with as she liked. And for this reason she could not assign a cause for the unrest and depression which suddenly seized upon her. It was not that she was growing tired of the loneliness; solitude had no fears for her, as long as she had Bearcot, her animals, her gardens, and her books. Life was full of pleasure and occupation. But the fact remained that this letter of Iris's had come like some disturbing fiend, and its effect was similar to that caused by the falling of a small pebble into a glass-clear pool of still water. The circles went eddying out and out, till she caught herself up sharp at the memory of Anthony Garnard. Yet it was not possible that this was the real disturbing element.

"Iris sprang forward and seized his arm."—p. 530.

You see, no one had ever paid much attention to the ugly duckling at home. Iris had always monopolised—naturally, so Jacquetta told herself—everyone, and no man in his senses—this was also Jacquetta's own opinion—would ever look at her again after once seeing the beautiful Iris. She had all the capabilities of friendship, and even for love itself, given the right person; but no one had ever attracted her in the least, except—Anthony And now he, too, would, of course, forget her for—Iris. It was a thought which held a pang of bitterness—a new and altogether incomprehensible feeling to Jacquetta, but very real, nevertheless. But presently her inherent cheerful philosophy reasserted itself, and she went out into the garden with a laugh at her own folly. Ugly duckling she must remain to the very end of the chapter; she must grin and bear it.

* * * * * *

Jacquetta turned and held out her hand, with a flush on her face, as Anthony Garnard came in.

"How good of you to come to my first house-party," she said. "You know my mother and Iris, don't you? That's the party; small and select. I wouldn't have Bearcot turned over to a crowd of fashionable folk who would only vote it dull and uninteresting. The Vicar joins us to-morrow."

"Quite right!" said Garnard heartily, looking round him with sincere appreciation. "How charmingly you have decorated this room; yet it is not altered much."

"No; I liked it as it was, with just a few alterations of a trivial kind. I don't think it could be improved possibly, though I know Iris hankers after white paint instead of my lovely old panelled walls."

"Iris is a Philistine," said Lady Marcia, smiling fondly at her younger daughter, whose fair beauty seemed to be only enhanced by the sombre background of dark walls and old family portraits.

They had come down to spend a week with Jacquetta, having exhausted the gaieties of London, Scotland, and Homburg, and Garnard had come by a later train. Lady Marcia had herself suggested that he should be invited, and Jacquetta, with an odd mingling of pleasure and distress, had duly asked him, reading his eager acceptance with a queer dart of pain. Of course, Iris was the magnet that drew him from his literary life—not Bearcot!

Yet how kind and courteous he was, how thoughtful for Jacquetta, and how interested in all her doings and the welfare of Bearcot. She tried to convince herself that this was mere brotherly interest, paid in advance; but the thought brought no balm to her soul. Her cheerful philosophy even threatened to fail at this novel crisis in her life.

It was then that a sudden autumnal storm sprang up and raged on the moor, howling in furious gusts round Bearcot, and devastating the country for miles around. The old house shook to its very foundations with the fury of the gale, and at the close of the second day one of the ancient twisted chimney-stacks fell in with a crash, carrying away part of the wall of what was known as the tower room, and leaving a gaping hole behind, where was evidently a hollow, like a secret chamber.

"What a mass of wreckage!" exclaimed Iris, as she and Garnard stood on the scene of the disaster. Jacquetta was closeted downstairs with the bailiff on the subject. Outside the wind was still tearing furiously.

"It's well it did not happen anywhere else," said Garnard; "this being just one of the rooms which is never used is quite providential. Hullo! what have you got there?"

Iris had picked up a curiously yellowed paper from amid the mass of débris, and the heading of it caught her eyes and sent a wave of hot colour running to her face.

"The last will and testament of Richard Ogilvy!" she read aloud; then opened the paper and glanced at it. A cry escaped her lips, and she looked quickly at Anthony.

"Do you know, this is a later will," she said, "and—we always said it must be a mistake of Uncle Richard leaving the place to Jacquetta; it was absurd, and you had always a prior claim. This will leaves Bearcot to you!"

Garnard started forward, his face grown strangely white.

"To me?" he cried. "Impossible!"

"It is the truth. Read it yourself. It is yours."

It was. A glance told him that much. He read the few words mechanically, then looked at Iris. Somehow, there was a new look in her lovely face which he did not like. Iris, with her milk and rose complexion, her sea-blue, velvety eyes, her wonderful hair, had never attracted him as had——

"Listen," he said peremptorily; "you will say nothing of this will."

"Why not? You must show it to the lawyer—of course you must. Why, otherwise—you cannot prove your claim to Bearcot, and it is yours."

"It is your sister's," he said steadily, "not mine. It is in far better hands with her. Let it remain so. I, at least, will never take it from her. As for this will, it is so much waste paper; I shall burn it."

He drew a match from his pocket as he spoke. Iris sprang forward and seized his arm.

"You are mad!" she said. "Quite mad! Why are you doing this? It is yours—yours; and yet you prefer to let Jacquetta keep it. What do you mean?"

"Simply this," he said quietly, "that Bearcot is hers, and shall remain so. And my reason is that—I love her. That is all."

"You—love—Jacquetta!"

The girl's voice was faint with amazement. No one had ever thought of Jacquetta in that way; it had always been Iris, and never the ugly duckling.

"Yes; and I will never take Bearcot from her."

"From whom?" asked a cheerful voice from the open doorway. Garnard turned, the will in one hand, a half-burnt match in the other. Jacquetta stood on the threshold; a dark shadow flitted for a moment into her brown eyes as she looked from Garnard to Iris and noted the latter's flushed face and bright eyes.

"Who is going to take Bearcot or not take it?" she asked smilingly; "and what is all this disturbance about? I heard your voice downstairs, Iris."

"The disturbance is this!" cried Iris, and before Garnard could prevent it she had snatched the will out of his hand, and given it to Jacquetta. "Read that!" she said, and then fled from the room. Her retreating footsteps had died away in the distance before Jacquetta raised her eyes from the paper in her hand.

"Where did you find this?" she asked quietly.

"In the débris. It must have been hidden in the wall."

"And you were going to—burn it? I could not help hearing what you said."

"Yes; I'll burn it now—if I get the chance."

"Why? Don't you like the place? Isn't it right that you should have it?"

"No. Jacquetta, I won't take it from you. I'll give it back again, so it's no use wanting me to take it, unless—exchange is no robbery, you know."

He had drawn nearer, and his hands were on hers. She looked up with a smile in her brown eyes.

"Well, what exchange do you want?" she said.

"Just you, Jacquetta. Give me yourself, and keep Bearcot for ever!"

She retreated a step or two, with burning cheeks and distressed eyes.

"But this is madness," she said; "you don't know what you are saying! I thought it was Iris—you—cared for. Besides, Bearcot has never been mine, really; it is yours."

"It is yours, dearest heart; and don't you know yet—that I love you? Iris is nothing to me; you are everything. Jacquetta, aren't you going to even give me an answer?"

Well, she gave him an answer, and it seemed to satisfy him, for the next moment she was in his arms, and the ugly duckling had come into her inheritance at last.

* * * * * *

So it did not really matter a bit to whom Bearcot actually belonged, for what was Garnard's was also Jacquetta's, and vice versâ. Whether old Richard Ogilvy could have ever foreseen this one cannot tell, but it is safe to say that he would have smiled on the union, which was one of heart and soul and—property.

Anthony Garnard is now a famous man of letters, and Bearcot is well known to his literary friends as the delightful home in which he tastes of real happiness, and over whose destinies Jacquetta presides so worthily.

SCRIPTURE ILLUSTRATIONS AND ANECDOTES.

BASED ON THE INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

MARCH 20TH.—Jesus Feeds the Five Thousand.

Passage for reading—St. Matthew xiv. 13—23.

POINTS. 1. A hungry multitude.
2. A compassionate Saviour.
3. An evening prayer.

ILLUSTRATIONS. God's Regard for the Poor. "Mother," said a little boy one day, "I think God always hears when we scrape the bottom of the barrel." His mother was poor. They often used up their last stick of wood and their last bit of bread before they could tell where the next supply was to come from. But they had so often been provided for in unexpected ways, just when they were most in need, that the little boy thought God always heard when they scraped the bottom of the barrel. That was only the little fellow's way of saying what Abraham said when he called the name of the place where God had delivered him Jehovah jireh—"The Lord will provide."

The Poor are Christ's Representatives. A rich youth in Rome had suffered from a dangerous illness. On recovering his health, his heart was filled with gratitude, and he exclaimed, "O Thou all-sufficient Creator! could man recompense Thee, how willingly would I give Thee all my possessions!" Hermas, the herdsman, heard this, and said to the rich youth, "All good gifts come from above; thither thou canst send nothing. Come, follow me." He took him to a hut where there was nothing but misery and wretchedness. The father lay on a bed of sickness, the mother wept; the children were clothed in rags and crying for bread. Hermas said to the rich young man, "See here an altar for the sacrifice; see here the Lord's brethren and representatives." The youth assisted them bountifully, and the poor people called him an angel of God. Hermas smiled and said, "Thus turn always thy grateful countenance, first to heaven and then to earth." "Blessed be the man that provideth for the sick and needy."

A Place for Prayer. "Where do you find a place to pray in?" was asked of a pious sailor on board a whaling ship. "Oh," he said, "I can always find a quiet spot at the masthead." Where there is a heart to pray, it is easy enough to find a place.

MARCH 27TH (PALM SUNDAY).—Christ's Entry into Jerusalem.

Passage for reading—St. Matthew xxi. 1—16.

POINTS. CHRIST'S RECEPTION.
1. Welcomed by the crowds.
2. Praised by the children.
3. Rejected by the Pharisees.

ILLUSTRATIONS. How to Receive Christ. One evening Charles Lamb had met some friends to talk together on literary topics. In the course of conversation it occurred to them to speak on the probable effects on themselves if they could speak mouth to mouth with the great and wonderful dead. "Think," said one, "if Dante were to enter the room, what should we do? How should we meet the man whose mind had contemplated the mysteries of glory in the highest heaven?" "Or suppose," said another, "that Shakespeare were to come." "Ah!" said Lamb, his whole face brightening, "how I should fling my arms up! How we should welcome him, that king of thoughtful men!" "And suppose," said another, "that Christ were to enter?" The whole face and attitude of Lamb were in an instant changed. "Of course," he said in a tone of deep solemnity, "we should all fall upon our knees."

Ministry of Children. At one of Mr. Moody's meetings a little child was seen talking so earnestly to a companion that a lady sat down by her to hear what she was saying, and found that the dear child was telling how much Jesus loved her, and how she loved Him, and asked her little companion if she would not love Him too. The lady was so much impressed by the child's words that she herself spoke to an anxious soul that very night for the first time in her life. And so "a little child shall lead them."

Opposition to Christ. You have heard of the sword-fish. It is a very curious creature, with a long and bony beak, or sword, projecting in front of its head. It is also very fierce, attacking other fishes that come in its way, and trying to pierce them with its sword. The fish has sometimes been known to dart at a ship in full sail with such violence as to pierce the solid timbers. But what has happened? The silly fish has been killed outright by the force of its own blow. The ship sails on just as before, and the angry sword-fish falls a victim to its own rage. But how shall we describe the folly of those who, like the Pharisees, or Saul of Tarsus, oppose the cause of Christ? They cannot succeed. Like the sword-fish, they only work out their own destruction.

APRIL 3RD (EASTER SUNDAY).—Jesus and Mary Magdalene.

Passage for reading—St. John xx. 11—18.

POINTS. 1. A weeping watcher at the tomb.
2. A comforting Friend in the garden.
3. A messenger of joy to the disciples.

ILLUSTRATIONS. The Christian's and the World's Sorrow. In the Pitti Palace at Florence there are two pictures which hang side by side. One represents a stormy sea, with its wild waves and black clouds, and fierce lightnings flashing across the sky. In the waters a human face is seen, wearing an expression of the utmost agony and despair. The other picture also represents a sea, tossed by as fierce a storm, with as dark clouds; but out of the midst of the waves a rock rises, against which the waters dash in vain. In a cleft of the rock are some tufts of grass and green herbage, with sweet flowers, and amidst these a dove is seen sitting on her nest, quiet and undisturbed by the wild fury of the storm. The first picture fitly represents the sorrow of the world when all is hopeless and despairing; and the other the sorrow of the Christian, no less severe, but in which he is kept in perfect peace, because he nestles in the bosom of God's unchanging love.

A Comforting Friend. Away in India a poor native woman—like Naomi—was bereft of her two sons. She would take no comfort. To everything that could be said she had one answer: "I had but two, and they are both gone." Day after day she pined and fretted, going listlessly about, her life "empty" of all but a blank despair. One morning, as she wandered here and there among the people of the mission, one of them again remonstrated; but the poor creature gave her old reply: "I had but two, and they are both gone." "Look," said the worker, turning and pointing to a group, where a white lady of the mission stood talking to some dusky natives. "Do you see her?" The woman looked, and saw a sweet, pale face; patient, gentle, glad, as clear as a sky washed blue with storms, but wearing that unmistakable look which tells that storms have been. "Yes," she said, "I see her." "Well," said the other, "she also has lost her sons!" The poor native mother gazed for a minute spellbound. Then she sprang towards her. "Oh, lady!" she cried, "did you have two sons, and are they both gone?" And now the white mother, on her part, turned and looked. "Yes," she said, clasping the hands of her poor sister in sorrow, "but Jesus took them, and they are with Jesus, and Jesus is with me and comforts me. And by-and-by I shall have them again." From that hour the native woman sat at her white sister's feet, followed her about, hung on her words, and from her would take comfort—the comfort wherewith she herself was comforted of God.

A Joyful Heart. It is a bad fireplace where all the heat goes up its own chimney. True religion spreads joy all around. Yet the fire warms first the chimney in which it burns, and grace comforts the heart in which it dwells. Faith is the key of happiness. It delights to communicate the same to others. As the hymn says:

> "Then will I tell to sinners round
> What a dear Saviour I have found."

Joyful Christians set others longing for the pleasures of true religion. If saints were happier, sinners would be far more ready to believe.

APRIL 10TH.—St. Peter Confesses the Christ.

Passage for reading—St. Mark viii. 27—38.

POINTS 1. Christ acknowledged by St. Peter.
2. Christ foretells His sufferings
3. Christ's requirements of His followers.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Confessing Christ. A great many years ago a Roman emperor said to a Greek architect, "Build me a Coliseum, and when it is done I will crown you, and I will make your name famous through all the world, if you will only build me a grand Coliseum." The work was done. The emperor then said, "Now we will crown that architect. We will have a grand celebration." The Coliseum was crowded with a great multitude. The emperor was there, and the Greek architect who was to be crowned for putting up the building. And then they brought out some Christians, who were ready to die for the truth, and from the doors underneath were let out the hungry lions. The emperor arose amid the shouts of the people, and said, "The Coliseum is built, and we have come to celebrate its opening to-day by putting to death Christians at the mouth of these lions, and also to honour the architect who has constructed this wonderful building. The time has come for me to honour him, and we further celebrate his triumph by the slaying of these Christians." Whereupon the Greek architect sprang to his feet and shouted, "I also am a Christian!" And they flung him to the wild beasts, and his body, bleeding, torn, and dead, was tumbled into the dust of the amphitheatre. Could you have done that for Christ? (Talmage.)

Fellowship of Suffering. A suffering Christian lady on a bed of sickness shrank for a while from the prospect of prolonged anguish which opened before her. One night in a dream there appeared to her a small crown twined here and there with thorns, and by the side of this emblem of the Saviour's deep love there lay another crown composed entirely of thorns—large, murderous spines, such as doubtless composed the mocking wreath that bound the brow of the Son of God. She seemed to hear One say, pointing to the large heavy crown, "I bore this for thee; wear thou thine for Me." She meekly bent her head, and wore the wreath, and now she has laid it by for the "crown of glory which fadeth not away."

Suffering for Christ. A noble Scotch martyr said with his dying lips, "I am dying—oh, so happy! And if I had a thousand lives I would willingly lay them all down, one after another, for Christ. Oh, He is near me! I seem to see Him! I am coming, Lord Jesus." And he added, "Tell my parents not to weep, but to continue steadfast in the faith, and not to fear a suffering lot for Christ."

IN TOUCH WITH THE CHILDREN OF BETHANY.

By May Crommelin.

"Suffer the little children to come unto Me."

WE had just reached the village of Bethany, and begun the toilsome ascent of its hill, when they, the little children, espied us. As yet we did not notice them much, being occupied in looking to either side of the rough lane. Here one of our party of three exclaimed, in admiration of an ancient dark archway leading to half-ruined buildings, "What a pretty sketch it would make!"; another was musing near picturesque crumbling steps of weather-worn limestone.

Meantime, children's shrill cries and the patter of many light, bare feet came nearer and nearer, till they were close about us. From the grey flat-roofed dwellings that cling to Bethany's hill like nests, above the new wide road cut midway betwixt height and valley, voice answered voice in childish treble. Small, bare-legged forms clad in pink and crimson, or blue and white, or that exquisite blending of saffron under-garment and upper jacket, or robe of pale turquoise (which initiated folk smilingly say is merely the result of long washing of the common deep blue cotton garb) came stumbling or springing over the rocky ground according to their more or less tender years.

Down from the upper world, where the house of Simon the Leper stands out in sharp, rock-like ruin against the cloudless evening sky, they trooped, frisking like "kidlings blithe and merry." More slowly uphill small sisters of from five to seven years climbed with babies in their arms—babes of a few months, or infants so big and heavy that the nurse is but little bigger herself. These fellaheen (peasant) maidens know, alas! so little childhood. They are taught to work—to nurse, to wash, to bake, to go for water, or bear burdens, all before they are, say, eight years old. But wise though they must needs be, how happy and childish were the bright glances bent upon us! When we stopped to try some snapshots and to take breath, how gleefully, yet shyly, they watched the kodaks! A few took flight from the wicked instruments; others allowed themselves to be much coaxed into posing in the foreground.

Were these little children like in features and complexion to those whom our Lord took in His arms and blessed, one wonders? Why not? True, these are Arab children, descendants of Ishmael, for the most part. True, also, that the nigh a hundred years of occupation by the Crusaders in the Holy Land—a fact which we seldom now realise—has left some traces in the people more enduring than their many ruined castles. In some places especially one can discern a Northern type, or Frankish—a stirring nature unlike the calm of the home-abiding Eastern. Nevertheless, be sure some—perhaps a large number—of the Jewish peasantry must have lingered on as a bed-rock of population in spite of Saracen warriors and Knights of the Cross. And the Eastern make of these wee, scanty garments, their brilliant native dyes would be always the same in Palestine. Even north in Damascus, south in Cairo, are they not much alike?

XUM

(Photo : Bonfils.)

BETHANY.

The nurslings wore not much more than a shift and an amulet tied to a plaited lock of hair. Often this charm was a tiny blue-glass hand made in Hebron, a sovereign aid against the evil eye. But the older girls, if well off, were adorned with half a dozen silver coins strung on the forehead, and bead charms round the neck. Poorer ones had only a red and yellow kerchief tied prettily over their tangled mops—often of fair hair. But a small maid with glossy black curls, might have been Irish, so glorious were her eyes therewith, blue as the wild borage blossom growing over the waste land nigh. Alas! that several of these pretty faces looked up at us wistfully, hardly able to raise their eyelids. Ophthalmia is still a curse in this land of scorching sun and limestone dust in summer time. That it was so in our Lord's lifetime here, witness the many blind He healed. Yes, little children like these He must have laid His hands on—graceful with the agility which comes to those whose many generations of ancestors lived an almost open-air life under a glowing sun, breathing the pure air of this hill country of Judæa. Much like these except——Ah, we expected so much!

"Bakshish!" cried a piping chorus; for now the kodaks were folded, and not only the models, but all their fellows were stretching out hands for money. How greedily they clamoured, pressing up, plucking our skirts, grasping at big "kabbaks" (about half a farthing), darting bird-like on smaller "metalliks" (hardly a halfpenny), passing the spoil on to the father, the mother in the background. Ah, theirs was the blame; and yet they begged no worse than Neapolitans, and these poor country-folk groan under the taxes of Turkish officials.

Still, we Westerns felt as if a fair illusion had vanished, and went on to see the sights of Bethany somewhat grieved. We were wrong.

Awhile later, at the hill foot, we found some listless groups of children again. One of our party—an Arab gentleman—who understood his small compatriots, began to chant to them in Arabic, clapping his hands. In a twinkling he was surrounded by some thirty, singing and clapping in chorus, following like a flock of lambs. As he led them laughing along the road towards our carriage in the distance, he seemed the Pied Piper of Hamelin.

The Bethany village shop is a small, flat-roofed house boasting one door and window of small dimensions. Within, three fierce-looking men lay or sat cross-legged on a counter. Their black eyes, flashing like their white teeth, glowered on the foreign woman from under their turbans. But when she (aided by her Arab companion) bought sweets piled high on a brass tray, to give the children, smiles wreathed their dark-complexioned faces. Eagerly the three big men came out to aid with grave courtesy. The English ladies said all must be orderly—"No scrambling!" The little ones must not be pushed by yonder nine-year-old lad, in the green and white striped "kumbaz," round which he was girding his sash tighter in anticipation of using the said kind of long shirt as a wallet. A radiant boy he was; but a giant among the rest.

With a gentleness that their savage looks belied, the Arab villagers guided up the long line of little folk, one by one; helped each pair of tiny henna-stained palms to make as deep a hollow as could be. But what miracle has transformed the lately chattering children that quarrelled like sparrows over their bakshish? Utterly silent, they raise eyes big with wonder, almost awe, to the pile of rose, white, and lemon delights. Sweet lips quiver, baby hands tremble. It is well-nigh too great joy. Not one murmured that he or she got a comfit less than another. The smallest boys mutely opened their shirts, hoping to store more there than in their fists. The little nursemaids trustfully squatted on the dusty road, with the babies beside them, and spread their tiny skirts to hold the generous largesse. Only a sound of crunching, gurgles of glee, sighs of utter ravishment.

A miracle indeed! But what has wrought it? Just love. Then as the two foreign women drove away with the "Piper," voices broke out. Shrill thanks, outcries and hand-clapping, a babble of joyous prattle. And we, regretfully looking back, thought of One Who took such little ones in His arms and blessed them.

THE COLBY GLEN, ISLE OF MAN.

PARLIAMENT PILL.

A Story for the Little Ones by the Author of "Colonel Kit."

"COME on, Mouse, I'll show you something."

"Yes, what is it, Pill? Where are we going?"

She was a little ragged girl in a frock that was much too large for her; she had a sharp, frightened face and quick, suspicious movements, not unlike the creature after which she was called. The boy was sturdy-looking, with square chin and determined face; rents in his knickerbockers showed his bare legs, and the sleeves of his coat were nearly torn off.

The wind was chill and fresh; a great many people were about, many of them well-dressed and wearing a holiday air. All seemed to be pouring over Westminster Bridge from the south.

"Ain't there a lot of toffs?" said Mouse, pressing close to Phil. "What are we going to see?"

"I'm going to show you the King making a Parliament," Pill answered.

Mouse looked awed. "I ain't never seen him," she said; "how does he do it?"

"He'll come riding in a gold kerridge, and he goes in that big house there, and makes laws, and if people don't keep them he cuts their heads off."

"Oh!" said Mouse.

"He used to stick the heads up all round the Parliament," said Pill, with a vague recollection of something he had heard at school. He and Mouse were very irregular in their attendance there, but, being unpromising, undesirable pupils, were not much sought after.

Mouse crept closer to him; they were in the midst of a crowd now, and she, being such a long way down, could see nothing much but backs of people.

There was an eager movement in the crowd, and a murmur of "They're coming!"

Pill had elbowed their way nearly to the front rank, but still there were backs between them and the desired sight.

"I can't see nuffin," wailed Mouse in a miserable voice.

"Here, get on me," Pill said, and by the use of other people Mouse managed to climb on his shoulder, and so caught a glimpse of the "gold carriage" as it passed.

"You didn't see nuffin yourself," she said to Pill as the crowd moved and she saw his hot face; "it was a beautiful Parliament."

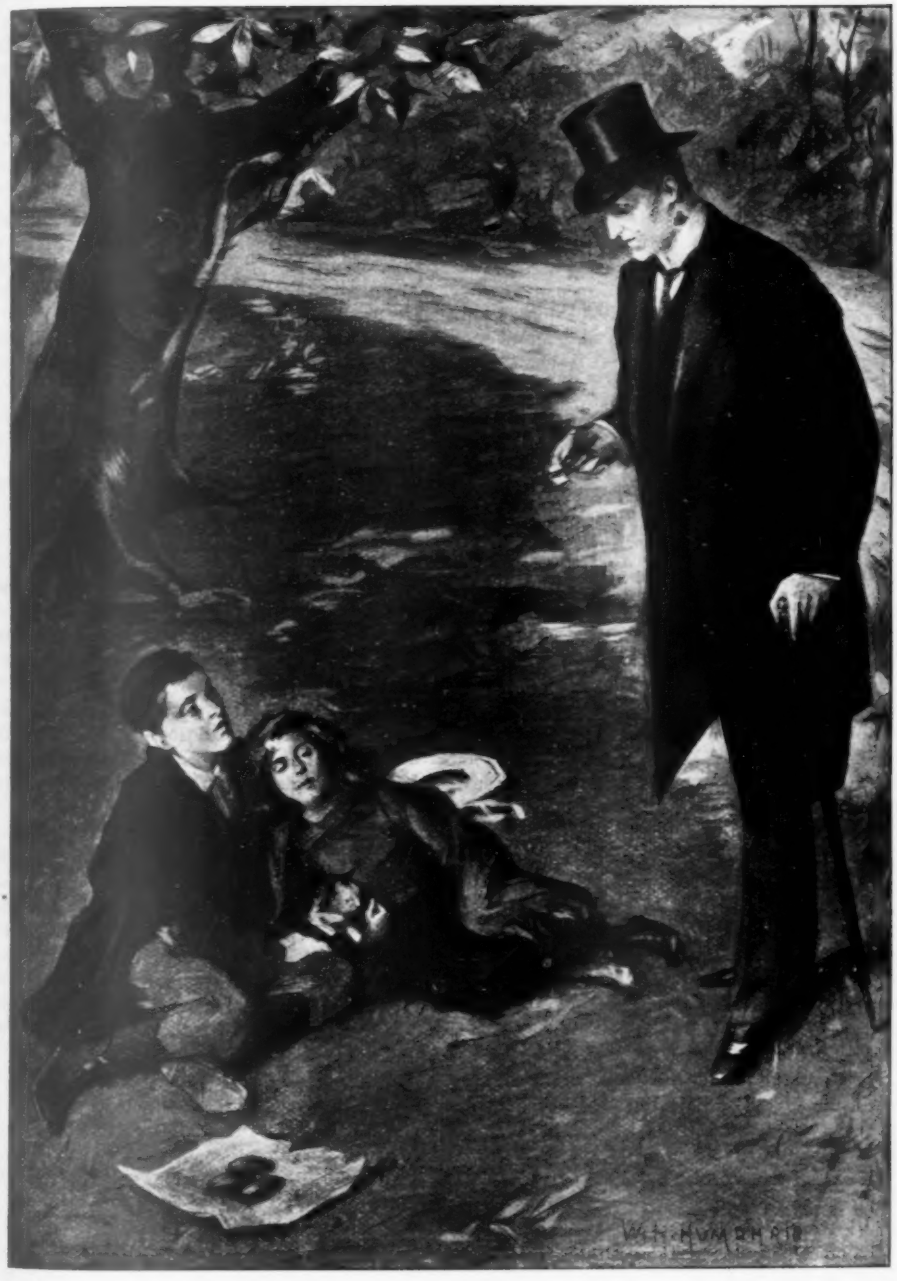
"I'll be one once," Phil said, "I'll make people do fings, and chop off their heads if they don't, and you shall ride in my gold kerridge, Mousie."

"Fank you," she said fervently.

A gentleman near by smiled broadly at the talk, then as he passed on slipped sixpence into Phil's hand.

What a feast the children had as they wandered about the streets looking at smartly dressed people and gay carriages! It did not matter when they got home; Pill's people would not mind when he got in; and Mouse, who lived with an aunt and cousins, could do much as she liked. With the careless kindness of the poor, they had taken her when her parents died, letting her sleep somewhere in their two rooms, and giving her a share of their food. For the rest, she must look after herself, and she would have fared rather badly if Pill had not constituted himself her protector. Pill was respected in the court: he had ready fists, yet was always willing to do a good turn to those who were civil to him.

After the day Parliament opened Pill talked so much about what he would do when he was a Parliament that they nicknamed him "Parliament Pill."



"What's the matter, Mousie?" Pill asked one day, coming upon the little girl, who was looking very miserable.

"I've hurted my hand," she said, showing a swollen hand that was a good deal inflamed; "I cut it with a piece of glass."

Pill found a bit of not too clean rag, which he dipped in water, and then applied to the hand. His rough surgery comforted Mouse, but the hand grew worse, as was not much to be wondered at.

The little girl grew white and thin, her eyes heavy with pain, and Pill became quite anxious about her. No one took much interest in the two, and the boy's heart grew hot within as he tried fiercely to think that Mouse was getting better.

Then came fine spring days, and Pill took "'My boy, is the little girl ill?'"—p. 538.

Mouse for walks in the sunshine, doctoring the hand after his poor methods. He earned a few coppers whenever he could, and bought dainties to tempt her appetite, but more often than not she turned away from them.

"When I'm a Parliament," he would tell her, "nobody shan't have bad hands."

"I wish you was one now," said poor Mouse, who believed in him with all her heart.

"When rich folks get ill," Pill said gloomily, "their doctor says 'Go away and live in the country, and don't do nothing at all but eat and get fat,' and then they eats chicking and crabs and ices, and rides in kerridges and comes home with such red cheeks nobody don't know them."

"I'd like to see the country," Mouse said.

"You've got to," Pill said desperately, a great fear tugging at his heart as he saw her white face and dragging limbs.

Mouse must see the country somehow, and she could not walk there, even if they went by easy stages. Trains were out of the question, but trams went a long way, right into the real country, Pill had been told, but had not felt particularly interested.

For the next few days Pill, who was not generally too anxious for work, was eager to get any jobs he could, and on Saturday night a costermonger of his acquaintance hired him to help at his stall. If it was fine, they would go for their excursion on Monday, and Pill, finding his mother in a particularly good temper, begged from her a red woollen shawl that would wrap nicely round Mouse's shoulders.

Pill would not tell her till he saw what sort of a morning it was, and he was awake quite early on Monday to see what sort of weather it was.

Through the grimy window the sun was shining brightly; Pill's parents slept heavily, and took no notice of him as he crept from the room laden with the shawl and a mysterious newspaper package.

Mouse would be sure to hear him, and she came to the door of the back room directly he drummed on it. He told her in a whisper that she was going out with him, and he would wait for her in the street.

Her tired face brightened, and in a very few minutes she came out to him, carrying a miserable kitten.

"You can't never take that," Phil said, ready to take it from her arms.

She burst into tears. "Oh, I must—the boys were hurting of it so, I couldn't leave it."

"All right," he agreed, rather unwillingly.

Mouse had never been on a tramcar before, and of course they were to ride outside. The conductor was very kind to them, even finding something to put across Mouse's knees when he saw she felt the cold. But she was very quiet, leaning against Phil, and taking little notice of his talk. The bad hand, which was now very bad indeed, was hidden under the shawl.

At last they came into what was to them very real country, but Pill was disappointed that Mouse did not look more pleased; she only smiled faintly, and leaned harder against him.

They went as far as the tram lines, and then Mouse was unwilling to get down, and the kind conductor lifted her down the last steps and carried her across the road. "If I was you," he said to Pill, "I'd take the little 'un home, and put her to bed."

"The country 'll be sure to do her good," Pill said, less hopefully.

The conductor watched them as they went away together slowly, but he had to go back to his duties, and, being such a fine day, he was soon busy enough.

Many well-dressed people passed the forlorn little girl with the kitten, but no one spoke to them.

"Here's the real country," Pill said at last, proudly leading Mouse down a quiet lane that was bordered by tall trees. There was a sweet-smelling hedge at each side, and some pleasant grass patches.

"Couldn't we sit down?" Mouse pleaded, and Pill took her to the grass in the shade, hoping to tempt her to eat some of the cakes he had brought. But she could not touch them, and presently seemed to fall asleep, leaning against him and still holding the kitten.

Pill would not move, and sat there holding her till arm and back ached almost intolerably. Few people came down the lane, and those who did only looked rather amused to see the children sitting there with the kitten, and the stale buns spread out on the newspaper.

"My boy, is the little girl ill?" Pill had not noticed footsteps, and now looked up, to see a kindly-faced elderly gentleman standing above them.

"Yes," said Pill.

"What is the matter with her?"

"Her hand hurts her, and she wanted to go into the country, but it ain't doing her no good," Pill said with fierce misery. "When I'm a Parliament I'll send all the little gals into the country for holidays."

"Let me see her hand." The gentleman took the hand so gently that he did not rouse Mouse, but he drew in his breath sharply as he looked at the poor hand.

"My boy," he said at last gravely, "I must take the little girl to the hospital at once—no, she will die if it is not now, and afterwards I will go home with you."

In a short time Pill found himself in a grand carriage with Mouse, the gentleman (who was a great doctor), and the kitten, but he could not feel any satisfaction as he saw how anxious the doctor was about the little girl. Pill himself was so tired and worn that everything seemed like a dream, the arriving at the hospital and seeing Mouse taken away. But he could trust the doctor, and presently fell asleep on a beach, only rousing as the nurse brought him some food. Then it seemed quite a short time before his doctor friend stood over him and said, "The little girl is in bed, and you cannot see her to-night, but you may stay in this room if you like—I have been to where you live"—he could not bring himself to say home, and he felt afraid Pill himself might fall ill. Besides, they wanted to have him near in case Mouse got worse in the night.

Pill slept well, and woke in the morning, to find the nurse beside him suggesting a good wash and then breakfast.

"Ain't I going to see Mouse?" he asked.

"Just for a few minutes," the nurse told him.

"Where's her cat?" he asked angrily. "You ain't killed it, have you?"

"No, indeed," the nurse said, pleasantly. "Well, suppose you come and see the little girl before you have your breakfast."

Pill went, treading as softly as he could, into the quiet ward; it was a small one, and in a bed Mouse lay with closed eyes, and, cuddling close to her, the kitten.

"She wanted it so," the nurse explained, and just then Mouse opened her eyes and looked at him. Her thin little face lighted all over, but she did not speak.

"There," said nurse, "you shall come and see her again, but she must rest now."

Pill's friend of yesterday came as he was eating his breakfast—Sir James, the nurse called him—and treated him with great respect.

"Does he know?" Sir James asked the nurse.

"No," she answered, "I hoped you would tell him."

Pill looked rather scared, and the doctor drew him to him. "My boy," he said kindly, "your poor little friend was so ill yesterday that to save her life we had to take off her hand at once. Now, please God, she will get quite well in time. I went to your house yesterday, and settled that you are to stay here for a bit and be near the little Mouse; would you like that?"

"Aye," said Pill, "and I could run your errands, and clean your boots."

"We'll make you useful, never fear. I hear the kitten has begun to earn its own living, and has caught a mouse this morning, so we shall have to keep it too, I suppose." The doctor's eyes twinkled.

Somehow, while Mouse was so ill Pill became a settlement in the hospital. He was provided with new clothes, and ran errands, and became a great favourite. It was all very irregular, of course, but Sir James usually got his own way in that hospital.

Mouse did not get well quickly, and the kitten had grown into a great dignified cat by the time the little girl got about again, and she was not at all anxious to go away.

"I say," Pill said to her one day, "our doctor's going to send you into the real country, and I'm going to school, and then you're coming back to live with the gentleman who keeps the gate. I live with him now, and I'm going to be taught a trade."

"I thought you was going to be a Parliament," Mouse said rather wistfully.

"So I am; our doctor says going to school and knowing a trade 'll learn me to be a right sort of Parliament."

"You'll have to give him something nice when you are," said Mouse.

"There ain't anything good enough for him," said Pill with sober conviction.

TEMPERANCE NOTES AND NEWS.

By a Leading Temperance Advocate.

A TYPICAL WORKER.

MR. EDWARD BORELAND, of Liverpool, is an excellent example of the all-round type of Temperance worker. He is one of the most popular representatives of the United Kingdom Alliance, and is held in such high esteem by his colleagues in the movement that a few years ago he was elected President of the Official Advocates Temperance Association, his term of office being admittedly a great success, and his presidential address one of the finest on record. Mr. Boreland was born in the North of Ireland on June 14th, 1847, and has been a pledged abstainer upwards of thirty years. His official work for Temperance began with the Good Templars. Later on he was for twelve years a missionary for the Liverpool Young Men's Temperance Society, an association which has accomplished much good in the great seaport. He resigned this office to undertake a district superintendentship of the United Kingdom Alliance, a position which he still holds, and in which he has been privileged to win over many recruits in the most influential circles. Mr. Boreland is an accomplished speaker, and his native wit has been a valuable asset when addressing large audiences. His organising powers have enabled him to arrange and carry forward many large demonstrations, while his untiring energies seem to be ever on the alert for new opportunities of advancing the cause of which he is so strenuous an advocate.

(Photo: J. Thomson, Liverpool.)

MR. EDWARD BORELAND.

MUNICIPALITIES AND MORALS.

Mr. Alfred T. Davies, a Liverpool solicitor, has for some time been earnestly engaged in directing the attention of the public to the importance of insisting upon a watchful outlook on the doings of municipal bodies with regard to the licensed houses under their authority. He is a native of Liverpool, and was educated at the University College of Wales at Aberystwyth. With the late Canon Major Lester he was one of the founders of the Liverpool Self-Help Emigration Society. Mr. Davies' labours as a Temperance worker have made his name familiar all over the country, particularly in connection with the reduction of licensed houses. He is the legal adviser of the Liverpool Vigilance Committee, the most successful organisation of its kind in the country. It may be mentioned that the reduction of licences in Liverpool, from 1890 to 1903 inclusive, amounts to no less than 422. The old stigma of Liverpool being "the black spot on the Mersey" is thus being slowly but surely wiped out. Mr. Davies has written most ably on the "Licensing Problem and Magisterial Discretion," five editions of his little book being called for in the first year of publication, and no fewer than 27,000 copies having been put into circulation. He was the first unofficial witness invited to give evidence before the Royal Commission on the Licensing Laws, and his examination occupied a whole day, and extended to over five hundred questions and answers. He holds strongly that England's great need is "Christian citizens, who realise as fully their duty to their neighbour as they profess to realise their duty to God." With this opinion in the forefront, he appeals to his fellow-countrymen :—"Send, therefore, to your Town Councils men of character, men who love their city, men who cannot be swayed by private interest, by social bonds, or by the glamour of wealth. Let no man win your suffrage who will not use his influence to secure that the police shall do the duty for which they are employed, without fear or favour, and that provisions of law now lying idle shall be put in force for promoting sobriety, decency, and peace. Educate your magistrates, energise your police, exert yourselves, and even Brewster Sessions shall witness the vindication of the people's rights."

(Photo: Hartley Brothers, Liverpool.)

MR. ALFRED T. DAVIES.

A HINT AS TO SALES OF WORK.

One is glad to find that a diocesan branch of the Church of England Temperance Society has been bold enough to pass a resolution calling upon the promoters of bazaars for religious purposes to keep clear of the liquor business. Without attempting to "cram total abstinence down everybody's throat," it is certainly open to Temperance workers to earnestly remind their fellow-Christians that "where there's drink there's danger." Many persons object to bazaars entirely; others look upon them as necessary evils; and others again think they may be made more tolerable by being pruned of raffling and the presence of intoxicating liquor.

"THE BLACK LIST."

The Alliance News' "Black List" for the last Christmas season is a truly appalling record of the operations of the liquor traffic, and should do much to arouse the national conscience to a sense of the importance of aggressive Temperance work. Murders, outrages, fights, inhuman offences against little children, crimes euphemistically termed by the papers "accidents," all combine to make a ghastly catalogue. The pity of it is that all parts of the country seem to tell the same sad tale. Well might Mr. T. Marchant Williams, stipendiary at Mountain Ash, in commenting upon a case before him, remark, "One would think you were celebrating the birth of the devil rather than the birth of Christ. The day is spent in feasting, drinking, and fighting. It is supposed to be a Christian festival, but it appears to be rather kept as a pagan festival." The prayer of the martyr, "O Lord, open the eyes of the King of England," may now well be paraphrased, "O Lord, open the eyes of the people of England, that they may see what evil intemperance is working in their midst." The widespread circulation of the Alliance News' "Black List" cannot fail to prove of great service in educating public opinion.

THE COMING BANK HOLIDAY.

The first Bank Holiday of the year is rapidly approaching. Shall it be a holiday or a folly day? Very much depends upon whether Temperance people will take the trouble to try and arrange for some counter-attractions to the public-house on that day. In working-class neighbourhoods every Temperance society should hold a Bank Holiday tea party, to be followed by a Bank Holiday entertainment. Many men and women can be helped over the holiday by a little effort of this kind.

AN EXAMPLE FOR BAND OF HOPE WORKERS.

The Rev. A. G. Girdlestone, M.A., Vicar of All Saints', Clapham Park, takes a deep personal interest in the Band of Hope which flourishes in his parish. In order that the members may learn to appreciate the Scriptural basis on which the Temperance movement is founded, Mr. Girdlestone has this year instituted a [illegible]n of Bible-searching questions. The Vicar will as a rule give a lesson to the Band of Hope once a month, on the month's texts, and prizes will be awarded for the best answers. Four subjects are to be mastered, connected with the object of a Band of Hope.

ANOTHER ABSTAINING BISHOP.

The Right Rev. H. H. Pereira, the new Bishop of Croydon, is a total abstainer, and has been prominently identified with the work of the Church of England Temperance Society for many years past. In the early days of his ministry at Southampton he became keenly interested in the movement, and from that time he has spared no pains to serve the cause which he has so much at heart. In his new position he will have even greater opportunities of carrying the principle of total abstinence into circles unreached by the ordinary Temperance methods.

Short Arrows

WORD AND WORK IN THE MASTER'S NAME.

"The Quiver" Order of Honourable Service.

THE first name to be added to the roll of Distinguished Members of the Order this year is that of Priscilla Lacy, who, on January 16th, completed fifty years' service as nurse in one family in Onslow Square. The medal of the Order was sent in time to be worn by the faithful old servant at a family gathering in her honour, and, in a letter of thanks to the Editor, she wrote: "I am very proud of it, as so few can get it." We need scarcely remind our readers that the only class of the Order now open is that for Distinguished Members, open only to those domestic servants who have completed at least fifty years' service in the same family.

A Portrait of Knox.

WE are indebted to Mr. W. Stirling Somers, of Hampstead, for an interesting note. Referring to the paper on "Painters and Preachers," which we published in the January number of THE QUIVER, he says:—"The writer observes, 'There being no original portrait of John Knox in existence, Wilkie had to invent a presentment of the Reformer, a model being found in Edward Irving.' Yet, singularly enough, he seems to be aware that Calder House is claimed as being the place where the Sacrament was first administered after the Reformation. Considerable controversy has raged round this point, but I mention it because I have in my possession a proof engraving of a portrait which hung in Calder House in my boyhood, and on the back of which was written, 'Mr. John Knox. The first sacrament of the super (sic) given in Scotland after the Reformation was dispensed by him in this hall.' I may add I was well acquainted with the owner, the late Lord Torphichen; also with the engraver of the portrait, published in 1828. The likeness is a pleasing one, and resembles the minute description given in the famous Latin letter written by Peter Young to Beza, 13th November, 1579." This portrait Mr. Stirling Somers was good enough to lend to us, and we reproduce it with this note

(After an Original Painting.)

JOHN KNOX.

Liberty, not Licence.

BEFORE the abolition of slavery in America a man bought a slave, in whom he took an interest, in order to give him his liberty. He told him that he was free, and could do what he liked, and go where he liked. At first the man could not realise what had been done for him. When he did so, he fell down at the feet of his benefactor and said: "I am free to be your slave." This is the sense in which it is true that in knowledge of Christ is perfect freedom. We are not free to do what we like, but what we ought. Jesus Christ has freed us from the law of sin and death that we should serve Him without fear.

All and Always.

"ALL at it, and always at it," was, according to John Wesley, the rule for a successful church. It is certainly the rule for successful Christian work. There should be union, all at it, and continuance, always at it. Disunion and overlapping waste Christian work, and too many take it up in an intermittent way only when they have nothing else to do.

Egyptian Hermits.

The following is told in a book about the Egyptian hermits. One of them, when he saw a brother steal his food, said: "I am sure that brother was in great need." Another, whose name was Arsenius, when asked why he, being learned, inquired of a peasant, replied that, though he knew Latin and Greek, he had not yet learned the alphabet of what the peasant knew.

Some New Books.

In handy parts, and at a moderate price, Messrs. Cassell are issuing a new "Cabinet Cyclopædia," which should commend itself to the reader whose purse and whose shelf space are limited, for the work gives promise of being at once concise and comprehensive.—From Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton we have received "The Religious Life of London," a volume of absorbing interest to all who have at heart the evangelisation of the Metropolis. It is edited by Mr. Richard Mudie-Smith, the superintendent of the most recent newspaper religious census, and author of an article on "The Lapsed Masses" in The Quiver. Statistical tables and diagrams in abundance have been provided at the cost of immense labour; but this will not have been undertaken in vain if its result is to awaken and quicken interest in the spiritual needs of the heart of the Empire.—Messrs. Passmore and Alabaster send us the forty-ninth yearly volume of C. H. Spurgeon's Sermons, and they have already entered upon the fiftieth consecutive year's issue. The great preacher for many years preached three times each week, and the publishers still have shorthand notes of some hundreds of unpublished sermons.—Messrs. Morgan and Scott send us a volume entitled "Pastor Hsi," of North China, by Mrs. Howard Taylor, who gives her work the very apt subtitle, "One of China's Christians." This biography is interesting not only as the record of a consecrated life, but as pointing the direction in which missionary work must move for the evangelisation of the Celestial Empire. Our old contributor, the Rev. Frederick Hastings, is responsible for "The Spins of the Cycling Parson" (Walter Scott Co.), in which he has gathered a number of his cycling experiences at home and abroad, chattily told and cleverly illustrated, in many cases from his own drawings.—We have also to acknowledge "The Pictured Rocks of Lake Superior, and Other Poems," by Emily M. Hills; "Christ's Relation to His People" (C. H. Spurgeon), and "Smooth Stones Taken from Ancient Brooks," by C. H. Spurgeon (Passmore and Alabaster); "The Story of Our Lord's Life," by Mrs. Montgomery (Longmans); "Sunshine and Shadow in the South-West," by E. A. Rusher (H. R. Allenson); "Songs of Summer," by C. W. Wynne (Grant Richards).

Just Weights.

The Dutch stand high in the scale of commercial morality. Though they inhabit a small country, they do an enormous trade. In the north of Holland there is a noted business town called Alkmaar, which is an important centre for dairy produce. In the market-place stands the weigh-house, containing several huge beam scales upon which round red or yellow cheeses resembling cannon-balls are weighed. The weigh-house is a picturesque old building, surmounted by a tower, which contains a fine set of chimes. The façade is ornamented with a statue of Justice, and below it these words, in large letters, occupy the breadth of the building: "Integrity has righted the false balance." Those who caused this reminder to be written up, plain for all folk to see, were men of sterling honesty, who held firmly the belief that the best business is founded upon scrupulous honesty and fair dealing between buyer and seller. Upon those sound principles Alkmaar has built up her successful trade.

THE WEIGH-HOUSE, ALKMAAR.

Zeal without Knowledge.

Long before the Revised Version of the Bible was thought of there were individuals who attempted to put the Scriptures into what seemed to them better English. One of these was an American named Hezekiah Woodruff. In 1852 he published his "improved" Bible.

We give two of the amendments as specimens. Where the Authorised Version says, "Except your righteousness exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees," Woodruff substitutes, "Unless your correctness should exceed the correctness of the clergy." Where Judas came to our Lord and said, "Hail, Master!" Woodruff, to be more up-to-date and elegant, has "Preceptor, your most obedient!"

"Thou God Seest."

DR. MORRISON, the Times correspondent at Peking, tells us that at one place where he stayed a Mahomedan milk-seller watered his milk. When accused of doing so, he used piously to say, even when met coming from the well, "I could not put a drop of water in the milk, for there is a God up there," and he would jerk his finger towards the sky, "Who would see me if I did." Alas! the same sort of thing is not unknown even amongst Christians.

"THE QUIVER" FUNDS.

THE following is a list of contributions received from December 30th, 1903, up to and including January 29th, 1904. Subscriptions received after this date will be acknowledged next month:—

For "The Quiver" Waifs' Fund: L. R. (Newcastle), 5s.; "Sed Nomine," 5s.; "An Old Reader of THE QUIVER" (Wimbledon Common), 5s.

For Dr. Barnardo's Homes: "Bradford," £2, 10s., 2s.; "Streatham Common," 5s.; E. T. (Bramley), 5s.; "An Interested One," 5s.; G. A., 1s. 6d. The following amounts have been sent direct:—H., £10; "Reta," £5; "Otto," £1; A. S., £1; M. E. B., 15s.; M. A. J. C., 10s. 6d.; "Thurlston," 10s.; Mrs. R., 4s.

For The Ragged School Union ("Robin" Dinners): "A Widow's Mite" (Brixton), 2s. 6d.

For The Orphan Working School: "Streatham Common," 5s.

For The British and Foreign Bible Society: "A Well-Wisher," 3s.

For The Mission to Lepers in India and the East: "Two Readers of THE QUIVER" (Jersey), 5s.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

BASED ON THE INTERNATIONAL SERIES OF LESSONS.

QUESTIONS.

49. To what place did our Lord retire with His disciples after the death of John the Baptist?

50. What great miracle was performed in this desert place?

51. How did Jesus spend the evening after this miracle?

52. What remarkable event took place in the early morning following the feeding of the five thousand?

53. What is the meaning of the word "Bethphage, and in what way did Jesus manifest there His divine power?

54. In what way did the people, on His journey to Jerusalem, acknowledge Jesus as the Messiah and their King?

55. What act of mercy did Jesus perform after He had cleansed the Temple?

56. By what name did Jesus say the Temple, as God's house, should be known?

57. Why should we suppose that the body of Jesus was laid in the tomb of Joseph of Arimathæa only as a temporary resting-place?

58. What comforting message did Jesus send to His apostles by Mary Magdalene?

59. Quote the words used by St. Peter testifying to his faith in Jesus.

60. In what way are Christians required to testify their faith in Jesus?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 448.

37. Because the disciples took some corn and ate it, rubbing it in their hands, as they passed through a cornfield. (St. Matt. xii. 1, 2; Deut. xxiii. 25.)

38. First, the extreme poverty of Jesus and His disciples; and, secondly, that the preparation of food is not a breach of the Sabbath. (St. Matt. xii. 3, 4.)

39. By healing the man with a withered hand on the Sabbath day. (St. Matt. xii. 10–13.)

40. That the heart be sincere. (St. Matt. vii. 22, 23.)

41. Jesus likens the doers of good works to a house built on a rock, which cannot be destroyed. (St. Matt. vii. 24, 25.)

42. The sudden storms which arise, the terrible effects of which have been noted by all travellers in Palestine. (St. Mark iv. 37.)

43. When a great storm arose on the Sea of Galilee, and Jesus was asleep, the disciples awoke Him, saying, "Carest Thou not that we perish?" (St. Mark iv. 38.)

44. Jesus rebuked the winds and the sea, and there was immediately a great calm. (St. Mark iv. 39.)

45. The country of the Gergesenes is a district on the eastern side of the Sea of Galilee, over against Tiberias, of which Gadara was the chief town. (St. Mark v. 1.)

46. By the order of Herod Antipas, son of Herod the Great, whom Tiberius, the Emperor of Rome, banished to Spain, where he died. (St. Matt. xiv. 3, 10; Josephus, "Ant.," b. xv. c. 14.)

47. Yes; for Herod was at first afraid to kill him because of the multitude, and the chief priests and elders were afraid to deny the divine commission of St. John because they feared the people. (St. Matt. xiv. 5 and xxi 26.)

48. Herod believed St. John to be a just and holy man, and when he heard of Jesus he believed that St. John had risen from the dead, and thus was able to perform miracles. (St. Mark vi. 14, 16, 20; St. Luke ix. 19.)

XUM

UNIV. OF MICH.

"IT IS THE LORD!"

JOHN XXI 7.

(Painted by W. H. Margetson)

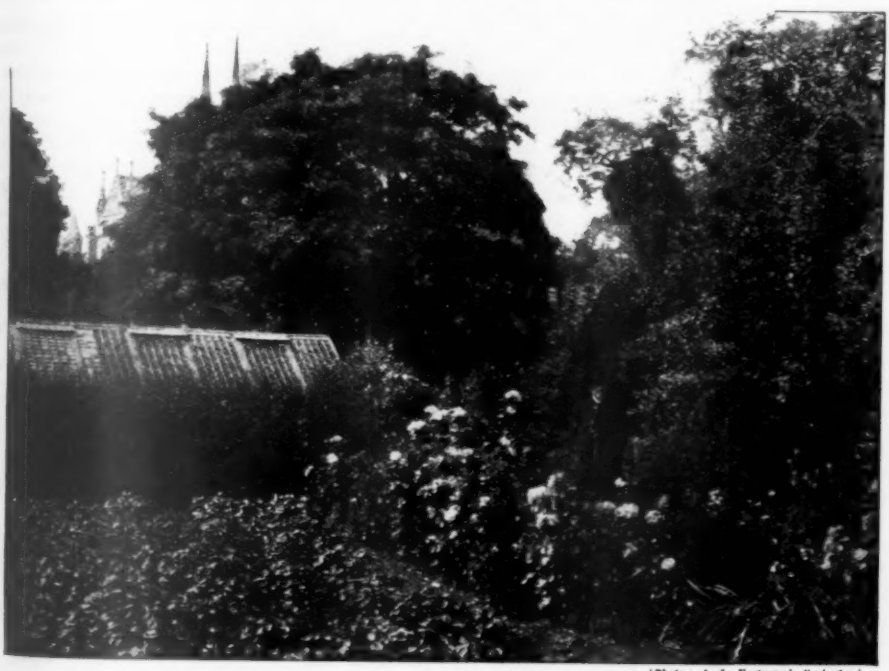
SOME NOTEWORTHY HOBBIES OF PARSONS.

By Hugh B. Philpott.

IT was a celebrated parson who said many years ago: "So long as a man rides his hobby horse peaceably and quietly along the king's highway, and neither compels you or me to get up behind him, pray, sir, what have either you or I to do with it?" That seems a pretty sound principle to apply to the consideration of hobbies in general. To pry very closely into the doings of a public man during his hours of rest and relaxation may even savour a little of impertinence. Our purpose, therefore, in this article is not to watch the Bishop of London playing fives and Dr. Clifford collecting geological specimens, nor to inquire how many parsons ride bicycles and how many play croquet. These are scarcely matters of legitimate public interest. Our concern is rather with a few cases in which a parson's hobby or recreation has some genuine intrinsic interest or importance.



We must also exclude from consideration those more obvious occupations of the parson—authorship, teaching, and public work—in which so many clergymen and

(Photo: Russell and Sons, Baker Street, W.)

DEAN HOLE.

(Photo: A. L. Eastmead, Rochester.)

DEAN HOLE IN HIS ROSE GARDEN.

Nonconformist ministers excel, but which may be regarded simply as developments in one direction or another of their daily work. When, however, we come to speak of horticulture, microscopic investigation, ballooning, building, and turnery, we have to deal with subjects that the reader does not so readily associate with the pastoral office.

A visitor to the Deanery of Rochester is not long in finding out the hobby of the present Dean. The beautiful and well-kept gardens proclaim their owner to be a lover of flowers, and especially of roses. And, indeed, no professional horticulturist is more enthusiastic or more skilful in cultivating the queen of flowers than is the venerable clergyman whom Tennyson once called "the King of Roses." Dean Hole is in many ways a remarkable man, and during his long life (he is now in his eighty-fifth year) he has served his fellows faithfully and zealously in many different ways, and has had intimate relations with many of the most famous men of the nineteenth century. Few volumes of reminiscences published in recent years have equalled in interest Dean Hole's "Memories" and "More Memories." As preacher, scholar, man of letters, and raconteur, the Dean holds, and has long held, a foremost place among the clergy of the English Church; but it is to the Dean as florist that our attention must now be confined.

All his life Dean Hole has lived amongst flowers, and has found them a continual solace and delight. Born at Caunton, Nottinghamshire, he became curate of that place in 1844, and was vicar from 1851 to 1887. In the garden of this quiet country vicarage he was able to pursue year after year his delightful hobby, his enthusiasm for which increased as the years passed by. His rose trees multiplied from a dozen to a score, a hundred, a thousand, and at last to five thousand, gradually encroaching on the space given to fruit and vegetables until they monopolised the whole garden, converting it into one of the finest rose gardens to be seen anywhere.

But Mr. Hole was not the man to devote time and money to his hobby for mere selfish gratification. He has always sought to share with others the pleasure and profit he himself has derived from the culture of flowers. No man has done more to improve the culture of roses in England, and to extend among rich and poor alike the love of flowers in general and roses in particular. His "Book about Roses" is a standard work on the subject, which has passed through many editions, and has the rare merit among technical books of being delightful reading for everyone as well as full of helpful hints for gardeners. In 1858 he organised the first Grand National Rose Show, which was held at the St. James's Hall, and proved a very great success in every way. It was followed by other shows, at first held at intervals of two or three years, afterwards annually and even more frequently.

The Dean, who has always been a true and sympathetic friend of the working classes, has never encouraged the idea that rose culture is necessarily an expensive or aristocratic hobby. In his "Book about Roses" he shows what may be done in a very small garden by a very poor man who really loves the rose. It is not wealth, but a love for the flowers that, in his judgment, is the chief qualification for the successful rose grower. "He who would have beautiful roses in his garden must have beautiful roses in his heart. He must love them well and always. To win he must woo, as Jacob wooed Laban's daughter, though drought and frost consume. He must have not only the glowing admiration, the enthusiasm and the passion, but the tenderness, the thoughtfulness, the reverence, the watchfulness of love."

This quotation suggests what is indeed the secret of the good Dean's enthusiasm in the pursuit of his favourite recreation: he seeks not merely his own pleasure, nor even the pleasure of others; he always has in view the great elevating and humanising power of flowers. "Get a man," he says, "out of the dram and beer shops into the fresh, pure air, interest him in the marvellous works of his God instead of in the deformities of vice, give him an occupation which will add to his health and the comforts of his family instead of destroying both; then build revealed upon natural religion, and hope to see him a Christian."

While at Caunton Mr. Hole did much to promote the love of flowers among the children by giving prizes for their collections of wild flowers, and by accompanying them on flower-collecting expeditions and teaching them the names, habits and uses of the flowers.

In encouraging popular interest in flowers and gardens the Dean believes that he is doing something for the strengthening of religious faith. "The gardener," he says, "cannot believe in unbelief. He takes a seed, a bulb, a cutting (who made them?); he places them in the soil which is most congenial (who made it ?); the seed germinates, the bulb spindles, the cutting strikes (whence the motive power ?); he tends and waters (but who sends the former and the latter rain ?); and the flower comes forth in glory. Does he say with the proud Assyrian, 'By the strength of my hand I have done it, and by my wisdom' ? Does he not stand the rather with a reverent wonder to consider the lilies, until the very soul within him rises heavenward, and Manus tuae fecerunt is his psalm of praise."

Another clergyman whose hobby is the beautiful art of rose-growing is the Rev. Henry Brydges Biron, B.A., the vicar of Lympne with West Hythe. Like Dean Hole, Mr. Biron has become quite an authority on roses. His garden in summer time is full of lovely blooms, and he is one of the judges at the National Rose Show held at the Temple Gardens. Like many another successful horticulturist, he has profited by the experience of past failures. His earliest essay in rose-growing was anything but successful: his own account of it is as follows: "I bought a book on gardening. In this I read that the ground should be trodden down firmly. So I dug a few holes in the driest part of the lawn, trod down the soil until it was as hard as a stone, stuck some rose-trees in, and then waited. The following year most of them died, and the remainder did not give a bloom"

THE REV. H. B. BIRON AT WORK AMONGST HIS ROSES.

Mr. Biron has also some claims to fame as a sportsman. In his younger days (he is now in his sixty-ninth year) he was for several seasons one of the representatives on the cricket field of his native county, Kent. He was also a member of the "Quidnuncs," and it was while playing for that club against the Gentlemen of Sussex that he made his highest score—214. He is also a good hunter, always riding without spurs, and is a capital shot.

A Christian minister, whose hobby unquestionably makes for the material and moral well-being of humanity, and who deliberately uses it for the advancement of religious truth, is Dr. W. H. Dallinger, the well-known Wesleyan preacher and scientist,

If we speak of Dr. Dallinger's scientific work as his "hobby" it must not be supposed that there is any suspicion of dilettantism about it. It is work that commands the respect of the scientific world, and has in more than one instance been of almost epoch-making importance. In his own special field—that of microscopic research—Dr. Dallinger stands without a rival. He was for four years President of the Royal Microscopical Society, and the edition of Dr. W. B. Carpenter's great work, "The Microscope and its Revelations," which he edited and partly re-wrote, is the standard work on the subject.

Dr. Dallinger became interested in microscopic observations while still a boy, and thoughout his ministerial life he continued to find time for close and careful study. In 1870 he began a series of microscopic investigations, which extended over ten years, into the life histories of minute septic organisms. One result of these investigations was very important from the point of view of the Christian apologist as well as of the biologist. The theory had been propounded, and was at one time maintained by eminent biologists, that life could be spontaneously generated; in other words, that dead matter might be the parent of a living organism. Dr. Dallinger's investigation led him to the opposite conclusion, which he thus states: "Down to the uttermost verge of organised existence, out to its very edge, and in its lowliest condition, it is yet true that only that which is living can produce that which shall live." This conclusion is now accepted by most competent biologists. To the question, "Whence came life?" only the believer in God has any answer.

Since 1888 Dr. Dallinger has not held any settled pastorate. The Wesleyan Conference, recognising the importance of his scientific studies, wisely decided to relieve him of the ordinary circuit duties and appoint him a special preacher with liberty to accept or decline any invitations to preach that might come to him. He has thus been enabled to continue his studies and extend his services to many churches—and not only those of his own denomination—who would otherwise rarely or never have heard his voice. And the value of those services it is scarcely possible to over-estimate. In these days when the chief assaults upon religion are made in the name of science, the Christian minister who has gone deeply into the mysteries of the physical world, and can speak of them with an authority none dare gainsay, must wield an influence of no ordinary kind.

(Photo: Cassell and Co., Ltd.)

THE REV. W. H. DALLINGER AT WORK WITH HIS MICROSCOPE.

With Dr. Dallinger the contemplation of the marvels of the material universe, so far from weakening his belief in the spiritual, has only strengthened it, and often in his sermons he enforces his arguments by illustrations drawn from his own special studies.

Another minister who has taken up a scientific hobby, though one of quite a different kind, and become one of the leading authorities on it, is the Rev. J. M. Bacon, M.A., who has achieved a distinct place for himself among the adventurous few who have a practical as well as a theoretical acquaintance with the science of aëronautics. Although Mr. Bacon has never held a living, he has in his time done a good deal of supply work for his brother clergymen; but of late years he has given practically the whole of his time to scientific work, chiefly in connection with ballooning. When Mr. Bacon takes a journey above the clouds he is not simply in quest of adventure and novel experiences; he always has a scientific purpose—some problem to solve, some fact in meteorology or acoustics to verify. A few years ago, when he startled a good many people in the city by exploding bombs over Trafalgar Square, he was engaged in some acoustical experiments, carrying out a suggestion made long ago by Professor Tyndall that such investigations could best be made from the car of a balloon. Other experiments have had for their object the establishment of means of communication between the earth and travellers above the clouds. While journeying in his balloon Mr. Bacon has successfully communicated with troops encamped on Salisbury Plain, and he has succeeding in exploding a mine in a garden when he himself was three or four miles distant in the sky.

THE REV. J. M. BACON WITH HIS BALLOON.

With all his learning Dr. Dallinger has great gifts of clear and simple exposition. He is one of the few men—as everyone must admit who has heard his fascinating lectures on such subjects as bees, ants, pond life, etc.—who can make a scientific discourse as interesting and intelligible to a popular audience as to a class of students. Dr. Dallinger's hobby—for such it was in the beginning, though it may now be regarded rather as his life's work—has not only enlarged his own life, but has instructed and delighted thousands, and has made the whole Christian Church his debtor.

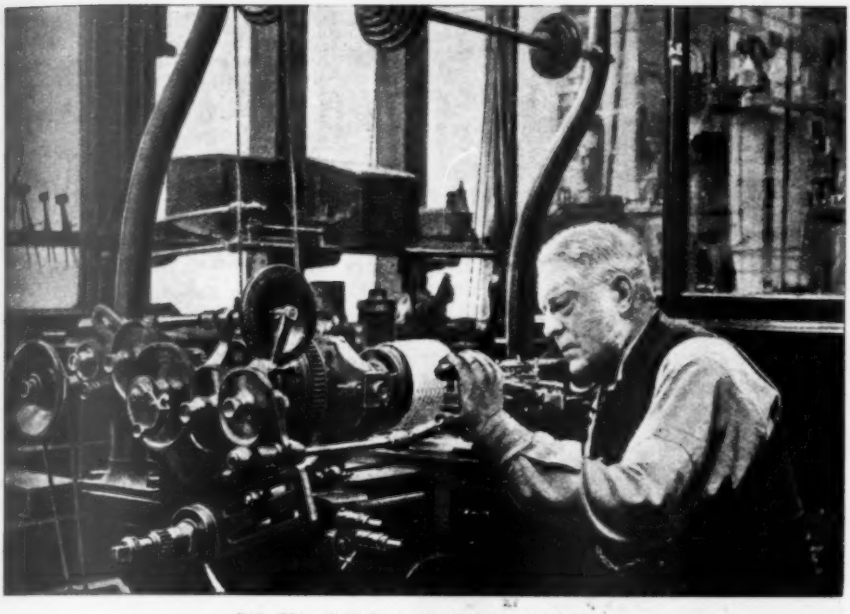
Astronomy is another subject in which Mr. Bacon takes a great interest, and his most perilous balloon voyage was one he undertook in November, 1899, with the object of photographing the Leonids. The ascent was made from Newbury, and for ten hours the aëronauts were unable to descend, as the valve had ceased to work. The balloon was travelling westward and they were in imminent danger of being carried out to sea. It was, in fact, a cold current of air from the Bristol Channel that brought about the descent. The fall was much too rapid to be safe, but the aëronauts dared not risk another ascent, as they were so near the sea. The balloon came to earth at Neath with such violence that Miss Bacon, who accompanied her father, had her arm broken, and Mr. Bacon had his clothes nearly torn off. In spite of this thrilling experience, however, Mr. Bacon does not admit that his hobby is a specially dangerous one. He points to the undoubted fact that aëronauts have often lived to a great age.

Mr. Bacon, who is a racy and attractive speaker, is in great demand as a lecturer on his special subject. He is the author of two books and many magazine articles dealing with the scientific aspects of ballooning, as well as with his personal experiences. His latest work, "The Dominion of the Air," is the best popular history of aërial navigation that has yet appeared.



A remarkable hobby, which leads to some very beautiful results, is that of the Rev. C. C. Ellison, M.A., of Bracebridge, Lincoln. Mr. Ellison is an expert turner of wood, metal, and ivory, whose work has frequently gained diplomas at the exhibition of the Turners' Company held annually at the Mansion House. Even when seen beside the work of the most skilful professional turners in the kingdom, Mr. Ellison's beautiful productions have not suffered by comparison. They won for him a silver medal for ivory work, and a bronze medal for metal; indeed, some of Mr. Ellison's admirers say that he is the most skilful turner in the world.

Ever since he could handle a tool of any kind—that is to say, for the last sixty years—Mr. Ellison has been an amateur mechanic. His first notable achievement was when, as a boy at a private school, he made a false bottom for a tool box. By this piece of inventive genius he secured undisturbed possession every half-year of many pounds of contraband sweets. Afterwards he went to Rugby, and while there he purchased his first lathe. He kept it in a hired room at a tailor's in the town, and by its aid spent many happy hours in work which doubtless seemed very fine and important at the time, but which from the standpoint of later accomplishment he describes as "converting firewood into chips."

At Cambridge Mr. Ellison continued to practise his hobby, and by degrees became quite an expert mechanic. Since leaving college he has never been without his workshop, in which he has found that complete change of work which active spirits find as recreative as play and far more fascinating. In the special field of work which Mr. Ellison has made his own—that of ornamental turnery—there are possibilities of accomplishment of which the ordinary amateur mechanic knows little. As an illustration of the amount of thought and skill which have been devoted to the mere machinery for securing the best results, it may be mentioned that one of Mr. Ellison's lathes, with its accessory tools, cost no less than £1,200.

Mr. Ellison's long experience has left him in no doubt as to the usefulness of recreative work of this character, whether pursued on the princely scale in which he has himself been able to indulge his tastes, or within the narrower limits with which most amateur workmen have to be content. "The art of working," he says, "brings you into touch and sympathy with workpeople to your mutual benefit, enables you to help many a lame dog over a stile, to take a class—it may be—in a technical institute, and in countless ways to make the world better and happier for your existence." This is a consideration which may commend such hobbies to other ministers of religion and Christian workers. In these days of technical institutes and evening classes, the ability to take the interest of an expert in the work carried on must be a valuable asset to the minister who seeks to influence the young mechanics.

Incidentally, Mr. Ellison has found his workshop and his mechanical knowledge of service in the detection of impostors among applicants for relief. Here is an amusing incident as he himself once told it to an interviewer :—

THE REV. CHARLES C. ELLISON AT HIS LATHE.

"One day a fellow came to the house with a basket of oranges to sell from, and to beg. I questioned him. He said he was a joiner out of work, so I marched him into the workshop and said, 'Now, old fellow, if you are a joiner, perhaps you will be kind enough to take down a jack-plane.' Whereupon he took down a trying-plane, which is about twice the size. I said, 'Perhaps you will be kind enough now to take down a panel saw.' He proceeded at once to take down a rip. Then I turned upon him and said, 'Look here; you are a lying impostor!' 'I am,' he murmured. So I told him, 'If you are not out of this place as fast as your legs can carry you, I'll turn you out.' He bolted in such confusion and hurry that he left his basket of oranges, and would have gone quite away without them if I had not shouted to him to take them away. And whenever a man comes here and says he is of such and such a trade out of work, I set him some of that work to do directly. They have got to know about it, and they fight shy of Bracebridge Manse."

An interesting hobby to which many parsons have given some attention is that of architecture. The usefulness of some architectural knowledge—especially in the case of the clergy of the Church of England—is obvious. The cathedrals, abbeys, and many of the parish churches of England are among the most precious of our national possessions, whether regarded as works of art or as objects of historic interest. It is therefore of the utmost importance that the clergy, who are the chief custodians of these treasures, should have an intelligent appreciation of their value, and should understand the best methods of preserving them. On the whole, these responsibilities have been well fulfilled, though sometimes it must be admitted that zeal has outrun discretion, and elaborate restorations have been carried out where a few modest repairs would have been in better taste. Many of the clergy have not only studied with loving reverence the buildings committed to their charge, until they know every stone and can read like a book the history of the building as revealed in its architecture; they have also in many cases made themselves authorities on ecclesiastical architecture generally.

As a rule, of course, the architectural knowledge of the clergy is purely theoretical, but there have been occasions when some clergyman, greatly daring, has put his knowledge into actual practice and become for a time his own architect or builder. A notable example is that of the Rev. W. Burland, M.A., rector of Langridge, Bath, who has acquired a thoroughly expert knowledge, both theoretical and practical, of ecclesiastical architecture, and has built and restored a number of churches without any professional assistance. It was want of money that in the first instance made Mr. Burland an architect. Some important church repairs needed to be done, but the necessary funds proved very difficult to raise; so it occurred to Mr. Burland that he might as well save the architect's fees by planning and directing the work himself. The experiment proved successful, and he has since several times conducted the restoration of old churches, and even the entire building of a new one. At Priestleigh is a new church of which he made the designs and superintended the building from foundations to coping stone.

(Photo: Cassell and Co., Ltd.)

THE REV. W. BURLAND AT WORK.

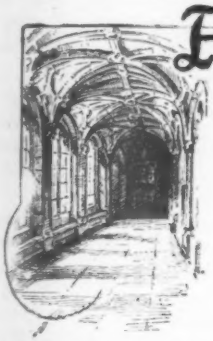
Mr. Burland makes all the working drawings required as well as the general design; he employs neither architect nor clerk of works, but engages his own workmen and personally superintends their work. The last piece of building work undertaken by him was the restoration of the fine old Norman church at Compton Martin, where he was lately rector. In this case the eminent architect Mr. T. G. Jackson, R.A., acted as expert adviser, but the actual work was carried out, as in other cases, by the energetic rector himself.

In working on these lines Mr. Burland is to a great extent reverting to the methods in vogue in the greatest period of English church building. When the great cathedrals and churches of the Middle Ages were built there were neither architects, contractors, nor trade unions in the modern sense. An ecclesiastic—bishop, prior, or abbot—was generally the leading spirit in the work, often the actual designer and master builder, and each workman laboured with the enthusiasm of an artist and the reverent zeal of one who felt that his was a truly religious work. Let us hope that in reviving the old methods Mr. Burland has also been able to revive in some measure the old noble spirit among the workers.



A ROMANCE OF OLD FRANCE.

By Christopher Hare, Author of "Dreams to Sell," Etc.

SYNOPSIS OF CHAPTERS I.- XIV.

The story opens in the reign of Louis XIV. Yvonne de la Féronniere, a Huguenot girl, is being educated at the famous Abbaye-aux-Bois. Her school friend, Gabrielle de Beaumanoir, is married to the Duc de Maillebois, and at the wedding Yvonne meets the young Chevalier Réné de Beaumanoir, and they are mutually attracted to each other. After the wedding, the girl-bride Gabrielle returns to the convent school with Yvonne, and the Duke, her husband, goes on an embassy to Rome, and takes Réné with him. Yvonne meets Réné again at the Palace of Versailles, when King Louis receives the Doge of Genoa. There she also meets her guardian, the Marquis de Vaudreuil, who abruptly removes her from the Abbaye-aux-Bois to his house, where she is pestered by the unwelcome attentions of his spendthrift cousin, Adolphe. Her crippled cousin, Louise, is the only comfort of Yvonne's life in her guardian's house.

CHAPTER XV.

AS the great lumbering chariot reached the ascent to the hill and drew near the château of Sceaux, Yvonne and he companions found that the road was crowded with gorgeous equipages, all bound for the same destination. At length, after much patient jolting and delay, the great entrance was reached, and as Madame de Vaudreuil alighted and looked eagerly round at the galaxy of rank and fashion awaiting the royal party, she was like the Queen of Sheba in the presence of King Solomon—there was no more spirit in her.

"Ah, what a f.te! And I have a right to speak, for I have seen so many in my time. Let me see, it must have been six years ago when we had that tournament at Versailles, and the King's generosity almost passed belief! Why, each lady found a complete toilette in her apartment. Mine was of shrimp-coloured satin, I remember. Pink always becomes me so well, and he knew it!" she sighed. "And the King himself, why, he was wont to be all glittering with diamonds—or true Roi Soleil!

"But now, see, where he comes yonder. Only that dark casaque, fastened by a single gold button. No rings, no jewels, save in his shoe and knee buckles. And his hat—why, 'tis a beaver with only a single feather! He has turned serious since the death of poor Fontanges, and we know whose influence rules him now. Ah, there comes Madame de Maintenon with Madame la Dauphine."

Thus the good lady poured out the even flow of her reminiscences and remarks into the ear of Yvonne, who was far too much absorbed and interested in all that was passing around her to pay the slightest attention. It was a brilliant scene of courtly magnificence, and the costumes of the great nobles and the ladies of fashion vied with each other in richness of colour and costliness of material. Many who have made a name in history were familiar by sight to the young girl, but her eyes strayed far afield, in wistful search of the friend who was her link with the past. More than once, on some festive occasion, she had seen Héloise de Chamans in the distance, but chance or design had always prevented their meeting, and she had been unable to obtain news of the young duchess.

To-day she was more fortunate, for she suddenly caught sight of the Duc de Maillebois in earnest talk with the King, and later, when the ladies were all marshalled to the raised seats under triumphal arches of flowers, to her intense delight she found herself next to Gabrielle.

The two friends had not met since the eventful day when Mademoiselle de la Féronniere had been so abruptly carried off from Versailles by her guardian, the day when she had parted from Réné.

Young Madame de Maillebois had been away from Paris during those two summer months at her husband's magnificent chateau in Brittany, where she had amused herself by playing hostess to her father and sister and a large, gay company invited to meet them; but she had been very glad to make this unique fête an excuse for returning to Paris and tasting the delights of the capital.

"Yvonne, my dear! This is, indeed, an unlooked-for joy. So the ogre has not devoured you yet? Tell me all that has befallen you, dear?"

Then a strange thing happened. The girl who had welcomed this meeting with such eager joy was suddenly dumb and panic-stricken. How could that simple question have carried dismay into the heart of Yvonne? What was there to tell?

With a sudden blinding flash of insight she saw her past two months spread out before her. A very lifetime it seemed, nay an eternity, wasted in thoughtless frivolity. Was there ever such an arid desert in which no heart of grace could blossom, such a scribbled page of vanity and folly, from which she could only hope that the recording angel would turn aside with averted eye?

She dared not meet her friend's keen inquiring eyes, but with bowed head she murmured:

"I cannot tell you—there is nothing——"

"Yvonne, dear Yvonne! Surely it is not true that which I hear on every side?" cried Gabrielle, in a tone of pained conviction. "They tell me that you are always at the Court, at every fête and picnic and rout, dressed in the very pink of the mode, no unwilling victim, but beaming with delight, a very queen of beauty—ah, that I can believe. But they also say that you are ever in the company of Monsieur de Vaudreuil, who is inseparable as your shadow, and that your marriage with him is fixed past all doubt——"

"No, no! It is false, Gabrielle!" interrupted Yvonne, in a hoarse, muffled voice of despair. "Oh, what have I done? Surely you could never believe it of me, that I could be so changeful, so false?"

"Dear Yvonne, I knew you too well. Even when Héloise vowed it was the common talk I well-nigh fell out with her, and I prayed that, at least, she would not write word to Réné till the marriage was an accomplished fact."

"That will never be! But I see how, in my ignorance of the world, I have been led astray and lured on," was the pitiful lament. "For it is true that my cousin has been with me everywhere, like my shadow, and ah, me! I have been so blind, so foolish, that I never understood the meaning smiles, the veiled jests, till now."

She buried her face in her hands, overwhelmed with the surging memories which mocked and tortured her.

Her friend pressed her hand in silence, full of understanding sympathy. When she spoke again, her words were sad and grave.

"I fear me that you have trouble ahead. If only I could help you! Remember that my home is always yours, and that Monsieur de Maillebois is the staunchest of friends."

"Tell me of Réné," whispered Yvonne. "We may be disturbed at any moment." And she gave a glance toward her aunt, who was revelling in a perfect orgie of gossip, with Madame de la Fayette by her side.

"My brother has been away on a cruise in his vessel, La Topaze, but has now returned to Toulon. He is well, he asks for news of you; and he tells me that he has written to you, but has had no answer——"

She paused, for at that moment a sudden silence and hush of expectation fell upon the gay company. The twittering of many voices ceased, and the fashionable ladies leaned forward with eager faces, as a blowing of horns and trumpets announced the approach of the grand procession, the central feature of the fête.

First came a stately array of knights in picturesque mediæval armour, preceded by floating banners, by heralds-at-arms, pages, and squires, all bearing their emblems on the glittering shields and coats of arms. The cavalcade was followed by an immense gilt chariot, the Car of the Sun, around which were grouped the four ages—of gold, silver, steel, and iron—all the heavenly signs, the seasons and the hours. Next came the Car of Apollo, surrounded by Arcadian shepherds, and followed by fauns and sylvans and dryads. To Yvonne's dismay, this motley company paused exactly in front of her seat, and one dressed as Pan came forward, and looking up at her, recited verses in praise of the Queen of Beauty.

With a quick, instinctive impulse, the girl

"The girl was suddenly dumb and panic stricken."

adroitly drew herself back into the shadow, behind the garlands of roses, and whispered to Gabrielle :

"Accept their homage with a good grace. See, Monsieur de Maillebois is smiling up at you."

It was quite true, and every face was turned towards them in restless curiosity ; but she did not add that Adolphe de Vaudreuil, standing below, with a wand of office in his hand, as one of the masters of the ceremonies, was looking in vain for his queen. His plot had failed, and apparently he had missed his chance of thus publicly paying court to his future bride, for she was nowhere to be seen.

Meanwhile Madame de Vaudreuil, on the other side of her, was bowing and simpering in the perfect content of satisfied vanity, without a doubt that the verses were in praise of her mature and unapproachable loveliness. Altogether it was a very pretty piece of mystification, although but a passing scene, scarcely understood even by the actors therein.

The fickle Pan had soon passed lightly on in the train of a stately Diana, to bear elsewhere the tribute of his flattering voice. Slowly the magnificent procession moved onwards, and under cover of the renewed laughter and applause, Yvonne whispered :

"You spoke of Réné's letters, but not one has reached me."

"I do not wonder, now that I have seen Madame de Vaudreuil!" was her friend's low reply. "That painted face, and ah! those cruel thin lips. You say she is so pious, too ? I must tell you a story M. de Brissac amused us with yesterday. It is so characteristic of the fashionable ladies like Madame.

"You know how the King has taken to religion of late years, always present at Vespers in the Royal chapel? And of course all the Court ladies, of whom your aunt was one, never failed in their attendance, and carried each a little taper to make sure that her face would be duly recognised. Well, one day M. de Brissac played them a trick, and gravely announced that the King would not come to chapel that evening. All the ladies stayed away, and when his Majesty, in dismay, asked the reason, he was told; and, alas! the pleasing fiction of the Court ladies' devotion melted away like a cloud."

A murmur of rippling laughter welcomed the merry jest, and in the gay humour of the moment the two young girls forgot the stately present, and were once more light-hearted comrades of the convent school.

CHAPTER XVI.

TO tell all that happened at that memorable fête in the gardens of Sceaux would need a volume in itself. Is it not written in Le Mercure Galant of that date?

To Mademoiselle de la Féronniere, at least, it was an eventful day, of which the slightest episode was written with indelible letters on her memory, for it closed a chapter of her life. By the side of the young Duchesse de Maillebois she was protected from the attentions of Adolphe de Vaudreuil, whose time was also much engaged by his official position. Yet now that her eyes were once opened, Yvonne could not fail to notice significant glances, and to hear now and again whispered remarks which flushed her cheeks with scarlet.

She was watching one of the ever-changing entertainments—this time a quaint new invention of a chaise drawn by Suisses, in which there were four seats, shaded by a gaudy canopy and occupied by a very distinguished company. She had seen Madame la Dauphine, Madame la Duchesse, Madame la Princesse de Conti, and Madame de Maintenon take their places, when she caught the sound of voices in the crowd.

"Who is that tall, fair girl?" asked one.

"Oh, that is a Mademoiselle de la Féronniere, an heiress from Poitou, who is going to marry young de Vaudreuil and pay all his debts for him. He has been flaunting her about everywhere, without the shadow of a chaperone to look after her!"

"Well, 'tis not our affair what repute the lady gets, if we see the colour of her husband's money. He lost five hundred écus to me at lansquenet the other night, and he is always unlucky at the game of euchre.

The girl heard no more, but she felt that she could sink into the ground for very shame. It was too terrible that, by no fault of her own, she should thus have become a reproach and a byword; but still more to be dreaded was this assumed certainty of her marriage.

She pressed closer to Gabrielle and hurried her away, on some light pretext, though she knew that in her splendid dress of silvery gauze it was impossible to escape observation. But at this moment fortune served her, for there was a general stir and movement towards the improvised opera house, where Monsieur Racine's Idylle de la Paix was to be given by the first singers of the day.

After this, events followed in rapid succession until the hour arrived for the sumptuous banquet, in the great hall of the château, when the famous artist of the royal kitchen, M. Robert, outdid himself. The long tables were set out in magnificent array, covered with gold and silver plate, and decorated with garlands of flowers and intricate architecture of confectionery. Every delicacy, in season and out of season, was piled on the board with lavish profusion. From sea and river came every known fish, great and small. There were peacocks and swans, egrets and turtle doves, game and fowl, and mighty joints of meat, all seasoned with spices and mediæval sauces, pungent and strong of flavour. In the centre, amid the quaint edifices of musk-scented pastry, were great dishes of fruit and sweetmeats innumerable.

The magnificent banquet was lighted up by rows of lacqueys, with flaming torches in their hands, standing behind the guests, in the great sombre hall, although it was scarcely dusk in the soft summer air outside. Not until very late, after another gorgeous fantastic procession by torchlight, did the long day of festivities come to an end.

With a lingering clasp of the hand, Yvonne parted from her friend.

"Courage, my dear," whispered Gabrielle. "Remember that if trouble comes, our home is ever a refuge for you."

"But if my need is desperate, and there is no escape, I will send you René's ring!" was the low murmured reply.

"The girl needed all her courage as she waited."—p. 562.

"Have no fear; it will call him back from the uttermost ends of the earth!" were the last precious words of comfort which she dimly felt, rather than heard.

Once more the young girl found herself in the great chariot by the side of Madame de Vaudreuil, and she shrank back into her dark corner as her cousin, flushed with wine, stumbled brusquely into his place opposite. The unwonted excess had loosened his tongue and robbed him of his self-control. Vaguely resentful of the way in which Yvonne had kept aloof from him all day, he addressed his words to his mother.

"Did you see that fellow d'Heudicourt? He has come back and wormed himself into the King's favour, till now he is appointed one of the Grands Louvetiers." *

"Yes; I saw him and his wife too," was the frightened reply.

"And I'll lay a wager that you greeted her as a dear friend!" he cried in a jeering tone. "Well, I wish you joy of her. She never was much to look at, but since her exile Madame d'Heudicourt has grown as ugly as sin, for all her gaudy finery. Did you hear what Madame de Poitiers had the spirit to say to her to-day? 'You have a fine holiday face!'" And he laughed noisily at his own story.

There was a strained silence, then the misguided Adolphe continued:

"Monsieur de Louvois is most urgent that I should accept a commission to go down into Poitou at once at the head of a dragonnade against the Huguenots, with the Abbé de Chaylus to help. You know him?"

"Ah, yes; the holy man who was so cruelly treated in Siam for his faith. Almost a martyr, my director told me," said Madame, unctuously.

"Sacré! he has been through the fire himself, and knows how to singe others!" was the rejoinder, with a brutal laugh. "I shall have a rare time with him. It would curdle your blood to hear of all that he did in the Cevennes against those damned heretics!"

"Hush, hush, my son!" interrupted Madame de Vaudreuil, in mortal terror, as she pointed towards Yvonne.

What a cruel irony of fate it would be if, in one moment of half-tipsy excitement, he should reveal his true character, and destroy all the fruits of his long self-restraint and careful devotion! But at that moment the heavy lumbering chariot swayed in some deep rut, and shook the horn lantern which hung in front. It cast a flickering ray on the girl's pale face. She gave no sign, her eyes were closed, and to all outward appearance she was asleep.

Madame drew a deep breath of relief, and Adolphe blundered on, with his confidences unchecked.

"Yes; those wretched miscreants of Poitou will curse the day when de Chaylus escaped from his persecutors. These dragonnades are an invention of genius, a gigantic satire! Picture to yourself a company of rough dragoons sent out as missionaries to all the towns and châteaux where most Huguenots are found, to convert them! Ha, ha! by every means their gentle souls can devise, short of death; there we draw the line.

"But if the recalcitrants chance to die of their tortures afterwards, why, 'tis the will of God, and no blame to us. You can never conceive the obstinacy of even weak women and children. At one lonely château we found the mistress a widow, of this reformed faith so-called, and her servants—mostly Catholics—had fled, so she was at our mercy. The dragoons drank her wine—very good wine in that cellar, I remember—they plundered the house, destroying all they could not take away. But what touched the woman most was to see all her dainty linen ransacked, and the costly damask cloths and fine Holland sheets carried down to the stable, as litter for the horses!"

"Ah, that was cruel!" gasped his mother, with a touch of sympathy for the outraged housewife.

"But what will you say when they took her boy of four years old—Pierre, she called him—and tossed him backwards and forwards across the long room? And when she implored the soldiers to spare the shrieking child, they said she must be cold, and tied her close to the fire. Then they piled it up with her furniture, and threatened to cast her in the flames if she did not abjure her faith."

"Oh, Adolphe, did they burn her to death?" asked his mother, shuddering.

"No; she fell senseless on the hearth, and we left her there, obstinate heretic! But this is nothing. Shall I tell you some more?"

"No, no, my son; I pray you spare me!" she pleaded, for vain, silly creature as she was, Madame de Vaudreuil was a woman still.

Moreover, she was in constant dread that her niece might awake, and hear these awkward

* Huntsmen of the wolf-hounds revelations, which Adolphe would be the first to disclaim in his sober moments. She roused herself to change the subject of conversation, and soon, to her relief, his heavy breathing announced that he was sleeping off the effect of those rare and costly wines.

Meantime, as the lumbering chariot jolted on through the night, poor Yvonne felt that she had indeed supped on horrors. Conscience might prick her on the morrow for listening to confidences not meant for her, but in the first moment she was half asleep and scarcely took in the meaning of his words. Then, as Adolphe's self-betrayal became more flagrant, she felt herself to be engulfed in a sea of infamy, and frozen with terror and repulsion. It was a revelation of undreamed depths to the horror-struck girl, and she closed her eyes, to hide the red glare of bloodshed.

Beneath the silvery mantle of gossamer, her hands were clenched until the nails dug into the tender flesh, she could have screamed aloud in her frantic despair, but she was hemmed in on every side, and durst not move nor breathe. Then a desperate thought came to her. Humbled to the dust by the memory of her friendliness with a traitor, and a cruel persecutor, Yvonne felt that she had reached the limit of her endurance. She must escape and flee for her life, no matter whither, so that she would be free from such defilement. She would seek a shelter with Gabrielle, or make a pilgrimage back on foot to her dear old home at Croisette.

In the wild tumult of her soul she poured out all to Madelon that night, as soon as the chamber door was closed and barred.

"Ah, Mademoiselle, if I could but have spared you this!" said the old woman sadly. "To me it is no surprise, but I could not warn you, for of late we seem to have drifted apart."

"Yes, Madelon, and I alone am to blame," was the free confession. "The downward course was so easy, so pleasant. I basked in the sunshine of flattery; I was vain and frivolous and worldly, and thought of nothing but gay apparel and ever-changing amusement!"

"Do not blame yourself too much, dear Mademoiselle. I would not deny the young their pleasure. 'Rejoice in thy youth,' saith God's word."

"And for all these things cometh judgment," added Yvonne. "I went astray against my better knowledge. I was like a soldier asleep at his post in an enemy's country. But now mine eyes are opened. We must find a way of escape, my Madelon."

There was a silence full of significance, and not until the duties of the toilette were ended did the maid remark:

"You spoke of the Abbé de Chaylus? He arrived here this very day, and seems to be looked upon by the household as a saint and a martyr after his sufferings in Siam. Rosalie met him crossing the great hall, and I saw her go down on her knees to beseech his blessing. She told me afterwards that it would save her many years of purgatory!"

If Madelon had told this story to change the subject, she was successful for the moment. She had given her mistress fresh food for thought when they parted.

The young girl had put far from her all hope of sleep, but the weariness of youth and health conquered all, and not until the early morning did she awake, refreshed. The night had brought counsel. No; she must not draw down suspicion and possible disaster on her friend Gabrielle and the Duc de Maillebois by taking advantage of their generosity. If she were missed, search would be made in their house at once, and they would lose the King's favour, as he was so bitter against the Huguenots.

She had noticed Madelon's silence at the suggestion of escape, and understood her. The time was not yet ripe. She must pay the penalty of her past frivolity—yes, and pick up the thread of her neglected duties.

As though in answer to her thought, she was scarcely dressed when there came a message:

"Mademoiselle Louise prays you to spare her a few minutes."

In eager haste Yvonne followed the maid, full of self-accusing thoughts and penitence for her careless neglect.

"Are you not so well, my dear? What can I do to serve you?" she asked, as her young cousin held out both hands in welcome.

"You can have your chocolate here and sit awhile with me," was the smiling reply. "Bichon, go and ask for another bowl."

When they were alone her tone changed. "Yvonne, dear, I have news to tell you; something has happened," she began impetuously. "Come close and listen to me. Have you heard that a guest came here yesterday?"

"Do you mean the Abbé de Chaylus?" asked the girl, with a sudden chill of unaccountable terror. "Madelon spoke of his coming."

"Ah, then, maybe you are prepared, for it is of him I would speak," was the quick rejoinder. "Yvonne, beware of that man; 'tis your most deadly foe, a fierce bigot and a persecutor. He arrived while you were all away at the fête, and came to see me, and with soft, flattering words beguiled me, until he had drawn out all I knew about my people—and you, dear."

"Then, last night—you know how hot it was?—I could not sleep, and sat for awhile at my open casement. I heard your coach rumble into the courtyard, and not long after I was startled by the sound of voices in the balcony, just there, close below. It was Adolphe and Monsieur l'Abbé, and I could hear every word they said."

"Louise! You should not have listened," was her friend's instinctive cry.

"And I tell you that I am justified a thousand times. In this house of plots and conspiracy, what can I, poor weak creature, do but fight the traitor and the coward with their own weapons?" exclaimed the strange child, looking almost beautiful in her excitement, as with flushed cheeks she fixed her dark, passionate eyes on her cousin's face.

"For I alone am on your side, Yvonne. I have loved you ever since like a sunbeam you came into my life. Oh, if you knew what happiness it has been to see you of late, so glad and joyous!"

"What have I done to earn such affection?" the listener asked herself, bewildered, as she stooped to kiss her champion's hot brow in silence.

"Even my brother seemed changed, but last night he betrayed himself," continued Louise. "L'Abbé de Chaylus declared himself amazed, indignant, that after all this time you should still be a Huguenot. 'What have they been thinking of at the convent—nay, what have you been about since the girl came to you, my friend?' he asked. 'Are there no tortures which have persuading power with such an obstinate heretic? Has her pampered body been starved? Has her delicate flesh been torn daily with the lash?'"

Yvonne could not restrain a shudder, but she found spirit to ask in a whisper:

"What did Adolphe say? Was he very angry?"

"Oh, no; he did but reply with a light laugh, 'That may come later, but we have tried softer measures first. I have reason to believe that she is deeply in love with me, and when the critical moment comes she will give up her faith without a contest. That is the first step, or I lose her fortune. All the world looks upon us as betrothed, and she cannot draw back now.'"

"Oh, hush, hush, Louise! Spare me, I can endure no more!" interrupted Yvonne, in her bitter despair. Stricken with shame, humiliated to the very dust, she buried her face in her hands.

At that moment the maid appeared with the cup of chocolate, and Louise gave a warning cough. Then, with quick presence of mind, she said aloud,

"Yes, dear; I will read you that couplet of mine. 'Tis by way of a madrigal. Bichon, give me my tablets. Ah, here it is:

> "They go, they come, the world it smiles,
> On all sides, festal joys,
> Alas! for me, sadness and care,
> I weep, I bow my head.
> Lonely in my chamber dark,
> For ever in the shade."

The girl read this aloud, slowly at first, and then, warming to her subject, with all a poet's pride in her verse. Her cousin had time to recover herself before the maid left the room, with a little meaning shrug of the shoulders, as one not lightly beguiled.

"Bichon is a good creature, and I can trust her; but we must run no risks," said her young mistress. "Tell me one thing, dear; is it true that you were learning to love my brother?" she added wistfully.

At this unlooked-for question, the girl was roused to her inmost soul, and fiery indignation recalled her wonted courage. She sprang to her feet as though it had been a call to arms.

"Can you ask me, Louise? Is it possible that even you would accuse me of playing false in the eyes of the world? I give you my solemn word that I would die sooner than marry Adolphe de Vaudreuil!"

There was a moment of troubled silence, then a low, tremulous whisper caught her ear.

"Yvonne, dear Yvonne, is there another whom you love?"

"Yes, Louise; there is one who lives ever in my thoughts, my knight without fear and without reproach," replied the girl in a steadfast tone, though the scarlet flushed over cheek and brow. "I cannot tell if we may ever meet again on earth; but I shall keep faith with him, as he with me."

"Ah! I know. It is the brother of your convent friend. It is Réné de Beaumanoir.

This is a romance indeed, such as I have dreamed," sighed Louise, and her eyes filled with tears of sympathy. "Dear Yvonne, how beautiful it is, and how good of you to tell me. Henceforth I live only to serve you.

"She sobbed out her story like a wounded child."—p. 563.

"Hush! Is not that a footstep on the stairs? One word more. I forgot to tell you that the Abbé de Chaylus has promised to speak with you, and never doubts that his eloquence will prevail. Hush! they come."

CHAPTER XVII.

IT was well for Mademoiselle de la Féronniere that she should have been, even in so slight a measure, prepared, for the summons to face the Abbé de Chaylus might well have made a stouter heart quail. They had thought to take her unawares, but Louise had forestalled them and given a note of warning.

In the days to come the young girl could never look back upon that interview without an inward shudder. The whole scene would rise up before her: the dim, solemn library, with its serried rows of books; the gloomy hangings of dull brocade; the massive, high-backed chairs, haunted by ghostly, unseen witnesses; but, above all, the stern, dark presence of the priest who had suffered almost to the death for his faith, and who was prepared, without a shadow of compunction, to mete out the same cruel measure to others.

A spell was upon her, and she could not turn her shuddering gaze from that death-like face, seared as it were by hot irons, and emaciated almost beyond human semblance. There was a lurid light in the deep-set eyes, and a savage clenching of the strongly-marked jaw, which revealed the man, his desperate courage, his indomitable will.

With slow, reluctant steps, as though drawn by some compelling force, Yvonne crossed the shadowed threshold and stood within the audience chamber; but the grim Abbé took no step forward to greet her, he spoke no word of welcome. Like an image of stone, he stood unmoved, and gazed upon her in frozen silence. There was something so inhuman in such a reception that the girl needed all her courage as she waited in an agony of suspense.

The moments were leaden-footed, time almost stood still, and she seemed to live through an eternity of expectant horror; but she gave no outward sign of fear. With uplifted head she stood before him, and there was no quailing of the eye's level beam. Not until the stillness grew intolerable did she exclaim, with proud self-control:

"Monsieur, I was summoned hither to meet you; but, meseems, there hath been some error. I will no longer disturb your meditations."

Thereupon, with a formal curtsey, she turned to leave the chamber; but there was a timbre in her low, clear voice which warned de Chaylus that he had met a foeman worthy of his steel.

"Stay, my child!" he cried, in a tone of command. "I have much to say to you My heart yearns over a strayed lamb, and I cannot rest until it is brought back into the Church's fold. Is it possible that I have heard aright when they tell me that you were brought up in a convent, and that with the living example of the holy sisters ever before your eyes, still you remain a heretic?"

He paused for a reply, and in that moment there flashed before the memory of Yvonne those words of Monsieur de la Forêt:

"When God calleth, you will awake, strong to do His will."

The hour had struck. The clarion note of duty had sounded in her heart, and stilled all other voices. Her late pursuit of pleasure, her gay smooth life of ease, all seemed to melt away as a dream when one awakes. With clear-sighted vision of all that might hang upon the words, she bore witness to her faith.

"I am a Huguenot, Monsieur, and I glory in the name! But to denounce me as a heretic is to condemn me without a trial. How should pleading avail when you are at once accuser and judge?"

"Then you make no defence? Ah, what sinful neglect, what fatal weakness must there have been, for the long years to leave you still an outcast from our Holy Church! May the blessed privilege be mine to guide you within the sanctuary. Confide in me, my daughter. What are your difficulties?"

"I have none, Monsieur" was the ready answer; "I am content with the faith of my childhood. On such deep matters I cannot dispute with you—I, an unskilled girl, whom you would crush with your learning and eloquence. I can but cling, heart and soul, to our reformed religion, for which my fathers have fought and died.

"All these years I have cherished it, with undimmed love, when outward ordinances were denied me, and I thank my God that I can still make my confession and pray to Him with no priest to come betwixt us."

She had thrown down the gauntlet, and her opponent was not slow to pick it up.

"Quos Deus vult perdere, prius demental,"* muttered the Abbé de Chaylus. "Can you be so blinded with vanity as to think yourself under the special care of the Almighty?" he asked in tones of caustic satire. "Does that braided hair, that costly apparel, bespeak one who has forsworn the world, a holy maiden given up to prayer and meditation? Has your frivolous life of late, spent in the court of princes, wasted in every form of vanity and worldly pleasure, been such as to deserve God's favour? Would even your own sect look upon it with approval? Nay, my child, ask yourself if they would not disown and cast you from them? Out of your own mouth you stand condemned."

He paused, and a quiver of emotion betrayed that the shaft had gone home. Yvonne had been pierced between the joints of her armour. The lifelong experience of the priest had served him well; he had dealt with such sensitive natures before, and he was quick to follow up his advantage.

"If you persist in your obstinate rejection of our kind offices, remember that your good name, your fortune, your liberty, your life itself are at our mercy."

"Do you threaten me, Monsieur?" asked the girl, with a flash of indignation. "I have heard ere this that 'tis not well for health to oppose a Jesuit, but—my good name?"

"Yes, Mademoiselle Yvonne de la Féronniere, your good name!" interrupted a voice of frost. "All these months, whilst you have dallied with pleasures in the haunts of worldliness and sinful luxury, think you that no mocking eyes have gazed, no venomous tongues

* "Those whom God would destroy, He first makes mad."

have gossiped, when my friend Monsieur Adolphe de Vaudreuil was ever your sole companion? He cannot marry you if you remain a Huguenot. What then? If the rumour spreads that he has forsaken you, why, it takes him but a shrug of the shoulder, a meaning smile, and your reputation is thrown to the wolves!"

"Is he base enough so to trade upon my helplessness?" murmured Yvonne, white to the lips with horror. "But I have powerful friends——"

"Ah, Mademoiselle, believe me, ere long a Protestant will have no friends. Private knowledge hath reached me that our Most Christian Majesty will no more endure the plague spot of heresy in his realm. Yes, the impious Edict of Nantes will be revoked. Already it hath been three months before the Council, and by fire and sword the evil thing will be cast out from our midst.

"Save for those who shall be snatched like brands from the burning, it will be with the Huguenots as in the day of St. Bartholomew. Whoso dares to befriend you in that hour, it will be at the cost of fortune and of life. So perish all the enemies of my God!'

The abbé paused, with an upward gaze of assured faith. As he clasped his hands in silent prayer, the loose sleeves of his habit fell back, and revealed fleshless, distorted arms, with the bones all bent and knotted. It was a fearful sight, and Yvonne shuddered in a very passion of sudden pity and shrinking terror. Her heart sank with the conviction that this man, cruel fanatic as she deemed him, was yet in deadly earnest, and that his words were true.

There had been no lack of warnings to foreshadow some dire event; but this was grim certainty, and never had the future loomed so darkly before her. For a moment she stood paralysed, stunned as by a crashing thunderbolt; then, with the primitive instinct of a hunted animal, she vaguely thought of flight. Her soul seemed to be journeying to some far-away distance, yet still the sounds of words pursued her, though the dulcet tones of that voice, deep as a passing bell, were strange and unfamiliar.

"Remember, my daughter, that there is another side of the picture. In her eternal long-suffering, our Mother Church is ready to receive you with open arms. Then all will be well with you, your life will be a dream of happiness, the desert of this world shall blossom as the rose——"

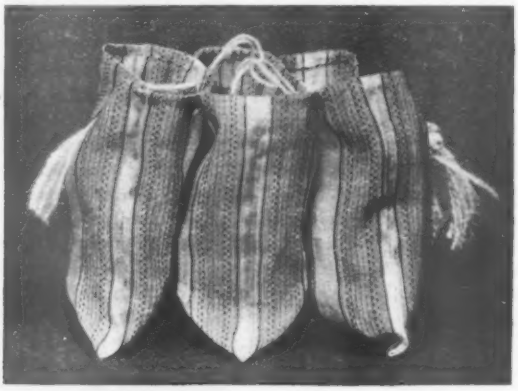
Against her will she paused to listen, moved by some compelling force. Ah, but these blandishments were an insult. It was too late to conciliate when open war had been declared. Yet the astute archer trusted that the thought of "what might have been" would rankle, in the dark days to come, like a poisoned arrow.

Yvonne never knew how she gained the quiet haven of her own chamber, for when she looked back upon that dark hour only a blurred memory remained. She found Madelon sitting placidly at her distaff, in the small inner closet. Not until she reached that calm atmosphere did the girl become conscious of the terrible strain which she had endured. The floodgates were opened, and she sobbed out her story like a wounded child.

The old nurse was too wise to check that healing dew of tears. Ere now she had known it turn the scale when life or reason trembled in the balance. The mood would soon pass, and leave the girl strong as tempered steel.

[END OF CHAPTER SEVENTEEN.]

OUR MISSIONARY SALE OF WORK.



SOME USEFUL HINTS FOR WORKERS.

OUR Missionary Sale of Work, for which we have been preparing so long, is a thing of the past, and, fortunately for us all, everybody seems pleased with the results. We have been congratulated over and over again on the care that we took to provide really useful things for the visitors, and many of our wares were so much sought after that we could have sold double the number. We took many orders to be executed later on.

For the benefit of other people who have the cares of a sale of work on their mind, we may enumerate a few of the goods that found the most willing purchasers. Judging by former experience, we provided an ample quantity of bags and boxes—for there is scarcely anybody who can resist buying something in this way. For months previously we had collected all the best of the boxes that came to the house with groceries, small purchases from the draper's, stationery, millinery—indeed, every box that was in any way shapely, strong, and neat we turned to account. Among those that sold very well were some good-sized wooden boxes that would hold a fur muff and stole. These we covered with chintz, added a fastening, and arranged inside four flaps of white linen to fold over the contents. We lined both the box itself and the lid with sheets of tar-paper. The boxes sold easily for 7s. 6d. apiece, and, apart from the actual work, they did not cost us more than half that sum.

We prepared numbers of smaller boxes for holding veils, trinkets, hat-pins, handkerchiefs, gloves, ties, collars, and cuffs. The cheaper kinds we covered only with pretty, flowery cretonne, but we raised this over a layer of wadding, and laid scent sachets under the lining at the bottom of each box.

The more expensive boxes were worthy of a place in the drawing-room to hold curios, photographs, and various other odds and ends that are apt to get lost if they are laid about on a table. These we provided with covers of brocaded silk—some looked so pretty covered with scraps that were cut off great-great-aunt Rachel's ball dress when Marjorie had it adapted for her own wear. We marked these boxes at special prices, for we felt we would rather buy them in ourselves than let them go for nothing. We need not have feared; the very fact of the brocade being really old and having been used on a grand occasion—the dress was worn at the historical ball on the night before Waterloo—sold the boxes like magic, and half an hour saw the last of them. Some little matchbox cases that we covered with the brocade, hiding the raw edges beneath a band of fancy gimp, were almost fought for by folk that we should have supposed to be far above such trifles.

A TRIPLE BAG.

Next to boxes, bags of every sort, size, and shape were the favourites. It seemed as if the inhabitants of Little Mudford had never seen a hand-bag before, so critically did they make their choice, and so proudly did they carry their purchase away. They seemed to set their affections upon the most gaudy they could find, and it was hard to repress a smile, even in church, on the Sunday after the sale, as we saw some of our bags performing the dignified office of carrying the family prayer-books.

A BULB PINCUSHION.

The triple bags, such as that shown on p. 564, for holding buttons, trinkets, and, indeed, almost any small things, proved perfectly irresistible. The most successful were fashioned of some rather stiff make of ribbon. We embroidered small devices on the outermost sides of the plain silk, but many of our bags were made of brocade and therefore needed no such addition. For a triple bag three pieces are required of exactly the same size—say, nine inches long and five inches wide. They are folded in half and neatly seamed up the sides on the wrong side. The upper edge is hemmed, and then the three bags are turned right side outermost. Two eyelet holes about two inches apart have next to be pierced and worked in each bag just below the hem. These holes must be in the same corresponding place in each bag—indeed, to be sure of this it is advisable to lay the bags one on top of the other, and to pierce through all six layers of silk at once. Place the first and second bag together, and very neatly oversew the two edges of the hems in the centre for a distance of an inch and a half. Lay the third bag alongside the other two, and join this also to the next by its hem. All three bags are now joined, and the only thing that remains to be done is to run a double cord, or ribbon drawstring through the holes that have been made to contain it. This string should be put in just as in any other kind of bag, so that by pulling the loop all the bags close up quite flatly. If firm ribbon has been used for them, the bags will stand up on the table with gaping mouths ready for the reception of any small things for which a safe place is needed. We took care to display all trifles of this sort well, but without worrying our visitors and touting unnecessarily. Many a shilling is lost on such occasions for want of a saleswoman who is quick to show off the good points of one of her wares that has struck the fancy of a visitor.

No sale would be complete nowadays without a goodly supply of pincushions, and undoubtedly those that found most favour were the hyacinths, crocuses and tulips. The model, shown in our second illustration, came from Montreux, and one of our cleverest helpers speedily set to work to copy, and perhaps improve upon it The crocuses and tulips she made from coloured sateen of appropriate colouring gummed to give it the necessary stiffness The hyacinth blooms were bought ready for use. The flowers and leaves were mounted upon a very stiff piece of wire which had substance enough to support the flowers and leaves that were bound to it with finer wire. This stem was afterwards hidden by strips of green tissue paper twisted round it after it had been smeared with paste. The lower end of the wire was allowed to project some two inches or so below the limit of the leaves because it was found necessary to build, as it were, the pincushion round it. The end of the wire was first twisted into a loop, which served to support the cotton-wool of which the pincushion was made. A wisp of the wool was pushed through the loop, then the rest was wound round and round till a bulb-shaped foundation was formed. This had, of course, to be flattened at the base to enable the whole thing to stand upright. The next part of the business required some amount of artistic taste. The outer cover consisted of ordinary tissue paper. A circle of this was cut, the bulb was stood in the centre of it, and the rest drawn up with as few wrinkles as possible to the base of the flower-stem. There it was secured with a twist, and the bulk of the paper cut away, only enough being left to give an indication of the sheath that is often found at the top of an actual bulb. The paper then had to be coloured and shaded with the brush to make it of the natural purplish tint of the skin of a hyacinth bulb, the rich brown of a tulip bulb, or the threadiness of the crocus bulb, as the case might be. Finally, a coat of gum was added, and when this was dry, the pincushion had to be subjected to very close inspection before it could be proved that it was not actually covered with some of the skin of a genuine bulb.

A BOOK-COVER.

A CASE FOR EMBROIDERY SILKS.

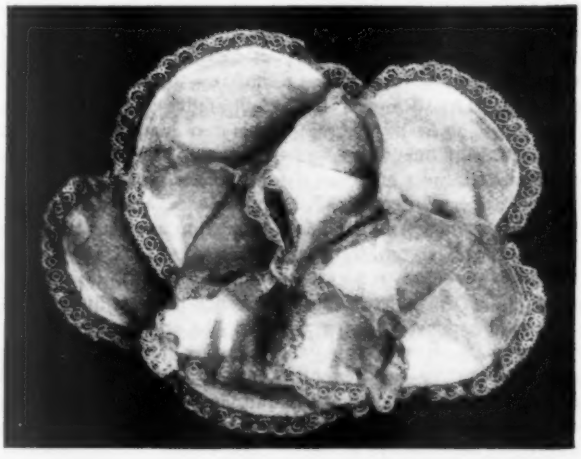
The next most popular of our goods were undoubtedly the book-covers—some with books inside them, others empty.



Many of these covers were bought ready traced for only a few pence apiece. They required nothing but stray needlefuls of silk, or Lustrines for the embroidery, and we gained fully three times their original cost. They were amply worth what they fetched, too, which is more than can be said for most bazaar wares. The dainty little book (illustrated on p. 565) was really a volume de luxe, and, as one of our visitors said, "its possession raised the keeping of accounts to a fine art." The cover itself was made of a rather coarse kind of unbleached linen. The very simple design was outlined with fine gold thread, and filled in with several shades of pinkish heliotrope, which matched the spangles that were arranged in groups at the ends of the sprays. The petals of the flower in the centre were enlivened by some smaller gilt spangles sewn on over the silken stitches. But most of our covers for photograph, postcard, note, account, and cookery books were embroidered simply with Lustrines, or flax threads, and both the gold thread and the spangles were omitted. There is something very satisfactory about the working of these book-covers, for they are all strongly made up, and the moment that the embroidery is finished and pressed, the volume can be slipped into its place, and there it is, ready for use without further trouble.

We had the usual selection of tea-cloths, tray-cloths, doyleys, nightdress cases, cushion covers, sham towels and pillow-slips of varying merit upon the tables. One of the least commonplace of the doyley patterns was that shown on p. 567. Germany provided the original design, and it was copied in many materials, sizes, and colours. It was not a very easy matter to make the first of these doyleys, which consist of three parts—a circle with five scallops and two pentagonal sections, alike in size and rather smaller than the circle. A pentagon is not an easy shape to get true, but at last we managed it, thanks to "Cassell's Popular Educator." I shall not soon forget how we cherished the final and accurate shape that we made in paper as a guide for cutting all the rest. The circle with the scalloped edge lies at the bottom, right side uppermost, and forms the base of the doyley. Upon it are placed the two pentagons, the bottom one having the right side uppermost, the top one with the wrong side upwards. If the two sides can be made reversible, so much the better. The points of the lower pentagon should be tacked to the edge of the circle between every scallop. The points of the upper pentagon should rest against those of the lower section, and the edges should be tacked together in the middle of each side—that is, between the points. The three layers should be held together by a line of stitching, following the outline of the pentagon, and carried round it about three inches within the edges. In every point of the uppermost pentagon should be sewn one of the buttonholed rings that are so much used now in point lace-making. When the doyley is finished, a cord or ribbon has to be run through each of these rings in turn. One end of it is then passed again through the first ring, the other end through the last ring. Until this cord is pulled up tightly, and the ends tied and tucked away into the centre, there is simply a collection of three flat doyleys laid one above the other. When the draw-string is tightened, there is a series of fascinating little pockets, each ready for its share of cakes, hot chestnuts, baked potatoes, sandwiches, scones, or anything else that the owner of the doyley may elect to put into them. The most dainty of these triple doyleys were the little ones made of mull muslin, the edges frilled dressily with lace. Others were rather severely fashioned from damask, and edged with fine crochet. Some were embroidered, others left plain, and all found admirers and purchasers at prices ranging from 2s. 6d. upwards.

Cases for holding embroidery silks, like that shown on the opposite page, proved novelties to many of our customers. The cases are sent out, cover and all complete, at a very moderate price. The pockets for the threads consist merely of white paper cunningly folded, made up into book-form, with stiff outer leaves. This cardboard binding slips into pockets made in the linen cover just as the book, already described, fits into its case. It may easily be guessed of what material these covers are made, since nowadays linen is "the only wear" for such trifles. Fairly coarse in texture, and approaching to brown in colour, it forms a good background for simple embroidery in shades of green and other colours of Peri-Lusta, if silk is not available. The green was, of course, in the example illustrated, used for stems and leaves, brighter hues being employed for the fruits and lettering.

Such are a few characteristic samples of the trifles that found favour at our sale, with which we did a far better trade than do many other vendors with more ambitious wares. We have already begun to save up scraps of gay materials, boxes, and odds and ends of all sorts, with a view to next year.

A TRIPLE DOYLEY.

THE CHRISTIAN BUDGET

By the Rev. H. B. Freeman, M.A.,
Vicar of Burton-on-Trent.

MOST of us have a difficulty with regard to thinking in millions, and the statistician, like his converse, the poet, is probably born rather than made. But figures, if we do not trust them too implicitly, or rely on them for verdicts too elaborate and conclusive, may have much to teach anybody whose arithmetic is equal to glancing down a column of digits, and noting the total. It is only with figures "in the rough" that our proposed estimate of some of the annual monies spent throughout the United Kingdom by Church and Chapel for religious purposes, can attempt to deal.

For all of us an admirable address, read before the British Association at Southport last autumn, on "The Wealth of the Empire, and how it should be used," ought to be of great service in clearing and codifying our ideas as to the gigantic and complicated subject of national finance. The author, Sir Robert Giffen, K.C.B., has been so courteous as to direct me to The Times, September 12th, 1903, as containing a correct and substantially verbatim report of his illuminating paper. Let us take the stupendous figure-facts, elucidated by his labours, as the groundwork for what we wish to say. (It may be more convenient to the general reader if we write the big amounts in words, rather than by long lines of numerals.) Sir Robert places the aggregate expenditure for one year, in the United Kingdom, at the almost inconceivable total of one thousand three hundred and eighty-six millions. A million, we recollect, is a thousand thousand; A clock which ticks seconds would require 11 days, 46 minutes, 40 seconds to mark off a million. To tick through the one thousand three hundred and eighty-six millions the long-suffering timepiece would want (without a pause) 16,081 days 16 hours—or 44 years, 21 days, 16 hours of ordinary years; but if the eleven leap years are taken into account, the cheerful little task could be ended in 44 years, 10 days, 16 hours. Supposing that he total expenditure was laid in a row in sovereigns, with the space of one-eighth of an inch between each, the golden coins would reach five and a half times round the polar diameter of the earth, with thirty-nine millions of sovereigns to spare.

Without following this vast total into all its channels of distribution, we observe that our food and drink absorb four hundred and sixty-eight millions annually, and our dress one hundred and eighty-two millions, while our houses (and this item includes rent, furniture, coal, gas, and water) cost us two hundred and twenty-three millions of pounds. On our shelter then, upon our backs, and upon the sustenance (and exhilaration) of our bodily life, we, the inhabitants of the United Kingdom, spend from January to December eight hundred and seventy-three millions. Most of us, we repeat, feel like children in the contemplation of such statistics, and it would need something in the way of a tremendous contrast to force any definite impression upon our numbed minds. Such a contrast is ready to hand. Sir Robert Giffen shows that thirty millions only are annually afforded for education, and a paltry twenty-five millions for all religious purposes whatsoever.

The eminent statistician whom we are quoting remarks that, so far as his object is concerned, this "£25,000,000 for Church may be passed over with such reflections as may occur to some respecting the smallness of the amount devoted by the people generally to 'saving their souls,' compared with the vast sums for food, raiment, shelter, and other purposes."

And it is our own main desire to show how a portion of the twenty-five millions is made up, which the Christianity of the United Kingdom can muster for the greatest work in the world. It must be distinctly understood that we can only hope to present samples of religious effort. The Churches differ very much in the facilities they afford, by their year-books and other sources of discovery, for an outside survey of their annual disbursements. Let me take as an example the Congregationalists. A friend of mine, a minister of long standing in that denomination, says, "I do not think you could possibly obtain all the information you want without applying to each of our 4,847 churches and mission stations. The Congregational Year-Book gives no such particulars, except very partially and incompletely. The London Missionary Society, which is worked by Congregationalists, spent on foreign missions for the year ending March 31st, 1903, the sum of £173,437 2s. For church aid and home missionary work we spent £26,095 12s. 6d. In this item the stipend of ministers is included; but it is most important to remember that this refers only to weak churches, a small proportion of our 4,847. We have no collected accounts of stipends paid to ministers by churches which receive no aid, nor any summary of the cost of new or renovated buildings, except in cases where a grant from our Church Building Society has been made. I regret this, as the smaller sums have sometimes been mistakenly used as representing the whole amount expended. For Irish missions £1,500 was raised, and for Colonial missions £8,956."

My friend's letter is proof of how fragmentary any financial ecclesiastical estimate must be. This necessary limitation has a certain compensating advantage. It is a bar to the detestable practice of pitting denomination against denomination, and viewing the material products of a year's working with a partisan triumph, or a jealousy the reverse of godly. Authentic financial rivalry is impossible—the data for it simply do not exist. To the Congregational details given above, we should like to add that the summary cash account of the Twentieth Century Fund, from June 6th, 1899, to April 30th, 1902, was £710,724.*

By far the most extensive and elaborate of the 1902–3 year-books which I have been able to examine is that of the Established Church, and it is only fair to take this careful compilation, as well as the numerical superiority of Church people, into account, in estimating these voluntary revenues. In the summaries everything in the way of Government aid has been rigidly omitted. But the accuracy of these calculations, the most complete of all, is again, to a certain extent, vitiated by the fact that 2 per cent of the clergy, representing in some cases parishes of considerable size, vouchsafed no return. Nor is any account made of subscriptions to societies for the support of which Churchmen and Nonconformists work together, such as the British and Foreign Bible Society (which spends £700 daily), the Religious Tract Society, and various spiritual and philanthropic agencies at home and abroad.

For home missions the contribution was £613,680; for foreign missions, £821,853; for educational work, £124,411. For the education of the sons of the clergy, the relief of those who are poor, and the support of widows and orphans, £199,484. For philanthropic work, including industrial schools, preventive homes, orphanages, and cottage hospitals, £550,566. The above sums represent funds contributed to central and diocesan institutions, and their total is £2,309,994.

We now come to funds locally raised, and we find that, for the maintenance of assistant clergy, and for subsidies to clerical incomes, there was provided, within twelve months, £846,474. The sum for elementary education, which includes Sunday schools and school buildings, stands at £1,194,274. Help in the compilation of these figures is given by the returns from the Education Department. We next examine monies contributed for general parochial purposes, and we find that church services, etc., account for £1,313,639. An even larger item is that of church building, etc., which totals £1,395,513. The sum for the endowment of benefices reaches £184,015; and parsonages have cost £150,767. With other items the total for this department is £5,907,319. If we add this to our former tota'

* If we may break our rule so far as to quote from the 1904 year-book, published this January, we would mention the sum of £14,991 14s. 4d. expended in 1903 on six theological colleges; but it must be noted that there are six others, including Mansfield College, Oxford, which make no return in the year-book. Each college issues its own separate report.

of funds not locally raised, we shall find that what the editor of the year-book calls "a conscientious and careful effort" to represent the income of the Church of England for the year ending Easter, 1902, exhibits the gross total (minus, we repeat, anything in the way of Government aid) of eight million two hundred and seventeen thousand three hundred and thirteen pounds (£8,217,313).

Of the work of the Baptist churches, I wish it were possible to procure an adequate conspectus. For the greater portion of the figures subjoined I am indebted to the kindness of another ministerial friend, who, however, would disclaim having access to any special means of knowledge as to the annual assets of his denomination. He prefaces his details by saying, "All the items given are for denominational purposes, the great bulk of the money raised yearly in our churches is for their own specific work, ministers' salaries, maintenance of chapels, Sunday schools, etc. This bulk it is quite impossible to ascertain, as no returns are presented, either to the associations or to the Baptist Union. There are 2,700 churches, and if they averaged £200 each the amount would reach £540,000. I mention this, not because I have the least ground for supposing that this average is anywhere near the mark, but only to show that the amount raised for denominational purposes is but a small part of the total contributed by the Baptist churches of this country for Christian work." With this important proviso the following statistics are instructive; they are taken for the year 1902–3:

	£	s.	d.
Home missions, including associations ... (N.B.—This does not include the home mission work done by individual churches—a large amount, but figures not obtainable)	24,067	0	0
Foreign missions	89,900	0	0
Cost of buildings erected and improved ...	130,368	0	0
Chapel debts paid off or diminished	90,787	0	0
For support of colleges	18,275	1	5
Augmentation of stipends	2,331	0	8
General expenses of Baptist Union and amounts raised for Sunday schools, say	10,000	0	0
	£365,788	2	1

My informant adds: "I am not able to state the amount raised for our Annuity Fund, which includes widows and orphans of ministers" The year-book for 1902 gives £8,205 as the annual disbursement for this object of the Yorkshire Society. On May 18th, 1902, the Rev. J. H. Shakespeare announced promises for the Baptist Twentieth Century Fund amounting to £250,000. This quarter of a million is allocated as follows: For home evangelisation, £125,000; help to weaker churches and aged ministers, etc., £60,000; scholarships, £6,000; Baptist Church House, £34,000; education, etc., £25,000. It is obvious that, to make even an approximate guess at the gross annual Baptist income, we should have to take some imaginary congregational average (the £540,000 suggested above is probably far too small for the total), and to add it to the totals otherwise obtained.

With regard to Wesleyan Methodist work, I am saved a good deal of trouble and probable understatement by the complaisance of two distinguished ministers, who have been so good as to write specially in answer to my inquiries. The Rev. Marshall Hartley, President of Conference, says: "I have the pleasure to inform you that our expenditure on foreign mission work for 1902 was £152,007 0s. 8d. This sum, however, only represents the payments recorded at headquarters in London. There was a further sum raised and expended within the districts, to which the Society makes grants in aid, and this further accounts for £245,831 6s. 7d. The total expenditure was therefore £397,838 7s. 3d." The Rev. H. J. Pope, D.D., Secretary of the Wesleyan Home Mission Committee, encloses the annual report, but warns me that it deals only with the money contributed to the general fund, from which grants were made to special cases. From this report I gather that the total income of the fund for 1902 has been £36,563 16s. 3d. Dr. Pope appends some very valuable information: "I am not able to give you the cost of the great missions in our large towns; these all publish their own separate reports. As to the entire annual cost of the work of our Church, I have gone into the matter repeatedly as fully as possible, and I believe that approximately the entire sum expended by us in support of our ministers, in home and foreign missions, chapel building, day and Sunday school education, the Children's Home and other charities, is about one million six hundred thousand (or, more likely, seven hundred thousand) pounds (£1,700,000). I am sorry I am not able to give you more detailed information." *

From the annual statement of the West

* I should like also to be allowed to thank the Rev. Thomas Law, the Secretary of the National Council of the Evangelical Free Churches, who has pointed me to several avenues in my inquiry.

London Mission, sent me by the Rev. Ensor Walters, I find that the turnover for the year ending March 31st, 1903, was (roughly added up, for no final summary is given) about £14,000. With this output it is interesting to compare the turnover, also for a year, of one of the largest and richest Anglican churches in London—St. Mary Abbott's, Kensington. The Vicar, as may be seen by his last year-book, puts his total for 1902 down at £22,687.

The synopsis of the Twentieth Century Fund of the United Methodist Free Churches on June 30th, 1903, stood as follows: Total amount promised by home churches, £108,345; paid to central fund, £42,804; to local purposes, £35,933. Total, £78,737.

We might mention that the comparatively small body of the Methodist New Connexion shows, as the result of its Beneficent Fund for 1902–3, £5,669. The Chapel Fund yielded £763, while the statement of the Mission Fund stands at £8,556. It will, we hope, be understood that it is only from lack of space and opportunity for inquiry that the annual financial harvests of the numerically smaller bodies within the United Kingdom are omitted from this survey. Their product, according to their means and numbers, is quite as generous as that of the broader fields of Christian organisation.

With regard to the Presbyterian Church of England, some massive figures are obtainable. For the year ending with 1902, the sustentation fund had paid to ministers direct £46,059, and through the widows' and orphans' fund, £1,235. Congregational contributions to synodical schemes for 1902 are put down at £24,365. The balances and investments on behalf of the Church, at the close of 1902, are given as £29,277 and £248,766 respectively. The congregational income for 1902 is £241,470. The summary of the congregational and synodical finances for 1902, i.e. total receipts of the Church for all purposes, reaches £298,634. The receipts for synodical funds (including home, foreign, and Jewish missions, and the £24,365 given above) are stated as £58,576. I have found all these figures in the latest copy available of "Minutes of the Synod." Concerning the Churches of Scotland, a well-known year-book says the income of the Established Church is £518,590, and of the United Free Church, £1,088,236.

The Classified Directory to the Metropolitan Charities sets down the following among sums contributed to London benevolent agencies during the year 1903:—Bible societies, £330,755; book and tract societies, £89,027; home missions, £894,158; home and foreign missions, £445,206; foreign missions, £1,304,056. Total, three millions and sixty-three thousand two hundred and two pounds (£3,063,202).

At the close of an attempt which, by its very conditions, must be without finality or completeness, and has therefore, as we said, the negative recommendation of being useless for controversial purposes, three thoughts, two of them encouraging, seem to emerge: (1) The Christian does present his "Budget," and it is no unworthy one. He is not, as a rule, among the richest men in his community, and he often pinches his own life to give a solid and substantial reason for the faith that is in him. His devotion to the Unseen and Eternal is at least a splendid protest in an age of selfishness and materialism. Deprecating comparison and rivalry, he has yet a justifiable zeal that his own "Church," that body of Christians to which his convictions compel him to belong, should be in the van of progress.

(2) The Christian shows by his "Budget," imperfectly as, through our misfortune rather than through our fault, we have submitted it, how many tasks he undertakes which would be otherwise thrown upon the State, and would increase the burden of national taxation. Apart from educational aids, outsiders might well acknowledge the immense amount of philanthropic and social work which is accomplished, as a matter of course, by all living churches—their care of the young, the fallen, the starving, and the helpless. From the £22,000 spent yearly in honest wages at the Church Army homes, to the many mouths filled daily at C. H. Spurgeon's Orphanage, such practical enterprises are the glory of each Christian denomination.

(3) And then, at the back of all the best the "Budget" can do, there is the sad problem which Sir Robert Giffen touched but lightly, and on which we are not now disposed to dwell. Our aim has been that of the elementary arithmetician rather than of the moralist. Sir Robert's figures indicate that there is provided annually for religious work within the United Kingdom hardly one-eighteenth of the sum which is expended in these little islands on the "meat which perisheth." The twenty-five millions for Church and Chapel contrast curiously with those one hundred and seventy-nine million pounds poured, in strong drink, down the nation's throat. Last year we spent about as much on our religion as we did upon our tobacco.

XUM

AN EMERGENCY GIRL

A Complete Story by E. C. Gidley.

IGH up among the roofs of the great city, in a small, poorly furnished room, a man lay battling between life and death. He had carried on this unequal warfare now for the past six months, sometimes getting the better of his enemy, sometimes getting the worse.

He was not old as men count years—barely thirty-one, and life, instead of closing, ought to have been spreading out before him. But the seeds of consumption had been passed on from another generation, and the tale of his years was numbered by months.

He had not even been armed with the weapons wherewith to fight the deadly, insidious enemy. Nothing that wealth could buy was his; no kindly disposed friend had come forward with the money which might have alleviated his lot, even though powerless to save his life. Gerard Annesley was poor.

And because there is generally to be found in every case some compensation, however inadequate, the invalid had his, in the shape of a sister, whose heart ached over the sufferings which she could do so little to prevent or cure, though her presence cheered and comforted him when all else failed.

Muriel Annesley's time was not her own, however; she was an emergency girl. That is to say, for a slight remuneration she supplied the place of any invited guest at the houses of the wealthy who happened in cases of emergency to fail their hostess at the last moment. It was generally in the case of dinners that her presence was required; big "squashes," where one more or less did not make much difference, she rarely attended; but she found it hard enough to eat the dinners and make light, interesting conversation when her heart was far away from the chatter and dainties and gaily dressed company she was supposed to form one of. Her brother's pale, patient face would come between her and the brilliant barrister on her right, who desired her entire attention to his clever repartee, and a lump would rise in her throat as she strove to eat some morsel which would have been so welcome to the delicate palate of the invalid in the fourth-storey attic who lay awaiting her return before going to sleep.

She had been an emergency girl for two years, during which time she had earned at least sufficient to keep herself and her brother from actual want. Once, when she had been a little girl, she had lived in a pretty rose-covered parsonage, and her days had been passed as a happy butterfly's, almost without a care. But the father had been too delicate to continue his work, and by-and-by he had passed to the other land, struck down by the same fell disease which was slowly but surely killing Gerard. Fortunately they—Muriel and he—had been the only offspring; and when their mother had followed the husband she had mourned so deeply, not four years later, the brother and sister, left with very little, drifted to London, where Muriel found the employment which a friend had suggested to her. The girl was just twenty, tall and elegant of figure, with clear, limpid blue eyes and golden hair. Her charming presence certainly made her in request with the agent in whose hands she had placed herself, and for want of more lucrative employment she followed up her success.

One evening, after Gerard had had an especially trying day, she was due at a smart dinner in Park Lane, the hostess, Lady Blenner, having been disappointed quite at the last moment.

"I wish you hadn't to go, Muriel," the man said, and for the first time in his life his tone was fretful. "It does seem hard that you can't stay with me just for to-night. Couldn't you put it off?"

"Put it off, Gerard dearest? What would the agent say? It's as good as my place is worth to fail. I'm an emergency girl, you know!"

She tried to laugh, but one glance at the pain in his tired eyes froze the little attempt at cheerfulness.

"It does seem hard!" the man interrupted, almost fiercely. "I ought to be working for you, instead of you keeping me a useless log."

"Useless log? Oh, Gerard, hush! You could never be that, darling!" the girl cried agonisingly. Gerard was usually so patient and uncomplaining; he must certainly be worse to-night. "Always believe that I should not know how to get on without you; I should be so lonely by myself. Gerard, you must, you shall believe that you are all the world to me—all my little world, darling!"

"'Let me look in your eyes: I am all humility.'"—p. 576.

She kissed his forehead passionately, and calmed by her evident misery, he put his hand out and stroked her bright head.

"Forgive me, little sister," he said penitently. "I believe you, I do indeed. There, there, go and dress yourself; and don't forget to come in and show me your finery before you start. Park Lane! You'll have an excellent dinner, darling, and lots to tell me about when you come back."

He smiled, and Muriel, kissing him, slipped off to the still smaller room which she called her very own.

Twenty minutes later a vision of loveliness stood by his bedside.

"That will do," he said approvingly, "though I always feel on such occasions I ought to come and look after you. No, I'm not going to grumble again it's only what I always think, though I know you have a cab, and do the thing in style—at your hostess's expense. There, I'm quite comfortable now, little woman, so you can be off. Don't forget to look in on me as you go to bed."

* * * * * *

"You don't think there is a law of compensation, Miss Annesley?"

The successful novelist, who was practically the "lion" of Lady Blenner's evening, attracted by something in his companion's face, had sought an introduction to her, and her ladyship had reluctantly effected it.

Muriel Annesley brought her thoughts together with an effort. She nodded gravely. "There is no such thing," she answered in low, rapid tones. "How could there be so much unevenness in life, so much of an unequal distribution of things, so much fighting to be done, if every human creature could say, 'I am fully compensated for all that my more fortunate brethren enjoy.' Does pain compensate for the absence of pleasure? Does an unequal fight with things temporal in itself compensate one for the inequality? Does death compensate—for life?"

"I admit some cases are singular," he said, "and I have no doubt that you are arguing from one point of view. But, believe me, Miss Annesley, there is a compensation for all pain; there is a compensation even for death itself, in the fact of the life beyond this."

"It is easy to believe in the theory," the girl answered bitterly, "but how about the people who never suffer; who dance through life with an easy conscience, happy in the secure belief that when death comes it will but be the beginning of an equally—not to say more—pleasant life in another world. There is much compensation in that thought, isn't there, for the poor and the maimed who have suffered all their lives here and hope, if they have been sufficiently patient and uncomplaining, to be admitted to the joys of heaven hereafter?"

The arrival of some fresh guests for the musical portion of the reception put an end to further conversation; but ere they parted Dermot acknowledged that she had put him a hard question.

"I shall meet you again, no doubt, Miss Annesley, when we will renew the topic of our conversation. Meanwhile, take my advice: do all you can not to deliberately get out of your depth."

It was on the tip of the girl's tongue to tell him that it was highly improbable that they would meet again, but force of circumstances tied her tongue; her hostess could not be betrayed to suit her own convenience, so without another word she slipped away, and soon afterwards left the house.

On her way home she thought about the kindly eyed, clever man who had talked to her as to a woman of understanding, and in her heart of hearts she was forced to acknowledge that she would not be sorry if his supposition were to come true and they were to meet again.

Delamere, too, could not get the wistful, bitter face out of his mind. Who she was, and what she did, he knew not; but as the days wore on, he hoped against hope that he would see her again. She had seemed so different from the general run of girls, and he would much like to study her sufficiently for the principal character in his new book.

He came across her name most unexpectedly at the Temple Rose Show. An old college friend—a clergyman in the East End of London whom he had not seen for some years—introduced the subject. It was little really that he knew about the invalid brother and his sister; but he had visited the former once or twice in the capacity of priest, and Gerard had not taken to him sufficiently to make friends with him.

So he knew little or nothing about the life-history of the two.

"Annesley!" Delamere ejaculated, reading the name on a certain exquisite rose, as he made a tour of the tents in the company of his newly discovered college friend. "That reminds me. A girl of that name asked me a question at dinner the other night—a question which, I think, from your experience you should be in a better position than I am to answer."

"Annesley is the name of a brother and sister I know," returned the Rev. Raymond Whalley, as his little steps pattered after Dermot's. "The brother is an invalid, and the sister is very nice too, as far as I can judge; but I think she spends too much of her time in society. Only the other evening I happened to call in on the poor fellow, and he was alone. When I inquired for the sister she was dining out at ———."

"What evening was that? Dining out?" cried Dermot excitedly. "I think she must be the same Miss Annesley. I met her at dinner."

"All that I can say is, then, that I think she ought to have been at home looking after her sick brother, who is dying. The next time you meet her ask her a question, don't let her ask you!"

"She is tall and beautiful," began Dermot, nothing abashed.

"So much the worse," answered the vicar angrily. "Her brother is dying—anyone can see that—and yet night after night, so the landlady told me, she goes out in a cab, dressed up in all her finery, to dinners and receptions and, for all we know, to balls!"

"But she didn't look that sort, really," put in Delamere hurriedly. He was loth to believe ill of his interesting companion.

"No, they never do," responded Whalley in a dry tone; "they prefer you to believe, of course, that they are the ones to be pitied, that life owes them some compensation."

"Compensation!" The word struck curiously on Dermot's ear. Was that not the very word she had used and harped upon?

As luck would have it, he came face to face with the subject of his discussion half an hour later just outside the Temple, walking slowly down the Embankment.

Notwithstanding her callous treatment and her desertion of the invalid brother, he felt he must stop her, if only to look once more into the depths of her blue eyes.

"Miss Annesley!" he said, and there was a satisfaction in the tones of his voice which conveyed more than his mere words. "I am so glad to meet you again. I have just seen a friend of yours—Mr. Whalley. You must ask him the answer to your question."

"Mr. Whalley!" Muriel reiterated. "Oh no; I don't think he could answer. I don't think he quite—approves of me."

"That's just it," responded Dermot firmly. "You should not give him cause to think ill of you. You see, he has told me about your invalid brother. How can you think it worth your while to go out and enjoy yourself when he is dying? Miss Annesley, believe me, I want to be your friend, if you will let me. Take my advice. Let me come and see your brother; it would give me great pleasure. Besides, you interest me more than any woman I have ever met."

His eyes spoke eloquently. If Muriel had not been a believer in love at first sight before she had met this man, she certainly had grounds for changing her opinions now.

But—his friendship? Ah, God alone knew what a comfort and delight that would be to her had she only dared to avail herself of it. But pride—the pride of poverty, which is the strongest of all—and the knowledge that her employment would leak out when it must be kept a secret—as the agent had particularly stipulated—made yet another fight unequal.

"I am sorry, Mr. Delamere," she said at length, standing still and holding out her hand. "We—move in different spheres, you and I, and no good could come of a friendship between us. My brother is quite happy with me"—here her voice broke a little, and a sob escaped her lips which she had tried in vain to stifle—"we had better each go our own ways."

He turned on her then. She had shattered all his newly formed ideals of her sex, and it was excusable that he should feel a little hurt, and that his wounded spirit should show itself in words he hardly chose with care.

"Go your own way then," he said passionately. "I thought you all that was noble in woman, even in the short space of time I had passed in your company, but I find I was mistaken. Mr. Whalley tried to warn me; but, Heaven knows, I believed in you until your own lips condemned you. Compensation is what you cry for—well, I suppose you have it in your gaieties——"

"Stop!" cried Muriel, "That will do, Mr. Delamere; I know what you think of me now, and—I—cannot excuse myself!" She looked at him defiantly. "You have said all you wanted to say, and I—must get back to my—gaieties! I am dining out to-night!"

With a bitter little laugh she slipped past his outstretched detaining hand, and a moment later Dermot was alone.

That same evening Muriel dressed despondently. She could not disguise the fact from herself that her brother was getting past human aid; and yet she had to go out and be merry to earn the wherewithal to keep body and soul together. It was with a heavy heart that she stepped out of a cab when she returned. Delamere had formed one of the party; he was much sought after, but he had taken no notice of her beyond a curt bow, which had somehow hurt her more than all the words he had said that afternoon. No doubt he had thought she enjoyed herself — heartless creature!

She half tumbled up the narrow, creaking stairs which lay between her and rest, and ever so gently she opened the door of Gerard's little attic. Something clutched at her heart—already so overladen. That still form on the bed in the corner—surely that was not her brother!

She crept nearer, whispering his name softly, tenderly. "Gerard, are you sleeping?" she cried.

She picked up one of the shrunken white hands on the coverlet, to caress it; but dropped it with an exclamation. This Gerard? Ah, no, that cold hand, that calm, still face, that stiff form!

Gerard would never speak to her again. He was dead!

With a hysterical laugh she flung herself on the body, and an exceedingly bitter cry escaped her parched lips.

It was thus that the landlady found them the next morning—the cold, dead brother, and the satin-clad sister—and she had some difficulty in separating them.

* * * * * *

How it came to pass no one could exactly tell, but the money for poor young Annesley's funeral was forthcoming anonymously, and later on, it is to be supposed, Raymond Whalley, having gleaned the whole state of the case from Muriel's landlady, who repeated the wanderings of the girl's delirious mind, eased his own conscience in the matter by retailing the story to his friend Delamere, whom he met not long afterwards. The result was that Dermot went immediately to see the girl he had so wronged, and succeeded in his mission so well that she, under protest, allowed herself to be taken away for change of air to the house of an old friend of his—a doctor living at the seaside, whose wife took charge of the desolate girl, and soon grew to like her so much that she made her a proposal to live with her altogether as her adopted daughter.

"I shall have to begin again soon to earn my own living," Muriel made answer, "and, dear Mrs. Bennett, you know I'm only an emergency girl."

The conversation was taking place in the doctor's garden. Mrs. Bennett looked up suddenly and caught sight of Delamere. She motioned him to come and take her place, in the shade just behind Muriel's deck chair, and, nothing loth, he did so, while the worthy lady, who had long guessed his secret, retreated into the house, congratulating herself upon her astuteness.

"You are never, with my permission, going to be an emergency girl again," said a deeper voice than Mrs. Bennett had ever possessed. "Muriel," bending forward suddenly until he leant over her shoulder, "darling, I know I deserve only to be told to go away and never look upon your face again, after my doubts of you; but will you try to forget and forgive, and then some day perhaps you will let me ask you a very important question which your heart will have to answer. Darling, is it so very impossible a thing?"

The passion in his voice awoke an echo in the girl's own heart. He had doubted her, but what of that? When a woman loves deeply, there are few things she cannot forgive.

"I am afraid I have already forgotten," she said in a low voice.

Dermot slipped round in front of her chair, and imprisoned both her hands.

"You have already forgotten," he repeated joyously. "Then perhaps I may hope. Muriel, don't turn away your face, sweet; let me look in your eyes; I am all humility, and you are my judge."

He slipped his hand under her chin, and, compelled thereto, she raised her eyes. What they held for him he was well able to make out for himself—so well that Mrs. Bennett had to come right down to the bottom of the garden before she could make them hear that tea was ready.

"Congratulate me, Mrs. Bennett," he cried, as he led Muriel in triumph towards her. "I am engaged to——"

"An emergency girl!" whispered Muriel, her eyes shining.

THE NEW BISHOP OF MANCHESTER.

By Raymond Blathwayt.

(With Illustrations from Photographs by Cassell and Co., Ltd.)

THE BISHOP OF MANCHESTER.

A RIPPLE of delighted laughter ran through the great meeting hall of the Church Congress of a year or two back as the then Bishop of Coventry delivered a speech on the Education Question much to the taste of his audience — High Church, Broad Church, and Evangelical though it was. Keen, clever, caustic, full of humour, it was exactly the kind of utterance to suit the varied palates of his many hearers, and he himself—a tall, dignified, clean-shaven, fresh-coloured personality, with a vigorous emphasis, a clear, ringing voice, and a rough and ready eloquence, was just the man to appeal to a popular audience.

In a word, a strong man, and in many respects the very man required for such a diocese as that of Manchester—a diocese where common-sense, lofty uprightness, and a thorough knowledge of the world, are all essential in the character of its bishop, and yet a diocese in which spirituality and other-worldliness will be regarded with love and respect, should such qualities be forthcoming in the new bishop. But will they? Let us wait and see.

The Bishop has before him no light task, and no one is more thoroughly conscious of this than he himself. He is succeeding three remarkable men, of whom the first two—Bishop Prince Lee and Bishop Fraser—were not only remarkable, but were also really great men, men who would have distinguished themselves in any line of life. No one, of course, conscious of the meaning and value of words, would ever claim for the late Bishop of Manchester greatness in the same degree; yet he will be a difficult man to succeed, for rarely indeed has there been a more capable bishop than he who first won his episcopal spurs in the colonies—James Moorhouse.

So Dr. Knox has a mighty task before him, but in the opinion of those who know him best it is more than possible that he will lie down at the finish the equal of his predecessors, if not perhaps—in a connection where comparisons are always odious—the greatest and the most remarkable Bishop Manchester has ever known.

But that is looking far ahead. For the present one thing is certain, and that is Manchester secures a singularly capable, hard-headed man, blessed with ideas, originality, and a certain amount of carefully restrained imagination; and a man with a strong line of his own upon certain definite questions of the day. Education, for instance; and I present the Bishop's views upon education wholly apart from any political opinions which he may hold—does, indeed, most strongly hold—upon the matter. I give but his ideas, with which all must perforce agree, for the Bishop is an educationalist who has made a scientific study of the whole question—a question which, you must remember, contains the whole future of the Empire within its ever-widening embrace. Now the Bishop as an ecclesiastic is keenly concerned that religion and education shall never be divorced, but as a man of strong common-sense and remarkable far-sightedness he sees truly enough that, if divorce is to be averted, there must be reform in many essential particulars. As he himself says, "Whilst the school is being modernised, the Church is being fossilised," and the remedy lies in a revivification of the Church, that is, the Church of Christ, for the Bishop is far too broad-minded a man to limit the sphere and influence of Christianity only to one branch of it. The child, he says, to be properly educated, must be environed from its infancy with a living Church, not a fossilised one. And he is wholly opposed to the curious idea, prevalent in a large and increasing circle of the clergy, that the modern advance in education is a thing to be dreaded, to be regarded with suspicion. On the contrary, he rejoices in it, for he is of opinion that the spread of education and the growing power of the school is not something which Churchmen are called upon to regard with suspicion or jealousy, but rather with deep thankfulness. "For," says he, "we have nothing to fear from the light. What we have to apprehend is lest a spirit of timidity or conservatism (sometimes a convenient alias for indolence) should prevent us from keeping abreast with all that is best in the advance of educational method. We have no excuse for such timidity. For our Church has laid on us educational responsibilities which can only be fulfilled by close alliance with our day-school teachers, and by trying to learn all that is best in their system. We are not to regard the offices of minister and teacher as antagonistic, but as gifts of the same Spirit."

THE DRAWING ROOM AT BISHOP'S COURT.

THE BISHOP'S PRIVATE CHAPEL.

